The ſame Baſil ſaith, that from the prayers of men, women and children to God, a mixed ſound was heard in the Church, as it were of a wave daſhing againſt the ſhore, in Hexam. Hom. 4. to. 1. p. 46. Which words of Baſil Ambroſe almoſt tranſlateth, ſaying, That the Church is well compared to the ſea, becauſe in the prayer of all the common people ſhe makes a noiſe, as in the reflux of the waters; then both from the reſponſes of the Pſalms, and the ſinging of men, women and children, reſults a ſound like that of waters. Hex. l. 3. c. 5. The Churches prayers were therefore uttered then in ſuch a language as all the common people, yea even women and children were acquainted with.

Jerom, in the 5th cent. ſpeaking of the concourſe of the whole ſwarm of eaſtern, and many of the weſtern nations to Jeruſalem, ſaith, their voice indeed is divers, but their religion is one; we have almoſt as many choirs of ſingers, as there be diverſity of nations, Ep. Paulæ & Euſtath. ad Marcell. apud Hieron. F. 45. B. When Paula died, ſaith he, they did not follow with houlings and lamentations, as the men of the world are wont to do, but with ſwarms of Pſalms in divers languages. Then, ſaith he, the Pſalms ſounded in the whole multitude of Paleſtine being then preſent, in Epitaph. Paulæ, F. 65. B.

Caſſiodorus, upon pſalm the 44th, in the 6th cent. writes thus: Let us ſearch why the Church of God is praiſed for the variety of her raiment, ſince all ſimplicity and unity agrees to her, but here this ſignifies the variety and multiplicity of tongues, becauſe all nations ſing in the Church according to the language of their country, that they may ſhew to the author of virtues a moſt beautiful variety.

And Cæſarius, Archbiſhop of Arles, ſpeaks thus unto the people, Hom. 34. I deſire and admoniſh you, my dear brethren, that as oft as the Clergy pray at the altar, or the deacon ſummons you to prayer, by crying, Let us kneel down, you would faithfully incline not only your hearts, but your bodies alſo. Where, obſerve, that it was the cuſtom of the deacon before prayer, to ſay to the people, Let us kneel down, and when prayer was finiſhed, Stand up, which he muſt do in vain, if they underſtood not what he ſaid, and much leſs could they faithfully incline their hearts unto the prayer which they underſtood not.

Moreover, all the eccleſiaſtical offices uſed both in the weſtern, and in the eaſtern churches, ſhew that they were celebrated in a tongue the people were ſuppoſed to underſtand.

That the prayers were read in a tongue underſtood by the people, appears not only from their conſtant cuſtom of ſaying Amen to them, which, ſaith Jerom, they ſounded forth like thunder, Prœm. 2. in Epiſt. ad Galat. f. 75. and which was, ſaith Auſtin, their ſubſcription, conſent, and their aſtipulation to the prayer, but alſo from the ſhare they had in them, and from the prieſt's invitation of them to pray with him. The old Ordo Romanus was compoſed by, or in the time of Gregory the Great, and it declareth, that the prieſt turned himſelf unto the people, ſaying, Let us pray; that he ſtood by the altar, ſaying, The Lord be with you, and, Let us pray; now, to what end ſhould he thus turn himſelf unto them, or thus ſpeak, if they perceived not the meaning of his words, or could not join with him in the prayers he uttered? Hence do the writers on theſe offices inform us, that the Prieſt or Biſhop ſaith, Let us pray, inviting the people to pray together with him. Iſidore, in his firſt book of Divine Offices, ſaith, That the order of maſs, or of the prayers by which the ſacrifices offered to God are conſecrated, is celebrated throughout the whole world in the ſame manner; the firſt of them is a prayer of admonition to the people, that they may be excited to intreat God earneſtly; the ſecond is a prayer of invocation to God, that he would mercifully accept the prayers of the people. Now, to be ſure the people were not admoniſhed to pray in words they underſtood not, nor did the prieſt beſeech God to accept ſuch prayers as they who made them did not underſtand.

In the Latin maſs uſed, ſaith Cardinal Bona, about ſeven hundred years after Chriſt, the prieſt humbly turning himſelf to the people ſtanding round about him, ſaith, Brethren and ſiſters, pray for me a ſinner, that mine and your ſacrifice may be acceptable to the Lord God Omnipotent before his ſight. Rerum. Liturg. p. 945. Then they all anſwer, Let the Omnipotent God receive the ſacrifice at thy hands, and let thy prayers aſcend in remembrance before the Lord, and let him hear thee who made thee an interceſſor for our ſins; let all the ſaints and elect of God pray for thee, let him remember all thy ſacrifice, and let thy burnt-offering be made fat, &c.

Albinus informs us, De Div. Off c. de Celeb. Miſſ. p 90. ibid. p. 82—84. that the prieſt ſaith, let us pray, and that then the Church prays with the prieſt, not with their voice, but with the heart, there is ſilence, and the breaſt cries to God in the ears of God. That he invites them to pray with him, ſaying, Let us pray; that after the incenſe the prieſt turns himſelf to the people, requiring them to join their prayers to his, that he may deſerve to be heard for their ſalvation, ibid. p. 82. Amalarius Fortunatus, De Eccl. Offic. l. 3. c. 9. not only cites and approves that paſſage of Cyprian, produced already out of his treatiſe on the Lord's Prayer, and that of Ambroſe, c. 19. p. 182. That the unſkilful hearing what he underſtands not, knows not the end of the prayer, and ſo anſwers not Amen, that the benediction may be confirmed. But alſo ſaith, that the words, for ever and ever, are pronounced with a loud voice, that they may be heard by the people, and the prayer may be confirmed by the anſwer of the people, ibid. p. 189. And giving an account of the Secretum, ſo called, becauſe the prieſt ſaid it with a loud voice: He informs us, that it belongs to the prieſt alone to offer ſacrifice to God, to whom, becauſe we ſpeak by thoughts, there is then no need of a loud voice; but in the following prayer, the prieſt calls out to the people, lift up your hearts, and therefore here a loud voice is neceſſary, that altogether they may give thanks to God, c. 20. p. 192. And, ſpeaking of the hymn before the paſſion of our Lord, he ſaith it is called the preparation, becauſe it prepares the minds of the brethren to an honeſty becoming the convention of holy Angels, and to the reverence of the conſecration, and therefore is ſung with a loud voice. And again; then, ſaith he, follows the Lord's Prayer, which it behoves us to ſing with great caution, that we may retain in our minds the things which with our words we pronounce. And laſtly, the whole people, with the prieſt, commend themſelves together to God, ſaying, look upon thy ſervants, and thy works,—and this with the words, we ought to retain in our minds.

Rabanus Maurus ſaith, De Inſtit. Cler l. 1. c. 33. p. 328. that after the prieſt goes to the altar, the Litany is begun by the Clergy, that the general prayer may go before the ſpecial ſupplication of the prieſt, and that this general prayer was generally underſtood by the people, is evident from this conſideration, that the prieſt, before it, was accuſtomed to ſay, Let us pray for the Holy Church of God, for our bleſſed Pope, for all the Biſhops, for the Faithful, for the Catechumens, for the penitents, for the perfidious Jews, the Hereticks, the Pagans; and of this cuſtom Auſtin ſpeaketh, ſaying, The prieſts rehearſe the Litanies with a loud voice, and common prayer is enjoined by the mouth of the deacon, Ep. 119. c. 18. and more fully in theſe words: Exerciſe thy diſputations againſt the prayers of the Church, and when thou heareſt the prieſt of God exhorting the people at his altar to pray for the unbelievers, that God would convert them to the Faith; for the Catechumens, that God would inſpire them with a deſire of Regeneration, and for the Faithful, that they may perſevere in that which they have begun to be, deride the Holy Voices, Ep. 107. p. 493.

This alſo will be farther evident from the alternate prayers of prieſt and people, in which he ſpeaks to them, and they return their anſwer to him, of which we have early mention in the Apoſtles Conſtitutions in Cyprian, in the fore-mentioned places, in Cyril of Jeruſalem, who tells us, that the prieſt ſaith, Lift up your hearts, the people anſwer, we lift them up unto the Lord. The prieſt ſaith, let us give thanks to the Lord; the people, it is fit and juſt; the prieſt, holy things to holy perſons; the people, there is one Holy, one Lord Jeſus Chriſt. In Chryſoſtom, ſaying, in the tremendous myſteries, the prieſt prays for the people, and the people for the prieſt, for this alone is ſignified by thoſe words, And with thy ſpirit. In Auſtin, in very many places of his works. In the Ordo Romanus, we have frequent mention of this reſponſe, And with thy ſpirit, and alſo mention of all the others cited by Cyril. Albinus, upon theſe reſponſes, remarks thus, that the Church having received the wholſome ſalutation from the prieſt, ſalutes him again in prayer, deſiring that as he prayed the Lord might be with them, ſo would he be with him, ſaying, and with thy ſpirit. That by the words ſurſum corda, the prieſts exhorts the people to direct their hearts from worldly cares, to the Lord; the people anſwer, we lift them up unto the Lord; as if they ſhould have ſaid; we have them lifted up as thou commandeſt; the prieſt again exhorts them, ſaying, Let us give thanks unto our Lord God, you and I together; the people affirm, that it is fit and juſt to give him thanks.

And the ſhort Exegeſis of the maſs, publiſhed at Paris 1548, ſaith, That the ancient Prieſts, who regarded not ſo much the ornament of ſpeech, as the ſalvation and edification of the People, N. B. were wont to ſay, Lift up your hearts in the vulgar tongue. Exeg. in Miſſ. Can. p. 9.

Moreover, that the Prayers of the Greek Church are performed in Greek, and that they were performed ſo as to be underſtood by the people, their Liturgies ſufficiently aſſure us. See Goar. in Lit. Chryſ. n. 65. p. 223.

This is evident alſo from all thoſe prayers which the prieſt begins myſtically, or ſecretly, and concludes with a loud voice; for to what end doth he elevate his voice, if they who heard it, could not underſtand the meaning of it?

From the beginning, as Juſtin Martyr doth inform us, (Apol. 2. p 98. D.) the commentaries of the Apoſtles, and the writings of the Prophets were read in the aſſemblies of Chriſtians, and that they were read ſo then as that the common people might underſtand them, is evident from what there follows, that when the reader ceaſed, the preſident of the aſſembly made an exhortation to provoke them to the imitation of thoſe excellent things then read unto them. And from that paſſage of Tertullian, Apol. c. 39. we meet together for the commemoration of the Divine Scriptures ——— we feed our faith, confirm our affiance, erect our hope by the Sacred Writings: From the reading of the Scriptures we derive the nouriſhment of faith, ad Vcor. l. 2. c. 6. From thoſe words of Gregory Thaumaturgus, Serm. 2. de Annum. B. Virg. When the Goſpel, or the Writings of the Apoſtles, are read, attend not to the book, or to the reader, but to God ſpeaking from Heaven, which ſure they could not be exhorted to do, provided that his words were read unto them in an unknown tongue. And from theſe words of Chryſoſtom, Hom. 3. in 2 Ep. ad Theſſ. c. 4. p. 234. They take not heed, nor do they mind that they come to God, that he diſcourſeth to them. For when the reader ſtanding up cries out, thus ſaith the Lord; and the deacon ſtanding up, ſtops the mouths of all; he does not this in honour of the reader, but of that God who ſpeaketh by him. The Epiſtles which are read every day, are heard from Heaven. ——— If a man came from the king, you would all attend to him; the Prophets comes from God, he ſpeaks from Heaven, and no man hearkens to him: Do you not believe that theſe things are ſpoken by God; theſe are Epiſtles ſent from God? From the like words of Auſtin, Serm. 33. de verbis Domini. The Holy Readings are propoſed, which we may both hear, and out of which, God aſſiſting, we ſhall diſcourſe ſomewhat; and from thoſe paſſages ſo frequent in him, We have heard the leſſon of the Apoſtle, this is a faithful ſaying, &c. Serm. 10. de verb. Apoſt. We have heard the Pſalm, we have heard the Apoſtle, we have heard the Goſpel, all the Divine Leſſons agree, Serm. 8. & de temp. Serm. 49 From that decree of the Council of Valence in Spain, cap. 1. That the Holy Goſpels ſhould be read after the Epiſtle in the maſs of the Catechumens in the order of the leſſons, becauſe it was allowed not only for the faithful, but for the Catechumens and penitents to hear the ſalutary precepts of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the Sermons of the prieſt. And that the cuſtom continued from the ſixth to the tenth century, at leaſt, we are informed from the writers of Eccleſiaſtical offices. See the Ordo Romanus, p. 40.

That in the Greek Church alſo the Epiſtles and Goſpels were, and are ſtill read unto them in the vulgar tongue, and ſo as that the people might underſtand the meaning of them, is ſtill more evident; for before the reading of them, the deacon always ſaid σοφία ὀρθοί, which word ὀρθοί, ſaith Cabaſilas, calls for that diligence, attention and reverence which we ought to have when we ſpeak or hear of Heavenly things, of which the firſt ſign we ſhould give is the erection of the body; ſee Goar. in Lit. Chryſ. n. 77. p. 125. He alſo ſaid, πρόσχωμεν, by which word, ſaith Cabaſilas, he commands us not to ſtand ſlothfully, or negligently, but to attend with our minds to the things done and ſung, n. 88. p. 128. The prieſt before the reading of the Goſpel, ſaith, let us hear the Goſpel. The deacon, the leſſon is taken out of ſuch a place. And the prieſt, let us attend to it, which were all vain words, if the people did not underſtand the leſſons.

As for ſinging, it is confeſſed by Cardinal Bona, Rerum Liturg. l. 1. c. 25. ſect. 19. That in the times of the Apoſtles, and for ſome following ages, the whole congregation of the faithful did anſwer the prieſt in ſolemn celebration of that ſervice, and were wont to ſing together with the clergy, this cuſtom, ſaith he, is confirmed by Chryſoſtom, who ſpeaketh thus, Anciently all met together, and ſung in common, and this we do at preſent; hom. 36. in 1 Cor. p. 487. And a little after he adds, what Bona took no notice of, He that ſings, ſings alone, though all ſing after him, and the voice is carried, as it were, from one mouth. Cæſarius, Biſhop of Arles, alſo taught the laicks, or vulgar ſort, to ſing pſalms and hymns with an elevated modulated voice, and to ſing proſe and anthems like as the clergy, ſome in Greek, and ſome in Latin, that there might be no time for them to tell ſtories to one another in the Church. He alſo adds, that Ambroſe commanded pſalms and hymns to be ſung after the manner of the Eaſtern parts, for the comfort of the faithful watching in the Church, and that Auſtin ſaith, that this cuſtom derived it ſelf from Milan, to almoſt all the Churches of the weſt, ib. Ex. Auguſt. confeſ. l. 9. c. 7.

Moreover, that the cuſtom of many other Chriſtian Churches was agreeable to that of the Proteſtants, we learn from good hiſtorians and approved authors: For,

1. Of the Armenians, Caſſander tells us out of Petrus Bellonius, that all who aſſiſt underſtand the Armenian tongue, which the prieſt uſeth in celebration of their ſervice, Liturg. p. 31. And Brierwood produceth many witneſſes to the ſame purpoſe.

2. The ſame Brierwood, ib. p. 188. from Alvarez, the Portugueſe, and many other authors, ſhews, that the Habaſſins, or mid-land Æthiopians, do celebrate their liturgy in their own language, which alſo the Liturgy it ſelf, if you mark the long anſwers of the people to the prieſt in thoſe prayers, ſufficiently atteſts.

3. And no leſs certain, ſaith he, is it alſo of the Moſcovites, and Ruſſians, that their Liturgies are miniſtred in their vulgar tongue. The whole maſs, ſaith Caſſander, Liturg. p. 32. is wont to be celebrated by them in the mother tongue, and the Epiſtle and Goſpel are recited out of the choir with a loud voice to the people, that they may the better underſtand them.

4. And as evident, ſaith he, p. 188. is it of the Illyrians, whom we commonly call Sclavonians, that they exerciſe their publick Divine Service in their own language; and in particular of the Liburnians, the more weſterly part of the Sclavonians, it is affirmed by Aventine, and of the Dalmatians, the more eaſterly part of them, by Angelus Rocha, that they celebrate their Liturgies in their own language. Of theſe Sclavonians the hiſtory of the Bohemian perſecution ſaith, that in the year of our Lord 968. when Dethmarus was conſecrated Biſhop, the then Pope endeavoured to deprive them of the uſe of the maſs in their own tongue, whereupon they ſent ſix of their prieſts, who obtained of the Pope that form of Liturgy in their mother tongue, which they ſtill have.

Laſtly, Metrophanes, a monk of Greece informs us, that the Creed was uttered in the eaſtern Church, even as all other things were with a loud voice, that all who were without the veil might hear, and underſtand them. And that this veil was opened, to ſignify that to thoſe who were orthodox in faith, all things were revealed, and to be heard, whether they were men or women, young or old, rich or poor; ſee White's reply to Fiſh. p. 378.

To theſe teſtimonies of the Church-Service being performed in a tongue known to the people, I could add the authority of Lactantius, Baſil, Ambroſe in the 4th age. Auſtin and Caſſianus in the 5th age. Iſidore Hiſpalenſis in the 7th age. Albinus Flaccus, Amalarius Fortunatus, and Wallafridus Strabo in the 8th and 9th age. Micrologus, and Ivo Carnotenſis in the 11th and 12th age, &c. But as that is already done in part, and theſe authorities are ſo commonly known by every one verſed in antiquity, and the fathers, I ſhall now proceed to what is more material to be obſerved from this 14th chapter of Corinthians. For,

The chief arguments we urge againſt the reading of the Scriptures, prayers, and pious leſſons contained in the maſs in an unknown tongue, are taken from Paul's diſcourſe upon that ſubject, which affords almoſt as many demonſtrations of his diſapproving of this practice, as it containeth verſes, and which the ancients, who have either occaſionally, or elſe profeſſedly writ upon that place, with one conſent interpret as we do. And,

1. Our argument from verſe 2. is to this effect; That which doth render the reading of the Scripture contained in the maſs a ſpeaking not to men, doth render it unlawful, becauſe theſe Scriptures were deſigned to be ſpoken unto men; but the reading of them in an unknown tongue is reading of them not to men, becauſe no man, to whom the language is not known, doth underſtand them, ver. 2.

Arg. 2. If we muſt rather chuſe to propheſy than ſpeak with tongues, becauſe that propheſying is more profitable, and more for edification, then alſo muſt we rather chuſe to read the leſſons, and the publick ſervice, in a tongue known to all, than in a tongue unknown to moſt then preſent, becauſe that alſo is more profitable, as is apparent from the confeſſion of the Trent Council: Miſſa magnam continet populi fidelis eruditionem, Seſſ. 22. c. 8. To make this argument, if poſſible, more evident, Conſider,

1. That the Romiſh Maſs, or Liturgy, containeth many portions of Holy Scripture.

2. That theſe portions of Holy Scripture were written for our learning, 2 Tim. iii. 16. and are profitable for our inſtruction, Rom. xv. 4.

3. That thoſe perſons who do not underſtand them when they are recited in the Latin tongue, are members of that Church which is to be edified, ver. 4. they are indeed the greateſt part, and moſt conſiderable members of the Church, ſuch as ſtand moſt in need of the edification, inſtruction, and conſolation mentioned, ver. 3.

4. That the Apoſtle here commands the Corinthian officiators in the Church, rather to labour after the gift of Prophecy, than that of tongues, becauſe the gift of Prophecy did more conduce unto the edification, inſtruction, and conſolation of the Church, ver. 3, 4.

5. That reading of the maſs in a tongue known is, ſpeaking to the edification of many in the Church, and reading it in a tongue unknown is, ſpeaking not to the edification or inſtruction of all them to whom it is unknown.

6. That therefore we are rather to read it to them in a tongue known, according to the purpoſe of Paul's advice, than in a tongue, unknown to them. Now ſuitably unto the purpoſe of theſe arguments the fathers deſcant upon theſe firſt four verſes thus: that by Prophets the Apoſtle means the interpreters of Scripture, for as the Prophet foretells future things, which are unknown, ſo he, whilſt he manifeſts the ſenſe of Scripture, which is unknown to many, is ſaid to propheſy: that though there be many ſpiritual degrees which he enumerates, yet is that better which provides for the advantage of the Church, ſo that all may learn the purpoſe of the Divine Law——to know the law is the beſt ſenſe; for knowledge joined with charity is not puffed up, but is meek, profiting to the benefit of all. For the knowledge of the law confirms their minds, and provokes to the encreaſe of a better hope. He that ſpeaketh in an unknown tongue, profits only himſelf, for men know not what he ſaith, and therefore they receive no profit by it; but he that propheſieth edifies all the people, whilſt what is ſpoken by him is underſtood of all. So Ambroſe, in ver. 1, 2, 3. He makes a compariſon of gifts, ſaith Chryſoſtom, and he rejects that of tongues; for by ſaying, he that ſpeaks with tongues, ſpeaketh not to men; for no man underſtands him, he takes that away, ſhewing, that it hath no great profit. He that propheſies exceeds it in that he is alſo profitable to thoſe that hear him; ſee how he ſhews the preferableneſs of this gift from the common benefit of it; and how every where he prefers that which is done to the profit of many; for ſo much difference as there is betwixt the profits of one, and of the whole Church, ſo great is the difference betwixt ſpeaking with unknown tongues, and propheſying, in ver. 3, 4. He ſhews, ſaith Photius, that Prophecy is more profitable, caſting down tongues; and he demonſtrates that Prophecy is better from the common profit of it, for though he that ſpeaks with tongues, ſpeaks by the Holy Ghoſt, yet he is ſo much leſs than Prophecy, as the profit of his ſpeaking is leſs; wherefore, as much difference as there is between the profiting of one, and the whole Church, ſo great muſt be the difference betwixt tongues and Prophecy. Theophylact repeats expreſly theſe laſt words, and on the ſecond and third verſe, he comments thus, he ſpeaks not to men, becauſe he ſpeaks not things manifeſt, and eaſy to be underſtood by them. And again, every where Paul prefers that which is moſt profitable, as Prophecy is, building up the unſtable, exhorting and ſtirring up the ſlothful, and comforting the feeble-minded. He teacheth, ſaith Theodoret, in ver. 2. the uſe of this gift of tongues, for it was given to the preachers of the Goſpel, by reaſon of the different languages of men, that going to the Indians, and uſing their tongue, they might publiſh the Divine Declaration; and again, diſcourſing to the Perſians, Scythians, Romans, and Egyptians, in every one of their languages, they might preach the doctrine of the Goſpel, for vain it was for men diſcourſing to the Corinthians to uſe the language of the Scythians, the Perſians, and Egyptians, which they could not underſtand: now reading of the Scriptures, is preaching in the language of the Holy Ghoſt, for Moſes of old times hath them that preach him in every city, being read in the Synagogue every ſabbath day; Acts xvi. 21. and therefore reading of the Goſpels and Epiſtles muſt be preaching of the Chriſtian doctrine, and muſt it not be vain, according to Theodoret, to preach to the Engliſh, French, Hungarians, Germans, Dutch, Swedes, and Normans, in the Latin tongue which they do not underſtand? Muſt not this practice contradict the very end for which the gift of tongues was given, that the Divine Declaration might be publiſhed to every one in their own tongue? May we not argue from theſe ſayings of the fathers thus, "That which tends moſt unto the profit of the Church is every where to be preferred by the Apoſtle's rule, but propheſying or reading of the Scriptures, ſo as to manifeſt the ſenſe of them: (which is not known, when it is read in an unknown tongue) and ſo that all may learn the purpoſe of the Divine Law, ſo as that all the people may be edified whilſt what is ſpoken is underſtood of all, ſo as to be profitable to them that hear him, ſo as to ſpeak things manifeſt and eaſy to be underſtood by them, tends moſt to the profit of the Church; therefore this reading, or this propheſying, by the Apoſtle's rule, muſt be preferred. And again, but reading and preaching in a tongue unknown to the hearers, is reading ſo as that the hearer knows not what you ſay, and therefore he receives no benefit, he hath no profit; it therefore is that reading which they, and the Apoſtle's rule aſſure us, ought not to be preferr'd. And thirdly, that which tends beſt to edification, exhortation, and comfort of the Church ſhould be preferred, but propheſying, or reading of the Scriptures ſo as they may be plain to, and eaſy to be underſtood by the hearers, tends, to the edification of the doubtful, exhorting the ſlothful, the comforting the feeble-minded, to the confirming of our minds, and the advancing of our hopes, 'tis as much better than ſpeaking in a tongue unknown, as the edification of the whole Church is better than the profit only of ſome few, and therefore is to be preferred.

Arg. III. From the fifth verſe, I would that ye all ſpake with tongues, but rather that ye propheſied, for greater is he that propheſieth than he that ſpeaketh with tongues; we learn that the Apoſtle Paul doth rather wiſh that they ſhould propheſy, than ſpeak with tongues. For that that was the greater gift, he proves by reaſon of the greater benefit the Church received by it, or becauſe it tended moſt to the edification of the Church. He ſaith it is the greateſt gift, for that is greateſt which profits all, ſaith Ambroſe. Prophecy is the greater, becauſe it hath the greater profit; ſo Theodoret: Becauſe they are many who receive the profit of it, which chiefly is to be regarded; ſo Chryſoſtom: Prophecy is the greater, becauſe it profits more; ſo Oecumenius: By reaſon of the greater benefit; ſo Theophylact. Since therefore the like reaſon holds for reading of the maſs, and all the pious leſſons contained in it, in a tongue known unto the vulgar, certain it is, that greater is he that doth thus read it, and that it were deſirable it were thus read, rather than in a tongue unknown to many of them, and therefore it is certain that the Trent council hath defined unwiſely, and not according to this declaration of Paul, and all theſe fathers of the Church, that the ancient rite of reading in the Latin tongue ſhould be retained every where; Seſſ. 22. c. 8.

Arg. IV. From the ſixth verſe, Now, therefore, brethren, if I come unto you ſpeaking in an unknown tongue, what ſhall I profit you, except I ſhall ſpeak unto you either by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophecy, or doctrine. What ſhall I profit you, ſaith Ambroſe; for no man can teach, except he be underſtood. He ſpeaks theſe things, ſaith Chryſoſtom, demonſtrating that he ſeeks their profit, and that which he ſaith is this, that if I ſpeak not ſomething which may be eaſily perceived, and may be manifeſt to you, but only ſhew I have the gift of tongues, you will go away without any profit. Photius, Apud. Oecum. in locum, thus deſcants on the words, I ſhall profit you nothing except I ſpeak unto you in revelation, that is, things manifeſt, and underſtood, and eaſy to be perceived; or in knowledge, that is, that you may know what I ſpeak; or in prophecy, for they knew that was ſpoken according to the common way of converſing with one another, or in doctrine, for he that teacheth, endeavours that his hearers may underſtand the things ſpoken: what profit ſhall I bring unto you, ſaith Theodoret, unleſs I uſe a doctrine, revealing to you hidden myſteries: And with reſpect to ſuch interpretations of the ancient fathers, Theophylact ſpeaks thus, ſome have ſo underſtood thoſe words in revelation, as to ſignify that they ſhould ſpeak things manifeſt and eaſy to be apprended, and things laid open, and thoſe words in knowledge, as to ſignify that they ſhould ſpeak ſuch things as may be known. Hence then the argument runs thus, "That which doth nothing tend unto the profit of the aſſembly, conſiſting of perſons not underſtanding what is ſpoken, ought not to be done by an Apoſtle, much leſs by men of leſs authority; but to read the maſs in Latin, in places where it is not underſtood, is to do that which nothing tends unto the profit of the aſſembly: If no man can profit except he ſpeak in revelation, or in knowledge, that is, things manifeſt, eaſy to be perceived and underſtood, then no man can profit the aſſembly, conſiſting chiefly of illiterate perſons, by reading of the maſs to them in Latin:" And therefore no man can by ſo doing, do what both Paul and Chryſoſtom ſay chiefly ought to be regarded in thoſe parts of publick worſhip.

Arg. V. The ſeventh, eighth and ninth verſes afford ſtill farther demonſtrations of the abſurdity of this practice, for thus they run v. 7. in like manner things without life, giving ſound, whether pipe or harp, except they give a diſtinction in the ſounds, how ſhall it be known what is piped or harped, v. 9. So likewiſe you, except ye utter by the tongue things eaſy to be underſtood, how ſhall it be known what is ſpoken; for ye ſhall ſpeak unto the air. For, ſaith Theodoret, when thoſe that are preſent underſtand them not, the words are vainly caſt into the air.

You will ſpeak unto the air, i. e. ſo as to profit nothing; for to what end doth he ſpeak who is not underſtood, ſo Ambroſe. You ſhall ſpeak to the air, that is, to no body, ſaith Chryſoſtom. And again, He puts the voice as the ſubject, the perſpicuity of the voice as the ſpecies, (i. e. that which diſtinguiſheth the kinds) which being wanting, there is no need of the ſubject. He proſecutes his diſcourſe thus, Why do I ſay that which ſhall be thus ſpoken by us will be unprofitable, but what is plain and eaſy to be apprehended will be profitable to them that hear it, ſince this is ſo even in organs without life, which muſt have diſtinction and plainneſs of ſound, or you do nothing, and much more in the words of men of life and reaſon, and in ſpiritual gifts ought we to ſeek for what is of an eaſy ſignification. Theophylact tranſcribes theſe words, and then he, with Chryſoſtom, applies the example thus, So you unleſs by this gift of tongues you utter a diſcourſe plain and perſpicuous, you will ſpeak in vain, and to no end, becauſe no man underſtands you: You will ſpeak into the air, ſaith Oecumenius, that is, in vain and unprofitably, if your words be not plain and underſtood; he alſo, out of Photius thus introduceth the Apoſtle ſpeaking, Why ſay I in my own perſon that what is underſtood is profitable, what is not underſtood is unprofitable; a man may find this in organs without life; and, if in little things clearneſs is much, how much more in ſpiritual things? Here then the argument runs thus. That which renders the meaning of the words read in the aſſembly of Chriſtians ſpeaking into the air, i. e. ſpeaking unprofitably, in vain, ſpeaking to no body, doing nothing, or to no purpoſe, muſt be abſurd and incongruous, but reading of the maſs in Latin to thoſe aſſemblies, renders it, ſpeaking into the air, &c. to all to whom it is unknown, therefore it is abſurd. Again, they who read ſo as that the hearers cannot know what is ſpoken, and ſo as that they do not utter things eaſy to be underſtood, it is not plain, perſpicuous and eaſy to be perceived, they ſpeak into the air, but ſo read they who read the maſs in Latin to thoſe aſſemblies which do not underſtand that tongue. Ergo, they ſpeak into the air.

Arg. VI. Verſe the eleventh, the Apoſtle ſpeaketh thus, If I know not the meaning of the voice, I ſhall be unto him that ſpeaketh a barbarian, and he that ſpeaketh ſhall be a barbarian unto me. He admoniſhes them not to ſtudy that by unknown tongues they may ſeem barbarians to one another, but that by unanimity of underſtanding, they may have common joy, ſaith Ambroſe. I ſpeak not theſe things, ſaith Chryſoſtom, rejecting the unknown tongue, but ſhewing that it is unprofitable to me whilſt it is obſcure, that it renders him that hears it a barbarian to me, and me to him, not through the nature of the voice, but through our ignorance. He ſhall be a barbarian to me that ſpeaketh, i. e. a ſpeaker of things not intelligible, If I know not the power of his voice, ſaith Theophylact. There are many kinds of voices, ſaith Oecumenius, but what gain we by thoſe voices, when we underſtand nothing of them? for if I know not what the voice ſignifies, we ſhall be both barbarians to one another: How therefore is it that you ſpeaking into the air, and ſpeaking things inſignificant to your own countrymen, are puffed up, as if you had done ſome great matters, and do not rather ſtudy, and take care that obtaining the gift of interpretation, you may uſe the gift of tongues unto the common benefit; for he that only ſpeaks with tongues uſing an inſignificant and unknown voice unto the hearer, inſtead of profiting, is a barbarian to him, and the hearer alſo is accounted a barbarian to the ſpeaker, and what profit ariſeth thence? You hear not their Anacharſis ſaying to me, all the Grecians are as Scythians, which is like that of our Paul, if I know not the meaning, &c. for as the Illyrians, Pæonians, &c. are eſteemed barbarians to the Greeks, ſo to them who underſtand not the Greek idiom, the Attick, Dorick, Æolick and Ionick tongues are barbarous; Theodoret. de Cur. Græc. aff. Serm. 5. p. 556. Where,

1. It plainly is aſſerted, that every one that ſpeaketh in a publick aſſembly is unto him that heareth a barbarian, (because he doth not underſtand the meaning of the voice, becauſe he ſpeaks things unintelligible by him, and ſo he gaineth nothing by his voice, becauſe he, ſpeaking in an unknown voice, ſpeaks not unto the common benefit.

2. It is here tacitly ſuppoſed, that this is a great fault, and manifeſt abſurdity, and that which the Apoſtle reproved in the Corinthians as by no means fitting to be done. Hence then the argument runs thus, That which renders the maſs-prieſt a barbarian, a ſpeaker of things unintelligible to the hearer, ſo that he gaineth nothing by his voice, a ſpeaker in that very manner for which Paul reproves the ſpeakers in like aſſemblies of the Corinthians, that ought not to be done; but celebrating the maſs in Latin, i. e. in ſuch a language in which in moſt aſſemblies few underſtand the meaning of his voice, renders the maſs-prieſt a barbarian, &c. Ergo this ought not by him to be done.

Arg. VII. The Apoſtle exhorts thoſe Corinthian Æmulators of the gift of tongues, that ſeeing they ſo earneſtly deſired to abound in gifts, they would do it to edification, ver. 12. endeavouring to excel in that which chiefly tended to that noble end: For thus he ſpeaks, Even ſo ye, foraſmuch as ye are zealous of ſpiritual gifts, ſeek that you may excel to the edification of the Church. Strive chiefly for them by which the profit and edification of the Church may be promoted, ſaith Oecumenius. He commands them to do all things to the benefit of the Church, ſaith Theodoret; becauſe 'tis profitable to explain the Scriptures: For the mind is excited and rejoices when it underſtands any thing of Scriptures; therefore he admoniſhes them to apply their ſtudy to this, ſo Ambroſe. You ſee his ſcope every where, how he points continually to one thing, in every thing laying down this as a canon or rule to walk by, that what is moſt profitable to the moſt; moſt beneficial to the Church, ought always to be done, ſo Chryſoſtom. Hence then the argument is this, That which is requiſite, that we may excel to the edification of the Church; to the profit of moſt, that in the publick ſervice is always to be done, according to the exhortation and the command of the Apoſtle. But celebrating the publick ſervice of the Church in a tongue commonly known to the people which aſſembled to join with us, is plainly requiſite to this end; for, as the fathers and Paul have often told us, unleſs they know the power of the voice it cannot profit, nor will they be edified; Ergo, the publick ſervice ought to be celebrated in a tongue known unto the people.

Sol. Unto this argument ſome of the Romaniſts reply, That the Trent Council hath obſerved the mind of the Apoſtle here, in that ſhe hath commanded all paſtors, during the celebration of the maſs, to expound ſome part of what is read.

Rep. But to this ſubterfuge I anſwer,

1. That which the Council ſaith is only this, The Holy Synod doth command all paſtors frequently to expound ſome of thoſe things which are contained in the maſs, it therefore doth not command that they ſhould always do ſomething of that nature, and ſo the Apoſtle's Precept muſt be neglected when this is not done.

2. The Council doth not oblige them to expound any certain part of the maſs, ſo that if they expound one verſe contained in it, they ſatisfy the injunction of the Council, but by no means do they ſatisfy Paul's injunction, that all things ſhould be done to edification, that if there be no interpreter they ſhould hold their peace, and leaſt of all thoſe ſayings of the Fathers, Let there be nothing done among you which doth not edify one another. That the Apoſtle's rule is this, that what is moſt profitable to the moſt, moſt beneficial to the Church, ought always to be done.

3. The reaſon which the council aſſigns of this injunction, viz. Leſt the ſheep of Chriſt ſhould hunger, and the little ones deſire bread, and there be none to break it them, ſeems to be a plain confeſſion that when this is not done, as frequently it is not, it muſt ſo happen, that Chriſt's ſheep do by this means hunger, and deſire bread, when there is none to break it to them. Since then, according to Paul, and theſe expoſitors, the profit of moſt is chiefly to be regarded, and he prefers that every where which is ſo done, ſince what is ſpoken in a tongue known is, ſay they, underſtood by all, and therefore edifieth all the people, but what is read in a tongue not known, is ſo read, that they receive no profit, no benefit by it, ſeeing there is the ſame reaſon for interpreting all they read, as any portion of it, it is evident all ſhould be interpreted, or read in a tongue underſtood by all. And,

4. It deſerves to be obſerved, that though the Church here requires the Prieſt to expound ſometimes, or preach, yet hath ſhe not obliged the People to hear them, Nullo (hoc) jure cavetur, ſed ſolum de miſſa, Sum Roſell. Domin. n. 4. that maſs, which they cannot underſtand, they muſt hear; but the ſermons, which they may underſtand, they need not. I affirm, ſaith Suarez, that there is no precept which in rigour, and by it ſelf obliges to hear the ſermon on feſtivals, (or the Lord's Day) ſo all the doctors ſuppoſe as evident, and it is apparent from the conſtant uſe and apprehenſion of the Faithful, L. 2. de Feſt. c. 16. n. 6. So that though without this, the Council doth confeſs, the ſheep of Chriſt muſt hunger, and deſire bread, and have none to break it to them; yet are they not obliged to that which can alone aſſuage their hunger.

Arg. VIII. The Apoſtle proceeds thus, ver. 13, 14. Wherefore let him that ſpeaketh in an unknown tongue, pray that he may interpret; for if I pray in an unknown tongue, my ſpirit prayeth, but my underſtanding is unfruitful. Let him pray that he may interpret, ſaith Theodoret, that he may bring profit to the Church. Let him pray not only for the gift of tongues, but of interpretation alſo, that he may be profitable to all, ſo Chryſoſtom. That his endeavour may profit others alſo, ſaith Ambroſe. He ſhews the manner how they might procure gifts that will profit the Church, ſaith Oecumenius. He ſhews how this gift may be uſed to the publick benefit, ſaith Theophylact.

The reaſon follows, For if I pray in an unknown tongue, my ſpirit prayeth, that is, ſaith Photius, my ſpiritual gift is exerciſed, but my mind is unfruitful; that is, ſaith Theodoret, I not interpreting my gift, have no fruit, others that hear me receiving no benefit, for the fruit of the ſpeaker is the profit of the hearers; for ſo he ſpeaketh in the Epiſtle to the Romans, that I may have ſome fruit among you, as among other Gentiles. My mind will be found unfruitful, ſaith Photius, becauſe it will not profit others, for the fruit of the mind is by various, and all kind of notions to bring profit to our neighbours. If any one ſpeak with unknown tongues, his mind is unfruitful, not to himſelf, but to the hearer, for whatſoever is ſaid he underſtands not. So the commentary that paſſeth under the name of Jerom. " When they that are preſent underſtand the prayer, then he that prayeth hath fruit, to wit, the edification of thoſe that are helped by his prayer. Saith Baſil, but when the words of the prayer are unknown to them that are preſent, then without controverſy the mind of him that prays is without fruit, ſince no man receives benefit by it, and the caſe is alike in treating of any other words of God, for ſo it is written, let no ſpeech come from your mouth but what is good, for the edification of faith ;" and that the mind is ſaid by the Apoſtle to be unfruitful, not with reſpect unto the ſpeaker, but to the hearer is evident.

1. Becauſe the Apoſtle in this very chapter ſaith, that he that ſpeaks with tongues edifies himſelf, ver. 4. adding, that where that tongue is not underſtood, it doth not edify.

2. Let him, ſaith the Apoſtle, who ſpeaks with tongues pray that he may interpret, not to himſelf, but others, for their benefit ; when therefore he aſſigns this reaſon of that exhortation, that otherwiſe his mind will be unfruitful, he muſt alſo mean not to himſelf, but unto others.

3. The Apoſtle ſeems plainly to interpret his meaning, thus by ſaying, ver. 19. In the Church I had rather ſpeak five words διὰ τοῦ νοός μου, with my mind, (not unfruitful, but underſtood) that I might inſtruct others, than ten thouſand words in an unknown tongue.

Hence then theſe arguments do very naturally reſult, if he that ſpeaks with an unknown tongue, muſt pray that he may interpret, that he may bring profit to the Church, that he may be profitable to all, and uſe his gift to the publick benefit ; then he that reads, or prays in publick, muſt ſo read, and pray, that he may be profitable to all, and conduce to the publick benefit, which ſure he doth not who celebrates the maſs in Latin, where that language is ſo far from being underſtood of all, that it is ſcarce underſtood of any in moſt of our Churches. Eſthius upon the place confeſſeth, that what is ſpoken here doth happen unto them who being ignorant of the Latin tongue, Latino ſermone preces recitant, read prayers in Latin, for their mind is unfruitful ; and muſt it not then alſo happen unto them who being ignorant of the Latin tongue, Latino ſermone preces audiunt, Hear prayers read in that tongue : For if prayer not underſtood by the ſupplicant is unfruitful to him, ſo is prayer not underſtood by the hearer to him alſo, on the ſame account.

Again, that which makes the prayer of the ſupplicant unfruitful to the hearer, ought not to be done, this being the reaſon of the Apoſtles exhortation to the Corinthian officiators, to pray they might interpret, leſt their mind ſhould be unfruitful. But praying ſo as that the words of the prayer are unknown to them that hear them, ſo as they do not underſtand them, ſo as they are not good for edification of him who knoweth not the meaning of them, is praying ſo as that the mind of him that prayeth is unfruitful to the hearer, and ſo by parity of reaſon is praying in Latin, to every hearer who underſtandeth nothing of it, it therefore is not to be done.

Arg. IX. What therefore is it ; I will pray with the ſpirit, I will pray with the underſtanding alſo, I will ſing with the ſpirit, I will ſing with the underſtanding alſo, i. e. What therefore is to be done, ſaith Oecumenius, how ſhall we contrive that we be not unfruitful. What is the beſt and moſt profitable to be done, ſaith Chryſoſtom, and Theophylact. He calls the ſpirit his gift, ſaith Theodoret ; the mind he calls the interpretation of what is ſpoken ; and ſaith, that it behoveth him who diſcourſeth in another tongue, whether it be in pſalms, in prayer, or doctrine, either himſelf to interpret, what is ſaid to the profit of the hearers, or to take another to his aſſiſtance who can do it ; which words are punctually tranſcribed by Oecumenius, who alſo adds from Photius, that to ſpeak with the ſpirit, and the mind, is to ſpeak for our own profit, and alſo to ſpeak ſo as that others may enjoy the fruit of our minds, that is, to ſpeak unto the profit of our neighbours ; and this will be done, if ſpeaking with tongues we receive alſo the gift of interpretation, for having taken up the name of prayer, for ſpeaking of things good and ſerious, that you might not think that he ſpoke primarily, or chiefly of prayer, and not alſo of any neceſſary and uſeful words ſpoken in tongues, he falls to pſalmody, ſaying as it were, whether it be in prayer, or pſalmody, or any other good and neceſſary words, in all alike, we ſhould endeavour both to profit ourſelves, and others. Caſſian relating, and propoſing to the imitation of others the cuſtoms uſed by the Ægyptian monks, which he ſays were very ancient, he firſt (l. 2. c. 5. and c. 11.) informs us, that one of them roſe up to ſing the pſalms in the midſt of them, and that the other ſate, having the intention of their hearts fixed upon the words he ſang ; for, ſaith he, they are not delighted with the multitude of verſes, but with the underſtanding of the mind, following that with their whole power, I will ſing with the ſpirit, I will ſing with the mind alſo, and therefore they judge it more profitable than ten verſes ſhould be ſung rationally, than that a whole Pſalm ſhould be poured forth with confuſion of the mind. The meaning therefore of the Apoſtles reſolution, the thing that he approveth of, as beſt and moſt advantageous to be done in publick, ὃ δεῖ γίνεσθαι, which ought to be done, is, that in the Service of the Church we pray with the mind, that is, ſo that others may enjoy the fruit of our minds, and the hearer may be profited ; and that this muſt be the true import of the words, is evident from the preceding words, which ſay, that if we pray in a tongue unknown, our mind will be unfruitful unto others ; and thence infer, that we muſt ſo pray in the ſpirit, as to pray alſo with the mind, that is, ſo as the mind be not unfruitful. 2. This is apparent from the connexion of the words with the enſuing verſe. I will pray with my underſtanding, for otherwiſe how can the Idiot ſay Amen unto my prayer, or by my Pſalm be edified, ſeeing he underſtands not what I pray, or thank God for. Now manifeſt it is the underſtanding of the ſupplicant contributes nothing unto the underſtanding of the Idiot, unleſs he utters by his underſtanding words which the Idiot can apprehend, it is therefore manifeſt the Apoſtle here diſcourſeth of ſuch words, and not of thoſe the ſupplicant alone doth underſtand.

Hence then the argument runs thus ; If by the rule of the Apoſtle, whether we be engaged in the publick ſervice, in prayer, in pſalms, or doctrine, we muſt ſpeak ſo as that the hearers may have profit by it, and may enjoy the fruit of our minds, that the intention of our hearts be fixed upon the meaning of the words, and with our whole power we follow after the doing of the ſervice with the intention of the mind, then muſt we pray, and ſing, and read in words which they that hear can underſtand, and profit by, and have their hearts intent upon, and therefore not in Latin words, where the hearers, or the generality of them, cannot underſtand, or have their minds intent upon them, becauſe they do not underſtand the meaning of that tongue.

Arg. X. Elſe when thou ſhalt bleſs with the ſpirit, how ſhall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned ſay Amen, at thy giving of thanks, ſeeing he underſtands not what thou ſayeſt. When thou bleſſeſt with the ſpirit, that is, with the ſpiritual gift of tongues, ſo Theophylact, with the voice of a barbarian, ſo Chryſoſtom, how ſhall the Idiot, that is, ſay Chryſoſtom, Theodoret, Ambroſe, Jerom, Oecumenius, the Laick, and unſkilful perſon, Sedulius, Haymo, Anſelm, and Aquinas, the man that only underſtandeth his own mother's tongue, how ſhall he ſay Amen at thy giving of thanks ? How ſhall he give his teſtimony, or aſſent, unto thy benediction ? ſaith Jerom. The unſkilful hearing what he underſtands not, knows not the end of the prayer, and therefore ſaith not Amen, that the benediction may be confirmed, for by them is the prayer confirmed, who ſay Amen, ſo Ambroſe, that which he ſaith is this, if thou bleſſeſt in a barbarous tongue, the Laick not knowing what thou ſayeſt, nor being able to interpret thy words, cannot ſay Amen ; and he ſhews that he ſuffers no ſmall damage, when he cannot ſay Amen. He brings in an example, ſaith Photius : For, ſaith he, if thou bleſſeſt in the ſpirit, i. e. thou only underſtanding, or profiting thy ſelf in bleſſing, but the hearer underſtands not what thou ſayeſt, What will he anſwer to thee? How will he ſay Amen, if it be needful for him ſo to do, not knowing at all what thou ſayeſt? For if thou only knoweſt, ſaith he, what thou prayeſt, or bleſſeſt, and thy ſoul ſpeaketh this in the ſpirit, the reſt not knowing the power of the things ſpoken, how ſhall the Idiot ſay Amen, at thy prayer? This therefore is the thing he ſaith, that he that ſings and prays ſhould interpret the things ſpoken, and the hearers likewiſe that they may ſay Amen. In the whole he would have the words underſtood, and not in ſome definite kind, and therefore ſometimes he ſpeaks of ſinging, ſometimes of bleſſing, and giving of thanks, ſhewing that his exhortation and care is univerſally of every neceſſary and uſeful things ſpoken in tongues. Now hence theſe things do clearly follow,

1. That it is the duty of the unlearned to join with the miniſter in prayer, for he muſt ſay Amen, he muſt give his teſtimony, and aſſent unto his benediction, he muſt confirm the prayer by ſaying Amen, and when he cannot do it, becauſe he knows not what the prieſt ſaith, he ſuffers no ſmall damage, ſaith Chryſoſtom.

2. It therefore muſt be the duty of the prieſt ſo to bleſs, and pray in publick, that the unlearned may be able to ſay Amen, and yield his teſtimony and aſſent unto the benediction of the prieſt, and may not ſuffer damage by his inability to do ſo.

3. That the illiterate perſon cannot perform this duty, when he cannot underſtand the matter of the prayer, or know what the prieſt ſaith, and ſo muſt ſuffer damage, when he ſo officiateth, as that the Idiot knows not what he ſaith. Hence then the argument runs thus:

That prayer, or benediction, to which the Idiot cannot ſay Amen, is not to be uſed in the Church, becauſe he is not to be damaged, or made uncapable of the performance of his duty, by that ſervice which was undoubtedly deſign'd for his advantage, and his help in the performance of his duty.

But prayer and benediction in Latin, where it is not underſtood by the Idiot, is that to which he cannot ſay Amen. Or thus,

That which the Idiot underſtands not, and therefore cannot ſay Amen to, muſt not be uſed in the Church: But prayer in Latin, in all places where Latin is not a known tongue, is that which the Idiot underſtands not, therefore it is not to be uſed in the Church.

Anſ. To this ſome anſwer, that Latin is always a tongue known to ſome.

Rep. 1. This is falſe, with reference to thouſands of our congregations.

2. It is impertinent, for the Apoſtle diſtinguiſhes the congregation into the Idiot, and others, and blames the prayer or benediction uttered in an unknown tongue, as being ſuch as Idiots in the congregation could not underſtand.

3. Is God an accepter of perſons? Would he have the learned edified by the Churches publick ſervice, who have the leaſt need of theſe helps, and the unlearned want the benefit? If not, muſt it not be acknowledged, that the Apoſtles reaſon dictated by the Spirit of God, concerns them both?

Arg. XI. Whereas the queſtion might be asked, Why may not the Idiot ſay Amen to what he underſtands not, ſeeing the matter of the prayer is good? The Apoſtle anſwers verſe the 17th, for thou verily giveſt thanks well, but the other is not edified. Where ſaith Ambroſe, If you meet together that the Church may be edified, you ought to ſay thoſe things which the hearers may underſtand; for what profit is it for a man to ſpeak in a tongue which he only knows? Such a one ought rather to hold his peace, that others may ſpeak who can profit the hearers. See, ſaith Chryſoſtom, how he throws the ſtone at the mark, always ſeeking the edification of the Church. The hearer gains nothing, he is profited nothing by thee, ſaith Oecumenius, that is, he receives not from the things heard, the fruit gathered for him, the mind of the ſpeaker profits him not, he enjoys not the fruit of it, he is deſtitute of fruit, is unfruitful, there being no benefit to thy neighbour, thy thankſgiving is unprofitable: So Theophylact. Now hence I reaſon thus: That which the Idiot doth not underſtand, is that by which he doth not edify, and therefore that which is not to be uſed in the ſervice of the Church; but Latin Service, where it is an unknown tongue, as to every Idiot it is, is that he underſtands not, and therefore that by which he is not edified, it therefore is not to be uſed in the Church, eſpecially where it conſiſteth chiefly of ſuch Idiots.

Arg. XII. The Apoſtle proceeds, ver. 18, 19. thus, I thank my God I ſpeak with tongues more than you all. But in the Church I had rather ſpeak five words with my mind, that I may inſtruct others, than ten thouſand words in an unknown tongue; he declares, ſaith Ambroſe, that it is more profitable to ſpeak few words plainly, which all might underſtand, than a long ſpeech in obſcurity. What is it, ſaith Chryſoſtom, to ſpeak with my mind, it is to ſpeak with knowledge, and to inſtruct others; for this only yields much profit, and this is that which he every where ſeeks after, what may profit all. With my mind, ſaith Oecumenius, that is, ſo that I may be able to interpret, and make plain to the hearers what I ſpeak, that they may be profited. Hence then the argument runs thus:

If we ought, when the congregation meets, rather to ſpeak few words plainly, and ſo as to inſtruct the hearers, and make that plain unto them which is ſpoken, than a long diſcourſe which they underſtand not; then ought we rather celebrate maſs in the mother-tonge, than in Latin, which to the generality of moſt pariſhes is a tongue they underſtand not.

Arg. XIII. The Apoſtle thus proceeds, ver. 20. Brethren, be not children in underſtanding, but be ye children in malice, in underſtanding be ye perfect. He will have them be perfect, ſaith Ambroſe, that they may know what is neceſſary for the inſtruction of the Church, that they may ſtudy thoſe things which profit to the advantage of the brethren, he uſes now a ſharper ſtyle, be not ye children, for 'tis the property of children to admire little things, as tongues, and deſpiſe great things, that is, Prophecying. Hence I thus argue:

That which renders the officiator a child in underſtanding, ought not by him to be done, but ſpeaking to the congregation in Latin, when it is an unknown tongue, and preferring that before Prophecying, or ſpeaking to the inſtruction of the Church, doth render the officiator a child in underſtanding.

Arg. XIV. From ver. 21. the argument runs thus: That which was in the law denounced as a curſe upon God's people, ought not to be the choſen, or be the conſtant practice of the Church of Chriſt; but ſuch was ſpeaking in an unknown tongue, and ſo as they could not underſtand with eaſe.

Arg. XV. From ver. 23. thus:

That which will give occaſion to the ſtranger, and the Idiot, entring into the aſſemblies of the Chriſtians, to ſay that they are mad, ought not to be done; but the uſe of Latin, where the meaning of it is not known, as it is not in many Pariſh-churches, will miniſter this occaſion, therefore it is not to be done.

Arg. XVI. Let all things be done to ediſying, ver. 26. He ſpeaks of Pſalms, Doctrine, and Prophecy, ſaith Theophylact, and adds, let all theſe things be done to edifying: For 'tis the buſineſs of a Chriſtian to edify and profit; but how can he do this, who ſpeaks in an unknown tongue? If he procure an interpreter, the ſcope of the Apoſtle, ſaith Theodoret, in ver. 22. is one, the profit of many, and therefore he exhorts the Corinthians to prefer Prophecy, as being that which brings a common benefit. See, ſaith Chryſoſtom, the foundation and the rule of Chriſtianity, for as the work of an artificer is to build, ſo the work of a Chriſtian is in all things to profit his neighbour. I regard only one thing, this, ſaith he, only am I concerned for, to do all things to edification. This is the concluſion, that nothing ſhould be performed in the Church in vain, ſaith Ambroſe, and that this chiefly is to be laboured after the unſkilful may profit, that no part of the body may be dark through ignorance. Let all things look to one end, ſaith Oecumenius, whether Pſalm, Doctrine, or interpretation, viz. the edification of the Church.

Arg. XVII. But if there be no interpreter, let him hold peace in the Church. Let him do this, ſaith Theophylact, leſt he ſeem to moſt a barbarian, and one that ſpeaks things which cannot be diſcerned or underſtood. Let one interpret, ſaith Theodoret, for they who are preſent ought to underſtand the things ſpoken; but if there be no interpreter, let him hold his peace, for it is moſt abſurd to uſe his gift for oſten- oſtentation, and not for profit. Let him be ſilent, ſaith Chryſoſtom, for nothing ought to be done in vain, or ſuperfluouſly, nothing for vain-glory; for you come not together for this end, that you may ſhew that you have the gift of tongues; but that you may edify the hearers, as he ſaid in the beginning, let all things be done to edification.. Let him be ſilent, ſaith Ambroſe, for he ought to ſpeak in the Church, who can profit all. Whence the argument runs thus:

If they who are preſent at the Church-aſſemblies ought to underſtand the things ſpoken there, and if he who can profitall, ought to be ſpeaker in the Church, becauſe the end of his aſſembling with them is, that he may edify the hearers, then ought he to be the ſpeaker in the Church-aſſemblies, who ſpeaks in a tongue known to all, i. e. who ſpeaketh to them who underſtand no other, in the vulgar tongue, ſince otherwiſe he cannot profit all, or anſwer the end of his aſſembling with them, nor can they who are preſent underſtand the things ſpoken. Again,

If he who ſpeaks in a tongue not known in the Church, ought to keep ſilence, leſt he ſeem to moſt a barbarian, i. e. one ſpeaking things which are not underſtood, and becauſe nothing ought to be done in the Church in vain, and becauſe it is abſurd to even the gift of tongues where it doth not profit, then he who reads the leſſons, ſings, or prays in Latin, where that language is not underſtood, ought to be ſilent, it being as true of him, as of the perſon ſpeaking with a tongue unknown to the Corinthians, that he is a barbarian, he ſpeaks in vain, and not unto the profit of his auditors.

Arg. XVIII. If any man be ſpiritual, or a Prophet, let him know that the things which I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord. Here he aſſerts, ſaith Ambroſe, that he ſpeaks not his own ſenſe, but that of Chriſt's. That which is the ſtrongeſt of all he puts laſt, ſaith Theophylact, declaring that God commands theſe things by him. Let him know, ſaith Oecumenius, that the things which I write are the commandments of God, and that I am not moved to ſpeak theſe things of my ſelf: And if theſe things, thus written by him concerning ſpeaking, praying, ſinging with a voice plain, and eaſy to be underſtood, and ſo as to inſtruct others, and as moſt tendeth to the edification of the hearers, be the commandment of God, then they who do not obſerve, but apparently tranſgreſs them, muſt be violaters of the commandment of God.

Let us ſee then what the doctors of the Church of Rome can ſay in favour of their ſervice in the Latin Tongue, and to excuſe that practice from being a plain violation of theſe precepts and inſtructions, which is not fully anſwered and confuted by theſe plain deſcants of the Fathers; and by the words, or the plain meaning of Paul in theſe expreſſions. All their evaſions may be reduced to three heads.

1. That the Apoſtle ſpeaks not of ſuch ſervice as is uſed in the Church of Rome. Or,

2. If what he ſpeaks concerns their ſervice, yet do they nothing in it which contradicts the mind of the Apoſtle. Or,

3. That the caſe is now ſo altered, that the Church may have reaſon to vary from the rules of the Apoſtle, and practice now, in reference to this matter, what, in the primitive ages of the Church, was not convenient to be done. And,

1. Their anſwer is, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks not of the publick and ſet prayers of the Church, but of extraordinary and ſpiritual exerciſes, of exhortations, and ſudden prayers. The prayers and ſpiritual exerciſes which Paul ſpeaks againſt were extemporal, made in publick meetings, ſaith Dr. Vane, according to the preſent inſpired devotion of the ſpeaker; ſo that the unlearned hearer, or he that ſupplied the place of the clerk, except he underſtood the language, and conſequently the matter, could not prudently ſay Amen to it, ſeeing he knew not whether the thing ſpoken were good and lawful, or no; but the Liturgy and Service of the Church hath ſet offices for every day, approved by the Church, and therefore from hence a man may be confidently aſſured, that it is good and lawful, and therefore he may boldly ſay, Amen. See Vane's Loſt Sheep, p. 355.

Anſ. 1. Thoſe who have the confidence to ſay, that the Apoſtle ſpeaketh here only of exhortations and publick preaching, are abundantly confuted by what Paul, and all theſe commentators, have diſcourſed of prayer, and of thankſgiving, ver. 14, 15. of the unlearned perſon's incapacity to ſay Amen, ver. 16. of Pſalmody, ver. 26 and from the ſuffrage not only of the fore-mentioned Fathers, but alſo of Primaſius, Haimo, Anſelm, Carthuſian, Lyra, Lombard, Aquinas, and others, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks of Divine Officers in general, and in particular of prayer.

2. Admit that the Apoſtle ſpeaketh of extemporary, and extraordinary prayers, yet if the reaſons why he doth condemn them, do as much condemn the uſe of an unknown tongue in publick ordinary ſervice, that publick ſervice muſt equally deſerve to be condemned. Now that this really is ſo, we have juſt ground to take for granted, till theſe our arguments, applied unto the publick ſervice of the Church of Rome, are anſwered.

3. To that of Dr. Vane I anſwer, that without doubt the hearers might be aſſured that the Holy Spirit, who did aſſiſt theſe perſons, would indite for them good petitions, it being blaſphemy to ſay he would ſuggeſt unto them evil ones; ſince then they prayed with the Spirit, as all then knew, they alſo knew that the matter of their prayer was good and lawful; and yet it is added, that they could not ſay Amen, for want of underſtanding the prayer.

4. The Apoſtle and theſe commentators do not ſay the unlearned cannot ſay Amen, becauſe they know not whether the thing ſpoken of be good and lawful, or no, but becauſe they do not underſtand it; yea, in flat contradiction to this vain imagination, Paul expreſly ſaith, thou giveſt thanks well; but yet he blames this good thankſgiving, becauſe others are not edified by it; though therefore Romaniſts may boldly ſay Amen to what they do not underſtand; how they can regularly do it, is ſtill the queſtion of Paul; and it is anſwered in the negative by all the commentators cited.

Anſ. II. 2. The R. doctor add, " That theſe Chriſtian meetings were intended for the inſtruction and edification of the auditors, therefore it was fit the exerciſes thereof ſhould be in a tongue, which they who were to be inſtructed, underſtood; but the publick Liturgy of the Church was inſtituted for the ſervice and praiſe of God, and therefore may be, without unlawfulneſs, in any tongue which he underſtands, to whom it is dedicated. Moreover the end of the Church meetings, here ſpoken of by the Apoſtle, was to inſtruct the ignorant and convert the infidels, as may be gathered from v. 23, 24. but the drift of the Church in appointing Liturgies, and ſet forms of Common Prayer, and readings in the maſs was not for the peoples inſtruction, but for other reaſons; ſee Vane, p. 358. Fiſher. apud Dr. White, p. 374, 375. As

1. That by this publick ſervice a continual daily tribute or homage, of prayer and thankſgiving might be offered publickly, and paid unto God by his prieſts.

2. That Chriſtians, by their perſonal aſſiſtance at this publick ſervice, might profeſs and exerciſe exterior acts of religion, common with the whole Church, repreſented by the Synaxis, or Eccleſiaſtical meeting of every Chriſtian Pariſh.

3. That every Chriſtian by his preſence yielding conſent unto the publick prayers, praiſes, and thankſgivings of the Church, may participate of the benefits and fruits which the Church doth ordinarily obtain by her Liturgies, and publick oblations. Now for theſe ends there is no need that every one ſhould underſtand, word by word, the prayers that are ſaid in the publick Liturgy, but it ſufficeth that the Church in general, and in particular, paſtors and eccleſiaſtical perſons dedicated to the miniſtries of the Church, have particular notice of all the prayers that are ſaid.

Rep. 1. The Trent council confeſſeth that the maſs containeth great inſtruction of the faithful people, if then the Church did not inſtitute it for the inſtruction of them, ſhe doth not anſwer the purpoſe for which it is adapted; but rather hinders them from receiving that inſtruction by locking it up in an unknown tongue, if it were not intended for the edification of the auditors, then ought it to be caſt out of the Church, where all things, ſaith Paul, are to be done for edification, and we muſt follow after things whereby we may edify one another, and where the fathers rule is this, Nihil ſit in vobis quod non ædificet alterutrum; Let there be nothing done among you which is not for edification.

2. If the leſſons of Scripture read in the maſs, are not read, or appointed to be read for the peoples inſtruction, 'tis plain they are not read or appointed for their proper uſe; for all "Scripture, ſaith the Apoſtle, is profitable for inſtruction, and whatſoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning," 2 Tim. iii. 6. Rom. xv. 4. 'Tis plain that then they do not follow the example, nor approve the Wiſdom of that God who appointed them to be read for this very end unto the people, that they might hear and learn to do all the words of that law. Then 3. By the rules and ſayings of the holy fathers, and Paul, ſeeing God ſpeaketh in the Scriptures read in the maſs, he muſt ſpeak to himſelf, and not to men; for he that ſpeaks to men, ſpeaks, ſaith Paul, in a known language, and ſpeaketh to edification, conſolation, and inſtruction, 1 Cor. xiv. 3, 4. He muſt ſpeak into the air; he muſt be a barbarian to his people. He muſt ſpeak ſo as not to inſtruct others all the year long, and in every publick aſſembly, which Paul ſaith he will never do, ver. 19.

As for the inſtances of prayers and praiſes, theſe anſwers do ſo plainly contradict Paul; for he, enquiring what is to be done, and conſequently what ought to be intended to be done in publick prayers and praiſes, anſwers thus to that enquiry, "I will pray with the ſpirit, I will pray with my underſtanding alſo," that is, as I have proved already, I will ſo pray, and praiſe in publick as to be underſtood in both, of thoſe that hear me, and that their minds may be inſtructed touching the matter of my prayer; you may do ſo if you pleaſe, ſay the R. doctors, but our Church intended no ſuch matter in her publick prayers and praiſes.

Again, He that underſtands not what you ſay when you pray, or bleſs, cannot ſay Amen to your giving of thanks, ſaith the Apoſtle, becauſe he underſtands not what you ſay who do officiate. What is that to the purpoſe, ſaith the Romaniſt, the prayers and praiſes of the Church were not intended for the knowledge of the people, or for their inſtruction, but only to be a continual tribute paid to God by his prieſts, if the people yield their bodily preſence, and ſome exterior worſhip, 'tis no matter for their ſaying Amen, much leſs for their ſaying it underſtandingly.

Your action is blame-worthy, tho' as to the matter, you give thanks well, ſaith the Apoſtle, becauſe another is not edified, or inſtructed by what you ſay. We never intended that he ſhould be inſtructed by our prayers or praiſes, ſay the Romaniſts.

3. Either the people are bound to thank God in publick, or they are not; if they are, then muſt they know what they ask in prayer, and thank God for, or elſe they cannot offer to him rational ſervice, they cannot ſing praiſes with underſtanding, as the Pſalmiſt and all the ancient commentators on him ſay they ſhould, they cannot be the bleſſed people that underſtand the joyful ſound, if they are not bound to pray, or to thank God in publick, or to concur with him who doth officiate in publick, wherefore then do they meet in publick? To exerciſe exterior acts of religion, ſay the Romiſh doctors, and to conſent unto the publick prayers and praiſes by their preſence. But I deſire to know of them whether any man can join in prayer or praiſes, by exerciſing any other act of outward worſhip, which is neither any act of prayer or praiſe; or what need is there either of prayer or praiſes, in order to the performance of thoſe Acts of worſhip which may be done as well without the ſpeaking of one word? and if by being preſent they yield conſent to what they do not underſtand, Paul and all the fathers who have writ upon that place muſt be exceedingly miſtaken, when for this very reaſon they aſſert that the unlearned cannot ſay Amen to the thankſgiving of him who doth officiate in an unknown tongue, becauſe he knows not what he ſaith, and ſo cannot conſent unto his prayer or benediction.

And laſtly, the Apoſtle and the ancient fathers never argue thus; theſe hymns, prayers, praiſes, propheſyings, were intended for inſtruction, and therefore you do ill, becauſe you do not anſwer the intention of them, but they expreſly do condemn the practice of uſing ſuch a tongue in the performance of them as was not underſtood, becauſe not being underſtood, it could not tend unto edification or inſtruction, they therefore more undoubtedly condemn the maſs, which never was intended for theſe ends, if theſe great doctors may be credited, ſince this aſſertion plainly contradicts, and overthrows the whole foundation of the Apoſtle's argument. And I deſire any Romiſh doctor to produce one ſingle author within a thouſand years of Chriſt, who ever did aſſert, That the Church Liturgies were not intended for the inſtruction or the edification of the people. It is an evidence their cauſe is very bad, who are conſtrained to advance ſuch ſtrange paradoxes to defend it.

The languages then ſpoken were utterly unknown many times to any man there preſent, even to the ſpeaker himſelf, but the Liturgy of the Church is in a language known to very many, as being in Latin which is known to all ſcholars, to moſt gentlemen, and youth bred in Grammar-ſchools, and in ſome countries to moſt mechanicks, it cannot therefore abſolutely be ſaid to be an unknown tongue; ſee Fiſher, ibid. p. 372. and Vane, ubi ſupra.

Anſ. To this ſuppoſed diſparity I anſwer,

1. That it is very frivolous in reference to all thoſe prayers which are uttered by the maſs-prieſt, in ſo low a voice that none can hear him, which, ſaith the author of Popery miſrepreſented, is the greateſt part of the maſs, for as to all theſe portions of the Liturgy, it is apparently all one to ſpeak to them in a voice that none can know, and in a voice that none can hear.

2. If we may credit their own authors, there was no great diſparity in former ages, either as to prieſt or people, it being confeſſed by them, that many maſs-prieſts underſtood not Latin, nor the things they prayed; yea, of the Popes of Rome, Alphonſus a Caſtro ſaith, many were ſo illiterate that they underſtood not Grammar, and what then was to be expected from the mechanicks, or the common people? And however matters may be now in ſome other countries, we know in our dominions that in many Pariſh-Churches there is ſcarce one perſon who underſtands one ſentence of the Latin tongue. In all ſuch Churches therefore there is no diſparity, as to the hearers, betwixt the tongue unknown, forbidden by Paul, and the Latin ſervice uſed by the Romiſh prieſts. For what is it to ſuch perſons, whether the prieſt ſpeaks by enthuſiaſm, or by diſcipline, what he perceives not, or whether the prieſt underſtand himſelf or not, his ignorance of what is ſaid or read being alike in both theſe caſes. See Nicol. de Clamangis de Corruptio Eccl. Statu, cap. 16. Clictov. Præfat. Elucid. Eccleſ. Ambroſ. Compl. apud Sixt. Senenſ. l. 6. Annot. 263. Alphonſus Adv. Hæreſ. l. 1. c. 4. Edit. Pariſ. 1534.

3. The plea for Latin ſervice on the account of this diſparity is flatly oppoſite to the Apoſtle's words, and to the comments of the fathers on them, for they diſtinguiſh the congregation into Idiots, that is the Layman, the Plebeian, the unlearned and unskilful, the man that only underſtand not, and therefore cannot ſay Amen to; this conſent to, this confirmation of the prayers and praiſes uſed in publick they are concerned to give, ſay the fathers on the place, and they receive no ſmall damage if they cannot do it, ſaith Chryſoſtom, and that they cannot do it where they do not underſtand the meaning of the words, both the Apoſtle and the fathers do with one voice aſſert.

4. Is God an accepter of perſons? Would he have the learned edified by the Churches ſervice, who have leaſt need of thoſe helps, and the unlearned want this benefit? If not, muſt it not be acknowledged that the Apoſtle's reaſon, dictated by the Spirit of God, concerns them both? If profit of the hearers be to be regarded in theſe ſervices, muſt not the profit of more hearers be more to be regarded? If Paul here prefer what is done to the profit of many, and is moſt beneficial, as the Fathers generally teach, muſt he not prefer the celebration of the publick ſervice in the mother-tongue, by which all may be benefited, before the celebration of it in the Latin tongue, by which ſo many do receive no benefit? Put the caſe, that many perſons in a mixed congregation underſtood Greek, or French, would it be therefore lawful ordinarily to preach in either of thoſe tongues to ſuch congregation? If not, how comes it to be lawful to read the Scriptures in Latin to ſuch congregations?

To proceed then to their ſecond plea, that they do nothing in contradiction to the Apoſtle's meaning in celebration of their ſervice in the Latin tongue. This they plead,

1. Becauſe the congregation, ſay they, is edified, as the Apoſtle appoints it ſhould be, by the things done, and ſaid in the Church, while the people have but a general underſtanding of the ſeveral paſſages thereof, Vane, p. 356.

Anſ. Is this general underſtanding a knowledge of the meaning of the words ſpoken in reading, ſinging, praying, or is it not? If it be, then muſt illiterate perſons know the meaning of the words uttered in Latin by the maſs-prieſt, as they would do, had they been ſpoken in their mother-tongue, which they, for ſhame, will not aſſert; if it be not, it cannot be the knowledge here required by the Apoſtle. For he requires ſpeaking with revelation in the Church, ſpeaking words eaſy to be underſtood, ver. 9. with a voice whoſe power or meaning is known unto the hearer, ver. 11. So that he knoweth what the prieſt who bleſſeth, ſaith, ver. 16. A voice that may inſtruct others, ver. 19. and where this voice is wanting, he ſaith the ſpeaker cannot profit, ver. 9. That he will be a barbarian, and one that ſpeaketh to the air; that his mind will be unfruitful unto others, and he will not edify them; as if he had deſigned the confutation of theſe Romiſh gloſſes. The ſayings of the ancient Fathers alſo are expreſs for a particular knowledge of the meaning of the words read unto the people, and of the prayers and praiſes in which they do join, or to which their aſſent is to be given, that is, according to their deſcant, the prayers and praiſes uſed in the aſſemblies where they are.

Plea II. 2. Becauſe, ſay they, Fiſher, ibid. p. 372. and Vane, p. — means are applied to the ignorant multitude, by which they are, or may be, if they uſe diligence therein, made to underſtand the publick prayers of the Church; namely, ſermons, exhortations, catechiſms, private inſtructions, manuals, and primars in vulgar languages, where the prayers uſed in the Church are found; ſo that the ordinary and common paſſages of the publick ſervice may be, and are eaſily underſtood, even by women and children, and they may underſtandingly Amen; therefore as the Apoſtle did allow of an unknown tongue in the exerciſes of the Corinthians, provided there were ſome to interpret it, ſo the ſervice in Latin is very allowable, even under this notion, while there are the aforeſaid means uſed for the interpretation thereof. The author of a Papiſt miſrepreſented and repreſented, ch. 24. doth not bluſh to ſay, they have directions in Engliſh Prayer books, ſet forth in great variety, for the help of the ignorant, by which they are taught the meaning of every part, and ceremony of the maſs, and how to apply their devotions accordingly.

Anſ. Quid verba audio, cum facta videam? To what end do you tell us, that ſuch and ſuch things might, by the due attention of the ignorant, be done; when it is notoriouſly known, that the people ſtill continue ignorant, and whilſt they do ſo, you tranſgreſs the laws of the Apoſtle, by praying in a tongue they underſtand not? Was it not notorious here in England before the Reformation, that ſcarce two in a pariſh underſtood the ſervice? Let us have ſervice in a vulgar tongue? until you find the Latin ſervice generally underſtood, and we will ceaſe to charge you with contradicting the Apoſtle.

2. Either the diligence required of the common people imports the learning of the Latin tongue, and then they may alſo preach in Latin, and ſay the common people may underſtand them, if they uſe diligence therein, or it importeth only ſuch induſtry as may be uſed by thoſe who can only read theſe Engliſh Prayer-books which give ſuch exact directions, if we may believe them, to underſtand the meaning of every part and ceremony in the maſs. Now could they, by their induſtry, attain unto this knowledge, what muſt thoſe many thouſands, yea, myriads, do, that know not letters? What will their manuals and primars avail them towards the underſtanding of their bulky miſſal? But that all this is but a blind and vain pretence, is evident from theſe conſiderations, that the tranſlation of the maſs into vulgar tongues is carefully prohibited, and judged of very evil conſequence, as the ſeed-plot of diſobedience, raſhneſs, ſedition, ſchiſm, and many other evils. Bull. Alex. 7. Mi. which could not be, if it were common for the people to have ſuch manuals and primars as contained all the prayers, hymns, and leſſons of the maſs, and taught them the meaning of every part and ceremony of it. 2. That they have no ſuch manuals or primars printed in the vulgar tongue, as will inſtruct them in the meaning of every leſſon, prayer and hymn uſed in their maſs on every day throughout the year, that no illiterate Papiſts, or very few amongſt us can be produced, who, by peruſing any of their books now extant in the vulgar tongue, can underſtand, ~~or know~~ the meaning of the maſs-prieſt in every leſſon that he reads, or prayer he makes in a loud voice, that no ſuch books are uſually brought into their aſſemblies, in which the maſs there uſed is ſo interpreted, that they may read in their own language what he reads in Latin, and join with him as certainly as if he ſpake in their own mother-tongue. No Engliſh Bibles, in which the Pſalms and Leſſons, the Collects and Epiſtles, may be read with him in that language which they underſtand, (except of late the people in England have printed ſome larger helps, tranſlated from the maſs-book and breviaries than heretofore, without licence. Nor,

3. Can we reaſonably expect that they ſhould be concerned either privately to inſtruct them in, or be importunate with them to uſe this diligence, ſo requiſite to the underſtanding of their Churches ſervice; or reprove them for not doing it, when we conſider what they have already taught us, that the publick ſervice never was intended for the edification or inſtruction of the people; that the words do not belong to them; that it is not the buſineſs of the congregation preſent to employ their ears in attending to the words; nay, that they are inſtructed not to underſtand them; that it is a thing undeniable, that to ſay prayers well, and devoutly, it is not neceſſary to have attention on the words. See Popery Miſrepreſented and Repreſented, p. 59, 60, 61, 62. Can it be thought, that they who generally aſſert theſe things, ſhould be ſollicitous to teach the people; or they who read them ſhould be concerned to learn the ſenſe and meaning of the words uſed in their publick ſervice?

That this has not been done among them, they are even forced to acknowledge. Faber complains, that the greateſt part of men in his time did not pray with the mind, but in a tongue they underſtood not, and by which they were not able in the leaſt to edify others. Com. in 1 Cor, 14. f. 122. b. They pray in a tongue, ſaith Mercer, our people do not underſtand: So as they cannot be underſtood, ſaith Cajetan. They are kept ſtrangers from all communion in the prayers and Divine Leſſons, ſaith Caſſander. The prieſt ſounds forth words not underſtood, ſaith Eraſmus. They do their duty, when they ſay their prayers, though they do not underſtand, ſaith Tolet; and, were it otherwiſe, very few would do their duty, when ſo very few do at all underſtand what they ſay; and, could it be otherwiſe in France, when the Council of Tholouſe made this decree, We forbid to give to the lay-people permiſſion to have the books of the Old and New Teſtament, except that probably ſome, for devotions ſake, deſire to have the pſaltery, or the breviary for Divine Service, or the Bleſſed Virgin's prayer-book; neither are they to have theſe books in the vulgar tongue. Concil. Toloſ. Can. 14. A. D. 1228.

4. This plea is grounded upon this ſuppoſition, that it is meet and needful that unlearned perſons ſhould be taught the ſenſe of the publick ſervice by catechiſms, manuals, and private inſtruction; and, if ſo, Is it not far more reaſonable that the ſervice ſhould be ſpoken in a vulgar tongue; ſeeing, by this all perſons preſent would certainly, and immediately be taught the meaning of the words; whereas theſe other means are ſuch as will not certainly be uſed, or, if uſed, will not certainly produce the ſame effect, and in moſt, never will produce it; if they in any do produce it, this cannot be done immediately, but by long ſtudy and application of mind; ſo that theſe learners muſt be a long time ignorant of the ſenſe of the Church ſervice, and that muſt be left to the induſtry and ingenuity of people, and the inſtruction of the prieſt, which, by the other method, might be certainly obtained.

Plea. Laſtly, ſome of them do ingeniouſly confeſs, that Paul hath here taught, that as well prayers as ſermons ſhould be celebrated in a tongue commonly known in the aſſemblies of the faithful, that the Church may be edified; but then, when this objection ſtares them in the face, that therefore the Church-men do offend who obey not Paul, but murmur prayers and pſalms, neither underſtood by themſelves, nor others. They anſwer, by ſaying, that the Church offends not by departing from this inſtitution of Paul, it being free for the Church to infringe this inſtitution of Paul, or even of God himſelf, Hoffmeiſt. in 1 Cor. 14. p. 272.

Repl. This is, indeed, a full and catholick anſwer to this and to all other objections that can be urged from Scripture againſt the errors and ſuperſtitions of the Roman Church, viz. That ſhe hath power to infringe the conſtitu-

tions even of God himſelf; only it is ſo like exalting the Church above all that is called God, and not only breaking the commandments of God, but alſo teaching men to do ſo, that methinks men who would not be eſteemed anti-chriſtian, ſhould not aſſert ſuch things?

2. Let us conſider what are thoſe mighty reaſons which conſtrain this Church thus to infringe God's inſtitution: Hoffmeiſterus ſaith, ſhe may do it, becauſe this inſtitution anciently tended to the benefit of the Church, but now it hath little of edification; which, indeed, is very true, as they have ordered matters, by reading much of their ſervice in a voice ſo low, that the people cannot hear, and other parts of it in ſuch confuſed and broken words, ſay Cajetan, Albertus Pius, and Eraſmus, as that the people cannot underſtand them; this apology therefore is too true, but not much for their credit; for, in effect, it is this, we ſerve God ſo in publick, that in what language ſoever we ſhould ſpeak, the people could not underſtand us, and therefore it is no matter in what tongue we celebrate.

Repl. 2. At this rate of anſwering, farewel all Church-government and diſcipline, v. g. when in the ſame chapter he ſaith, Let all things be done decently, and in order, and elſewhere, Let there be no diviſions among you. All theſe things, may the Fanatick ſay, muſt be referred to the condition of thoſe times, which is far different from the condition of the Church in our days. But wherein doth this great diſparity conſiſt? Thomas Aquinas, in locum lect. 3. p. 185. gives it thus, Perhaps in the primitive Church the benedictions were in the vulgar tongue, that they might be underſtood by the people, and that they might the more conform themſelves unto them, but ſince the faithful have been inſtructed, and know the things they hear in the common office, the bleſſings are performed in Latin. Lyra, in 1 Cor. xiv. doth in like manner ſay, that in the primitive Church the bleſſings and all other publick things were done in the vulgar tongue; but ſince the Church is multiplied, and the people have accuſtomed themſelves to conform to the miniſters of the Church, it ſuffices that the Clerk ſay Amen.

Repl. Theſe aſſertions are confeſſedly falſe, as hath been proved already: For never were the people more ignorant than they were in the age of Thomas, and the two following ages; nor is it to be wondered that they ſhould know ſo little of thoſe prayers which many of the prieſts themſelves underſtood not, as will be farther evident from theſe confeſſions: Not only they who ſupply the place of the ignorant, underſtand not, for the moſt part, that which is ſaid in prayer; but even the prieſts themſelves, or the deacons that pray or read, very often underſtand it not. So Ambroſius de Compſa. Apud Sixtum Senenſ. l. 6. Annot. 263.

To the premiſes I add theſe plain and cogent reaſons againſt the Latin ſervice of the Church of Rome, which alſo may be ſtrengthned from the conſent of fathers, and other doctors of the Church.

Arg. I. I argue thus: That which rendreth the voice of the maſs-prieſt uſeleſs, and makes it as good to moſt that are preſent to have a dumb prieſt to do maſs, as one that hath a tongue to ſay it, ought not to be done; but to read maſs in Latin to them who underſtand it not, rendreth the voice of the maſs-prieſt uſeleſs to them, and all one as if the prieſt who celebrates the maſs, were dumb. Ergo, maſs ought not to be ſaid to them in Latin.

This argument is bottomed upon theſe ſayings of Auſtin, Ep. 121. cap. 11. p. 626. that words are neceſſary for us, not to inſtruct, or move our God, but that we may be minded by them what we are to aſk, and that there is no need of ſpeaking when we pray, that is of ſounding words, unleſs it be for the end for which the prieſts do uſe them, viz. to ſignify their minds, not to God, but that men may hear them, and by remembring of them with conſent may be carried up to God, De Magiſtro, cap. 1. Whence the argument runs thus. There is no uſe of vocal prayer in reference to God, becauſe he underſtands the prieſts heart when he ſpeaks not, as well as when he ſpeaks, he hears the prayer of the heart, and ſees the word of the mind.

Nor, ſecondly, can ſpeech be uſeful that the prieſt may underſtand himſelf, or know the import of the words he utters, for if he knoweth not before the import of them, he cannot do it by ſounding forth he knows not what; ſpeech was given to man not to make him know his own thoughts, or words, for then he muſt be ſuppoſed to ſpeak he knows not what, till he hath ſpoken it, but to make his mind known to others; that man is therefore ſenſeleſs who, ſpeaks to himſelf that he may underſtand himſelf.

Nor, thirdly, can his ſpeech be uſeful to make his hearers underſtand him, provided that he ſpeaks in ſuch a language which they do not underſtand, for he that hath no tongue, and he that hath none to be underſtood, is alike inſignificant to them; a dumb prieſt can do all the ceremonies, and make the ſigns, ſhew his crucifix, and elevate his hoſt, and he that ſpeaks aloud to them that underſtand him not doth no more. Here then we may enquire with Auſtin what avail right words which the hearer doth not underſtand, ſeeing there is no cauſe of ſpeaking, if they do not underſtand what we ſpeak, for whoſe ſake we ſpeak, De Catech. Rudibus, cap. 11. For ſince there is no uſe of vocal prayer in publick, but that all together may ſignify their deſires, and ſtir up one another, and join in the expreſſion of them to God, where this end cannot be obtained, becauſe the hearers do not underſtand the voice of him that prayeth, cui bono? to what end is the voice uſed in ſuch prayers is an unanſwerable queſtion, and it is the very queſtion of Ambroſe, in 1 Cor. xiv. 7. to what end doth he ſpeak who is not underſtood? And the aſſertion of Chryſoſtom, that there is no need of words where the perſpecuity of the voice is wanting, ibid.

This argument is urged by others thus. That which is contrary to the very ends of ſpeech ought not to be done, but ſpeaking of the leſſons, pſalms and prayers in Latin, to them who do not underſtand that tongue is ſpeaking contrary to the ends of ſpeech, for what we would effect when we ſpeak, ſaith Auſtin, lib. de magiſtro, cap. 1. is either to teach or learn, or bring to remembrance, and he that ſpeaks doth outwardly give a ſign of his will by an articulate ſound, and for that cauſe only is there uſe of ſuch a ſound in publick prayer. He adds that words are ſigns, and ſigns are nothing if they be not ſignificant, that (cap. 2.) by the words which come out of our mouth we give a ſign to others that they may underſtand ſomething, and ought not to ſpeak if we ſignify nothing. That (cap. 6.) in prayer to God whom we cannot teach, and to whoſe remembrance we can bring nothing; we either admoniſh our ſelves, or do it that others may be taught or admoniſhed. And that (cap. 13.) in thoſe things which are diſcerned by the mind, he in vain hears the ſpeech of others, who cannot diſcern his mind by it. Now ſure by ſpeaking of the maſs in Latin to them who do not underſtand it, they teach them nothing, they bring nothing to their remembrance, they give no ſignificant ſign of their mind to them, they do not admoniſh others, they therefore muſt by Auſtin's rules, ſpeak contrary to the ends of ſpeech. Yea, in the judgment of Paul, and all the fathers who do comment on him, they are barbarians, they ſpeak into the air, vainly, unprofitably, to no body, to the profit of none, and therefore doubtleſs in their judgment, they do not anſwer the great ends of publick ſpeech.

Arg. II. 2. That which hindreth the leſſons read, the pſalms chaunted, the prayers offered up to God from being done to edification ought not to be done, the command of the Apoſtle being expreſs and plain, that all things ſhould be done to edification, but reading of the leſſons, chaunting of the pſalms, and prayers in Latin to them who do not underſtand that tongue, hindreth the leſſons read, the pſalms and prayers chaunted, from being done to edification, at leaſt in reference to them. Ergo, It ought not to be done. The minor which alone can be denied, is guarded with the conſtant ſuffrage of the Holy Fathers, who, with Auſtin, do unanimouſly declare, that no man is edified by hearing what he doth not underſtand, and that when men ſpeak with an unknown tongue they can profit none, De Geneſi ad lit. l. 12. c. 8. If it be replied, that although theſe things be not done to the edification of the illiterate, yet are they done to the benefit of the learned clerks, and that is ſufficient, the fathers baffle this evaſion by declaring, that Paul every where prefers that which tends to the benefit of moſt, τὸ κοινῆ συμφέρον, that which is for the common benefit, that he lays down this as a canon, that which is uſeful to moſt muſt be done in the publick ſervice of the Church, that we muſt chiefly labour that the unſkilful may profit by them, and ſay, without diſtinction, or exception, that if we meet for the edification of the Church, theſe things ought to be ſpoken which the hearers underſtand.

Arg. III. 3. That which renders the Service of God no more beneficial to the unlearned that are preſent, than to them that are abſent, and conſent to the prayers and praiſes in general, and to what is done for all faithful people, that ought not to be done, much leſs enjoined, becauſe it rendreth their coming together not for the better, which is the crime objected by Paul to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xi. 17. But praying in Latin rendreth that Service of God, to them to whom Latin is unknown, no more beneficial, though preſent, than if they were abſent and conſenting, &c. For what profit can he receive, who hears a ſound and diſcerns it not? Were it not as good he were abſent as preſent, may he not as well place himſelf in ſome part of the Church where he cannot hear it, as where he can? It is true by accident it may be better for him to be there, becauſe he ſees what is done, and gueſſes at ſomething in the general, but ſtill he is no better for what he hears, but only for what he ſees, nor is he farther benefited by that than as it helps his underſtanding; and therefore, all that is not underſtood, does him no more benefit that is preſent, than to him that is abſent, and conſents to the prayers in general, and to what is done for all faithful people. Nor can any man give a good account why a deaf man ſhould not be as fit an hearer of ſuch ſervice, as is the illiterate perſon of the quickeſt ear, though it be evident, that it is to him all one whether you ſpeak when he is preſent, or when he is abſent. And truly theſe things how abſurd ſoever they may ſeem to us blind Proteſtants, ſeem to be no abſurdities or incongruities unto the Roman Catholick, for he, ſaith the author of a papiſt miſrepreſented and repreſented, cap. 24. p. 59, &c. is commanded to aſſiſt at the Church-Service, and to hear maſs, and in this he is inſtructed, not to underſtand the words, but to know what is done. For the maſs being a ſacrifice wherein is daily commemorated the death and paſſion of Chriſt by an oblation made by the prieſt of the body and blood of the immaculate lamb under the ſymbols of bread and wine according to his own inſtitution, it is not the buſineſs of the congregation preſent to employ their ears in attending to the words, but their hearts in contemplation of the Divine Myſteries, by raiſing up fervent affections of love, thankſgiving, compaſſion, hope, ſorrow for ſins, reſolutions of amendment, &c. That thus having their heart and intention united with the prieſts they may be partakers of his prayers, and of the ſacrifice he is then offering, and for the raiſing of theſe affections in his ſoul, and filling his heart with the extaſies of love and devotion, he thinks in this caſe there is little need of words, a true faith without theſe is all-ſufficient.—— And if he muſt needs have words, let him behold with the eye of faith the gaping wounds of his Redeemer, and ſee if thoſe ſpeak nothing to his ſoul; if they do not, it is becauſe he wants faith; if nothing therefore concerns his devotion, that the maſs is ſaid in Latin; if the Church has ordered it thus, ſo to preſerve unity as in faith, ſo in the external worſhip of God, and to prevent alterations and changes which it would be expoſed to if in vulgar languages, and other good reaſons, What's that to him? He ſhould receive but little advantage if it were in his mother-tongue. For, beſides that the greater part is ſaid in ſo low a voice, that it is not poſſible that he ſhould hear it, the words do not belong to him, that is only the prieſt's office, and his obligation is to accompany the prieſt in prayer and ſpirit, to be a joint offerer with him to contemplate the myſteries there repreſented, and to excite in his ſoul devotions according to the exigency of every paſſage. Now, if theſe things be true,

1. It evidently follows that a dumb prieſt may well officiate, and a deaf man may join with him in the celebration of the Romiſh maſs, and that there is little need of tongue to ſpeak, or ear to hear this great and ſolemn part of publick worſhip in the Church of Rome; for if it be not the buſineſs of the congregation to employ their ears in attending to the words, if the words do not belong to them, they may as well attend upon this ſervice who cannot hear one word as they that can, ſhould they who underſtand this Latin be like the deaf adder that ſtoppeth her ears, which will not hearken to the voice of the charmer, Pſal. lviii. 4, 5. or like them, who, as the Prophet Zechariah complains, ſtopped their ears that they ſhould not hear, Zech. vii. 11. the Church of Rome could have no reaſon to complain of any of her members for ſo doing. And ſeeing the dumb prieſt could elevate the hoſt, and ſhew the crucifix, and lay the conſecrated wafer on the table, and do all the outward ſigns, which tend to raiſe the affections of the people by contemplation of what they ſee, I know not why he may not officiate as well as he who hath the loudeſt voice among thoſe people to whom the words belong not, and who are not concerned to attend to any of the words pronounced, but are inſtructed, according to this author, not to underſtand the words.

2. Hence it muſt follow, that the Papiſt is irrationally commanded to hear maſs, as he ſaith he is, and that he rather ſhould be commanded to ſee maſs. For, what is more abſurd, than to command him to hear words that do not belong to them, and which it is not his buſineſs to attend to, and which, for the greateſt part, are ſaid in ſo low a voice, that it is impoſſible that he ſhould hear them, ſaith this author.

3. As for the preſent practice of the Church of Rome, which, ſaith he, is to read the greateſt part of the maſs in ſo low a voice, that it is impoſſible the people ſhould hear it. He doth, or may know, that this is contrary to the practice of Chriſt, in the firſt inſtitution of the Sacrament, and to the declaration of Paul, that he who underſtandeth not the Euchariſtical thankſgiving of the prieſt, cannot ſay Amen to it, and contrary to the univerſal practice of the Church of Chriſt, by the plain teſtimonies of the Fathers, who expreſly teach that the faithful, even all the people preſent, ſaid Amen at the conſecration and benediction of the Euchariſtical oblations, particularly from the fore-mentioned teſtimony of Juſtin M. in the ſecond century, from the teſtimonies of Tertullian, De ſpectac. c. 25. and Denys of Alexandria, Apud Euſ. l. 7. c. 9. in the third, from the fore-mentioned teſtimony of Cyril of Jeruſalem, and from the teſtimony of Ambroſe, c. 9. in the fourth, from the teſtimonies of Auſtin, Reſp. ad. qu. Oroſii 49. ſerm. 7. de Jejun. and of Pope Leo in the fifth century, from the Novel of Juſtinian in the ſixth centry, which expreſly forbids all Biſhops and Prieſts to celebrate the Holy Communion, κατὰ τὸ σεσιωπημένον, in a ſilent voice, and as expreſly commands them to do it, μετὰ φωνῆς τῷ πιστοτάτῳ λαῷ ἐξακουμένης, with a voice heard by the faithful people, from the Nomo canon of Photius in the ninth century, which mentions this Novel as a law then obtaining in the Church of Chriſt; as alſo doth Balſamon, in the twelfth century, to ſhew the practice of the weſt, even to the cloſe of the ninth century, to the teſtimonies of Albinus and Amalarius, I add the words of Paſchaſius Rathbertus, which are theſe, Behold in the book of the Sacraments compiled, (as we believe) by bleſſed Peter, what the prieſt prays in the canon, that the Sacrament may be made the body and blood of thy beloved Son; which prayer being finiſhed, with a joint voice we ſay all Amen: and ſo every Church in every nation and language confeſſeth and prays, Epiſt. ad Frudeg. And the words of Florus, who ſaith that Amen, which is anſwered in all Churches, is interpreted true; this, therefore, do the faithful anſwer at the conſecration of ſuch a myſtery, as they do alſo in every lawful prayer. And therefore Cardinal Bona having cited theſe words, (Bona Rerumliturg. l. 2. c. 12. p. 775.) confeſſeth, that afterwards it was decreed that the canon ſhould be ſaid with a low voice, and ſo this cuſtom ceaſed. So that this cuſtom is as great a novelty, and apparent deviation from the practice of the Church of Chriſt, and from Paul's preſcription, as that of praying in a tongue not underſtood, and therefore cannot juſtify that practice.

4. This apology for reading of the canon of the maſs in Latin, or in a language not underſtood by the people, is built on an aſſertion abundantly confuted by Paul, and all the ancient commentators who have writ upon him; for it is to this effect, that the people ſuffer no injury by this practice, becauſe it belongs not to them to know the words of the prayers, leſſons, or thankſgivings uſed in the canon of the maſs. Nor are they concerned to attend to any of the words pronounced, that without the knowledge of them they may raiſe up fervent affections of love, thankſgiving, hope, compaſſion, ſorrow for ſins, reſolutions of amendment, and have their hearts and intentions ſo united with the prieſt's, as to be partakers of his prayers and ſacrifice; and ſo be edified as well as if they knew the meaning of the words.

But Paul, in oppoſition to theſe things, ſaith ver. 5. that the Church cannot be edified by him who ſpeaks with tongues, unleſs he doth interpret; he enquires, ver. 6. If I come to you ſpeaking in tongues, what ſhall I profit you, without revealing of the import of them? He ſaith that he ſpeaks to the air, who ſpeaks not in the Church words eaſy to be underſtood, or of clear and diſtinct ſignification to the hearer, ver. 7—9. That he who ſpeaks ſo in the Church, as that the hearer doth not know the power of his voice, is to him a Barbarian, ver. 11. That if he prays in the Church in an unknown tongue, his mind is unfruitful to the hearer, ver. 14. He is not edified by it, ver 17. He cannot ſay Amen, becauſe he underſtands not what he ſaith, ver. 16. And from theſe things concludes, this was to be done, that he who ſpake with tongues ſhould interpret what he ſpake; and he that prayed with his ſpiritual gift, ſhould alſo pray with his underſtanding, that he might inſtruct others, ver. 15—18. To which the admirers of tongues might anſwer in the words of this repreſenter, what of all this, what injury do the people ſuffer by all this, ſince they are not concerned to underſtand the words, or attend to them, what if they profit nothing by the words, which belong not to them? True faith without them is all-ſufficient. Haſt thou forgot Paul, that we Chriſtians have maſs every day, or every Lord's Day at leaſt; and that in this the Chriſtian is inſtructed not to underſtand the words, but to know what is done, to employ not his ears in attending to rhe words, but his heart in contemplation of the Divine Myſteries, by raiſing up fervent affections of love, thankſgiving, &c. What, therefore, though the maſs-prieſt be a Barbarian, and ſpeak to the air, in uſing words which belong not to the hearer, what abſurdity is in that, what though the hearer be not edified, or do not profit by the words he hears? Since, by this all-ſufficient faith without them, and by this contemplation of the Divine Myſteries, he edifies ſo much?

Again, the Fathers do unanimouſly declare, in oppoſition to this paradox, that they who meet together that the Church may be edified, ought to ſay ſuch things which the hearers may underſtand; that otherwiſe they are Barbarians to the hearers, their words are loſt in the air, and profit no body: and the poor ignorant perſons, they conceived an abſurdity in reading, ſinging, or praying in any part of publick ſervice; whereas, it ſeems, it is no ſuch matter, the hearer being not concerned to attend to the words, but rather being inſtructed not to know them, Paul, ſaith theſe miſtaken Fathers, would have the words of him that prayeth underſtood; it is convenient, by reaſon of the words of Paul, that the prayers of the Holy Oblation, i. e. the canon of the maſs, ſhould be uttered with a clear voice; the hearers, ſay they, ſhould be able to interpret the prayer they hear; for otherwiſe they cannot ſay Amen. (Let the clerk do it for them, ſay the Romiſh doctors) the prieſt muſt utter in his prayer words known to them that are preſent; for otherwiſe his prayer hath no devotion, is deprived of its effect. No man receives benefit by it; what of that, ſay the Romiſh doctors? The drift of the Church in appointing Liturgies, and ſet forms of Common-Prayer and readings in the maſs, was not for the peoples inſtruction. It is not the buſineſs of the congregation preſent, ſaith another, to employ their ears in attending to the words; the words do not belong to them, it being an undeniable thing that to ſay prayers well, and devoutly, it is not neceſſary to have attention on the words, or on the ſenſe of the prayers, whatſoever theſe ignorant fathers might ſay to the contrary.

Beſides theſe arguments, which do in general concern reading, praying, and ſinging of the maſs in Latin to them, to whom it moſtly is a tongue unknown, there be many clear and convincing demonſtrations againſt all theſe practices in particular, and to begin with prayer.

1. That which is repugnant to the nature of prayer in general, to the ends of prayer vocal, and publick in particular, and to the circumſtances required to make it acceptable, and free from blame, that ought not to be done, but prayer in Latin, to them to whom it is a tongue unknown, and by whom it is not underſtood, is ſuch; ergo, it ought not to be done. And, 1. It is repugnant to the nature of prayer, for that, in Scripture-language, is the pouring forth of the ſoul before God, the lifting up of the heart unto him, the crying to him with the heart, the deſire of the heart, Pſal xxv. 1. lxxxiv. 21. cxix. 45. Eccleſ. xv. 2. But the heart cannot deſire what it underſtands not, we cannot pour forth the ſoul, or lift up the heart to God, or be excited ſo to do by words which are of no ſignficancy to us when they are either heard or uttered. Prayer, by the Fathers, is defined to be incenſe aſcending from the ſoul as from an altar, and from a pure mind and conſcience, ſuch words as do aſcend like incenſe from pious ſouls. See Clem. Alex. Strom. 7. p. 717—719. Orig. contra. Celſ. l. 8. p. 389. But where the ſoul hath no perception of the meaning of the words it hears or utters, they can inſpire it with no deſires; the mind and conſcience cannot be affected with the hearing of them, and ſo no prayer, truly and properly ſo called, can be produced by the hearing of them.

2. It is repugnant to the ends of publick vocal prayer, for they are, 1. A ſymphony, or mutual conſent of thoſe who pray in what they ask, according to that ſaying of our Lord, If two of you conſent in any thing which you ſhall ask, it ſhall be done unto you, Matt. xviii. 19. 2. The The glorifying God not only with one mouth, but with one heart, Rom. xv. 4. So Chryſoſtom, Occumenius, Theophylact upon that place. But how can the illiterate perſon, who underſtands not what the prieſt doth ſay, be moved by it to glorify God in his heart, together with him? Or to conſpire with him in the very thing he asketh? And if he cannot do this, how can he anſwer theſe great ends of publick prayer? Agreeably to this is even the doctrine of many ſchoolmen, and other doctors of the Romiſh Church. For the ends of vocal prayer ſet down by Biel, (De Can. Miſſæ, lect. 62. f. 170. A.) are, 1. The excitation of inward devotion. 2. The illumination of the mind. 3. The more eaſy calling of thoſe things to mind we pray for in the time of prayer. 4. The keeping of the mind from wandring. 5. The more compleat rendring of what is due to God, viz. the doing it both with mind and body. 6. A kind of redundance from the ſoul upon the body, from the vehement affection and devotion if it. And laſtly, The inſtruction of others.

Now which of all theſe ends can be obtained by hearing of that prayer we underſtand not; ſure Biel thought that none of them could be obtained unleſs the prayer were known unto the people, whence in the ſame place he aſſerts, that vocal prayer ought to be known to the people for whom it is offered, which it cannot be, ſaith he, unleſs it be vocal, for the people ought in this to be conform to the miniſters of the Church entreating God in a way poſſible to them, whence the Church did reaſonably appoint that the miniſters of the Church ſhould pronounce ſuch prayers with a loud voice, that they might come to the notice of all, ibid. F. 169. B. & F. 170. This it ſeems was anciently the care of the Church, not that they ſhould come to the knowledge of very few, and in ſome places of none at all, as through the care of the Trent Council, and the Romiſh Church, it is at preſent. Thomas Aquinas in his Summs, 22 q. 83. art. 12. had before uttered theſe laſt words, and from him Biel did verbatim tranſcribe them, as alſo three of the ſeven ends of prayer, viz. 1. The excitation of the inward devotion by which the mind of the perſon that prays is elevated to God. 2. The paying what is due to God, that man may ſerve God with the whole that he hath from him, not only with the mind, but with the body. 3. That there may be a redundance from the ſoul upon the body, according to that of the Pſalmiſt, my heart is glad, and my tongue rejoiceth, and having given the opinion of theſe two great ſchoolmen in this caſe, it will be needleſs to ſhew that others of them followed theſe leading doctors of the ſchools.

3. As for the circumſtances required to make this ſervice acceptable, and prevalent, or to preſerve it from being ineffectual and blame-worthy, Paul requires. 1. That it be λογικὴ λατρεία, reaſonable ſervice, i. e. Rom. xii. 1. the ſervice of our rational faculty, that we ſhould love and ſerve him with all our heart, and all our mind, that we ſhould come unto him with a true heart in full aſſurance of faith, and ſerve him with our ſpirit, and glorify him with our ſoul, and body which are his, particularly that we ſhould pray with the underſtanding, with the deſire of the heart, that we muſt ſeek him with all our heart, and all our ſoul, muſt ſet our heart and our ſoul to ſeek the Lord God, muſt ſeek him with the whole heart, Pſal. cxix. 2, 10. Search for him with all our hearts, and engage our hearts to approach unto him, and lift up our hearts with our hands unto God in the Heavens, and they who do not cry unto him with their hearts, and who draw nigh unto him with their lips, when their hearts are far from him, are ſaid to worſhip him in vain; ſee 1 Cor. vi 19. Rom. xii. 11. 1 Cor. xiv. 15. Rom. x. 1. Deut. iv. 29. Joſ. xxii. 5. 1 Chron. ii. 19. Jer. xxix. 13, 30, 31. Lam. iii. 41. Hoſ. vii. 14. Matt. xv. 18.

Moreover, the prevailing prayer muſt, ſaith James, be δέησις ἐνεργουμένη, a prayer put up with great devotion, intention and inward working of the heart, Jam. v. 16. and ſuitably the Fathers generally tell us, this intention of the mind is neceſſary, becauſe God is not the hearer of the voice, but of the heart, or as Gregory, Moral. xxii. c. 18. true prayer conſiſts not in the words of the mouth, but in the thoughts of the heart, that we muſt knock with a pious excitation, and fervent intention of the heart in prayer, with many things of a like nature, but what poſſibility is there that the illiterate, who know not in the leaſt the meaning of the words the maſs-prieſt utters, ſhould thus join with him in his prayer, ſerving God with all his heart, ſoul and mind, engaging, and lifting up his heart to God, and praying with the underſtanding. He, indeed, may think of other good things at the ſame time, or uſe ſome other prayers with which he is acquainted; but join with the maſs-prieſt in his he cannot, for his heart knows nothing of it, conceives nothing of the ſenſe of the words ſpoken, and ſo is not affected with them, or moved by them to deſire any thing. He therefore loſeth all the advantages he might receive by theſe prayers ſpoken in a language underſtood, the excellency of devotion, the paſſion of deſires, the aſſent of the mind to God, the intellectual converſation with him, the actings of his faith, affiance, hopes, compunction, humiliation upon occaſion of the prayers recited, and whether it be reaſonable, that in the publick ſervice, all theſe advantages ſhould be loſt to the greateſt part of the Catholick Church, to them who chiefly need, and might entirely enjoy them from the ſervice miniſtred in their mother tongue, let any reaſonable man judge.

2. As for pſalmody, praiſes and thankſgivings, the argument is much the ſame, for theſe thankſgivings, ſaith the Pſalmiſt, muſt proceed from the ground of the heart, theſe praiſes muſt be ſung with underſtanding, with melody in the heart, with grace in the heart, we muſt praiſe God with the ſoul, with all that is within us, with all the heart, with uprightneſs of heart, with the whole heart, Corde magis quam voce, with a mind more employed than the voice, ſaith Jerom, and all the Fathers before-cited; ſee Pſal. xlvii. 7. 1 Cor. xiv. 15. Eph. v. 18. Col. iii. 16. Pſal. ix. 1. 86—12. ciii. 1. cxix. 7, 10. Tertull. de orat. cap. 10. 13. Cypr. de orat. Dom. p. 140. Pſal. xxix. 9. Either then let the people praiſe thee, O God, yea, let all the people praiſe thee, is a ceremonial precept, not now obligatory, no not when they come into the temple where every man, ſaith the Pſalmiſt, ſpeaketh of his praiſe, and then Paul's enquiry, how ſhall he that is unlearned ſay Amen, at thy giving of thanks, was but a frivolous, and needleſs queſtion, or they muſt be excuſed from doing it as Scripture, and the Fathers ſay it ought to be done, with the heart, ſoul and underſtanding, or elſe the praiſes uſed in publick muſt be uttered in a language they may underſtand. And ſurely were it ſo, they would receive great profit, and advantage by it, for their hearts would be filled with ſpiritual joy, with a deep ſenſe of the Divine Goodneſs, and Mercy to them in thoſe things, for which they praiſe him, they would be obliged by theſe conſiderations to a greater love, and a more chearful obedience to ſo good a God, and why all theſe great benefits ſhould be loſt to all the illiterate members of the Church of God, that is, unto the greateſt part of the Church Catholick, which chiefly need theſe helps, I am not able to conceive. To loſe the benefit of publick prayers and praiſes, can be nothing leſs than to loſe the benefit of the means of grace, and the ordinances of God from which we obtain pardon of ſins, are ſtrengthned in faith, confirmed in hope, increaſed in charity, are comforted in ſorrows, derive help from God, are made ſenſible of his love, and are encouraged in his ſervice, and I much fear they will have a great deal to anſwer for at the great day of judgment, who command and plead for the performance of God's publick ſervice, in ſuch a manner, as neceſſarily deprives ſo many of Chriſt's ſheep of ſuch ſpiritual advantages to be received by it; God grant that they who are concerned may lay this to heart.

Obj. But ſaith the author of Popery miſrepreſented and repreſented, chap. 24. p. 61, 62. If at any time the papiſt be preſent at the Church-Offices, the Litany, ſolemn thankſgivings, exequies, &c. which are all performed in Latin, or ſhould ſay any private prayers, or ſing an hymn in the ſame language which he underſtand not, yet is he taught that this may be done with great benefit to his ſoul, and the acceptance of God, if at theſe occaſions he does but endeavour to raiſe his thoughts to Heaven, and fix his heart upon his Maker. For that God doth not reſpect the language of the lips, but of the heart, does not attend the motion of the tongue, but of the mind, and if theſe be but directed to him in thankſgiving, in praiſing, in petitioning, he need not doubt but that God accepts his prayers and devotions; it being an undeniable thing that to ſay prayers well and devoutly, it is not neceſſary to have attention on the words, or on the ſenſe of the prayers, but rather purely on God. Of theſe three attentions, this laſt being approved by all as of greateſt perfection, and moſt pleaſing to God. And this he can have whether he underſtands the words, or no, it being very uſual and eaſy for a petitioner to accompany his petition with an earneſt deſire of obtaining his ſuit, though the language in which it is worded be unknown to him.

Rep. To this it hath been lately anſwered, that the publick offices of devotion were deſigned for the uniting the hearts and deſires of the people in the ſame things, (or in our Saviour's language that they might conſpire and agree in any thing which they ſhall aſk) there being one form of prayer for all to join together in, that with the united force of the whole congregation their petitions may go up to heaven. Now in order to this united devotion it is plainly neceſſary that the people all know what they pray for. 2. That all the devotion which the author mentions as neceſſary to be performed in publick by the common people, may be done as well at a ſilent meeting, where not a word is ſpoken, as where the maſs prieſt ſpeaketh what they underſtand not in the loudeſt voice. If at theſe dumb meetings they do but endeavour to raiſe their thoughts to heaven, and fix their hearts upon their Maker, for that God doth not reſpect the language of the lips, but of the heart; does not attend the motion of the tongue, but of the mind; and if theſe be but directed to him in thankſgiving, in praiſing, in petitioning, he need not doubt but that God accepts his prayers and devotions; and if this be ſufficient, all publick forms muſt be unneceſſary.

3. Whereas he confidently adds that it is a thing undeniable, that to ſay prayers well and devoutly it is not neceſſary to have attention on the words, or on the ſenſe of the prayers, but rather purely on God, of theſe three attentions, the laſt being approved by all as of greateſt perfection, and moſt pleaſing to God. This bold aſſertion is not only without all preſident from Scripture, or the writings of the ancient fathers, touching publick prayer, or praiſes, but it is flatly oppoſite to both, and in itſelf ridiculous; it is flatly oppoſite to Paul, who declares he cannot ſay Amen well, and devoutly unto the prayers or the thankſgiving of the prieſt, who knows not what he ſaith; as ſure he cannot do, who attends not to the ſenſe of the words, the prayer or the thankſgiving which he uſeth. 'Tis flatly oppoſite to all the ancient commentators on thoſe words of Paul, who do with one conſent declare that he who knoweth not the ſenſe or meaning of the words uſed in prayer or thankſgiving, cannot duly, or as he ought, yield his aſſent unto it, or confirm it with his teſtimony. This bold aſſertion expreſly is confuted by theſe ſayings of the fathers, that when the words of the prayer are unknown to them that are preſent——no man receives benefit by it, that when it is not underſtood it hath no devotion, and is deprived of its effects. That we muſt ſing with underſtanding of the things we ſing, with conſideration of the thing ſpoken, ſtirring up our minds to underſtand, and that otherwiſe we only ſing unto the air, only honour God with our lips, when our hearts are far from him. Laſtly, 'tis a ridiculous aſſertion; for may I not as rationally ſay, that to ſpeak well it is not neceſſary a man ſhould attend to the ſenſe of what he ſpeaks, but only to the perſon to whom he ſpeaks, as that to pray well it is not neceſſary he ſhould attend to the ſenſe of what he prays but only to the God he prays to; can I pray devoutly without deſiring fervently that God would hear my prayer, and can I have a fervent deſire of any thing of which I have no ſenſe? Can I expreſs that deſire without a ſenſe of it, or attending to it, or if I could, is it fit, ſaith the father, Lactantius l. 5. c. 19. "that God ſhould attend to thy prayer when thou thy ſelf doſt not do it, or regard that deſire which is ſenſeleſs, and unregarded by thy ſelf.

But 3. That men ſhould think it reaſonable to read the word of God unto the people in a tongue they do not underſtand, that is to deliver God's meſſage, his command concerning things which he requires them to do, or leave undone upon the greateſt penalties, in ſuch a manner as that the perſons concerned in that meſſage, and bound to yield obedience to thoſe commands, ſhould be unable to diſcern his will and meſſage to them, that they ſhould lie under a neceſſity of ſuffering the reproof of Ephraim, "I have written to them the great things of my law, but they have counted them as a ſtrange thing, Hoſ. viii. 12. Or a thing not belonging unto them to know, or do, this I ſay is a practice in it ſelf ſo abſurd and irrational, ſo contrary to the policy and cuſtom of all nations in matters of like nature. So repugnant to the great purpoſe and deſign of God in ſending of this meſſage by his Prophets, and inſpired penmen, ſo plainly contradictory to the ſenſe, faith, and practice of the whole body of Chriſtians through many ages of the Church, that it is matter of exceeding admiration that any who are called Chriſtians ſhould ſet themſelves to juſtify and plead for this enormity; and more particularly, that they who do pretend a reverence for the concurrent practice of the Church of former ages, and to hold nothing which hath not by tradition been handed down unto them, ſhould be guilty of it. For do not all the kingdoms of the world deliver to their ſubjects thoſe laws which they would have them practiſe in that language which they underſtand? Did any nation ever dream of promulgation of them in a tongue unknown? Is not the thing a contradiction in it ſelf, if the miniſters of this nation ſhould unanimouſly ſay they judged it expedient that all our laws, and all his Majeſty's proclamations ſhould be read to the people only in the Latin tongue, would not they render themſelves ridiculous, and juſtly incur the cenſure of their civil governors? Why then do men deal ſo with the laws, edicts, meſſages of the Great God of Heaven, as no man in his wits ever thought fit to deal with any human laws on earth? For though ſome heathen nations have thought fit to keep their laws concerning ſacra from the peoples knowledge, yet never any nation thought it fit to read thoſe laws to them in a tongue unknown, and much leſs thoſe which they believed were of great importance to be known.

That this practice is abſurd and irrational I confeſs is ſomewhat difficult to prove, as it is to prove that a man walketh with his feet, and ſeeth with his eyes, or any other thing which ſhines already with the brighteſt evidence, becauſe 'tis difficult to bring a medium more evident to prove it by, for ſince the caſe is in this matter plainly this, whether Chriſtians ſhould hear the word of life, and of ſalvation, ſo as to underſtand their duty by it, and the way to life, or only hear it read unto them as the ſparrow, and the wren, and the dogs that come with them do, by hearing of a ſound which both do underſtand alike, that is not all? Whether it ſhould be read unto them to no purpoſe, or to very good purpoſe? Whether they who are commanded to do all things to the edification of the Church, and to follow after thoſe things whereby they may edify others. Should read thoſe leſſons which by confeſſion of the Trent council contain great matter for inſtruction, and the edification of the people, ſo as that they cannot be inſtructed, or edified in the leaſt by what they hear? Whether men ſhould in the name of Chriſt, and as the mouth of God, read ſuch words as theſe unintelligibly, Hear this, O my people, give ear ye that dwell upon the earth. Hear and underſtand, take heed how you hear; or indeed any other words ſpoken by them, as by the mouth and meſſengers of God; this being in effect to ſay God commands you by me to do what he will not have you know, he by me ſpeaks to you to no purpoſe, and bids you underſtand what he knows you cannot. I ſay, this being the plain caſe betwixt us and the Church of Rome, it is almoſt as hard, as it is needleſs to ſay any thing which is clearer than the very queſtion, or will convince that man who underſtands the meaning of the words, and is not ſatisfied.

3. That the faith, ſenſe, and practice of the whole Chriſtian world was for five hundred, I might ſay, a thouſand years unanimouſly for us, I have already ſhewed, from many expreſs ſayings of the ancient Fathers, and many practices and cuſtoms of the Church of God. To which we only add at preſent.

1. That nothing is more common in the writings of the fathers of the fourth, fifth and ſixth century, than to ſay thus and thus you have heard in the Goſpel, the epiſtle read unto you, or in the Pſalms now read.

2. That they conſtantly complain of them who did not liſten diligently, and yield attention to the Scriptures read unto them in the Church, and do as frequently exhort them to the performance of this duty, it were eaſy to compoſe a volume on this fruitful ſubject, but the contents of Chryſoſtom's Ethicks, or Homilies with which he doth conclude his expoſitions on the Scriptures will make this manifeſt beyond all contradiction, the contents of his firſt Homily on Matthew, run thus, that we ought exactly to give heed to the Scriptures read to us; his ſecond on John, that they who come to Church ought exactly to give heed to the things ſpoken; his fifty-third, that it is very profitable exactly to liſten to the Holy Scriptures; his third upon the ſecond epiſtle to the Theſſalonians, that we ought with gravity to come into the Church, and diligently to hearken to the things read unto us. To omit many others to the ſame effect.

3. That they took care before they read the Scriptures to the people, to quicken their attention to what was to be read out of the word of God to them. For to this end the deacon as a common perſon cried out aloud, Let us attend to what is read, this he doth often, ſaith Chryſoſtom, and the voice he utters, ἡ φωνὴ κοινὴ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἐστὶν, is the common voice of the whole Church. Hom. 19. in Act. Apoſt. p. 724. After him comes the reader, and that he may engage us to obedience to this exhortation of the Church, by the deacon, he cries out, thus ſaith the Lord. And laſtly, that this practice is repugnant to the great purpoſe and deſign of God in ſending of his meſſage to the people by his Prophets, and inſpired Penmen, will be exceeding evident if we conſider,

1. That God of old required the Scriptures ſhould be read unto them that they might learn to do what he required by it, Deut. xxi. 11, 12. When all Iſrael is come to appear before the Lord thy God in the place which he ſhall chuſe, thou ſhalt read this law before all Iſrael in their hearing, gather the people together, men, women and children, and the ſtranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn, and fear the Lord their God and obſerve to do all the words of this law. Paul not only doth aſſure us that this word of God is profitable for inſtruction, but that whatſoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning; 2 Tim. iii. 16. Rom. xv. 4. When therefore they are read to people ſo as they cannot learn to do them, and can receive no comfort and inſtruction by them, they muſt be read ſo as that the end which God deſigned in the reading of them cannot be obtained.

2. To make this farther evident, and ſhew the miſchievous effects of this contrivance, let theſe few queſtions be conſidered ſeriouſly.

1. Whether by this practice, and tradition of reading of the word of God in Latin to them who do not underſtand that tongue, they have not made the word of God of none effect to all that hear it thus read to them, and render it impoſſible for them to hear and underſtand, much more to hear and do, as Holy Scripture frequently exhorts.

2. Whether by reading of Chriſt's Goſpel thus, they do not hinder it from being what in Chriſt's mouth it was, ὁ λόγος ἐν ἐξουσία, a word in power.

3. Whether the word of God thus read unto them can be, as the Apoſtle ſtyles it, quick, and powerful, and ſharper than a two-edged ſword, Heb. iv. 12. or the engrafted word which is able to ſave the ſoul, Jam. i. 21. or as it is ſo often ſtyled the word of exhortation, Acts xiii. 15. Heb. xiii. 22. the word of grace, Acts xiv. 3. xx. 32. of life, 1 John i. 1. of ſalvation, Acts xiii. 26. of wiſdom and knowledge, 1 Cor. xii. 8. of truth, 2 Cor. vi. 7. Eph. i. 13. of reconciliation, 2 Cor. v. 19. of righteouſneſs, Heb. v. 13.

1. Whether

4. Whether they who thus read it do not make it neceſſary, that they who do ſo hear ſhould not believe, regard, obſerve it; ſee Pſal. cvi. 24. Exod. ix. 21. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 21.

5. Whether they do not force ſuch hearers to be like thoſe unprofitable hearers in this parable, who hear the word of the kingdom, and underſtand it not, Matt. xiii. 19.

6. Whether they do not fulfil to Chriſtians that which God threatned to his people for their ſins, with another tongue will I ſpeak unto this people, Iſaiah xxviii. 11, 12.

7. Whether they do not in part, or for that ſeaſon, deprive the people of a great bleſſing? the Pſalmiſt having ſaid, Bleſſed are the people which hear the joyful ſound, Pſal. lxxxix. 15. And the Evangeliſt of the obſcureſt book of the New Teſtament, Bleſſed is he that readeth, and they who hear the words of this Propheſy, Rev. i. 3.

8. Whether they do not bring them under that dreadful puniſhment and curſe God by his Prophet threatned to his people, ſaying, Hear ye indeed but underſtand not, Eſa. vi. 9. and which was in our Saviour's time fulfilled upon them, Matt. xiii. 14.

9. Whether they do not render it impoſſible for them to believe the word thus read unto them with the heart, to to take heed what, or how they hear, to lay it up in, or write it on the tables of their hearts, as Scripture doth require of all that hear it.

10. Whether, according to Chryſoſtom, they do not even ſtop the mouth of God, or contribute to the ſtopping of it; for, ſpeaking to ſuch as did not mind, or yield attention to the word read unto them in the Church: Hear, ſaith he, Hom. 19. in Act. Apoſt. and be filled with horror, ſuch an one, as it were, ſtops the mouth of God; for the mouth by which he ſpeaks, the mouth of the Prophets, is the mouth of God; and ſurely, then, they muſt do little better who order matters ſo, that many of the hearers cannot mind or yield attention to the word read in the Church.

But, ſaith the author of the Papiſt Miſrepreſented and Repreſented. The Papiſt truly repreſented, chap. 10. doth not think it fit to be read generally by all without licenſe, or, in the vulgar tongue, not for any diſreſpect to it, but only becauſe he underſtands that private interpretation is not properly the Scripture, 2 Pet. i. 20. 2. Becauſe that in the Epiſtles of St. Paul are certain things hard to be underſtood which the unlearned and unſtaple deprave, (as alſo the reſt of the Scriptures) to their own perdition. 3. Becauſe God hath given only ſome to be Apoſtles, ſome Prophets, other ſome Evangeliſts, and other ſome paſtors and doctors, Eph. iv. 11. For theſe reaſons he is taught, that it is not convenient for the Scripture to be read indifferently to all men.

Anſw. Let it be noted, that theſe are reaſons why the Papiſt is to believe not only that the Scriptures ſhould not be read by all in the vulgar tongue, but alſo that it is not convenient for the Scripture to be read indifferently to them. And this diſcovers two of theſe reaſons, though they be very weak, yet to be very proper to the ſubject-matter, the ſtrength and conſequence of them being as unintelligible to the common people as their leſſons read in Latin; and being in this like unto their Latin ſervice, that, doubtleſs, they were not intended to inſtruct, or edify, and much leſs to convince; for, ſure no perſon in his ſenſes can hope to convince us with ſuch ſtuff as this. The Scriptures were indited by men, not ſpeaking what their own ſpirit did ſuggeſt, but what the Holy Ghoſt ſuggeſted to them; therefore, they are not to be read indifferently to all men, or to be read in publick in the vulgar tongue. God gave only ſome Apoſtles, Prophets, Evangeliſts, paſtors, and teachers; therefore, theſe paſtors and teachers muſt not read the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue, or unto all indifferently. The ſecond reaſon ſeems at firſt view more plauſible, and is, on all occaſions, urged by the Romiſh doctors; and that it is indeed no better than theſe following. The wicked turn the grace of God into laſciviouſneſs, Jude 4 therefore that grace of God which brings ſalvation ſhould not indifferently be made known unto them. The word of God is to many a ſavour of death unto death, 2 Cor. ii. 16. and therefore is not to be preached indifferently. In the writings of the Prophets, and of Moſes were certain things hard to be underſtood, which both the learned ſcribes and Phariſees, and the unlearned Jews perverted to the diſcarding of the true Meſſiah, and ſo unto their own perdition, therefore they were not to be read in the ſynagogues every ſabbath-day, Act. xiv. 21. Therefore our Saviour did not well to ſay unto them indifferently ſearch the Scriptures, Joh. v. 39. or, they have Moſes and the Prophets let them hear them, Luke xvi. 31. Moreover, the Apoſtle Peter in that very Epiſtle where he ſpeaks of the unſtable and unlearned who wreſted the Scriptures to their own deſtruction, doth inform his hearers that they would do well to take heed unto that word of Propheſy, which the unſtable did thus wreſt, 2 Pet. i. 19. As to a light ſhining in dark places, and to be mindful of the words which were ſpoken before by the Holy Prophets, and of the commandment of the Apoſtles of the Lord and Saviour, ch. iii. 2. ſo far was he from thinking this a ſufficient reaſon for their being kept from reading or hearing of the Holy Scriptures read intelligibly to them. To conclude then this chapter, I doubt not but whoſoever ſeriouſly weighs theſe things will with Caſſander, (de officio pii viri, p. 865.) ſay, It were to be wiſhed that, according to the Apoſtle's command, and the cuſtom of the ancient Church, ſome heed were taken of the people in the publick prayers, pſalms and leſſons of the Church, which are ſaid for their ſakes, and that the common people ſhould not always and altogether be kept ſtrangers from all communion in the prayers and Divine Leſſons. The words of Paul are manifeſt that what is ſpoken cannot be underſtood, unleſs you expreſs them in a ſignificant tongue, and that it cannot be that he, who, through unſkilfulneſs, knows not what is ſpoken, ſhould ſay Amen to the thankſgiving of another, and that oracle by whoſe admonition the Pope, with the college of cardinals, is ſaid to have granted liberty to the Sclavonians, to perform the ſervice in their mother tongue, ſeems to belong to Chriſtians of all nations; let every ſpirit praiſe the Lord, and every tongue confeſs unto him.

CHAP. XV.

3 By Chriſt's reſurrection, 12 he proveth the neceſſity of our reſurrection, againſt all ſuch as deny the reſurrection of the body. 21 The fruit, 35 and manner thereof, 51 And of the changing of them, that ſhall be found alive at the laſt day.

MOreover, brethren, I declare unto you the goſpel which I preached unto you, which alſo you have received, and wherein ye ſtand;

2 By which alſo ye are ſaved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unleſs ye have believed in vain.

3 For I delivered unto you firſt of all, that which I alſo received, how that Chriſt died for our ſins according to the ſcriptures:

4 And that he was buried, and that he roſe again the third day according to the ſcriptures:

5 And that he was ſeen of Cephas, then of the twelve.

6 After that, he was ſeen of above five hundred brethren at once: of whom the greater part remain unto this preſent, but ſome are fallen aſleep.

7 After that, he was ſeen of James; then of all the apoſtles.

8 And laſt of all he was ſeen of me alſo, as of one born out of due time.

9 For I am the leaſt of the apoſtles, that am not meet to be called an apoſtle, becauſe I perſecuted the church of God.

10 But by the grace of God I am what I am : and his grace which was beſtowed upon me, was not in vain ; but I laboured more abundantly than they all : yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me.

11 Therefore whether it were I or they, ſo we preach, and ſo ye believed.

12 Now if Chriſt be preached that he roſe from the dead, how ſay ſome among you, that there is no reſurrection of the dead ?

13 But if there be no reſurrection of the dead, then Chriſt is not riſen.

14 And if Chriſt be not riſen, then is our preaching vain, and our faith is alſo vain.

15 Yea, and we are found falſe witneſſes of God ; becauſe we have teſtified of God, that he raiſed up Chriſt : whom he raiſed not up, if ſo be that the dead riſe not.

16 For if the dead riſe not, then is not Chriſt raiſed :

17 And if Chriſt be not raiſed, your faith is vain ; ye are not in your ſins.

18 Then they alſo which are fallen aſleep in Chriſt, are periſhed.

19 If in this life only we have hope in Chriſt, we are of all men moſt miſerable.

20 But now is Chriſt riſen from the dead, and become the firſt-fruits of them that ſlept.

21 For ſince by man came death, by man came alſo the reſurrection of the dead.

22 For as in Adam all die, even ſo in Chriſt ſhall all be made alive.

23 But every man in his own order : Chriſt the firſt-fruits, afterwards they that are Chriſts, at his coming.

24 Then cometh the end, when he ſhall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father ; when he ſhall have put down all rule, and all authority, and power.

25 For he muſt reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet.

26 The laſt enemy that ſhall be deſtroyed, is death.

27 For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he ſaith all things are put under him, it is manifeſt that he is excepted which did put all things under him.

28 And when all things ſhall be ſubdued unto him, then ſhall the Son alſo himſelf be ſubject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all.

29 Elſe what ſhall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead riſe not at all ? why are they then baptized for the dead ?

30 And why ſtand we in jeopardy every hour ?

31 I proteſt by your rejoycing which I have in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord, I die daily.

32 If after the manner of men I have fought with beaſts at Epheſus, what advantageth it me, if the dead riſe not ? let us eat and drink, for to morrow we die.

33 Be not deceived : Evil communications corrupt good manners.

34 Awake to righteouſneſs, and ſin not ; for ſome have not the knowledge of God : I ſpeak this to your ſhame.

35 But ſome man will ſay, How are the dead raiſed up ? and with what body do they come ?

36 Thou fool, that which thou ſoweſt is not quickened except it die.

37 And that which thou ſoweſt, thou ſoweſt not that body that ſhall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of ſome other grain.

38 But God giveth it a body as it hath pleaſed him, and to every ſeed his own body.

39 All fleſh is not the ſame fleſh : but there is one kind of fleſh of men, another fleſh of beaſts, another of fiſhes, and another of birds.

40 There are alſo celeſtial bodies, and bodies terreſtrial : but the glory of the celeſtial is one, and the glory of the terreſtrial is another.

41 There is one glory of the ſun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the ſtars ; for one ſtar differeth from another ſtar in glory.

42 So alſo is the reſurrection of the dead. It is ſown in corruption, it is raiſed in incorruption :

43 It is ſown in diſhonour, it is raiſed in glory : it is ſown in weakneſs, it is raiſed in power :

44 It is ſown a natural body, it is raiſed a ſpiritual body. There is a natural body, and there is a ſpiritual body.

45 And ſo it is written, The firſt man Adam was made a living ſoul, the laſt Adam was made a quickning ſpirit.

46 Howbeit, that was not firſt which is ſpiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is ſpiritual.

47 The firſt man is of the earth, earthy: the ſecond man is the Lord from heaven.

48 As is the earthy, ſuch are they alſo that are earthy: and as is the heavenly, ſuch are they alſo that are heavenly.

49 And as we have born the image of the earthy, we ſhall alſo bear the image of the heavenly.

50 Now this I ſay, brethren, that fleſh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

51 Behold, I ſhew you a myſtery; We ſhall not all ſleep, but we ſhall all be changed,

52 In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the laſt trump (for the trumpet ſhall ſound, and the dead ſhall be raiſed incorruptible, and we ſhall be changed.)

53 For this corruptible muſt put on incorruption, and this mortal muſt put on immortality.

54 So when this corruptible ſhall have put on incorruption, and this mortal ſhall have put on immortality, then ſhall be brought to paſs the ſaying that is written, Death is ſwallowed up in victory.

55 O death, where is thy ſting? O grave, where is thy victory?

56 The ſting of death is ſin; and the ſtrength of ſin is the law.

57 But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

58 Therefore my beloved brethren, be ye ſtedfaſt, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, foraſmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.

In this chapter the Apoſtle eſtabliſhes the doctrine of the reſurrection; wherein

I. A preface including the excellency of the ſubject here handled; in that it is a principal point of the Goſpel; ver. 1. and the way of ſalvation, ver. 2. Then he recites ſome principal points of doctrine formerly delivered to them, viz. (1) concerning the death of Chriſt, ver. 3. and his reſurrection, ver. 4. which he proves (1) by his appearing ſeveral times to the Apoſtles and brethren, ver. 5—7. (2) and laſt of all to himſelf; amplified by a deſcription of himſelf, in reſpect of the order of his calling to the Apoſtleſhip, in the laſt place; ver. 8. then his unworthineſs of that office in regard of his perſecution; ver. 9. Thirdly, the ground of his preſent condition; the grace of God. Fourthly, the good uſe he made of it; in his labouring abundantly, ver. 10. (3) By the unanimous conſent of allthe Apoſtles in this point, and relief of the Church; ver. 11.

II. The proof of the reſurrection; wherein from the reſurrection of Chriſt he infers the reſurrection of the dead: herein he

(1.) Proceeds by way of confutation of the contrary opinion, That there is no reſurrection. Which he propounds at ver. 12. and confutes by the abſurd conſequence thereof, that then Chriſt is not riſen, ver. 13. The abſurdity of which conſequence he ſhews in many particulars. For then, ſays he, all preaching and believing is vain; ver. 14. All that affirm Chriſt to be riſen are falſe witneſſes, ver. 15, 16. They are yet in their ſins; ver. 17. All the dead are periſhed; ver. 18. and the Chriſtians of all men muſt be moſt miſerable; ver. 19.

(2.) By way of affirmation, That he is riſen; amplified by ſhewing in what capacity he roſe; as the firſt fruits from the dead; ver. 20.

(3.) By way of probation; where he produces many arguments taken,

1. From the ſuitableneſs and becomingneſs of this, that Chriſt ſhould do as much for his members in a way of bleſſing and mercy, as Adam did for his poſterity in a way of curſing and miſery. Propounded, (1.) more generally, of man and man, ver. 21. And then, (2.) more particularly and expreſly, of Adam and Chriſt, ver. 22. Amplified by the order of this Reſurrection; firſt the head, then the members, ver. 23.

(2.) From the nature of Chriſt's mediatorial Kingdom, which muſt continue till he has ſubdued all his enemies, and no longer, but muſt then be delivered up to his Father, ver. 24—26. Amplified, by ſhewing the neceſſity of this, ver. 27, 28.

(3.) From the ſufferings of the martyrs and confeſſors; which would be uſeleſs and needleſs, if there were no Reſurrection. Where he firſt ſhews the uſefulneſs of ſuch ſufferings, ver. 29. And then the danger true Chriſtians are continually expoſed unto, ver. 30. Exemplified in the Apoſtle Paul himſelf, who was continually expoſed to death and dangers, ver. 31, 32.

(4.) If there be no Reſurrection, we may abandon our ſelves to all ſenſual delights, and avoid or flee from ſufferings for the name of Chriſt, as much, and by any means, as we can, ver.— 32. Amplified by a caution againſt ſuch opinions, with the reaſon, becauſe they will infect the practice, ver. 33. And then he admoniſheth them to ſhake off all ſuch principles and practices, ver. 34

III. An explication of the manner of the Reſurrection, ſhewing the quality or condition of the bodies of the ſaints after the Reſurrection. Where, firſt, he propounds a twofold queſtion concerning the poſſibility of the Reſurrection, and the condition of the bodies raiſed, ver. 35. And then returns proper anſwers; ſhewing the poſſibility of the Reſurrection, by an inſtance in nature; of corn quickned after its death, ver. 36. And by the condition of the bodies raiſed, viz. with more excellent qualities than before, illuſtrated by ſeveral ſimilitudes.

(1.) Propoſed; as of corn, which grows up in a more beautiful manner than it was ſown, ver. 37, 38. Of ſeveral kinds of fleſh, one more excellent than another, ver. 39. Of bodies celeſtial and terreſtrial, one more glorious than another, ver. 40. Of bodies celeſtial, one more glorious than another, ver. 41.

(2.) Applied to manifeſt the difference between the dying and riſing of the body. Where we find a four-fold difference between them, ver. 42—44. The roots of theſe two ſtates of the body; one Adam, the other Chriſt, ver. 45. The order of theſe two ſtates, ver. 46. And finally, their original again, ver. 47—49. Then

He ſhews the neceſſity of this great change of the body after the Reſurrection, in regard to the place to which it ſhall be tranſlated, ver. 50. After which,

He gives you the caſe of thoſe that ſhall be found alive at Chriſt's coming, ver. 51, 52. Amplified by the neceſſity of their undergoing ſuch a change, which he affirms at ver. 53. and proves by the authority of Scripture, ſhewing the victory which he believes muſt obtain over death, ver. 54. Amplified by their triumph over it, ver. 55. By ſhewing wherein the ſting of death conſiſts, ver. 56. And by a gratulation for their deliverance through Chriſt, ver. 57. From whence follows,

IV. The application and concluſion of the whole, in an exhortation to conſtancy and abounding in good works, ver. 58.

Ver. 1. —— I declare unto you.] In this chapter we have the fulleſt account of the Reſurrection of the dead, that the whole Scripture affords us, plainly deſcribed, and ſtrongly proved ; enobled with the moſt auguſt myſteries and grand ſentiments, and adorned with all the beauty of compoſition, choice of words, vigour, variety and magnificence of figures, as are to be found in any piece of eloquence of equal length in any language. For,

Here we meet with the metaphor in all its ſprightlineſs and clear alluſion, ver. 42, &c. The Proſopopeia, with all its ſurprize and wonder, ver. 55. The Interrogation, with its moſt preſſing vehemence and rapidity, ver. 29, &c. The Amplification, with its unexhauſted ſtores, and entertaining variety, ver. 31. The Repetition, with all its emphaſis, quickneſs of turn, and charm of harmony, ver. 43, &c. The Epiphonema, or concluding Remark, with all its ſoundneſs of ſenſe and ſagacity, and its dexterity and happineſs of application, ver. 58.

——— The Goſpel.] The joyful tidings of Chriſt's dying for our ſins, ver. 3. His Burial and Reſurrection on the third day, ver. 4, &c.

Ver. 2. —— If ye keep in memory.] In ſuch a manner as to hold faſt the faith which he had preached, and they received.

——— Unleſs ye have believed in vain.] Or, made your faith of none effect, by your evil deeds, or turning from that Goſpel which ye had once embraced.

Ver. 3. —— According to the Scriptures.] Pſal. xxii. 15, &c. Iſa. liii. 5, 6, &c. Dan. ix. 26. See alſo Luke xxiv. 26. and 1 Pet. i. 11. and ii. 24.

Ver. 4. —— According to the Scriptures.] Pſalm xvi. 10. Iſa. liii. 10. Hoſea vi. 2.

Ver. 5.—Seen of Cephas.] i. e. Peter. See Luke xxiv. 34.

——— Then of the twelve.] See Mark xvi. 14. and Luke xxiv. 26. John xx. 19—24. and Acts x. 41.

Ver. 7 —— Of all the Apoſtles.] See Luke xxiv. 50.

Ver. 8. —— Seen of me.] See Acts ix. 4. and xxii. 14—18. For Paul was the laſt of the Apoſtles to whom Chriſt appeared.

——— As of one born out of due time.] i. e. Abortive, Where note, that the Apoſtle makes uſe of theſe terms to ſignify the more naturally, that he was the laſt that was called to the Apoſtleſhip by Chriſt ; beſides his converſion being ſudden and ſurprizing, he likens it to an abortion, which is always the effect of ſome ſudden ſurprize, ſome ſtrain or violent motion. So Paul's converſion was ſudden and violent, and out of the common way ; for, he was ſmitten from his horſe to the ground, where he lay as one dead, in his paſſage to his new life.

Ver. 9. —— I perſecuted the Church of Chriſt.] As it is recorded in Acts ix. Gal. i. 13. and 1 Tim. i. 13.

Ver. 10. —— I laboured more abundantly than they all.] As may be proved from a compariſon of Paul's labours, with Matt. x. 20.

Ver. 11. —— Whether I or they, &c.] i. e. Whether I, or any other Apoſtle laboured moſt in preaching the Goſpel, the doctrine is the ſame ; we both teach that Chriſt died for our ſins, roſe again the third day, and will raiſe us.

Ver. 12. —— How ſay ſome of you, That there is no reſurrection of the dead ?] Here the Apoſtle ſpeaks plain, accuſing ſome of the Corinthians of the hereſy of the Sadducees, who ſaid there is no reſurrection.

Ver. 13. —— Then is Chriſt not riſen.] This is an argument, ad hominem, for they had believed in the Goſpel, which Paul preached ; ſee ver. 3, 4.

Ver. 14. —— Then is our preaching vain.] i. e. Then you muſt, if you deny the reſurrection of Chriſt, reject our preaching as fooliſh and idle tales.

——— And your faith is alſo vain.] And if our preaching be an idle, fooliſh dream, ſo your faith, which you have received thereby, is no better than a fancy.

Ver. 17. —— Ye are yet in your ſins.] Or, under the guilt of Adam's ſin, and liable to condemnation for that original tranſgreſſion ; for Chriſt was raiſed again for our juſtification.

Ver. 18. — Which are fallen aſleep in Chriſt are periſhed.] All thoſe, who through faith expected the Meſſiah, and the holy martyrs and ſufferers for Chriſt, ſince his coming eſpecially, are utterly loſt and periſhed finally, if there be no reſurrection from the dead ; i. e. martyrs, will then be great looſers, and martyrdom muſt be accounted great folly.

Ver. 19. — We.] Chriſtians.

——— Of all men moſt miſerable.] As if the Apoſtle had ſaid, as thoſe martyrs were errant fools, and periſhed as ſuch, who laid down their lives for Chriſt, if they have no hopes of a reſurrection, when they ſhall take them up again. So we Chriſtians that ſurvive, are the wretchedeſt creatures upon earth, who undergo all the ſufferings and hardſhips of this life, and deny ourſelves many comforts and advantages, which we might enjoy. From whence we may obſerve, that the ſoul of man is immortal ; and therefore, before I proceed to the Apoſtles main argument to prove the reſurrection of the dead, I ſhall prefix,

A Diſſertation on the immortality of the ſoul.

When our Saviour was commiſſioning his diſciples to preach the Goſpel to the world, knowing that the world would hate them, and perſecute them for their good works, bid them not fear them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the ſoul, &c. Matt. x. 28. In which words we deduce theſe obſervations.

I. That the ſoul and body are diſtinct beings.

II. That after the diſſolution of the body, the ſoul, as the Apoſtle here teaches, lives in a ſeparate ſtate. And I ſay,

I. That the ſoul and body are diſtinct beings.

The very argument our Lord uſes to perſuade the diſciples not to fear thoſe who can kill the body, reſts upon this ſuppoſition, that the ſoul and body are beings diſtinct one from another. For if men had no ſouls ; or, if the ſoul was not a different thing from the body ; or, if other men had as much power over the ſoul as the body, there would be no force in his reaſoning. But to make this truth the more evident, I ſhall draw arguments from theſe three heads.

1. From the diſtinct properties of the ſoul and body.
2. From the incapacity of matter to think.
3. From the difference every where ſuppoſed in Scripture between the ſoul and body. And,

1. From the diſtinct properties of the ſoul and body. Now if we will give our ſelves leave a little to contemplate our own nature, we ſhall diſcover in us powers, qualities, and actions, which are peculiar to the ſoul, and quite different from the affections and qualities which belong to the body. Eſſential properties of the ſoul are to think, to underſtand, to will, to conſider, to judge, and the like. But inſeparable properties of body, are length, breadth, thickneſs, ſize, ſhape, &c.

But as theſe things may be eſteemed eſſential, ſome to the mind, and ſome to the body ; for if either you ſever thinking from the mind, or extention from the body, you can have no conception or apprehenſion of the one, or the other : So they are very diſtinct, not having the leaſt affinity each with other ; thus conſideration, remembrance, judgment, liberty, conſcience, have no relation unto the body, and do not enter into the notion and idea of it ; neither doth length, breadth, ſize, figure, hardneſs, ſoftneſs, enter into the conception of a ſoul ; for we never ſpeak of the length, or the ſhape, or the bulk, or the colour of our thoughts, ſince that would be abſurd ſpeech, by which we could mean nothing.

So that it is manifeſt, our ſouls are diſtinguiſhed from our bodies by properties, which are peculiar and eſſential to each of them ; and that we have as clear, full, and diſtinct apprehenſions of the attributes that are eſſential to the ſoul, as of thoſe which are inſeparable from the body. For does not every man as plainly comprehend what is meant by thinking, conſidering, and judging, as by dimenſions, motion, and diviſibility in bodies? "Every man judges (ſays Atticus Platonicus, and Euſeb. præp. lib. xv. p. 810.) that they are the properties of the ſoul, to deliberate, to conſider, and after any manner to think. For when he looks upon body, and its powers, and likewiſe concludes, that thoſe kind of operations cannot belong unto bodies, he preſently yields, that there is in us ſome other thing, which does deliberate or adviſe, and that is the ſoul."

2. I argue, that the ſoul and body are diſtinct ſubſtances, from the incapacity of matter to think. All we know of the nature and qualities of matter, we learn from its operation on our ſenſes ; for further than it acts upon ſome of our ſenſes we have no notice of it. But matter can no other way work upon our ſenſes, but by motion, which is the cauſe of all that variety, which ſhews it ſelf in bodies. If then matter can perceive and think, and all the effects and changes in matter be wrought by motion, then unto motion muſt be aſcribed thought and perception. But as nothing is more unlike than corporeal motion and cogitation, ſo it is unconceiveable how one ſhould be the cauſe of the other, that is, how ſtupid matter by any degree of motion communicated to it, ſhould acquire a power to conſider, reflect, and remember.

The Epicureans indeed, who hold the ſoul corporeal, to explain how matter may perform the functions of the mind; do teach that the parts of matter which go to making a ſoul, are light and ſmall, and of a globular or round figure. Juſt as if a maſſy piece of lead, when melted and formed into bullets, was in a nearer capacity to think, meditate, debate, and act like a ſoul. But I appeal to the common ſenſe of mankind, whether that philoſopher has a right to call any legendary tale into queſtion, who can believe that little balls of matter, by being briskly moved, can come to have underſtanding, will, and judgment.

Surely they ought to doubt of nothing, who can be perſwaded that ſmall bodies round, or of any other ſhape, ſhould by juſtling and moving one againſt another, be endued with reaſon and wiſdom, and a talent to diſpute concerning the nature of their own beings; to raiſe queſtions, whether they are matter or ſpirit, bodily or incorporeal ſubſtances? And not only yield to, or reſiſt the impreſſions of objects preſent to them, according to the acknowledged laws of motion, but alſo reflect on the times long ſince paſt, and meditate on thoſe which are to come, nay, ſtretch out their conſideration to infinite ſpace, and eternal duration.

But as the Epicureans would rid us of our difficulties by aſſigning the figure of the parts, which compound a corporeal mind; ſo the Stoicks would make the thing intelligible by deſcribing the kind or ſort of motion which cauſes matter to think. Now its their doctrine that the ſoul is fire, and conſequently, that it performs its office by ſuch motion as is in fire.

But this is ſtrange fire which gives us underſtanding, and yet no light, whereby we may any whit more eaſily conceive in what manner it is poſſible for matter to think. For who can ſhew ſo much as the ſhadow of an argument to move a ſober man to conclude, That there ſhould be reaſoning powers and faculties any more in a fire of coals, than in a lump of cold clay; or that a log of wood ſhould get ſenſe and underſtanding being put into a flame; Cic. Tuſc. quæſt. lib. 1. If materialiſts will make their ſenſes, to which they ſo often appeal, the judges, they muſt confeſs, that the natural effect of fire is to ſeparate and rend the parts of bodies aſunder, which action can bear no faint reſemblance to the thoughts, deliberations, and judgments of the ſoul, nor to that freedom of will with which it either ſets its faculties on work, or ſtops them.

Theſe are ſome of the groſs and nauſeous abſurdities, which unhappy licentious perſons are forced to cram down, who yet are ſo nice and ſqueamiſh, as not to yield their aſſent to any truths of religion, for which there is not mathematical proof or demonſtration.

Ariſtotle, ſays Cic. in Tuſc. quæſt. l. 1. a man of moſt profound judgment, and penetrating thoughts, who was of opinion that every thing under the ſun was compounded of the four elements, obſerving that the faculties and operations of human ſouls were ſo remotely diſtant from all the phœnomena or appearances of bodies, was compelled to believe, that there was a fifth eſſence or element, of which only ſouls were formed, To remember the paſt, to conſider the preſent, and provide for the future; to encreaſe our own knowledge, and to improve others, and ſuch like; all the products of a thinking faculty, were things in the opinion of this great philoſopher, not poſſible to be accounted for by the affections and modes, and qualities of matter; ſo that I may ſay with Mr. Bernier, My dear friend, have not you and I concluded an hundred times, that how much ſoever we ſtrained our underſtanding, we could never conceive how from inſenſible corpuſcles there could ever reſult any thing ſenſible, without the intervention of any thing but what is inſenſible; and that with all their atoms, how ſmall and how nimble ſoever they make them, what motions and figures ſoever they give them, and in what order, mixture, or diſpoſition they range them; yea, and whatever induſtrious hand they aſſign them for guidance, they would never be able (ſtill ſuppoſing with them, that they have no other properties or perfection than thoſe recited) to make us imagine how thence could reſult a compound, I ſay not that ſhould be reaſoning like a man, but that ſhould be merely ſenſitive, ſuch as may be the vileſt and moſt imperfect worm on earth. How then dare they pretend that they will make it out, how thence can reſult a thing imagining, a thing reaſoning, and ſuch an one as ſhall be the imaginations and ratiocinations themſelves. Mr. Bernier's Letter of Atoms and the mind of man, p. ult.

3. The ſoul and body will appear diſtinct ſubſtances from the difference every where ſuppoſed in Holy Scripture between them. To ſhew which, I begin with the creation of man. And God ſaid, Let us make man in our image, after our likeneſs; Gen. i. 26. But man is not like God in reſpect of his body, becauſe God hath no body. Beſides, the body in its nature is diviſible and corruptible: But God without change or decay is eternally the ſame, a Being for ever infinitely perfect. The ſimilitude therefore between God and man muſt be with relation to the ſoul, which is a ſpirit as God is a ſpirit.

The diſtinction between ſoul and body may alſo be obſerved from the manner wherein God created man. And the Lord formed man of the duſt of the ground, and breathed into his noſtrils the breath of life, and man became a living ſoul; C. 2. v. 7. His body was made of the earth, but his ſoul which gave life to it, came immediately from God. The ſoul therefore, ſays J. Philoponus de mund. Creat. p. 21. was not created of the ſame ſubſtance, nor together with the body, but of one better and more Divine, as the Scripture ſhews. For of the brute creatures void of reaſon, it ſays, That the water brought forth ſome, and the earth others; but of man, that God breathed into him the breath of life. Manifeſting thereby that he had an intellectual and rational nature, more noble than that of brutes, and near of kin to the Divine Beings above.

Accordingly alſo Solomon pronounceth, that at the hour of death, "The ſpirit of man goeth upward, and that the ſpirit of the beaſt goeth downward to the earth;" Eccl. iii. 21. In which author, the wiſeſt of men, (if his authority may be of any weight) there is another paſſage that demonſtrates the ſoul and body to be diſtinct ſubſtances, and puts the matter beyond a poſſibility of a contradiction, at c. xii. 27. "Then ſhall the duſt return to the earth as it was, and the ſpirit ſhall return to God who gave it." The ſoul of the dead remain uncorrupted. For God lends men the ſpirit, and 'tis his image: But the body we have of the earth, and we all being diſſolved into it, ſhall be duſt; but Heaven ſhall receive the ſpirit; ſee Phocylid. Poem. and Triſmegiſt.

In purſuance of our argument it may here be proper to obſerve, how difficult it will be for them, who maintain that the ſoul is only a mode, accident, or quality of the body, to give a rational account of Chriſt's words: "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the ſoul," &c.

According to theſe philoſophers other men may kill the body, but are not able to hurt the accidents and qualities of the body, which they are pleaſed to call the ſoul. And yet it is moſt certain, that men only can deſtroy the accidents and qualities in bodies, but cannot deſtroy their ſubſtance, which after all force uſed to it, will ſtill ſubſiſt in other forms and ſhapes. Inſomuch as they quite invert our Saviour's doctrine, it following manifeſtly from their aſſertions, that men have only power to kill the ſoul, that is, to deſtroy the modes and accidents in the body, but can do no injury to the body or ſubſtance itſelf.

In one inſtance more give me leave to ſhew how repugnant theſe wild opinions are to the Chriſtian Religion: And it ſhall be in the promiſe of our Lord to the penitent malefactor, who was crucified with him, to day ſhalt thou be with me in Paradiſe, Luke xxiii. 43. which in their ſenſe muſt be thus: While the body of this ſincere penitent was on the croſs, or in the grave, the modifications and qualities of his body were to attend our Saviour into Paradiſe. But I think only to name ſuch ridiculous ſtuff is ſufficient to confute it; nothing being plainer than that men muſt either part with theſe principles, or the doctrines of their Saviour, for they can never conſiſt and agree together.

2. That after the diſſolution of the body, the ſoul doth exiſt and live in the ſeparate ſtate. It appears from our Lord's words, fear not them which kill the body, &c. that he does rather ſuppoſe, than go to prove the immortality of the ſoul, which he took for a granted truth by them ſteadily believed. And therefore it was not his deſign to convince them, that the ſoul does live after its ſeparation from the body; but to ſhew that it is ſuch a ſimple and incorruptible ſubſtance, that nothing beneath Almighty Power can deſtroy it.

But I fear a general decay of faith and piety will not only juſtify, but make it requiſite, that we ſhould endeavour to prove that fundamental doctrine of the immortality of the ſoul, the truth whereof our Lord ſuppoſed, while he was inſtructing his diſciples.

1. The firſt argument I ſhall uſe for the immortality of the ſoul, ſhall be from the general ſenſe and perſwaſion of men, that the ſoul does ſurvive the body. This belief ſeems to be as early as the firſt inhabitants on the earth; for authors of the greateſt reputation and antiquity, who write of the opinions and manners of men, do relate almoſt of every country, that they thought the ſoul did ſubſiſt after death.

This perſwaſion prevailed among the Jews, not only while they were the immediate and peculiar care of God, but hath been diligently preſerved and tranſmitted to their poſterity; the ſect of unbelieving Sadducees being long ſince extinct; ſee Joſephus, lib. 3. and Tacit. lib. 5. hiſt. Maimonid. de fund. Legis, p. 47. Vide Manaſſ. Ben. Iſrael de reſurrect. Mort. The Egyptians, a nation famous for invention of arts and ſciences, are ſaid firſt to have taught the doctrine of immortality of ſouls; ſee Herodot. in Euterp. Diodor. Bibliothec. p. 83. Dion. Halicarn. Rom. Antiq. p. 523, 3. Strabo, l. 4. p. 197. id. l. 13. p. 76. Cæſar, l. vi p. 118. Pompon. Mela. lib. 2. c. 2. p. 28. Diog. Laer. prœem. Segm. 11. Which opinion found entertainment among all the ancient inhabitants of the eaſt; was the perſuaſion alſo of the old Greeks and Gauls, and Thracians.

This was the opinion of Homer, Il. ι. Odyſ. λ'. who preceded all the ſects of philoſophers, he in words, very like our Saviour's, declaring that nothing was ſo valuable to him as his ſoul, and he makes Ulyſſes to ſummon before him the ſouls of the dead, and to hold diſcourſe with them. And among the old Greek and Latin poets, ſcarce more than a diſſenter or two from the judgment of Homer are to be found.

Thales, ſuppoſed by ſome the firſt phyſiologer who treated of nature, is ſuppoſed alſo firſt to have taught the immortality of ſouls, Diog. l. 1. Segm. 24. But as Herodotus does aſcribe the firſt publication thereof to the Egyptians, Herod. in Euterp. So Pauſanias aſcribes it to the Chaldeans and Indian Magi; as Tully does it to Pherecydes, Pythagoras's maſter; and ſome to others: Inſomuch, that this belief of the ſouls future ſubſiſtence ſeems ſo general and very ancient, that the firſt writers are not able to diſcover the authors of it, or fix the time of its beginning; ſee Cic. Tuſcul. l. 1. Vide menagii in Diog. Laert. li. 1. Seg. 116. Obſervationes.

This alſo is the avowed doctrine of Pythagoras, the founder of the ſect of Italick philoſophers, and of Plato, with all his judicious interpreters, and Plotinus, Amelius, Porphyrius, Proclus, Alcinous. And into this liſt we may bring Ariſtotle, about whom though there is ſome controverſy, yet Photius affirms, that they did not dive deep enough into his profound mind, who were of another opinion; ſee Photii Biblioth. Col. 1317. And as Moſes relates, that after the body was formed of the earth, God did breathe a living ſoul into it; ſo Ariſtotle, l. 4. de gen. animal. expreſly teaches, that the ſoul only enters the body from without, and is of Divine Extraction: He may alſo paſs for a good witneſs, both when he affirms, that the renowned philoſophers who were before him, believed that the ſoul lived after it had left the body, and alſo when he ſays no philoſopher before him held the world to be eternal.

That great man Tully (Tuſc. queſt. lib. 1.) urges for the truth of this doctrine, immemorial tradition, that we have the conſent of all antiquity for it; and that the voice of all men is the law of nature; and that all are much concerned for thoſe things, which ſhall take place after death. Seneca alſo treating of the eternity of ſouls, does affirm that he has the publick perſwaſion on his ſide, and the conſent of men, who either fear the inviſible powers below, or worſhip thoſe above; and that the ſoul is of Divine Original, obnoxious neither to old age nor death; and that as ſoon as it is ſet at liberty from the heavy chains of this body, it will return to its place in Heaven; Suaſoriar, p. 129.

Macrobius (in ſom. Scipio. l. 1. c. 14.) declares, that the opinion hath univerſally obtained, as well that the ſoul is an incorporeal ſubſtance, as that it is immortal.

And as the belief of immortality was generally received among the antients; ſo men all along ſince have been ſtedfaſt and conſtant to it. For from modern hiſtories, voyages, and travels, it is found to be the common opinion of the world as much in theſe later days, as it was in old time. The Turks have ſo ſtrong a perſwaſion both of the reſurrection of the body, and the ſubſiſtence of the ſoul after it leaves the body, that not only the Alcoran, but their offices of prayer (Muhammedan. Prec. p. 18. & p. 399. Vide Hottinger. Hiſt. Orient. p. 254.) have frequent relation thereunto. The Arabian philoſophers think that a virtuous ſoul, when it has taken leave of the body, ſhall partake of immenſe pleaſures and joys, and be as the chief Angels which are neareſt to God, Propoſita Sapientiæ Arabum Philoſoph. p. 75.

The Chineſe hold the ſoul ſpiritual, and ſeparable from the body, and that after death pious ſouls ſhall be rewarded, and bad ſouls tormented. They who have of late travelled in Perſia, India, Japan, and other countries of the eaſt, have obſerved the ſame belief to prevail among the preſent dwellers of thoſe places; and the like accounts we have of Southern inhabitants from them who have viſited Guinea, and other parts of Africa. And though they who firſt touched at the Cape of Good Hope, either through want of time rightly to be informed, or not having curioſity ſufficient to diſcover the truth, did relate the people of thoſe parts to have no religion; yet we have quite another ſtory of them from late travellers, who with more care and accuracy have ſearched into thoſe matters. And what is remarkable the firſt diſcoverers of America, found the people of Braſil, Canada, Virginia, &c. though ſevered from the reſt of the world by the vaſt ocean, and with whom probably they had no intercourſe in many ages to have generally the ſame belief of the ſoul's immortality, Joh. Mendoza, de Regno Chinæ, l. 2. 6. Trigautius de Chriſt. expedit. apud ſinas, p. 102. Linſchoten, Voyag. p. 39. Varenius de diverſ. Gent. Religion, p. 255, 269. Lerius, Navigat. c. 16. Oſorii Hiſt. l. 4. Benzo Hiſt. Nov. orb. p. 29. Harriot. Virgin. Tavernier Perſian Trav. p. 165. Ind. Trav. 167. Joſ. Acoſta, lib. 5. c. 7. Rauwolf's Trav. p. 240.

But after all it muſt be allowed, That there have been here and there ſome, who reſolving to live wickedly in this life, have pretended to deny a future one; even the Chriſtian Church hath not wholly eſcaped this infection. For within its pale ſome have ſtarted up, who maintain the impious doctrines of Epicurus, to the great diſhonour of the Lord who bought them, and the reproach of their Holy Profeſſion.

Of this ſort of ill men about the beginning of the 16th century, Italy produced a plentiful crop, who valuing themſelves more upon the reputation of their philoſophy than religion, taught openly, that the ſoul did periſh with the body; ſee concil. lateran Seſſio 8. 19. Decemb. An. 1513. But notwithſtanding theſe vain-glorious perſons by venting ſuch ſtrange notions, hoped to have been accounted the only maſters of ſenſe and reaſon, yet by the judicious and ſtrong confutations of the worthy men who anſwered their writtngs, it does appear, that they are as weak philoſophers as bad Chriſtians.

But as thoſe who bid defiance to God, and ridicule religion, bear no proportion to the bulk of mankind, ſo 'tis no wonder ſome ſuch ſhould be found. For when men abuſe the liberty God has given them over themſelves, and by continual debauchery weaken and corrupt their faculties, it may ſo come to paſs, that they ſhall hardly form a true judgment of any thing. Indeed, a mind enfeebled and clouded with the ſteams of brutiſh luſt is no more able to contemplate the Glorious Nature of God, or to be affected with pure and intellectual pleaſures, than a body brought into the world without eyes and hands, is capable to do the ordinary works of life.

For men may make themſelves monſters, as well as be born ſo; ſays Muretus in Ariſt. Eth. p. 150. but then by the example of a few ſuch monſters, we ought not to ſuffer either our faith to be ſhaken, or our manners to be perverted.

Before I part with this head, I would obſerve, where piety, and virtue, and wiſdom, have thriven moſt in the converſation of men, and the greater good they have done to the world, ſo much the more firmly they have been perſuaded, that their ſouls ſhould ſubſiſt after they had left their bodies; and on the contrary, that there hardly ever were found any much diſpoſed to ſcoff at Providence, and deny a future ſtate, who had not been infamous livers.

A Heathen philoſopher hath ſpoke of this point with ſo much wiſdom and piety, that I think it will be no loſs of time here to preſent yon with what he hath ſaid, " If conſcience, (ſays Hieroc. in carm. Pythag. p. 165.) awaken in a bad man a ſenſe of his evil deeds, which tortures his mind, and puts him in fear of puniſhment in hell, his only remedy is to fly to non-entity, or not-being; ſo he cures one evil with another, ſupporting his wickedneſs by the deſtruction of his ſoul. He gives ſentence of himſelf that after death he ſhall be nothing, to fly the penalties of future judgment. For a wicked man will not have his ſoul immortal, that he may not ſubſiſt to ſuffer puniſhment. He anticipates his judge, by declaring it is fit that a wicked ſoul ſhould be reduced to nothing. But as thro' want of counſel he was drawn to ſin, ſo through ignorance of the meaſure of things he paſſes wrong judgment on himſelf. For the judges of ſpirits departed, framing their ſentence according to the rules of truth, do not judge it meet the ſoul ſhould be annihilated.

My next argument ſhall be taken from the fears men have of puniſhment after this life for their ſins. Sin troubles the minds of men in ſuch inſtances, as the law takes no notice of; and in ſuch, which notwithſtanding they are puniſhable by law, yet were acted too ſecretly to be detected; and then alſo, when the offenders having fled their country, were out of reach of the ſecular judge. Such perſons likewiſe have been perplexed with the remembrance of their wickedneſs, whoſe height and power made them ſtrong enough to break through the laws, and trample on them; in which ſeveral caſes there was nothing but the natural ſuggeſtions of conſcience to terrify them.

Now, whence can this inward trouble proceed, but from an invincible perſuaſion, that after death will come judgment. If any doubt this, we may appeal to diſconſolate ſinners themſelves, who often finding no eaſe in the buſineſs of their calling, in the converſation of their friends, nor in the change of company or place, have been driven to ſeek for relief of another kind, and to apply themſelves to proper perſons, unto whom they may unburden their ſouls, and confeſs their ſecret offences, hoping by their devout prayers, and ghoſtly aſſiſtance, to procure ſome remedy for their diſtreſſed minds.

I may add, that ſo inſupportable have been the horrors of a wounded conſcience, that men have diſcloſed their capital crimes to the magiſtrate, when they well knew it was his duty to puniſh ſuch criminals with death. And the reaſon why they expoſed themſelves voluntarily to temporal death, was to eſcape Divine Vengeance in another world, which they of all things dreaded. They did truſt, that having confeſt their ſin, and repented of it, and made all the ſatisfaction they could to civil juſtice, God would not enter into judgment with them, but out of his infinite compaſſion forgive them, and ſave their ſouls alive.

Neither was the courſe here taken to be imputed to melancholy or diſtraction, ſince experience aſſures us, many hereby have quieted their minds, and found comfort in death.

Now, if the fears of what ſhall become of us after death, were the effects only of the falſe principles which are owing to bad education, certainly they would not be ſo general, nor ſo deeply rivetted in our nature, nor ſo terrible, that men ſhould be willing to ſacrifice their lives to get rid of them.

3. The third argument I would urge for the immortality of the ſoul, and that men were not made only to live here, is this, That there is nothing in the world which fills the mind with ſatisfaction. Men are always diſſatisfied with their preſent condition, and endeavouring to make ſome alteration in it; and after the alteration is made, they do not continue any long time pleaſed; but rather diſcover that they have only changed their old grievances for new ones, and are diſturbed with a freſh ſet of complaints.

Thoſe who have the greateſt opportunities to ſupply themſelves with the various pleaſures of ſenſe, ſhould, if any were, be eaſy in their enjoyments; and yet experience declares, that what lately they with much eagerneſs deſired, does pall their appetites, and grow flat and inſipid.

It is well known that men, who have had their treaſuries filled with gold, who have commanded great and victorious armies, and conquered and ruled over many nations, have, after the large increaſe of their wealth, their power, and their glory, upon little occaſions been diſturbed and diſcontented, and fallen into ſuch fits of rage, or luſt, or melancholy, as are in no wiſe conſiſtent with true contentment of mind. And therefore they ſtill poſt and preſs forward from one deſign to another, but with the ſame diſſatisfaction; either truſting thoſe who will deceive them; or ſtriving to remove that which will never leave them; or vehemently coveting what they ſhall never obtain.

Now, what reaſon can be given why worldly goods ever ſhew better and greater at a diſtance, than they prove in our poſſeſſion, but this; that they carry no proportion to the appetites of the mind, which is of a ſpiritual and heavenly nature, and can never hope to receive adequate ſatisfaction from any thing here below?

Wherefore, if theſe vaſt capacities and deſires were placed in us by a Being of Infinite Wiſdom, and if a Being infinitely wiſe can do nothing in vain, then it follows, that our ſouls were created not only for this world, but to live in another, where they ſhall converſe with, and enjoy ſuch bright and glorious objects, as will compleatly gratify and delight them. And from hence I deduce a fourth argument for the Immortality of the Soul, viz.

4. From the common appetite in men to live for ever, and in that eternal ſtate to poſſeſs the chiefeſt good which will ſatiate the higheſt and moſt extenſive deſires of the mind. Every man that comes into the world loves happineſs, and would enjoy it eternally; it was not only the deſire of Paul to be diſſolved, and be with Chriſt; but the wiſh of Balaam, to die the death of the righteous. He believed a future Life, and that good men ſhould be bleſſed in it, and he wiſhed he might have a ſhare of their bleſſedneſs.

We have had great experience of God's goodneſs, who hath enriched us with many favours, and therefore we ought to believe that he loves us, and did intend good to us in the whole contrivance and conſtitution of our nature, wherein he only could put theſe unextinguiſhable appetites to live and ſubſiſt happily for ever, and to partake of ſuch felicity as this world does not afford, and which, indeed, is no where to be found, but in his infinitely perfect Being.

Now, he who loves us exceedingly well, and of whoſe bounty we have ſhared thus largely already, would not have endued our nature with thoſe vehement appetites; which, unleſs he be pleaſed in fit time to give them ſatisfaction, can only ſerve to diſtract and torture our minds, and render us extremely miſerable, as the Apoſtle argues in this chapter. For ſuch a treatment would be not only inconſiſtent with his Infinite Wiſdom, which appears in every part of the world; but repugnant to his boundleſs goodneſs, which always diſpoſes him to promote the happineſs, pity the weakneſſes, and ſupply the wants of his poor creatures.

It is hope of enjoyment of everlaſting happineſs, which makes us to bear injuries, pains and loſſes patiently, and at length yield to the ſtroke of death with a willing and contented mind. But had we reaſon to believe, that death would make an utter end both of body and ſoul, as the conceit thereof all along, this life would be an intolerable burthen, ſo we ſhould leave the world with deep horror.

But if there be a God, and that God is the author of our nature, and the author of our nature is infinitely good, and always acts ſuitably to that goodneſs; and if it be the property of Infinite Goodneſs to beſtow all that endleſs bliſs and felicity upon its creatures, which it not only hath made them capable of, but which it hath inclined their very nature earneſtly to deſire and hope for; then we may from hence, beyond all queſtion and doubt, conclude the Immortality of our Souls. And our hope of a joyful eternity can no where reſt ſo ſafely as upon the Divine Goodneſs.

5. I ſhall but name one argument more, though it is of unconquerable force, to prove the future ſubſiſtence of the ſoul; and that is, Divine Providence, which governs the world, preſerves all things in their natural order, and obſerves whatever is done upon earth, to the end all men may receive a treatment from God, agreeable to their behaviour. That thoſe who love, and fear, and ſerve God, may partake of the glories with which he will reward the heavenly-minded; and that they who neglect, and forget, and diſhonour God, may be baniſhed into outer darkneſs.

That they who have done good in their generation, and ſhewed pity to their fellow-creatures, may obtain a recompence; and they who have been impure, and malicious, and have laid wait for the righteous, oppreſſed the poor, and not ſpared the widow, may receive judgment without mercy.

But ſince this equal diſtribution of rewards and puniſhments, which the Divine Juſtice does require, is not made in this world, we have full aſſurance our ſoul ſhall live in another, and there have judgment paſs upon them according to their deſerts. And therefore, we ſee how juſt and true the Apoſtolical argument concludes for a Reſurrection, in the premiſes.

Ver. 21. —— Since by man came death.] i. e. By ſin death entered into the world, for the wages of ſin is death, ſaith the ſame Apoſtle; which ſin was the tranſgreſſion of our firſt parents, Adam and Eve, who are both to be underſtood in this word man, which is a common name for all mankind.

—— By man came alſo the Reſurrection of the dead.] It is ſaid, that by ſin death entered into the world; ſo here we read, that the Man Chriſt Jeſus, by his Reſurrection from the dead, has proved to us, that as many as depart from their iniquity, and through him follow after righteouſneſs, ſhall be raiſed from the death of ſin, and ſhall not be kept in the grave, but ſhall riſe with him at the laſt day to inherit eternal glory. See ver. 23.

Ver. 24. Then cometh the end.] Of the world.

—— When he ſhall have delivered up the Kingdom to God, even the Father.] Not his natural and eſſential Kingdom which he had from all Eternity, and of which there is no end; but his Mediatorial Kingdom, which, as Mediator, he received from the Father: Therefore, at the end of the world, Chriſt having ſubdued all his foes, and the enemies of his Church, and having put down all rule, and all authority and power, both in the World and in the Church, he ſhall deliver up his Mediatorial Kingdom to his Father, and reign no longer as Mediator, and as deputed thereto by the Father; but he ſhall reign eternally, as God equal with the Father, for his Kingdom is an everlaſting Kingdom, and his dominion endureth to eternal ages. See the Biſhop of Meath's ſermon on this text, 1678.

Ver. 26. The laſt enemy, &c.] In the premiſes you read, that Chriſt muſt reign, as Mediator, till all his enemies are deſtroyed, or put under his feet; but death is one of thoſe enemies, and the laſt of them, which was brought upon the fleſh by ſin, and keeps the believer's body from a re-union with his ſoul, and conſequently, from a perfect communion with Chriſt: Therefore, death muſt be deſtroyed, which cannot be done, otherwiſe than by a Reſurrection from the dead.

Ver. 27. For he.] Chriſt, our Mediator.

—— Hath put all things under his feet.] See Matt. xxviii. 18. and Pſalm viii. 6. and Heb. ii. 8.]

Ver. 28. And when all things ſhall be ſubdued unto him, then ſhall the Son alſo himſelf be ſubject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all.] Here are three remarkable clauſes in this verſe, which require our particular regard, and ought to be well meditated upon and underſtood, leſt thereby any one may be brought into a falſe belief of a natural inferiority of the Son of God to Father; which would be either robbing the Son of his Divinity, or profeſſing a belief in two gods: Both which we Chriſtians deny.

The firſt thing to be remarked is, the Son's ſubjection to the Father, in theſe words, Then ſhall the Son alſo himſelf be ſubject unto him. Now,

This is to be underſtood of the ſecond perſon in the Trinity, as he is the Mediator, God and man in one perſon, undertaking a particular charge, the redemption of mankind, which may be call'd the Mediatory Kingdom of Chriſt.

When man by his rebellion enter'd into an apoſtacy with the fallen angels, he could expect nothing from the natural government of God, but a ſpeedy execution of juſtice; and the reaſon why this juſtice was not immediately executed in its full force and utmoſt rigor, was the amazing condeſcention of the ſecond perſon in the Trinity, who, as it were, ſtept out to take upon him the Glorious Work of man's redemption; and upon this account, the laſt and flaming part of God's Vengeance is ſuſpended, 'till grace and mercy have try'd their utmoſt. Now,

This Mediatory Kingdom, as to its adminiſtration, muſt neceſſarily have an end, for otherwiſe Chriſt had undertaken what he could not accompliſh; and when this end ſhall come, then ſhall the ſon be ſubject to him, who put all things under him. But though the adminiſtration ceaſe, yet the effect of this kingdom will be eternal, the glory and beatitude purchas'd by this undertaking will never expire; and therefore 'tis added in the Nicene Creed, Whoſe kingdom ſhall have no end.

Chriſt is for ever to be the head of a Church purchas'd by his blood, and purify'd to that degree, as to be without ſpot or wrinkle; for this is the reward of his paſſion, of the travail of his ſoul; and certainly, the reward ſhall not ceaſe, when the work is done. The mode of his dominion ſhall be alter'd, when there remains no more contrary powers to be ſubdued; but the glory of it ſhall never paſs away.

As the ſon of a king, who is ſent with a large commiſſion, and mighty forces, to quell a rebellion; when he has deſtroy'd the worſt part of his and his father's enemies, and brought the remainder into an intire ſubjection again, returns to his father, glorious with victories, lays down his authority of vice-roy, but lives in all the honours of his father's Court: So when our Bleſſed Saviour ſhall have ſubdued all rebel-powers, and have gather'd his Church, and made it perfect to the laſt degree, he ſhall reſign the high office of a Mediator; but as the Eternal Son, he ſhall for ever reign with the Father, and his human nature ſhall for ever ſhine with a diſtinct glory in the Church Triumphant.

The ſecond thing to be explained is, when this ſubjection ſhall be, viz. When all things ſhall be ſubdued unto Chriſt.

When our Saviour aſcended into Heaven, he then triumph'd over the principalities of darkneſs; but yet this was not a final and compleat conqueſt; all things are already ſo far ſubdued unto him, as to be under his diſpoſal and management; he reigns now, but he has not yet put all his enemies under his feet; he has not yet put down all contrary rule, and authority, and power; the infernal polity of wicked ſpirits, the ſeveral tyrannies in this world, and the maliciouſneſs of ungodly people, ſtill exerciſe their ſubtilty, rage and cruelty; yet all theſe are ſo over-rul'd, that they really erve the deſign of Chriſt's kingdom, though contrary to their own purpoſes and inclinations.

But 'tis at the day of judgment, that all things ſhall be more eminently ſubdued to Chriſt: Then death ſhall be deſtroyed by a general reſurrection of all, as well as a glorious reſurrection of the juſt; the Devil and his angels, and all thoſe wicked people that have finally adhered to that accurſed party, ſhall ſink down into the depth of torments, with all the weight of God's Vengeance upon them; the allotment of the angels, and of all mankind, ſhall be then everlaſtingly determined; the Church ſhall be delivered from all oppreſſion and infirmity, and temptation and ſin ſhall be no more.

And when all things ſhall be either converted or ſubdued unto Chriſt, then the Divinity ſhall act without any Mediation, as it did before the fall of man, and God ſhall be all in all. Which is the

3. Thing to be explained, viz. That God may be all in all, that is, that Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt (for that is the only true Divinity or Godhead that we Chriſtians acknowledge knowledge and believe) may act immediately, without any interpoſition or interceſſion; for the mediation being conſtituted upon the account of the fall of man, or his apoſtacy from God, muſt naturally ceaſe when the apoſtacy is at an end, and all things are ſubdued.

Now 'tis not to be imagined that we can comprehend, how God will reign in Heaven, after this kingdom of Chriſt is compleated, and reſign'd, or what his immediate irradiations will be upon glorified ſouls: Now the Holy Spirit works upon our ſouls, but that is chiefly in order to change them and reform them; to cleanſe them and purify them, that they may be fit to receive the laſt impreſſions of happineſs from the immediate influence of God. Now we receive ſome ſuitable diſtribution of gifts and graces, as may be beſt for our preſent ſtate, and for the improvement of our ſelves and others; but then according to that rank and order that we bear in the rational creation, and in proportion to the good uſe we have made of the talents committed to us, we ſhall be filled with all the fulneſs of God. Now from the fulneſs of Chriſt, we may receive grace for grace; that is, abundance of grace, though in a leiſurely progreſs, with one degree added to another; but then we ſhall receive from the fulneſs of God our compleat meaſures of glory all at once.

Ver. 29. Elſe what ſhall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead riſe not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead?] If I ſhould ſay of theſe words as Auſtin ſaid of thoſe, He ſhall be ſaved yet ſo as by fire, 1 Cor. iii. 15. that it is one of thoſe places in Paul's Epiſtles which Peter tells us are hard to be underſtood, 2 Pet. iii. 16. I believe it could not be thought that I ſpake in vain. For, even what the Apoſtle ſays of thoſe, are applicable to theſe words alſo, they that are unſtable and unlearned wreſt them unto their own deſtruction.

This text has employed the wits and pens of many commentators, that they might have the credit of giving us the Apoſtle's true meaning concerning the reſurrection and baptiſm mentioned in this chapter and verſe. Therefore,

I ſhall begin with a brief account of their ſeveral endeavours and different deciſions in the caſe, with a free and impartial animadverſion on them, and conclude with my own thoughts in the controverſy, always preſerving a ſtrict veneration for the primitive writers of the Church; a faithful regard to the maſters of Grammar and criticiſm, a due reſpect to the whole context, and eſpecially to the analogy of Chriſtian faith. Now,

The different commentators underſtand this text of baptiſm either properly or improperly: Properly for a real and outward waſhing with water: Improperly or metaphorically, for the baptiſm of affliction and ſuffering, as ſometimes the word is found to ſignify. And therefore,

1. Baptiſm properly underſtood, is either ſacramental, 2 funeral, and 3 legal. The ſacramental baptiſm is that Holy Ordinance or Inſtitution, whereby children or thoſe of riper years are admitted into the Chriſtian Church by the action of outward waſhing or ſprinkling with water. The funeral waſhing, was practiſed in order to the burying of the dead bodies. The legal or ceremonial waſhing, was uſed by the Jews as often as they were defiled by touching the dead: And this was done either in their own perſons, or by another for them in caſe they died before they were cleanſed.

I. We begin with the various interpretations of thoſe on the place who underſtand it of ſacramental baptizing. And firſt, there are ſome who interpret it of thoſe who at their baptiſm profeſs themſelves dead to ſin and to the world: And by this baptiſmal act they are reputed to be thus ſpiritually dead. A ſecond opinion is of thoſe who imagine the words ſpoken of baptiſm as it repreſenteth the bodily death. Others underſtand it of baptiſm as it was accompanied with the confeſſion of the article of the reſurrection of the dead. A fourth ſort ſay it is ſpoken of the Clinicks, thoſe who lay on their ſick-beds, and receive the ſacrament of baptiſm. Fifthly, others underſtand it of baptizing over the dead, over the tombs of the deceaſed martyrs. Sixthly, there are ſome who think it is meant of baptizing in the place and ſtead of the dead. Seventhly, there is a learned man who thinks it is ſpoken of an annual baptizing for the benefit of the dead. Eightly, another conceiveth it refers to baptizing with the impoſition of the names of the dead. Laſtly, there is a learned critic who diſſents from all the forenamed opinions, and is perſwaded that ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν is put here for ὑπὲρ τȣ̃ νεκρȣ̃, the plural for the ſingular: But how he applies it, you ſhall hear afterwards.

1. I begin with the firſt, the opinion of thoſe who imagine theſe words are ſpoken of baptized Chriſtians, who by this very ſacrament profeſſed to the world that they were ſpiritually dead. So that to be baptized for the dead, is as much as to be reputed as dead perſons when they were baptized, or, at their baptiſm to be like dead men, viz. dead in reſpect of ſin and any love to it. At that ſolemn initiating themſelves into the Church, they openly renounced their former ſins, they publickly diſowned their paſt vices, they became mortified perſons, and betook themſelves to a ſevere and ſtrict courſe of life: thus (myſtically and ſpiritually ſpeaking) they were dead. So the words are interpreted by ſome ancient fathers, Jerom, Chryſoſtom, Theodoret, Primaſius, Sedulius, with whom agree a few of the moderns, Melancthon, Cajetan, &c. amongſt whom a late writer, Philip. a Limborch Theolog. Chriſtian. l. 6. c. 10. expreſſes his ſenſe thus, "Baptized for the dead are they who when they are baptized declare that they are ready to die to the world, to be in it as dead men, and to live a new life: and if occaſion be, to ſubmit to the croſs, and die for their religion. This they do that they may have a bleſſed reſurrection." But this interpretation will be far from gaining our conſent, if we conſider (beſides what I ſhall add under the next opinion) but theſe two things: Firſt, there is no reaſon to interpret theſe baptized for the dead, of thoſe that are ſpiritually dead, becauſe it is generally adviſed by all ſober interpreters of Scripture, that we ſhould not fly to an improper and metaphorical ſenſe, when the literal and proper one will ſerve our turn. But I ſhall afterwards prove that a plain and literal meaning of theſe words is moſt probable and reaſonable. Secondly, the context it ſelf will confute this interpretation, for if the ſpiritual death be here meant, i. e. the being buried with Chriſt in baptiſm, and being dead to ſin and the world, then who will think there is any conſequence in the Apoſtle's reaſoning, whilſt he argueth from a ſpiritual and myſtical death and reſurrection (of which baptiſm is a ſign) unto that which is bodily and external, which is the ſubject he here treats of through out the whole chapter. The inference is ſo foreign that I cannot ſee how it will ever be admitted.

2. Others are of opinion, that theſe words are ſpoken of baptiſm, as it repreſents the bodily death. And ſome of the fathers, who were patrons of the firſt interpretation, were pleaſed alſo to eſpouſe this ſecond; for they thought fit to join both theſe together, viz. the ſpiritual and the bodily death, aſſerting that the repreſentation or reſemblance of both was intended here by the Apoſtle. Now let us ſee how they apply theſe words to the death of the body. They hold that the Apoſtle's argument in the text is of this ſort, If there ſhall be no riſing of the dead hereafter, why is baptiſm ſo ſignificant a ſymbol of our dying and riſing again, and alſo of the death and reſurrection of Chriſt? For thoſe that were proſelytes to the Chriſtian religion, were interpreted to make an open profeſſion of theſe in their being plunged into the baptiſmal water, and in being there overwhelmed and buried as it were in the conſecrated element. The immerſion into the water was thought to ſignify the death of Chriſt, and their coming out denoted his riſing again, and did no leſs repreſent their own future reſurrection, On which account the miniſter's putting in of the Chriſtian converts into the ſacred waters of the baptiſtary, and his taking them out thence, are ſtiled by Chryſoſtom, Homil. in 1. Epiſt. ad Corinth. 15. cap. the ſign and pledge of deſcending into the ſtate of the dead, and of a return from thence. And thus becauſe the waſhing and plunging of the newly-admitted Chriſtians was a viſible proof and emblem, firſt of Chriſt's, and then of their reſurrection from the grave, the forementioned fathers have been induced to believe that this paſſage of our Apoſtle, which I am ſpeaking of, hath a particular reſpect to that, and is to be interpreted by it. Nay, this ſeems to agree exactly with the language and tenor of our Apoſtle himſelf, who may be thought to be the beſt interpreter of his own words: Know ye not, ſaith he, that ſo many of us as were baptized into Chriſt were baptized into his death? therefore we are buried with him by baptiſm into death, that like as Chriſt was raiſed up from the dead, even ſo we alſo ſhould walk in newneſs of life, Rom. vi. 3, 4. It is no matter of admiration to me that ſome have thought and confidently aſſerted, that the Apoſtle's manner of ſpeech here is the ſame with that in the text which is before us, and that βαπτιζόμενοι ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, is to be explained and commented upon by εἰς τὸν θάνατον αὐτοῦ ἐβαπτίσθημεν, and by that other expreſſion, συνετάφημεν αὐτῷ διὰ τοῦ βαπτίσματος εἰς θάνατον. They may ſeem, indeed at firſt, to be near a kin to one another, and to bear upon them the very ſame ſtamp and form of ſpeech. But I conceive it was only ſome little reſemblance of the phraſe and ſtile, or mode of ſpeech, not the ſame ſignificancy and real matter couched in both theſe places, which brought any to this opinion. But without any more diſpute, I would admit of the interpretation before-mentioned as moſt natural and genuine, upon condition that any one can make it good out of but one Greek author, much more from the uſe and idiom of the tongue, that to be baptized ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν for the dead, ſignifies to be baptized as dead, or, after the manner and ſimilitude of thoſe that are dead: for thoſe of the former opinion, and of this (that is, thoſe that interpret the words of a repreſentation of the ſpiritual or bodily death) acknowledge for the dead, is as much as like the dead, or, in reſemblance of the dead, or after the manner of the dead. Theſe muſt be proved to be ſynonimous before that firſt, or this ſecond expoſition of the words can look for our aſſent and ſuffrage. Let it be proved that ὑπὲρ is as much as ὡς or ὡσεὶ, i. e. that it is a word of ſimilitude, and ſignifies the ſame with ſicut, tanquam, quaſi, in the Latin. 'Till then it cannot be credited, that for the dead, ſignifies a reſemblance or likeneſs to thoſe that are dead. I grant that pro in Latin is ſometimes as much as quaſi, perinde, inſtar; as when we read in Tully, pro nihilo putare vel ducere, to eſteem as nothing: and (to come nearer to the preſent matter) when the ſame author ſaith, pro occiſo relictus eſt, he was left as dead. So pro mortuis may be applied in a ſentence to ſignify as much as tanquam mortui. And it is true that in our own vulgar way of ſpeaking, for dead denotes as much as dead, or as dead: thus we ſay, ſuch a one lay for dead, or was taken up for dead. But I never heard that it was thus in the Greek tongue, and therefore I am very loath to charge our Apoſtle here (as Eraſmus and Calvin do in other places) with falſe Greek. I grant that the actions in baptiſm (eſpecially as it was adminiſtred of old) were repreſentative of the death and reſurrection both of Chriſt and believers: but that Paul's words here have reference to any ſuch thing, the propriety of phraſe (as you have heard) will not permit us to believe. Beſides, you may obſerve (as you ſhall have farther occaſion hereafter to take notice) it is ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν with a præpoſitive article, which utterly ſpoils that ſenſe which is pretended: for the Apoſtle ſpeaks here definitively, and not at large: and the words are rightly rendered for the dead, not for dead.

3. The next interpretation is that of Chryſoſtom, (for you muſt know it is uſual with him to adjoin one opinion to another, as here he thinks fit to add this, which I am now mentioning, to thoſe other two which I named before) and he is followed by Theophylact and Oecumenius, and they by Hemmingius and our learned Hammond. The baptized for the dead, ſay they, were thoſe who were baptized upon the article of the reſurrection of the dead, and conſequently in hope of that reſurrection. So that the Apoſtle here is thought by them to refer to the form of confeſſion of faith, or reciting the articles of the creed, in which among other things the perſon to be baptized openly profeſſed his belief of that article of the reſurrection of the dead. And the great canoniſts, Balſamon and Zonaras, refer the Apoſtle's words to this cuſtom, and explain them in theſe terms, (Not. in 18 can. Concil. Carthag.) What ſhall they do that are baptized in the hope of the reſurrection of the dead? Which anſwers to the expoſition of Theophylact, (in locum.) What ſhall they do who are baptized on the expectation of the deads riſing again? But, 1. though it be univerſally acknowledged, that ſoon after the Apoſtle's time, a publick profeſſion of the creed was required of thoſe that preſented themſelves to be baptized; yet it remains to be proved that in the time wherein our Apoſtle lived they ſolemnly recited a form of belief at baptiſm, and that they had this very confeſſion of aith which now goes under the Apoſtles names. This is doubtful at leaſt, and ſo we ought not to be definitive and peremptory about it, and therefore we cannot be ſure that the Apoſtle argues in this place from any ſuch practice as the rehearſal of the creed. 2dly, Grant that this form of confeſſion was uſed at baptiſm by the Catechumeni, and that all the articles of it were openly rehearſed, and conſequently, in the cloſe that of the reſurrection of the dead: Yet then it ſhould rather have been ſaid, What ſhall they do that are baptized for thoſe that are riſen from the dead, not barely, for the dead? Nay, 3dly, Who ſees not yet farther a greater impropriety and harſhneſs in the Apoſtle's way of ſpeaking, if to be baptized for the dead muſt be interpreted thus, to be baptized in hope of the reſurrection of the dead? Firſt, the dead is put here for the dead bodies of the deceaſed, for theſe only can be ſaid to riſe at the laſt day. And therefore, it is Chryſoſtom's gloſs on the words, for the dead, that is, ſaith he, for the dead bodies. Secondly, the dead bodies is put for the reſurrection of thoſe dead bodies. Nay, thirdly, it is put for the confeſſion, or the article, or the faith, or hope of the reſurrection of the dead bodies. This is too conciſe a way of ſpeaking; wherefore, I yield to our judicious Thorndyke, who deſcanting on this paſſage, concludes it cannot be juſtified by any example, that ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν ſhould ſignify, ἐπὶ ἀναστάσει τῶν νεκρῶν, as Chryſoſtom would have it. Nay, 4thly, If the words were to be taken in his ſenſe, the article τῶν, which is here inſerted, ſhould be left out, and it ſhould have been barely ὑπὲρ νεκρῶν, as the learned Hammond ſets it down in his annotations, being conſcious, as it were, that it ſhould be ſo.

4. Let us paſs to another reading of the words, and it ſhall be ſtill of thoſe who take baptizing here in the ſacramental ſenſe, and hold that the baptized for the dead were thoſe perſons who had that ſacrament adminiſtred to them when they were cloſe upon the confines of death, and juſt expiring their laſt. This expoſition is abetted by Calvin. The baptized for the dead, ſaith he, are they who are baptized when they are dying, when they are given over, and looked upon as dead. And ſo the particle ὑπὲρ, is as much as the Latin pro, as when they ſay, habere pro derelicto. Other learned writers alſo (as Peter Martyr, Ludovicus Capellus, Eſtius.) take this to be the ſenſe of the Apoſtle's words; but it came firſt from Epiphanius, in his book againſt hereticks, (Hæreſ. 28.) who acquaints us, that when it ſo chanced, that the Catachumeni, or new comers to Chriſtianity, were overtaken with ſome mortal diſtemper, and there was an utter deſpair of their living till they could be brought to the Sacred Font, they uſed to be baptized ἐν ταῖς κλίναις, as they lay in their beds: And from that uſage of theirs, the Clinici, or bed-ridden took their name. For you muſt know that it was uſual with thoſe that were converted to Chriſtianity to defer their baptiſm. Perhaps, ſay ſome, at firſt it proceeded from fear and cowardize, which made them unwilling to hazard themſelves by the open profeſſion of their religion, and ſo they put off their admiſſion into the Church as long as they could; but when they were arreſted by grievous ſickneſs, and confined to their beds, they paſſionately begged to be baptized before they left the world. This was one ſort of Clinicks. But, there was a ſecond ſort who deferred their baptiſm on other accounts: Theſe were no new converts, but ſuch as had embraced Chriſtianity a conſiderable time; yet they purpoſely deferred their baptiſm on one pretended ground or other. Thus Conſtantine the Great was not baptized till the ſixty-fifth year of his age, which was the one and thirtieth year of his empire, Socrat. Eccl. Hiſt. l. 1. c. 26. Sozom. l. 2. c. 32. and he declared himſelf (as Euſebius, de vit. Conſtant. l. 4. c. 61. teſtifies) that he delayed his baptiſm becauſe he intended to be baptized in the river Jordan, the place which was ſo famous for the firſt baptizing, and where our Saviour himſelf was baptized. But he was hindred from going thither, and being aged he fell ſick, and was baptized in the city of Nicomedia, where he then was, by Euſebius biſhop (either at that time, or formerly) of that place, and he died in the very ſame year he was baptized. I know this is contradicted, and it is ſaid he was not baptized in the eaſt, but in the weſt, not by a Greek biſhop but a Roman one. This was Miltiades, ſay ſome; others ſtiffly maintain that it was Sylveſter, and this they have from one of the Roman biſhops, Damaſ. lib. Pontif. who wrote Sylveſter's life, and aſſerts that he baptized Conſtantine, telling us withal that this emperor, among other admirable ornaments and utenſils, kept in his palace the font wherein he was baptized, and deſcribes the make and coſtlineſs of it. It ſeems it is ſince tranſlated or thought to be tranſlated to Rome, and there is kept as a choice memorial; ſee Dr. Burnet's Travels. And as for the occaſion of Conſtantine's being baptized, they tell us it was this, he being guilty of his ſon Criſpus's blood, and other unnatural murders, was ſtruck by God with leproſy, which affected him ſo much that he applied himſelf to the biſhop, and ſhewed himſelf ſorrowful for the fact; and to give an evidence of his repentance, he deſired to receive baptiſm. Then by the biſhop's prayers and this holy laver, or ſacramental waſhing, he was cured of his noiſome diſtemper. This was in the eighteenth year of his reign, A. D. 324. and is mentioned by Zoſimus and Baronius. Yet Cedrenus, and others, ſay he was baptized at Rome by this Sylveſter ſome years before, viz. in the ſeventh year of his reign. But Euſebius, the famous biſhop of Ceſarea in Paleſtine, who writ the life of Conſtantine, ſaith not a word of all this, but tells us that he was baptized not at Rome, but at Nicomedia, and that many years after the Nicene Council, in the cloſe of his life, the laſt year of his reign, five years after Sylveſter was dead, by Euſebius biſhop of Nicomedia, Conſtantine's life, book iv. ch. lxi, 62. And this is teſtified and confirmed by Jerom, Ambroſe, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, and others, and ſeems to be the true account of the emperor's baptiſm. To haſten then out of this digreſſion, this example of Conſtantine's deferring his baptiſm was followed by ſeveral other ſucceeding emperors. Thus his ſon Conſtantius was baptized at the point of death, Athanaſ. de Syn. Armini & Seleuc. Theodoſius the Great falling ſick was thereupon baptized, and recovered upon it; but he had deferred his baptiſm longer, if his ſickneſs had not haſtned it, Socrat. l. 5. c. 25. The next Theodoſius, was not baptized till he was very old, Oroſ. l. 7. c. 33. Eccleſiaſtical hiſtory acquaints us alſo, that the emperor Valentinian put off his baptiſm, that he might receive that ſacrament from Ambroſe, but he was prevented by death. We read the ſame of ſome of the moſt eminent Fathers of the Church. Jerom and Ambroſe were not baptized till they were thirty years of age, although their parents were Chriſtians, Auguſtin was a Manichean till he was one and thirty years old, and then (and not before) he was baptized by the foreſaid Ambroſe, the famous biſhop of Milan. Thus it was alſo in the Greek Church; ſome of the moſt eminent perſons (beſides the emperors before ſpoken of) deferred their baptiſm till they came to ſome ripeneſs of years. Thus Chryſoſtom, though born of and bred up under a Chriſtian mother, and Gregory Nazianzen born of Chriſtian parents, were not baptized till they arrived to be men. Nectarius, Archbiſhop of Conſtantinople, entered into epiſcopal orders before he was baptized. Now, there are different, yea, contrary reaſons alledged for this practice; ſome did purpoſely put off their baptiſm till death approached, that they might be the more at liberty to indulge their follies and vices; for when one of the Catechumeni committed a fault, they uſed to excuſe his failing by alledging this in his favour, that he was not yet baptized. They did it alſo, that they might not ſin after the celebrating the ſacrament of baptiſm, for Cyprian tells us they had this fond and groundleſs notion, that there was no pardon for thoſe that relapſed into ſin after baptiſm. This aroſe from the miſtaking of that place, Heb. vi. 4, 5. which the Novatians very warmly inſiſted upon, and would by no means abſolve thoſe that lapſed after baptiſm. But the orthodox fathers were of another mind, and ſharply reproved this cuſtom of deferring baptiſm. Gregory Nyſſen, (de baptiſmum differentibus,) hath a whole oration againſt it, and Gregory Nazianzen, and Chryſoſtom (Hom. 1 & 23. in Act. Apoſt.) inveigh againſt it very zealouſly. So Auguſtin (whoſe parents delayed his baptiſm on purpoſe, becauſe they feared the young man's relapſe into his former vices) complains of this abuſe in the Church, which prevailed in his days; ſee Serm. 97. de Temp. It ſeems it was grown into a cuſtom to omit the receiving of baptiſm, as long as they were in health, (and perhaps the example of Conſtantine and his ſon Conſtantius, who did ſo, gave ſome repute to this evil uſage,) but as ſoon as they fell ſick they bethought themſelves of their duty, and when they perceived the malady grew deſperate, and themſelves irrecoverable, then they ſent preſently for the Chriſtian prieſts, and ſolemnly gave up their names to Chriſt in holy baptiſm, as being deſirous to carry out of the world with them the ſeal of their eternal ſalvation. Theſe are called by the Council of Laodicea (which was under Sylveſter) οἱ ἐν νόσῳ παραλαμβάνοντες τὸ φώτισμα, thoſe that were admitted to baptiſm when they lay ſick, for φώτισμα here ſignifieth baptiſm, as it doth frequently among the antients. This was called ἐντάφιον βάπτισμα, by Gregory Nyſſen, (de baptiſm. differentib.) becauſe they deſired to be baptized and to die at once. Of theſe ſpeak Cyprian, Epiſt. 7 ad Magnum. Euſebius, Eccl. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 43. and many writers of the primitive times, and the canons of ſeveral councils. Of ſuch as theſe, viz. the Moribundi, who lay on their death-beds, and called for ſpeedy baptiſm, ſome interpret the words of the text. But that they have but little reaſon, I ſhall prove from theſe following particulars. 1. It is not probable, that that ſort of Clinicks who were newly converted from Paganiſm is here meant, becauſe in thoſe firſt days fear and faint-heartedneſs did not poſſeſs men, as they are known to have done afterwards. A ſingular zeal and ardency inſpired their minds, and they were not aſhamed to own and publickly maintain the faith they had eſpouſed; yea, they gloried in their ſufferings for the cauſe of Chriſt, and rejoyced in their perſecutions for it, as the Acts of the Apoſtles aſſure us. It is not likely therefore, that theſe deferred their being baptized on the fore-named account, and conſequently it is not likely that the text ſpeaks of theſe. 2. It is not certain, that it was the opinion of the Chriſtians in the Apoſtles days, that ſin after baptiſm is irremiſſible, which was another ground of the cuſtom of deferring baptiſm. And conſequently it is to be ſaid, and that with evident truth, that it doth not appear in the leaſt that the fore-mentioned cuſtom of the believers requeſting baptiſm in the very cloſe of their lives prevailed in the times of the Apoſtles; but it ſeems rather to have crept in after thoſe firſt guides of the Church were gone; and therefore that gloſs on the words can have but a ſlender foundation. Or, 3dly, ſay that ſuch an uſe obtained even in the Apoſtles days, yet will not Paul's argument have any force at all by relating unto that. For thus it muſt proceed, What ſhall the baptized Clinicks do if the dead riſe not at all? Why are they alſo baptized juſt at the point of death? Why have they that holy ſacrament given to them at the laſt gaſp? If there be no riſing again, why do they thus? It may be anſwered, that though there ſhould be no reſurrection of the dead, yet it follows not that they were baptized in vain, for that ſacred office of baptiſm was thought in that caſe, and that rightly too, chiefly to have reſpect to what was paſt. Though the dead bodies riſe not, yet that adminiſtration was uſeful to the ſoul, and available to the abſolution and remiſſion of their ſins; which plainly appears from the reaſon of deferring baptiſm heretofore, namely, leſt they ſhould ſin, and ſo defile themſelves after waſhing. Though the dead ſhould never riſe again, Chriſt's ordinance might be conducible to this preſent life, whilſt by that they were admitted into the Church, and had their former ſins waſhed away, and their conſciences cleanſed: And alſo it might be ſerviceable to the future life, for the ſalvation and happineſs of their ſouls, though their bodies were unconcerned. But 4thly, to ſay no more, this interpretation of the words is faulty in the ſame kind that the two former were, that is, it is irreconcileable to the propriety of ſpeech, and the uſage of the tongue in which the Apoſtle wrote: Which I cannot but believe, till it is proved to me that theſe two are of the ſame import, viz. to be baptized for the dead, and to be baptized when they are dying, or at their death: Which is the thing that the abettors of this expoſition contend for, but it could never yet be made out by any parallel place of Scripture, or the leaſt teſtimony of approved authors.

5. Another acceptation of the words is countenanced by the authority of Luther, Piſcator, and the admirable Voſſius, in his theſis concerning the Reſurrection. They will have ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, rendered by ὑπεράνω τῶν νεκρῶν, over the dead, i. e. over the dead corps as they lay in the cœmeteries, or burying-places: or, over the dead, i. e. upon the tombs, and over the ſepulchres of the newly deceaſed martyrs, which were called memoriæ martyrum, and ſo the words refer to the cuſtom of baptizing perſons over the dead martyrs graves or tombs. Here firſt, I ſhall

grant, that according to the Syriack, it is rendered ſuper mortuos, upon, above, or over the dead. Secondly, I grant, that the innocent commemorations of the holy martyrs, even at the time of adminiſtring of baptiſm, were no unuſal things of old, and have great antiquity to aſſert them. But then, this I have to ſay, that ὑπὲρ for ὑπερανω, is not ſo eaſy and obvious an acceptation, as that which I have to offer (and certainly the eaſieſt and plaineſt is to be deemed the moſt natural and genuine. Again, though the prepoſition in the text frequently ſignifies over or above, and that with a genitive caſe, when it is applied to a place, yet it may be queſtioned whether it hath the ſame ſignification when it is joined with perſons, as here; for, though the baptizing be ſuppoſed to be over the graves, yet it is properly over thoſe that are dead, who are conſidered as perſons, as here; at leaſt their bodies, not the places they were in, are ſpoken of here. But I will not inſiſt on this, but will rather ſuppoſe it to be good Greek, for the ſake of the chief author of this opinion, the admirable Voſſius, who was as eminent a Grammarian as he was a Divine. But further, I could object againſt this cuſtom, as a ſuperſtitious one, and therefore not fit to be made an argument of the Reſurrection by Paul. Again, if this ceremony of adminiſtring baptiſm over the dead were wholly void of ſuperſtition, yet I am not ſatisfied that that practice was at all in uſe in our Apoſtle's time. Nay, the Evangelical Hiſtory is againſt it, for we read there that Jordan, John i. 28, and Ænon, John iii. 23. (not church-yards and vaults, but) rivers were made uſe of for baptizing; although it is true, Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory relates that in after-ages the fonts and the graves were together, the baptiſteria and the martyrs tombs were cloſe to one another. But that they were ſo at firſt, and that the memoriæ martyrum, ſo often ſpoken of in Cyprian and Auguſtin, were as old as the Apoſtles, I have no where read. Or, if we ſhould ſuppoſe there was ſuch a cuſtom then, yet that could not be applied by our Apoſtle to the preſent purpoſe; for it cannot be proved that they that were ſo baptized over the tombs, did profeſs thereby to believe the Reſurrection; for they might do this to ſhew that they would in ſome ſort be like the dead, which is the thing Chriſtians profeſs in baptiſm, as the Apoſtle tells us: Therefore, I am not convinced that the words before us have any alluſion to ſuch a practice.

6. There are ſome learned men, Juſtellus (ad Can. 12. Concil. Neocæſar.) Scaliger (l. 3. Epiſt. 236 & 237 Epiſt.) Eraſmus, Caſaubon, Grotius, who fetch the ſenſe of theſe words from a cuſtom which they read of in Tertullian and Epiphanius, which was this, When any of the Catechumeni were ſuddenly ſnatched away by death (before they could have time and leiſure to approach to the Holy Laver of Baptiſm) ſome of the ſurviving friends were intreated to be baptized for them, i. e. in their ſtead; and the perſons that were deceaſed, though unbaptized, were reputed to be baptized, becauſe they were ſo in their repreſentatives. Ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, then is as much as ἀντὶ τῶν νεκρῶν, vice vel loco mortuorum, in the room and place of the dead. And that the prepoſition bears that as well as other ſignifications, is not to be doubted, there being abundant authority to confirm it. I ſhall help to ſtrengthen it with a remarkable quotation, which looks as like this of our Apoſtle as may be. It is out of Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus (8th book) ἔτει, (ſaith he) τὴν ἀρχὴν παραλαβόντες ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀποθανόντων ἐν τῷ πολέμῳ στρατιωτῶν ἤξιουν ἑτέρους καταγράφειν, i. e. the magiſtrates would have other ſoldiers enrolled and admitted in the room of thoſe who died in the war. Theſe two examples, ὑπὲρ αποθανόντων & ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, ſeem to be very nearly allied, but really are not. However, from the former of theſe it is evident, that ὑπὲρ ſometimes is as much as ἀντὶ. And there are abundant inſtances in the New Teſtament, that this prepoſition ſignifies a ſubſtitution, a putting one perſon in the place of another, as Grotius, De Satisfactione, hath proved ſufficiently againſt the Socinians, who will by no means have it denote a ſubſtitution or ſurrogation. So that I muſt confeſs, I wonder at what a great Critick ſaith concerning this interpretation, vice mortuorum, viz. that he doth not know that any body ever ſpeaks after this manner, Heinſ. Exerc. Sac. Whereas it is apparent that this is an uſual and common way of ſpeaking, and is to be met with frequently in the beſt writers; wherefore it muſt be imputed to the forgetfulneſs of that great ſcholar, that he delivers any ſuch thing. Having ſpoken hitherto of the grammatical part of the opinion, now let us conſider the cuſtom on which it is founded. Firſt, then, ſuppoſe there was ſuch a cuſtom of old among the Marcionites or Cerinthians, or both, (for Tertullian, De Reſurrect. carn. cap. 48. & contr. Marcion. l. 5. c. 10. imputes it to the Marcionites, and ſo doth Chryſoſtom; but Epiphanius, Hœreſ. 28. relates it as an hereſy of the Cerinthians) yet neither of theſe Fathers acquaint us, that it obtained in the days when Paul or Cerinthus lived; and therefore there is no evidence that the Apoſtle had notice of any ſuch thing, and conſequently he could not mention it in his writings. But let us ſuppoſe (what we cannot grant) that even whilſt the Apoſtle lived, ſuch a practice was more rarely and privately uſed; yet it is not credible that Paul, the great maſter of logick and diſcourſe, would argue from a thing ſo obſcure and apocryphal, and not openly received at that time, eſpecially in a Catholick Epiſtle, directed not only to the Corinthian Church, but unto all that in every place call upon the name of Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, (as you read in the front of this Epiſtle, v. 2. But this is not all, Shall it be thought worthy of the clear and demonſtrative reaſon of him that was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, to build the great Doctrine of the Reſurrection on a vain obſervance and a manifeſt error of ſome conceited hereticks? If there were ſuch a thing as a poſthumous baptiſm, (if I may ſo call it) a repreſentative waſhing, vicarium baptiſma, as Tertullian ſtiles it, a Sacrament by a proxy or deputy, even when the party moſt concerned was in another world, if you can imagine that there was ſuch a thing as this in the Apoſtle's days, yet can you think likewiſe that this is the thing deſigned in theſe words? Could ſo vain and idle a rite come into the Apoſtle's mind upon this occaſion? Would he argue from a vain abuſe of baptiſm by hereticks? Would the Apoſtle proceed upon the errors of others? This would be no ſimple and abſolute proof, but it would only be ſignificant to thoſe erroneous perſons, by bringing them by this arguing to an inconvenience. Nay, can you imagine that this holy man would ſo lightly paſs by and overlook ſo groſs an abuſe of the baptiſmal inſtitution, that he would not reflect in the leaſt on ſo notorious a pollution of that Sacrament, when he had taken particular notice of the very poſtures and habit of the Corinthians, of the mens praying veiled, and of the womens praying unveiled in the publick congregations, and likewiſe of the length and wearing of their hair, and had reproved them for theſe diſorders? Why would he now be ſilent, or (I may ſay) diſſemble, when he had at other times ſmartly checked leſſer errors and obliquities? Chryſoſtom, in his homily on this 15th chapter of the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, relates the manner of this abſurd practice of thoſe hereticks, where he tells us that they uſed to put a living man under the bed of the deceaſed, and then the dead perſon was asked, whether he would be baptized? Whereupon he that was under the bed made anſwer for the dead, and deſired baptiſm, and him they immediately baptized in the place of the dead. This the good Father relates there at large; but he tells his auditors before-hand, that he knows he ſhall, in rehearſing the antick cuſtom of thoſe hereticks, move them to no little laughter; it being a piece of mere mockery, an hiſtrionical ſacrament, a ludicrous profanation of baptiſm, for thoſe ridiculous ſectaries, (as he expreſſes it) did but act a part in a play. Can it be imagined, then, that ſo weighty and ſolid an article as the Reſurrection is, can be founded on ſo ſlight and abſurd a bottom? Paul needed not to have ſought for aids from falſhood and error, when the truth itſelf is ſufficiently armed, and hath auxiliaries enough of its own to defend its cauſe. I might add alſo, that this practice ſuppoſes a reiterating of the Sacrament of baptiſm, which is an abſurd thing; unleſs it be ſaid that thoſe perſons were baptized only for others: But then it cannot be denied, that at the ſame time they were really baptized themſelves. This meaning of the words, therefore, will but little credit our Apoſtle, and therefore I have the leſs eſteem for it; and I have none at all for that which follows, viz.

7. The opinion of the learned Joſeph Scaliger, Not. in N. 1. according to whom the baptized for the dead, are thoſe who are baptized for the benefit and advantage of the dead. It is, indeed, granted that this might be true according to the letter, or grammatical part, for ὑπὲρ ſometimes is as much as in utilitatem ſeu commodum in good authors. And accordingly it is ſaid often in the New Teſtament that Chriſt died ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, not only in our ſtead, but for us, i. e. for our good and advantage, viz. that he might purchaſe ſalvation and eternal happineſs for us. But the meaning which the aforeſaid author conveys to us by this conſtruction is intolerably abſurd and ſuperſtitious; and it is no other than this, that the Apoſtle herein mentioning the ſuſception of baptiſm for the dead, points at ſome pious office of bathing or baptizing the dead, or being baptized for them in order to the refreſhment of their ſouls The riſe of it, he ſaith, was this, that the antients thought the ſouls of the dead were impriſoned in the earth till the day of judgment, which he labours to prove out of Tertullian, Auguſtin, and Lactantius: And from that error, ſaith this great man, was propagated the doctrine of Chriſt's deſcent into Hell. Now people were mightily concerned for theſe cloſe priſoners, and they were deſirous to purchaſe ſome refreſhing for the ſouls of their friends and relations. To this purpoſe they frequently prayed, and made oblations for them, and they were willing to do any thing, that their departed friends might fare as well as might be till the laſt day. And on this ſame ground they uſed baptiſm for the dead, and that annually on a certain day, viz. the calends of February, as Tertullian, Contr. Marcion. l. 5. ſaith expreſly:. And even to this day, ſaith Scaliger, ſome of the Ethiopian Church yearly renew their baptiſm at the Feaſt of Epiphany; which very thing Voſſius, Diſputat 17. de Baptiſmo alſo teſtifies of the Ethiopian Chriſtians. And Scaliger explains this cuſtom yet further out of Lactantius and Auguſtin, and rangeth it among the Ineptiæ Patrum & Eccleſiæ Doctorum, the dotages of the ancient Fathers and Doctors of the Church. Hence, ſaith he, is the Apoſtle's heavy cenſure of the Corinthians in the 34th verſe of this chapter, ſome have not the knowledge of God: I ſpeak this to your ſhame. From which words this critic would prove that the practice, from which the argument in the text is drawn, was no ways good and laudable, though the argument it ſelf which the Apoſtle uſeth be ſolid enough. But this is a miſtake, for when it is ſaid, ſome have not the knowledge of God, it is apparent that it ſtrikes at thoſe who denied or queſtioned the reſurrection of the dead, as you may eaſily be convinced by peruſing what immediately follows in the 35th and the 36th verſes, Some men will ſay, how are the dead raiſed up, and with what body do they come? Thou fool, that which thou ſoweſt is not quickned except it die: And v. 38. God giveth it a body as it pleaſeth him. From whence it is clear, that the fond and fooliſh reaſoning of the Corinthians about the manner of the reſurrection, and their ſhameful ignorance of the Almighty power of God concerning it, are the things which the Apoſtle there rebukes them for. He tells them that ſome have not the knowledge of God, in the ſame ſenſe that our Saviour reproved the Sadducees, ſaying, Ye do err not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God, Matt. xxii. 29. And as for the uſe of that officious baptizing for the benefit of the dead, (which Scaliger thinks is intended in this place,) before it gain our aſſent, it is to be proved that that fond and idle rite had a being in the Apoſtle's days, and was well known to the Corinthians, which is not yet proved, and ſo he cannot be thought to have an eye to any ſuch thing. Or, if we ſhould be ſo liberal of our conceſſions as to grant that ſuch a cuſtom was on foot when the Apoſtle writ this Epiſtle, which it is utterly impoſſible to prove, yet have we no reaſon to think, unleſs we can ſwallow down the doctrine of purgatory, and perſwade ourſelves that that officious waſhing was available to cool thoſe flames, unleſs, I ſay, we can digeſt this, we have no reaſon to believe, that the preſent argument is drawn thence. But on the contrary, it is highly rational to maintain, that this paſſage of Paul, and that of Peter in his 1 Epiſt. chap. iii. 19. of which we ſhall next ſpeak, with other places of Sacred Writ, have been forcibly drawn by perverſe men to patronize the gainful doctrine of ſatisfaction for the reſcuing of ſouls out of the priſon of purgatory. Beſides, I might aſk, what doth freeing from purgatory, which happens before the reſurrection, conduce to the confirming the reſurrection? They are, they ſay, baptized for the dead, to free their friends from purgatory, but that may be though there be no reſurrection; for it is the ſoul, not the body that ſuffers the pains of purgatory. Nay further, it doth not appear that even in after-ages the practice which Scaliger ſpeaks of did prevail, viz. that the living were baptized for the benefit of the dead. For the annual baptizing on a certain day, which he alledgeth for his purpoſe, argues no ſuch thing. It was done only in remembrance and reverence of Chriſt's baptiſm, which was performed by John on the Calends of February, according to ſome, or on the Epiphany, according to others. That day is called φώσφορος ἡμέρα by the antients, either becauſe of John Baptiſt the fore-runner, the true Evangelical Phoſphorus, or becauſe φωτίζεσθαι was βαπτίζεσθαι; ſee Heb. vi. 4. He that conſults the antients ſhall find, that they generally aſſert Chriſt was born and baptized on the ſame day of the year, which they think they prove from Luke iii. 23. This day being, according to their opinion, ſo ſignazlied by our Saviour's birth and baptiſm, was reputed a very high day, and was in great eſteem among them; inſomuch it ſeems, that they repeated their own baptiſm on that day. And for this reaſon ſome of the Abiſſine Chriſtians (whom Scaliger calls the Ethiopian Church) yearly baptize themſelves in rivers and lakes on Epiphany day. And I could add from a late author, that the biſhops in Muſcovy at this day conſecrate the rivers on the Epiphany every year. But what is all this to the purpoſe? Is here any baptizing for the benefit of the dead? No, aſſuredly. I am ready to grant alſo, that baptizing of the dead was uſed heretofore by ſome Chriſtians. This is as certain, as that it was uſual to give the other ſacrament to the dead; which both appear to have been practiſed from the ſixth canon of the 3d Council of Carthage, and the 83d of the Council of Trullo, in which you find a prohibition againſt that adminiſtring the Euchariſt and Baptiſm to the bodies of the deceaſed. And the above-named canoniſts (Balſamon & Zonaras) in their comments on the 18th canon of Carthage, acquaint us with the ground of this baptizing the dead, and likewiſe of the baptizing the living in the room of the dead, namely, upon the miſunderſtanding theſe words of the Apoſtle, What ſhall they do that are baptized for the dead? The Jews, it ſeems, had the like ſuperſtitious opinion and practice as to circumciſion; for Buxtorf (in ſynagoga.) acquaints us, that the infant that died before it was eight days old was circumciſed in the burying-place, over the grace. And that is yet more vain, which I have read of a people among the Tartars, who had ſo great an opinion of matrimony, that if their ſons and daughters died before age, they ſolemnized a marriage between the parties after death. Such a piece of folly was the baptizing of the dead, which was practiſed, we grant, in ſome ages after the apoſtles, and thoſe learned lawyers (Balſamon and Sonaras) think it was founded on the text. Yet any unprejudiced man may ſee that there is not the leaſt foundation in the words for ſuch a practiſe; for it is impoſſible to make theſe two one, baptizing the dead, or baptizing perſons when they are dead, and being baptized for the benefit of the dead.

8. There is another opinion which may be referred to this firſt rank of interpreters, and that is, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks here of the cuſtom received in the Church of giving names in baptiſm in memory of the dead. This, ſaith Heinſius (in exercitat. ſacr. in locum.) who is the only expoſitor that goes this way, was in uſe among the old Chriſtians, and thence the Nominalia were inſtituted and ſolemnly obſerved by them, which were feſtival days kept by the Chriſtians yearly in remembrance of the name given them in baptiſm. Theſe Nominalia, as Tertullian calls them, or Ὀνομαστήρια, as Gregory Nazianzen ſtiles them, were firſt derived from the Jews in circumciſion, at which time the infants had the names given them of their parents or neareſt kindred and friends deceaſed, which is confirmed in the Evangelical hiſtory by that diſpute which was about the naming of John the Baptiſt. And this uſage prevailed in the Chriſtian Church afterwards, and they were wont to give their children the names of their kindred who had excelled in virtue; for theſe were thought to inſpire them by their worthy examples. And by this means alſo the names of their departed friends were recorded, and their memories preſerved, and they ſeemed to ſurvive in thoſe that bore their names. Theſe were ſaid to be baptized for the dead, i. e. ſaith that learned critick, in gratiam & memoriam mortuorum. They might juſtly be ſaid to raiſe up the name of the dead, as thoſe were ſaid to do among the Jews, who, being next of kin, married the widow of the deceaſed. The Apoſtle then is thought by him to refer to that giving of the names of the dead to thoſe that were baptized, becauſe that was in memory and honour of the expired friends, in hope of their reſurrection, and in belief of eternity; for though they were dead, yet they really lived in another world. Thus therefore the argument is ſuppoſed to run, Why are thoſe names of departed parents and friends given to the baptized relations, if thoſe perſons are not at all in being? To what purpoſe were this if the deceaſed utterly periſhed, and after death were never to riſe again? The reſurrection ſuppoſeth the ſouls immortality, and ſo believing this we cannot queſtion the other. The perſons wearing the names of thoſe that are dead, do hereby tell the world that they believe their pious parents and friends are ſtill in being, and at the laſt day ſhall riſe again. What ſhall they do, how vainly do they act who are thus baptized themſelves, or baptize others in memory of the dead, if they believe not the reſurrection? Elſe why do they conſider the deceaſed, as yet living, when they give or bear the names of thoſe perſons? The anſwer to all this in ſhort is, 1. If ſuch a cuſtom was in the Apoſtles times, yet it ſeems to be too particular and too mean a one to ground ſo great and general a matter on. 2. 'Tis not giving or receiving a name that is here ſpoken of, but baptizing, which is another thing, and of more moment. And why baptiſm ſhould be put here for impoſition of names in baptiſm I ſee no reaſon, unleſs it could be proved that an improper acceptation of a word is more agreeable than the proper and native one. 3. It is not evident that names were generally and commonly given at baptiſm ſo early. If we conſult the hiſtory even of the times ſoon after Chriſt, we ſhall read of very few, which I ſomewhat wonder at, I confeſs, who bore the names either of the Evangeliſts or Apoſtles, or other martyrs. 4. To argue from the impoſition of the names of the dead to their certain riſing again is no ways firm and ſolid. And therefore, it is not probable on theſe conſiderations that this was the ſenſe of the Apoſtle.

9. In the next place I will propound the opinion of that late learned critick Alexander More, who in his notes on ſome ſelect places of the New Teſtament, underſtands this place of the ſacramental baptiſm, but by the dead (which in the Greek is in the plural) he thinks is denoted a ſingular perſon, and that perſon is Chriſt; and to be baptized for the dead, is to be baptized for Chriſt, the meaning of which you may find in that author. I will only here take notice of the unreaſonableneſs of his interpretation, ſo far as he underſtands Chriſt by thoſe that are dead. It is true, I grant that there are ſeveral examples of the change of the ſingular number for the plural in Holy Scripture. This Syllepſis, or Synechdoche, or enallage numeri, call it as you pleaſe, is frequent in the Sacred Stile, and it is moſt uſed when ſome eminent perſon or thing is meant. And I grant that Chriſt was the moſt eminent perſon, and his death the moſt ſignal and remarkable thing that ever was. But I cannot think that the Apoſtle here expreſſes the ſingular by the plural, becauſe, 1. The Apoſtle here mentions the dead three times, which ſhews he means it in the true proper ſenſe. For it were tolerable to put the plural for the ſingular once, but to repeat it is unuſual, much more to ſpeak after the ſame manner a third time is not to be allowed. Where you meet with the change of numbers in Scripture, it is by the bye, and not frequent; but this reiterating of it is no where to be found, which is an argument that the dead here is no ſuch kind of ſpeech, but that it is a way of ſpeaking after the ordinary rate, and conſequently that one number is not put for another. 2. All along in this chapter Chriſt is ſpoken of, and repreſented as riſen; how comes it to paſs that the character is here altered, and that now by the dead, thrice named, we muſt underſtand Chriſt. 3. When we can ſatisfy ourſelves very well with the propriety of ſpeech, we have no reaſon to fancy improprieties, and then to fly to that meaning which is contained in them. This is our preſent caſe, the Apoſtle here ſpeaks in the plural, and we can very well underſtand him. Why muſt we imagine, that he intends the ſingular, when he expreſſes himſelf plurally? Why muſt we make him ſpeak improperly when we can apprehend him as well, nay better in his proper way of ſpeaking? Thus we have no good ground to think that ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, is put for ὑπὲρ τȣ̃ νεκρȣ̃.

There is another interpretation yet remaining, even of thoſe who take baptizing here in the ſacramental ſenſe. But that being the interpretation which I ſhall fix upon, as the moſt probable and accountable, I will therefore reſerve it for the cloſe of all.

Thus far we have examined theſe expoſitions of the text, which make it to be underſtood of ſacramental waſhing, ſignally ſtiled baptiſm.

II. There are a ſecond ſort of expoſitors who will have the words meant of the waſhing of the dead bodies in order to burial: And of this opinion Beza is the chief patron, in his Annotations on the place, and he is followed by Paræus. It was, indeed, an ordinary practice to waſh the corps before their interment, and what Luke tells us of Tabitha, in Acts ix. 37. is a confirmation of it. It is likely, ſay theſe authors, that this was done in belief and expectation of the riſing again of thoſe bodies; and therefore it is probable the Apoſtle argues from the received rite and cuſtom of waſhing the bodies of the dead before they laid them in the grave; for this cleanſing (and anointing too, for that alſo was uſual) was a viſible profeſſion of the belief of a future Reſurrection. What ſhall they do that make uſe of this ſepulchral waſhing, to what purpoſe do they obſerve this rite, if the fleſh be never to riſe again? What doth this action of theirs ſignify? To what end is it? Why are all nations ſollicitous about the lifeleſs carcaſs? To what tends all this care of theirs, if the body ſhall not experience the happineſs of a reſtoration? The reply to this is eaſy, 1. The notion of baptizing, according to this interpretation, is forced and diſtorted; for tho' βαπτισμὸς may and doth ſignify waſhing in the more general ſenſe, and is applied to common waſhings, in Mark vii. 4. and Heb. ix. 10. yet there is no reaſon to relinquiſh the more noted acceptation of it in the ſtile of the New Teſtament: And here to reſtrain it to the cuſtom of funeral waſhing, is very odd and unaccountable. 2. Though the Chriſtians uſed this ſort of ſepulchral waſhing, yet how doth it appear that this was a proof of the Reſurrection of the dead? Durandus, in his Rationale, tells you, that the Chriſtians waſhed the dead, to ſhew that their ſouls were cleanſed from ſin by confeſſion and pennance. 3. This funeral waſhing was in uſe among the Jews, as well as thoſe that profeſſed Chriſtianity. Now it is known, that the Sadducees acknowledged no ſuch thing as a Reſurrection, and therefore their waſhing the dead could have no reſpect to the riſing again of the dead. Again, 4thly, the ablutio mortualis (as Plautus calls it) was uſed by the Pagans as well as Chriſtians; and it is not to be thought that theſe did it with regard to the Reſurrection. You may learn why they waſhed the dead bodies from Servius, in Æneid. 2. viz. that if the vital ſpirits in thoſe that ſeemed to be dead were only benumb'd, they might be revived and rouzed by the warm water, and rubbing it on the body. But it is more probable, in my opinion, that they waſhed the dead bodies in order to anointing them, for the Romans and Grecians, and other nations, uſed both theſe, and one made way for the other; for they firſt cleared the skin of its pollution, and then made uſe of their perfumed ointments. Virgil giving account of Miſenus's funeral obſequies, takes notice of this practice.

Poſt calidos latices, & ahena undantia flammis,
Expediunt, corpuſque lavant frigentis, & ungunt. Æneid 6.

And Ennius doth the like, ſpeaking of deceaſed Tarquin,

Tarquinii corpus bona fæmina lavit unxit.

And Homer deſcribes Patroclus's funerals after the ſame manner, Iliad 9. And by the bye, I might inſert that it is probable they waſhed our Saviour's body, ſeeing we read that Mary Magdalen, and other women, anointed it after his death, Mark xvi. 1. John xix. 38, 39, 40. as did alſo Joſeph of Arimathea and Nicodemus. Chryſoſtom is poſitive that Chriſt's body was waſhed after he was taken down from the croſs, Homil. 84. in Johan. Thus Jews, as well as other people, uſed this funeral ceremony of waſhing the dead body, it being in order to anointing; for it was proper firſt to waſh off the filth of the body, before they laid on their ſweet ointments. Or, we may add another reaſon of the cuſtom to be drawn from the Pagan antiquities. There I find that waſhing the infants that were newly born was a conſtant practice; not only Plautus, in Amphitryon. but ſeveral others, take notice of it, and the very ſacred records expreſly mention it, Ezek. xvi. 4. and thereby confirm the antiquity of this cuſtom. Perhaps, therefore, waſhing after death was an imitation of the waſhing at the birth. Their entering into the world, and their leaving it, had the like names, and they would have them reſemble one another in the like actions. See Plutarch. Sympoſ. l. 8. Ammian. Marcellin. It is probable they agreed upon it to end as they began, at coming into and going out of the world to uſe the ſame cuſtom. But if this conjecture be not admitted, then we muſt have recourſe to the former accounts given of this uſage, or we may yet further add, that the generality of the people, who uſed the luſtral waſhing, did it either out of ſome ſuperſtitious humour, or barely to comply with cuſtom. Take it in any of theſe aſpects, it doth not look like an argument that the Apoſtle would make uſe of for the proof of the Reſurrection. 5. To ſay no more, the criticiſing genius of this modern expoſitor fails him here? for, What conſtruction can reconcile theſe two, and make them the ſame, viz. the waſhing of the dead (i. e. waſhing perſons after they are dead) and waſhing for the dead? Theſe are vaſtly different, and it was never heard that there was any affinity between the one and the other. Therefore this ſepulchral waſhing ought to be diſallowed here; Grammar will not vouch it: Which is a ſufficient confutation of the opinion, though there were nothing elſe to ſay.

III. A third ſort of interpreters are as wide of the truth, when they refer this text to a legal and ceremonious waſhing uſed among the Jews after their touching of a dead body, or going into the ſepulchres, or ſtanding too near the perſons that were breathing their laſt. The pollution which they contracted by this means, was to be purged away by waſhing themſelves. And, indeed, it happens that the word βαπτίζεσθαι is applied to this ſort of cleanſing by the Apocryphal author, in Eccleſ. xxxiv. 25. Nay, Mark applies the word in this ſenſe, Mark vii. 4 Except they waſh, (or be baptized) they eat not. And the Arabick verſion of the text ſeems to favour this opinion, which renders it thus, What ſhall they do that are baptized, becauſe of the dead perſons, viz. whom they have touched, and ſo polluted themſelves? Hottinger, therefore, in Cipp. Hebraic. underſtands the Apoſtle to ſpeak of this ceremonial baptiſm of the Old Teſtament (as he calls it) which he ſaith was inſtituted to remind the Iſraelites of the Reſurrection of the dead. But I do not find that he hath gained any conſiderable proſelytes to his opinion, which has ſo little reaſon to rely upon. For to be baptized or waſhed, ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, for the dead, and ἀπὸ τῶν νεκρῶν, from the dead, i. e. from the pollution contracted by touching or coming near the dead, are vaſtly different. Waſhing themſelves after their being defiled by a dead body, What is that to waſhing for the dead? And as this Moſaick waſhing hath no Grammar, ſo neither hath it any Logick to appear in its behalf; for it miſerably perverts the ſenſe of the words, and the conſequence of the Apoſtle's diſcourſe, which I leave you to examine.

And ſo doth that other opinion of Turrianus the Jeſuit, who will needs have this baptizing for the dead relate to a legal waſhing or purifying of the dead bodies. It is his fancy, that the Apoſtle argues from the practice of the Jews, among whom it was uſual, that if any man died legally unclean (i. e. before he was purified from his uncleanneſs according to the law, Numb. 19.) ſome other perſon was waſhed and cleanſed in his ſtead: For they thought, ſaith he, that this purging profited the dead, and by this means the uncleanneſs, which he died in, would not hurt him; nay, that he ſhould be thereby cleanſed: And by this ceremony too they profeſſed their faith of the Immortality of the ſoul and the Reſurrection of the dead, againſt the hereſy of the Sadducees. But,

The naming of this conceit is enough to confute it: For, firſt, there is no proof that there ever was any ſuch practice: Secondly, there is no reaſon to think that the Apoſtle, by baptizing, means any other than Sacramental Baptiſm: Thirdly, any man may gueſs that the Jeſuit chiefly deſigned this Expoſition for the ſake of his ſo much admired doctrine of Purgatory.

And for that end have others of the Church of Rome faſtned another, but as improbable a meaning on the words. Which brings me to the laſt rank of Interpreters, viz.

IV. Thoſe that will have the baptizing in the text to be underſtood in a metaphorical ſenſe. It is the dream of Stapleton and Salmeron, and ſome others of that party, that becauſe by baptiſm or waſhing, is meant affliction or ſuffering, in Matt. xx. 23. therefore the perſons, who are ſaid to be baptized for the dead, are ſuch kind ſouls, who, to do the dead a courteſy, undergo all ſorts of afflictions and hardſhips. As if Paul had ſaid, What ſhall they do who voluntarily ſuffer ſo much in this world to help thoſe that are in miſery in another? What ſhall they do that baptize themſelves, as it were, in their ſweat and tears, and bathe themſelves in their own blood, to redeem poor ſouls from the pains of purgatory? What will become of them that do and ſuffer any thing for the advantage of the dead, if the dead ſhall not riſe? Why do they inure themſelves to long prayers and tedious faſtings? Why do they undergo the baptiſm of penance and almſdeeds? (for Bellarmine underſtands it ſo, and Salermon upon the place tells us, that alms are a kind of waſhing, for which he quoteth, Eccleſiaſticus iii. 30. Water will quench a flaming fire, and alms maketh an atonement for ſins; and Luke xi. 4. Give alms, and behold, all things are clean unto you.) Why do ſo many undertake long pilgrimages, wear hairſhirts, roll themſelves in ſnow, ſcourge and torture themſelves, and go through all the hardſhips of ſelf-denial, if they do not think theſe things will prove ſatisfactions for diſobedient ſouls? Why do they relinquiſh the world, and ſtudy nothing but ſeverity and mortifications and auſtere exerciſes of their bodies, if they could not by theſe arts do the dead ſome good? Why are they thus baptized or afflicted for the dead? Certainly this baptizing will mitigate the flames of purgatory, and inable the diſtreſſed priſoners to get looſe the ſooner out of that painful durance. This is the true popiſh interpretation of the text. To which I reply, 1. That it is an odd notion and way of theſe men to reckon repentance, and prayers and almſdeeds, among afflictions and ſufferings and puniſhments. This is a doctrine which no Divines but themſelves ever taught. 2. Let it be remembred, that although penances for the dead were in uſe among the Pagans, yet God's people were particularly forbid to uſe any ſuch thing, Deut. xiv. 1. Ye ſhall not cut your ſelves, nor make any baldneſs between your eyes for the dead. And ſhall not Chriſtians think it unlawful as well as Jews? 3. Any man may ſee that this is a plain fetch to eſtabliſh that doctrine which hath brought the Church of Rome ſo much profit, and therefore muſt be maintained right or wrong. 4. Whereas they ſay the end of theſe ſervices and undertakings of the living for the dead is, that the ſouls detained in purgatory may be releaſed; I reply that this is fondly alledged, becauſe purgatory is not a priſon for bodies, but for ſouls only, as they confeſs. Now I never heard of the reſurrection of ſouls, but of bodies; and of this the Apoſtle ſpeaks, if the dead riſe not at all, meaning it of the bodies of the dead. So that this text hath no reference to what they dream of. It ſpeaks of another thing, unleſs ſoul and body are the ſame thing. 5 It were enough to ſay that this obſcure and myſtical notion of being baptized, is but ſeldom uſed in the ſtile of Scripture, and then, one place of Luke excepted, it hath an explanation added after it, as Voſſius hath well obſerved, in Theſ. de reſurrect. carnis. There can be no reaſon therefore, in this place eſpecially, to think that this allegorical baptiſm, i. e. the baptiſm of ſuffering, is intended.

I might annex here the opinion of our learned Rabbi Dr. Lightfoot, who is the only Proteſtant of any note, except Voſtius, who interprets this place of the metaphorical baptiſm, the baptiſm of ſuffering. What ſhall they do that are baptized for the dead, if the dead, &c. is as much, ſaith he, (Harmony of the New Teſtament,) as if the Apoſtle had ſaid, If the dead riſe not again, what will become of thoſe that are baptized with a martyrial baptiſm, or that do ſuffer death for the profeſſion of the truth? And he adds, to confirm this interpretation, that the Jewiſh baptizings or dippings in their purifications, were a very ſharp piece of religion, when in froſt and ſnow, and wind and weather, they muſt over head and ears in cold water, from which the phraſe was uſed to ſignify death, and the bittereſt ſufferings. Whence he gathers that baptiſm for the dead in this place, is ſuffering of martyrdom; and conſequently he makes this to be the ſenſe of the text, What ſhall they do who have, or do undergo martyrdom? What ſhall become of them, if their bodies riſe not again? Thus he. But who ſees not that this is a very groundleſs notion, and taken up only from that Jewiſh way of ſpeaking which he mentions? Whereas, if we conſider it well, there is no affinity at all between the one and the other. Though the Jewiſh baptiſms might be made uſe of to expreſs great ſeverities, yea, death it ſelf, yet what is this to being baptized for the dead? Baptiſm may repreſent martyrdom, but who can reaſonably thence infer, that the baptized for the dead in this place are thoſe that were martyred? There is not the leaſt connection between theſe two. It muſt be ſaid then that this worthy and reverend perſon eſpouſed this notion merely upon the account of that great reverence which he always paid to the Jewiſh and Rabinical writings, of which moſt of his opinions have a tincture.

There are ſome other odd fancies which I have met with on the words; as that of Lyranus, Lombard and Aquinas, who by the dead underſtand mortal ſins, called by the Apoſtle dead works, Heb. ix. 1—6, 14. for the expiation and waſhing away of which holy baptiſm was ordained. But their own Stapleton refutes this, ſaying, the Apoſtle ſpeaks not of ſins but men, not of works, but perſons. This, and the reſt of this ſort, I paſs by, as unwilling to entertain you with trifles. Some of the other interpretations before-mentioned carry with them a greater ſemblance of truth or probability, and have ſome antiquity and authority to recommend them. But this, and ſome of thoſe lately mentioned, are invented on purpoſe to be aſſiſtant to a bad cauſe, which they are willing to ſupport by the multitude of arguments, ſeeing they are not able to do it by the goodneſs and ſolidity of them.

V. I will now at laſt offer to you the interpretation which I conceive is moſt reaſonable and accountable. But before I preſent you with this expoſition, I will make way for it by premiſing theſe three things.

1. That I intend to adhere to the firſt rank of expoſitors, who (as you may remember) underſtand the words of baptiſm properly ſo called, i. e. ſome kind of real waſhing, and particularly of the ſacramental baptiſm, whereby we are initiated into the Church of Chriſt. For why ſhould we without neceſſity and urgent reaſon (and I can ſee no ſuch thing here) underſtand the words of a metaphorical baptiſm? It is a general rule delivered by Auſtin, De Doctrina Chriſtiana. l. 3. c. 10. that we ought not to interpret thoſe things allegorically, which are ſpoken properly, and that we muſt never depart from the literal and proper ſenſe of Scripture, unleſs it be manifeſtly proved that ſuch a ſenſe is not to be followed. The uſual and proper ſignification is firſt to be attended to, and it is not fit we fly to borrowed and figurative ſenſes, ſo long as the natural and genuine one will ſerve our turns. This then I aſſert, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks here of the uſual and received baptiſm of the New Teſtament. But the main thing in the words is the prepoſition. Therefore, 2dly, I premiſe this, that the prepoſition ὑπὲρ, which is here tranſlated for, is as much as becauſe of, or by reaſon of, or for the ſake of; and conſequently, ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, is as much as ἕνεκα τῶν νεκρῶν mortuorum cauſa ſeu gratia, becauſe of the dead, or, for the ſake of the dead; for it is well known that ὑπὲρ τινὸς, is in gratiam alicujus. This is the plain and ordinary import of that prepoſition, and it is uſual and obvious in writers of all ſorts, ſo that it is a wonder it hath been overlooked here. Socinus, to promote his beloved doctrine, maintains that by no means an impulſive, but a final cauſe, is denoted in the New Teſtament always by this particle ὑπὲρ, but Grotius hath largely ſhewed this to be notoriouſly falſe, and thereby convinced the learned how faulty the Grammar, as well as the Divinity of that heretick is. I doubt not therefore, that the prepoſition ſignifies here an impulſive cauſe, and is taken in the ſame ſenſe, that it is in thoſe places where it is ſaid, the Gentiles ſhould glorify God for his mercy, Rom. xv. 9. i. e. becauſe of his mercy ſhewed unto them; ſee Pſal. xliv. 22. For thy ſake we are killed, &c. (which the Apoſtle renders by ἕνεκα, Rom. viii. 36.) Gen. xxxvii. 8. and xliii. 18. and 2 Sam. i. 26. and in many other places. The prepoſitions gnale, magnan, lemagnan, are uſed after the ſame manner, and are accordingly tranſlated either Χάριν, or, ἕνεκα, by the LXX. And where the Apoſtle ſaith, I ceaſe not to give thanks for you, Eph. i. 16. i. e. becauſe of you, of whom I have heard ſo great and laudable thanks: This excites me to thank God; and where you read of ſuffering for Chriſt's ſake, and for the kingdom of God, Phil. i. 29. 2 Theſſ. i. 5. But moſt palpable is that of the Apoſtle, in 2 Cor. xii. 10. where he ſaith, he takes pleaſure in his perſecutions and diſtreſſes, ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ, for Chriſt's ſake, as we rightly render it, and ſo the prepoſition ought to be rendred in the text. I might obſerve, that this prepoſitive particle in the Greek, anſwers exactly to the Hebrew על in many places of the Old Teſtament, which ſignifies for the ſake, or, becauſe of. So then this verſion of the words is plain and eaſy, and hath the greateſt authority to vouch it, What ſhall they do that are baptized by reaſon of the dead, or, for their ſakes? How this is to be applied I will ſhew you anon. Having thus laid down what I underſtand by the verb βαπτίζεσθαι, and the prepoſition ὑπὲρ, in which the main difficulty of the text lies, I muſt alſo premiſe and obſerve this to you,

3dly, That it is not barely ὑπὲρ νεκρῶν, without the article τῶν, as the learned Scaliger alſo noteth on the place, and ſaith it is not without ſome ſingular emphaſis. The prepoſitive article ὁ is frequently of the like force with the Hebrew ה, and the Engliſh that, which are notes of emphaſis and ſpecification. It is probable therefore, that not all but ſome certain dead are here meant, for this article, which is here demonſtrative, denotes ſomething that is certain and definitive. It is true, it is ſometimes left out, and other times inſerted, and yet the ſenſe is neither heightned nor impaired, and I deny not that it is ſo in ſome places in this chapter. But ſince it is oftentimes ſignificant and emphatical, and becomes a relative and demonſtrative pronoun, it may be ſo in this text that is before us, eſpecially the article being expreſſed twice, and it being likely, as I will make it appear, that it particularly relates to ſomething mentioned before in this chapter. So that the words are to run thus, What ſhall they do that are baptized by reaſon of, or for the ſake of thoſe dead, viz. thoſe dead before ſpoken of? And now that you may underſtand, who thoſe dead are, and that we may the better apprehend the whole arguing of the Apoſtle in the text, and at the ſame time give the confirmation of the ſenſe which I am to offer, I will preſent you with a ſhort view of the context. This is the beſt way certainly to enervate and deſtroy the former opinions, and to eſtabliſh a right judgment of the text.

The ſcope and deſign of Paul in this chapter is to eſtabliſh the doctrine of our reſurrection. That ſo weighty and important doctrine, to which he gives the name of the Goſpel, ſee ver. 1. This great article of the Chriſtian Faith (which ſome of the Corinthians had called in queſtion is here maintained by ſeveral arguments; the firſt whereof is Chriſt's reſurrection, which he tells was atteſted by above five hundred witneſſes, ſome of whom he ſaith are fallen aſleep, ver. 6. The ſame, you know, is expreſly ſaid of Stephen by the Evangeliſt Luke; and without doubt our Apoſtle ſpeaks here of Stephen who was ſtoned to death, (Acts vii. 60.) and of James the firſt martyr of all the Apoſtles, who was beheaded by Herod Agrippa, Acts xii. 2. And Clemens tells us, l. 7. that another died at the very ſame time: he relates how the perſon that carried James to the place of judgment, and heard him there ſo fully give teſtimony to Chriſt, was thereby converted, and preſently profeſſed himſelf to be a Chriſtian: whereupon both of them were carried together to execution, and were (as he reports) beheaded. The Apoſtle may be thought likewiſe to ſpeak here of the other James, who was alſo calleſt James the Juſt, who was barbarouſly knocked on the head by the Jews in Nero's time, as Euſebius reports. But whether this James was put to death before Paul writ this Epiſtle to the Corinthians, I will not confidently determine. We might alſo here reckon Philip the Apoſtle, who was put to death at the ſame time that James the Juſt was, as ſome relate: whence it is that our Church celebrates the memory of them both on the ſame day. But it is unqueſtionable that John the Baptiſt, who was the firſt martyr, fell aſleep before all theſe, being beheaded by a former Herod, in the firſt year of our Saviour's preaching. And there were many others who were crowned with martyrdom, as our Apoſtle himſelf teſtifieth, Acts xxvi. 10. Many of the ſaints did I ſhut up in priſon; and when they were put to death, I gave my voice againſt them. There were many that ſuffered martyrdom, who are therefore ſaid to be fallen aſleep in Chriſt, viz. thoſe holy men that ſacrificed their lives for the Goſpel; thoſe are the dead whom the text ſpeaks of. And hence he frames a ſecond argument to prove the abſurdity which would follow upon denying the reſurrection. Then they alſo which are fallen aſleep in Chriſt are periſhed. To theſe very ſaints, who are thus fallen aſleep, who are the ſame with thoſe mentioned, in 1 Theſſ. iv. 14. them which ſleep in Jeſus, and in ver. 16. the dead in Chriſt, (the bleſſed martyrs who died for Chriſt's ſake) to theſe my text hath relation. Theſe were οἱ νεκροὶ, thoſe dead for whoſe ſakes, and becauſe of whom ſo many in the Apoſtle's days became converts, and were baptized. Theſe martrys, ſaith he, who are fallen aſleep in Chriſt are periſhed if there be no reſurrection: they have utterly undone themſelves and others by loſing their lives for Chriſt. Thirdly, he proceeds to argue thus, as thoſe martyrs were arrant fools, and periſhed like ſuch, if there be no reſurrection, ſo we that ſurvive are the wretchedeſt creatures upon earth if that be true: If in this life only we have hope in Chriſt, we are of all men moſt miſerable, ver. 19. But now is Chriſt riſen from the dead, and become the firſt-fruits of them that ſlept, ſaith the Apoſtle triumphantly in the next verſe. By this confident aſſumption he baffles the gainſayers, and comforts the Chriſtian Church. But within two verſes after breaks off this argument which he had newly reſumed, and after a digreſſion about the manner of the future reſurrection, and the final conſummation of the world, (which reaches from the 23d ver. to the words of my text) he falls into a freſh argument thus; Elſe what ſhall they do that are baptized for the dead, if the dead riſe not at all? why are they alſo baptized for the dead? The firſt word (as we have it tranſlated) elſe, implies that this verſe refers to the immediately foregoing ones, or to ſome general concluſion before. But if you examine both, you will not find any connection between this and the immediately preceding verſes: and indeed the Syriack leaves out this alioquin or elſe, as if the ſentence were entire without it. I conceive then that the Greek word is not rightly tranſlated here, but that it ought to be rendred moreover, ἐπεὶ ſignifying ſometimes ſo in the Septuagint's Verſion, as in pſal. lxxviii. 20. and in prophane authors, as in Herodotus, l. 2. and Plutarch, in publicola. out of whom many places might be produced, wherein ἐπεὶ is as much as ἔπειτα deinde, pæterea; and that is the import of the word in the text.

So then the Apoſtle returns here to his diſcourſe about the reſurrection, and tenders another argument, a new reaſon to confirm it. "Moreover (ſaith he) to evince further the doctrine of the reſurrection, in Publicola, which I have been diſcourſing of; what ſhall they do that are baptized for the ſake of the dead ſaints and martyrs whom I ſpoke of before, who I told you were fallen aſleep, if the dead riſe not at all, if they awake not at the laſt day? Why are they alſo, or (as Grotius noteth, ϗ in this place is as much as οὖν, ergo,) Why are they therefore baptized upon the account, or for the ſake of thoſe dead? Why do new converts come in daily, requeſting to be admitted into the Church by Holy Baptiſm? Is it not, think you, for the ſake of thoſe excellent perſons who fell aſleep in Chriſt? Is it not by reaſon of them that they take up the profeſſion of Chriſtianity? Yes ſurely; they have ſeen the lives and miracles of thoſe good men, they have obſerved their carriage and conſtancy at their deaths, and by this they are ſtirred up effectually to own the ſame cauſe, to love the ſame religion, and to admit themſelves into it by the ſacrament of baptiſm. Thoſe dead ſaints and martyrs (whoſe memories and acts are ſtill living) fetch in theſe great numbers of converts. The blood of dying ſaints is the ſeed of the Church, which the more plentifully it is ſown and ſhed, yieldeth the larger increaſe of converts. Hence, hence it is that proſelytes come in apace to Chriſtianity, that converts flock to the Holy Waters of baptiſm; for they, well obſerving the admirable behaviour of thoſe perſecuted Chriſtians at their death, are ſoon perſwaded into the belief of another life. From their examples they are excited to a love of the Chriſtian Religion, which they ſee makes men live and die couragiouſly, and hereupon they are zealous to be made members of the Chriſtian Church by the ſacrament of baptiſm." This is to be baptized for or becauſe of the dead. Or, after this manner, and in theſe words you may imagine the Apoſtle to argue in my text: "You ſee, O Corinthians, that the ſufferings which the Chriſtians undergo, are ſo far from diſcouraging others from turning Chriſtians, that vaſt numbers of unbelievers are animated thereby to own the Chriſtian Profeſſion, and to live and die in the acknowledgment of it. See what power and efficacy the example of thoſe ſaints hath, and how it works on the hearts of the moſt reſolved, and makes them preſently renounce and forſake their follies. Tell me, What makes the idolatrous Gentile quit his former prophane life? Or what makes the wilful Jew renounce his circumciſion, and leave his Moſaical waſhings for the laver of Chriſtian Baptiſm? It is not to be imputed to this cauſe chiefly, viz. that they behold and are raviſhed with the ſingular behaviour of the ſuffering ſaints, who contentedly quit all for Chriſt their Maſter? They cannot but reverence and imbrace that religion which inſpires thoſe men with ſuch valour, and gives them ſo invincible a courage: And immediately hereupon they haſten to be initiated into the ſociety of ſuch brave Chriſtians. Now, tell me, O ye men of Corinth, you eſpecially that queſtion the article of the reſurrection, is it nothing that ſo many every day voluntarily admit themſelves into the Church by Holy Baptiſm, and that upon the account of the deceaſed confeſſors and martyrs, who they ſee ſacrifice all that is dear to them to purchaſe another world? Why ſhould you think there is no other life, when you ſee men lay down their lives for their religion, and others preſently taking up that religion for which they loſt their lives? And for what reaſon do ſo great ſholes of converts come into the Baptiſmal Waters? What ſhall they do that are thus baptized? To what end and deſign do they this, and continue to do ſo? To what purpoſe, on what account is it? You cannot but ſee that it is for the ſake of the ſaints, whoſe exemplary lives and deaths they have beheld, and thereby were thoroughly convinced of the truth of Chriſtianity, which promiſes a better life after this at the reſurrection of the dead. Why are ſo many, I ſay, ſtirred up to embrace Chriſtianity, and to enter into Holy Baptiſm? Is it not by reaſon of the deceaſed ſaints and martyrs? Is it not becauſe of the love and reſpect they bear them, and the goodneſs of the cauſe which they ſo bravely maintain? Is it not hence that they run to their ſpiritual guides and inſtructers, and beg to be baptized: And if theſe demand the reaſon of it, is not this their reply, we come to be baptized for the dead, i. e. we are moved to come to the Holy Baptiſm by reaſon of thoſe departed ſaints, whoſe godly behaviour we ſo much admired, whoſe patience and courage to the laſt we were even aſtoniſhed at: Becauſe of theſe worthy perſons we are excited to enter into the Baptiſmal Vow, and to admit ourſelves into their religion, which is the beſt in the world." What interpretation can be plainer and clearer than this? And yet I know not any writer excepting one, or two at the moſt, who ſeem ſo much as to approach towards this expoſition, or to give the leaſt hint of this notion which I have preſented to you; ſee Cloppenburg. Syntagm. Select. Diſput. 14. Spanhemius in locum. Yet certainly, if you weigh this well, you will find it worthy of all acceptation: For in all the forenamed interpretations there is either ſomething defective or redundant: There is ſome fault in Grammar and criticiſm, or a miſtake in hiſtory and chronology, or an apparent inconſequence in the way of argument. In ſum, there were bold ſuppoſitions; but ſlender proofs. Whereas you may obſerve, that in this interpretation which I have rendred to you, the propriety of the words is preſerved entire: the criticiſm is not ſtrained: The genuine and proper ſignification of the words is upheld: The whole deſign of the context and of the Apoſtle's arguing is diſcovered: And the hiſtory of the ancient Church, and the relation of the beſt antiquity concur to make this expoſition ſolid and authentick. Here is nothing begged, but all is free and unconſtrained. This is the cleareſt and moſt reaſonable ſenſe in it ſelf, and likewiſe the moſt accomodate to the preſent purpoſe of the Apoſtle in this chapter, to the ſtile and phraſeology of the Scripture, and to the whole analogy of Chriſtian Faith.

And now in the cloſe of all, to apply this interpretation to our ſelves. We have the ſame reaſon now to maintain the Chriſtian religion that thoſe firſt good converts had to embrace it. The conſideration which made them enter into religion, ſhould make us hold it faſt: for we as well as they profeſs that religion which was atteſted by the death, and ſealed with the blood of martyrs. Martyrdom made Chriſtians then; let it confirm us in Chriſtianity now. Eſpecially let us be encouraged to love and maintain our religion, which we can hold with eaſe and all the conveniencies of this life. We are not forced to quit our lives that we may ſecure our religion and our conſciences. Bleſſed be God, we can enjoy theſe here, and carry them with us into another world afterwards· But if ever the Divine Providence ſhall call us to lay down our lives, and ſpend our blood in the ſervice of our Lord and Saviour, let us not count our lives dear unto us, ſo that we may finiſh our courſe with joy, and teſtify the Goſpel of the grace of God, as our Apoſtle ſpeaketh, Acts xx. 24. Let us, like the primitive ſaints, rejoice that we are counted worthy to ſuffer ſhame, and even death for the name of Chriſt, Acts v. 41. Let us chearfully ſacrifice our lives for the ſake of him who died for us, let us drown our affections to the world in our own blood, thereby propagating our Holy Religion, and therein following the pattern of the bleſſed Apoſtles and primitive Saints, who manfully and undauntedly died for the faith; on whoſe account, and by virtue of whoſe example it was that thouſands of converted perſons flocked to the waters of baptiſm, and were ambitious to aſſert that cauſe for which they ſaw thoſe excellent Chriſtians lay down their lives. The death of an eminent Saint made a great number of diſciples in thoſe days: the blood of a holy martyr baptized whole cities. This I conceive was to be baptized for the dead. This I offer as the moſt plain and eaſy, the moſt natural and genuine meaning of the text, ſays the learned Dr. Gregory.

Ver. 31.——I die daily.] i. e. I am continually expoſed to death.

Ver. 32. If after the manner of men.] Or, to ſpeak after the manner of men.

——— I have fought with beaſts at Epheſus.] Paul here refers to that which had befel him at Epheſus, Acts xix. compared with 2 Cor. i. 8.

——— Let us eat and drink, &c.] This is the concluſion that might reaſonably be deduced from the premiſes, if the dead riſe not; ſo the force of the argument ſeems to be this: If I have undergone all theſe ſufferings and afflictions, in hopes of an happy Reſurrection, What advantageth it me if the dead riſe not? If this were true, it would be more reaſonable, Let us eat and drink, for to morrow we die. Then ſenſual fools would be the wiſeſt men, who gratify their appetites and brutiſh deſires, till death ſurprizes them, and cuts them off. This was the doctrine of the Epicureans, and therefore the Apoſtle adds, in the next verſe,

Ver. 33. Be not deceived.] By this atheiſtical deluſion; for even one of your own poets, Menander, confutes the Epicureans, when he ſays, Evil communications corrupt good manners, or good diſpoſitions or deſires.

Ver. 35. But ſome men will ſay, How are the dead raiſed up? And with what body do they come?] The Apoſtle having fully proved, by many ſubſtantial arguments, the Reſurrection of the body, in the premiſes, begins now to anſwer the objections that were, or, as he conceived, might be made againſt it. Thus, (1.) To the ſeeming impoſſibility of the Reſurrection of the dead, he anſwers, That it is as impoſſible for the dead to riſe, as it is for corn, ſown in the earth, to be quickened after it dies in the earth. Corn ſoon rots and dies, yet it doth not periſh by dying, but ſprouts up green and freſh: In like manner the body, ſown in the grave, is not loſt, doth not periſh; though the parts of the body, by death, are diſſolved, yet they are not annihilated; they are ſcattered, but are not periſhed. (2.) There were ſome that required the manner of this Reſurrection of the body to be deſcribed or demonſtrated to ſenſe: To theſe the Apoſtle replies, that our bodies ſhall ariſe the ſame in ſubſtance, though not in qualities; as corn ſown is raiſed in ſubſtance, and ſome in kind, but diverſe in qualities, coming up with blade and ear, and corn in it: It does not riſe in the ſame figure in which it was ſown, but it riſes in the ſame nature in which it was ſown; that which was ſown wheat, ariſes wheat, in like manner our bodies, ſown in the grave, ſhall riſe ſubſtantially the ſame, but different in qualities.

Ver. 42.—— It is ſown in corruption.] Here the Apoſtle begins to give you the different qualities ſpoken of in the laſt note: (1.) Says he, It is ſown in corruption, or it is here, in this world, a frail, mortal body, ſubject to putrefaction; but when it riſeth at the laſt day, it will be incorruptible, it ſhall never more be ſubject to death or diſſolution. (2.) It is ſown in diſhonour. In this world the body is ſubject to deformity and vileneſs, and lies down in the grave loathſome and nauſeous; but at the laſt day it ſhall riſe a bright and beautiful body, ſhining like the ſun in the firmament of Heaven. (3.) It is ſown in weakneſs, or in this life it is ſubject to infirmities and weakneſſes by labour, diſeaſes, and advance of age; but it ſhall be raiſed in power, i. e. by God's power, to become a powerful body, never more to ſuffer impotence, weakneſs or feebleneſs; but ſhall be ſtrong, active, vigorous and nimble. (4.) It is ſown a natural body, ſubject to all the accidents and qualities of an animal in this lower ſtate of the world, and to death itſelf; but it ſhall be raiſed a ſpiritual body, endued with thoſe qualities which are proper to the bleſſed Angels, one of which is always to ſee God, and never to die any more. See the note on ver. 53. where you will find the many advantages they ſhall acquire who riſe in the Reſurrection of the juſt.

Ver. 50.——Fleſh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God.] i. e. Theſe our natural bodies, conſiſting of fleſh and blood, cannot inherit the Kingdom of God, while they are in this weak, baſe and droſſy condition of corruption. See ver. 53.

Ver. 53. This corruptible muſt put on incorruption, and this mortal muſt put on immortality.] The Apoſtle having proved, by ſeveral convincing reaſons, that Chriſt is riſen, and that thoſe who are Chriſt's ſhall riſe alſo in God's due time, he now proceeds to the diſcovery of a myſterious truth, not hitherto unfolded to the Corinthians, which holy ſecret conſiſteth of two branches, viz. the wonderful change which ſhall, of a ſudden, be made in the bodies of thoſe true Chriſtians who ſhall be found alive at that time, when Chriſt ſhall come to judge the world. The Apoſtle ſhews, that then there ſhall be no other ſeparation of the ſouls of the juſt from their reſpective bodies, than what the Almighty Power of God ſhall make by the tranſmutation of thoſe bodies from a groſs to an heavenly frame. Then he declares the like glorious alteration which ſhall be made at the laſt in the bodies of thoſe who, having ſlept in Chriſt, ſhall be raiſed again at that day. Behold, ſays he, I ſhew you a myſtery; we ſhall not all ſleep, but we ſhall all be changed, ver. 51. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye at the laſt trump; (for the trumpet ſhall ſound) ver. 52, or ſome awakening power ſhall go before the heavenly King, when he deſcendeth with his hoſt of Angels, and the dead ſhall be raiſed incorruptible, and we ſhall be changed, for this corruptible muſt put on incorruption, and this mortal muſt put on immortality.

In which text we have, (1.) The grounds of a Chriſtian's belief concerning the change of a corruptible and mortal, into an incorruptible and immortal body. (2.) The many and great advantages that follow ſuch a change. And,

I. That the body is mortal, is an article in every man's Creed, though many live as if they had not ſpent a thought about dying, and upon the account which, after death, muſt be made by them.

That the body ſhall riſe, was a doctrine which the primitive Chriſtians ſpake of with ſuch great aſſurance, that as the Heathen, in Minutius Felix, obſerves, a man that heard them would almoſt think they themſelves were already riſen. And though the conceit of Origen about a new celeſtial body, inſtead of the glorified frame of the old one, at leaſt of the ideal rudiments of it, had been by his followers entertained, yet, they agreed with other Chriſtians in the point of a Heavenly Tabernacle. Nevertheleſs, all men in all ages have not had a faith equal with theirs, but ſome (eſpecially in ours ſo over-run with ſcepticiſm) have doubted concerning the reſurrection and further change of this body; ſuch things entring with difficulty into our imaginations, of which no inſtance has been ſeen by us. Notwithſtanding which, we have reaſon to believe this change, though none have come out of their graves to ſhew us it.

And here, I appeal to all ſenſible men, whether that God who is the author of motion, by which all alterations in bodies are made, who brought this goodly frame of the world out of an heap of indigeſted matter, who formed the body of Adam out of the duſt, who has ſo framed nature, that a ſpring of vegetables ſhould ſucceed their death in winter; who quickens dying ſeeds into beautiful ſtems and flowers and fruit, who cauſed even the dry rod of Aaron to bud, and bloſſom, and bring forth almonds; who has given ſkill and power to men, by fire and other natural cauſes, to open and refine the groſſeſt bodies, in whoſe book, (ſaith David) were all our members written, which in continuance were faſhioned, when as yet there was none of them, Pſal. cxxxix. 10. who is pleaſed frequently to raiſe the ſick to health and ſtrength and vigour, after they had ſuffered a long and tedious languiſhment, in which low eſtate their fleſh and their ſpirits were waſted, and their bones ſtood, as it were, ſtaring upon them; I appeal, I ſay, to all men of ſound common ſenſe, whether that God who hath done theſe great things, is not able to put together the parts of an human body which he made, contrived, and formerly joined, and to advance the frame of it from groſſneſs to purity. To think he is not, is next to no thinking at all, and it is to reproach God's power, and knowledge and wiſdom, which is a perilous, as well as an injudicious and irreverend practice.

How God will effect the change of this body, when he ſhall make it celeſtial, I pretend not to explain. No man, I believe, can minutely tell how a grain of muſtard-ſeed grows up into a tree, or arboreſcent plant. It is true, we cannot properly call that part of this doctrine, which is revealed, any longer a myſtery. But there is ſomething of it kept ſecret ſtill. God hath not been pleaſed fully to diſcover the methods of his working this wonderful effect. It may ſuffice, in this doctrine of grace, (as in thoſe of time, and place, and reſt, and motion in nature,) that we know enough for our preſent uſe, though we know not all; and that we are ſure of the thing it ſelf, though we cannot comprehend the manner of it.

It is more than barely credible, it is certain, that God, who can do all this, will at laſt do it, becauſe he has ſaid he will. He who, on earth cauſed the faces of Moſes and Stephen to ſhine, who tranſlated Elias, in the chariot of a bright and glorious cloud into the Heavens; has told us, in his Holy Word (which ſhall not paſs away, though this world ſhall) that, at the end of it, the righteous ſhall ſhine forth as the ſun, in the kingdom of their Father, Matt. xiii. 43.

That they who ſhall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the reſurrection from the dead, ſhall be equal with the Angels, Luke xx. 35, 36.

That if our earthly houſe of this tabernacle be diſſolved, we have a building of God [a Divine Frame], an houſe not made with hands, eternal in the Heavens, 2 Cor. v. 1.

That there is a natural and a ſpiritual body; and that, as we have born the image of the earth, we [Chriſtians] ſhall alſo bear the image of the Heavenly [Adam], 1 Cor. xv. 44—49.

All this is further confirmed to us by the œconomy of the Goſpel. That ſets forth Chriſt as the perſon, who, on earth, was transfigured in ſo admirable a manner, that his face did ſhine as the ſun, and his very raiment was white as the light, Matt. xvii. Mark ix. 2, 3. who bought both body and ſoul with an incorruptible price; who died and roſe again, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living, Luke ix. 29. who roſe as a publick perſon, as the Head of his Church, in order to the reſurrection of the members of it; who, riſing from the dead, became the firſt-fruits of them that ſlept; who, (both to accommodate himſelf to theſe regions, and to prove, beyond contradiction, that it was he himſelf and not a ſpectre; took again his body with fleſh, bones, and all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, (artic. 4.) and aſcended through the ſtarry Heavens into a region ſtill more pure, and had that body made celeſtial, Heb. iv. 14. and ſtill lives in that moſt Heavenly Form, and will come again and receive his true diſciples into that thrice happy Jeruſalem, where he now is, and will change their vile bodies, and faſhion them like to his own glorious body, Philip. iii. 21. not aboliſhing the ſubſtance of them, but exalting the meanneſs and earthlineſs of their preſent frame into celeſtial agility and luſtre.

And, indeed philoſophy (ſuch as is not vain, though much is, eſpecially when it refines upon Sacred Myſteries,) does plainly ſhew us, that a heavenly body is only fit for a heavenly region; that a pure body is not in its element, unleſs it lives and moves in pure æther. Upon which account, I ſuppoſe, Paul himſelf obſerves that fleſh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God above; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. It muſt be changed into a body that cannot corrupt or die, if it is to ſubſiſt moſt happily for ever in an Heavenly Place; and ſuch is the place prepared for the children of the reſurrection.

All this being conſidered, it becomes us not to be faithleſs, but believe that this mortal ſhall put on immortality. For it is full out as abſurd to refuſe to believe when there is a reaſon for our faith, as to believe, with a forward credulity, when there is none.

II. The conſequence of this belief is very comfortable; for great and many are the advantages derived to Chriſtians, by being clothed with a celeſtial body. The very nature of the thing ſpeaks aloud the benefit which will accrue to them by the renovation of this body. There is ſcarce a compariſon to be admitted betwixt this earthly body, and that which ſhall be at the aſcenſion of Chriſtians. They differ more than the leaſt and dimmeſt ſtar, and the brighteſt and greateſt luminary in the firmament of Heaven Of this Paul takes notice in the fortieth verſe of this chapter, and thoſe which follow it, ſaying, There are celeſtial bodies and bodies terreſtrial; but the glory of the celeſtial is one, and the glory of the terreſtrial is another. There is one glory of the ſun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the ſtars; for one ſtar differeth from another ſtar in glory So alſo is the reſurrection of the dead. It is ſown in corruption, it is raiſed in incorruption: It is ſown in diſhonour, it is raiſed in glory: It is ſown in weakneſs, it is raiſed in power. It is ſown a natural body, it is raiſed a ſpiritual body. Happy are the people who are in ſuch a caſe.

But, to deſcend to a more ſpecial conſideration of this matter: The happineſs derived from the change of a natural to a ſpiritual body, conſiſteth in a deliverance,

1. From the groſſneſs of the former, as it is a body of this fleſh and blood.

2dly, From the diſorderly motions of it, as it is a corruptible body.

3dly, From the periſhing nature, decay and fall of it, as it is both a corruptible and mortal body.

The firſt advantage which Chriſtians obtain by changing an earthly for an Heavenly Body, is deliverance from the groſſneſs of the former, as it is a body of this fleſh and blood. And this is a very valuable privilege, upon three accounts.

1ſt. Upon the account of natural eaſe.
2dly, Of Divine Contemplation.
3dly, Of piety and devotion.

1ſt. Chriſtians have a privilege, by being freed from the groſſneſs of this body, upon the account of eaſe which is ſo naturally deſired. For, as the book of Solomon ſpeaks agreeable to its title, the corruptible body preſſeth down the ſoul, Wiſd. ix. 15. And, in that load and heavineſs, there is little comfort. Seneca ſays, of the body, that it is the weight and pain of the mind, and a kind of bond round about its liberty. Our office for the burial of the dead, calls it the burthen of the fleſh. Paul alſo, makes this acknowledgment in 2 Cor. v. 4. we who are in this tabernacle do groan [groan earneſtly, ver. 2.] being burdened. By this great change that which was formerly, a heavy and uneaſy weight, becomes as wings and (as the antients ſpeak) a celeſtial chariot to the ſoul.

2dly, Another privilege enjoyed by Chriſtians upon deliverance from the groſſneſs of this body, is freedom from a mighty impediment of Divine Contemplation. The Scripture teacheth us, that this viſible world ſhall be renewed. The heavens and the earth which now are ſhall periſh; Hebr. i. 10, 11, 12. not in their being, but with reference to their preſent frame; which, as it is, is a glorious ſtructure; but he who made all things, can and will build it better. This earth, and theſe Heavens, ſhall be folded up as is a veſture, and be marvelouſly changed. Upon which, there ſhall be new Heavens, and a new earth.

That phraſe is in ſome places metaphorically uſed in ſetting forth a new and excellent ſtate of the Church. But, in Peter, 2 Pet. iii. 3--7--12, 13--6. it is to be literally underſtood of a new frame of nature, after the old (reſerved unto fire againſt the day of judgment) ſhall be by ſuch means, diſſolved, as the earth was once overflowed by water. But the change in Noah's time was from better to worſe, this will be from worſe to much better. Doubtleſs it will be a glorious world which God will raiſe out of the ruins of this. It is a world expected as a wonderful bleſſing from the promiſe of God; ver. 12, 13, 14.

Now in this world, the earthly tabernacle weigheth down the mind that muſeth upon many things; Wiſd. ix. 15. and it is from the groſſneſs of the organs of it that we think ſo little, and diſcern ſo little of the beauty of nature and Providence. And the more the eye is helped by art, the more it raiſeth admiration in him who conſiders the works of God. It letteth in a new world of creatures, and an infinite agreeable variety of motions, figures, and contextores, which we diſcern nothing of by our naked ſight. And in ſuch contemplation, there is more true and uſeful pleaſure, than in all the brutalities in which ſenſual men conſume their time, ſubſtance, and health; and waſte their conſcience too. Now, it will be neceſſary for the body to be cœleſtial, that it may be capable of conſidering thoſe extraordinary ſtamps and characters of the Divine Power and Wiſdom which will be found upon a cœleſtial and incorruptible world; the obſerving of which, will (I believe) be one of thoſe exerciſes in which the ſpirits of juſt men made perfect ſhall be moſt happily employed. For if theſe heavens declare the glory and handy-work of God, thoſe will much more do ſo; and a ſaint cannot be ſuch, if he delights not in that manifeſtation.

3dly, Another privilege ariſing from our deliverance from the groſſneſs of this body, is the removal of a great hindrance of piety and devotion. It cannot but be an extreme mortification to thoſe who would lift up their hearts to God, and have their converſation in heaven, to feel ſuch a preſſure and dulneſs upon their ſpirits as damps and deadens them in their holy admirations, praiſes and prayers. This eſpecially will be an extraordinary grief to them when they ſet themſelves with all their heart and ſoul and might, to anſwer, with the degrees of their devotion, the moſt ſolemn occaſions of publick worſhip; ſuch as thoſe of this day, on which all that is within us ſhould bleſs the Name of God, who hath begotten us again to a lively hope by the reſurrection of Jeſus from the dead. But when the body is not reſtive, and the ſpirits move as handmaids to the ſoul; then, even here on earth, it is raviſhed with religious joy.

The ſecond advantage which Chriſtians obtain, by changing an earthly for an heavenly body, is deliverance from the diſorderly motions to which this body is liable, as it is a corruptible body, whether the ſpring of them be within, or from without; and upon which account it may be called (as it is in the book of Wiſdom) a body that is ſubject unto ſin, Wiſd. i. 4. Here frequently ſickneſs and violent torture render life not worthy the name of life, and provoke the patients to think, ſometimes, that death moves very ſlowly towards them. Here, it many times happens, that one corrupt member muſt be cut off for the preſervation of the reſt; though with certain pain, and uncertain hope. In this body, the warmth which is ſubſervient to wit and elocution, carries frequently with it a mixture of extravagance and indiſcretion. How often does this corruptible frame bring ſuch decays upon the memory, that all things are almoſt forgotten, even injuries themſelves? tho' of this ſort of oblivion we have no reaſon to complain. What is more common than the raging and ſwelling of unruly paſſions and affections, which are troubleſome both to the perſon ſo highly moved, and to the world, to which he gives diſturbance? How often do unreaſonable appetites and inclinations become ſo impetuous, and war with ſuch force againſt the ſoul, in men who are not yet grown up into ſtrong habits of grace, that the good which they do, that they do? How often do fleſh and blood prejudice the underſtanding by enthuſiaſtick heat, which repreſents to it dreams and ſtrong deluſions and flaſhes of madneſs in the fancy, as immediate illuminations from God? How frequently does it form a cloud of melancholy in the imagination, and faſhion that cloud into all the ſhapes of terror and affrightment, in good, though ſcrupulous men? Upon this account they cry out, in their haſte, and in the anguiſh of their ſouls, Will the Lord caſt off for ever? and will he be favourable no more? Is his mercy clean gone for ever? Doth his promiſe fail for evermore? Hath God forgotten to be gracious? Hath he, in anger, ſhut up his tender mercies? Pſal. lxxvii. 7, 8, 9. Theſe, through the ſumes of the blood, rather than the guilt of the conſcience, are for a ſeaſon in this life, of all others the moſt miſerable; for ſuch a troubled ſpirit who can bear? Nevertheleſs, upon the whole, their condition is much ſafer and better than theirs who ſport with their misfortunes, and mock at their griefs, and at the ſame time wallow in ſin without any reflection upon either the criminalneſs or the peril of their own ſenſuality. For theſe latter, at the dreadful day, ſhall have their bodies made the moſt diſhonourable and unprofitable of all veſſels, whilſt thoſe of the former ſhall be changed into veſſels of the higheſt honour and the greateſt uſe, that human nature is capable of; and ſuch they ſhall remain for ever. And that is

The third ſort of advantage which thoſe who are Chriſt's will be happy in; that is to ſay, a freedom from the periſhing nature, decay, and fall of this body, as a corruptible mortal body; for this corruptible muſt put on incorruption, and this mortal muſt put on immortality. There are two things which all men naturally deſire; to know an end of their ſufferings, and to have no end of their happineſs. The way to the accompliſhment of theſe deſires is not ſhewn in the ſchools of Zeno or Plato. It is confeſſed, there was taught by them a celebrated but falſe doctrine of the reſtitution of the world. This they would have to be brought to paſs in the revolution of a certain period of time, in ſuch ſort, that all things ſhould come about again, and be as they had been before for a like quantity of duration; and ſo in viciſſitudes for ever: From whence it would follow, that this corruptible body, after it had put on incorruption for a ſeaſon, ſhould become corruptible again, and mortal again. But in the ſchool of Chriſt, we learn a propoſition which is moſt comfortable as well as moſt true; to wit, that after the reſurrection, aſcenſion, and glorious change of this body, all groſſneſs, all diſorderly motion, all pain and trouble ſhall ceaſe; but of the felicity of the Chriſtian man's ſoul dwelling in it, there ſhall be no end. The Apoſtle aſſures us, that death, their laſt enemy, ſhall, itſelf, be then deſtroy'd. For the Lord [Jeſus] ſhall deſcend from heaven with a ſhout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Chriſt ſhall riſe firſt; then thoſe which are alive and remain, ſhall be caught up in the clouds together with thoſe that have been raiſed, to meet the ſame Lord in the air, and ſo ſhall they be ever with the Lord; 1 Theſſ. iv. 16, 17.

The ſting of miſery is the continuance of it, and Hell is the more Hell for that. Continuance alſo is the Heaven of joy. It is made perfect by our poſſeſſing it, without any ſhadow of ſuſpicion of being ever bereaved of it. And thus it will be after the reſurrection of the juſt. Then ſhall be entirely fulfilled the words of the Prophet Hoſea, He will ranſom thee from the power of the grave: He will redeem thee from death. O death! he will be thy plague; O grave! he will be thy deſtruction; Hoſea xiii. 14. Then ſhall be made good thoſe words of Paul, Mortality ſhall be ſwallowed up of life; 2 Cor. v. 4. Or, as he expreſſeth it, in the words after this text,——When this corruptible ſhall have put on incorruption, and this mortal ſhall have put on immortality; then ſhall be brought to paſs the ſaying that is written, [written of old by the Prophet Iſaiah, xxv. 8] Death is ſwallowed up in victory. See the next note.

Theſe which I have recounted, are (you will ſay) very great advantages which a Chriſtian ſhall gain by changing this earthly for a heavenly body. But, it may be, you will add, Why cannot the ſoul be fully happy in itſelf without any body at all; and happier than in a body, though incorruptible and immortal?

To this, I think, it is proper to anſwer, That God who framed his creatures in divers orders, made man a creature conſiſting of ſoul and body; and that it belongs to his rank in the creation to have them at laſt united again: Alſo, That by the perfecteſt union of them, a creature of that order is, as ſuch, compleated both in his proper being, and in the happineſs of it. To this purpoſe are (as I conceive) the words of Paul. In this [tabernacle] we grow earneſtly, deſiring to be clothed upon with our houſe which is from Heaven. If ſo be that, being clothed, we ſhall not be found naked. For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burthened: Not that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be ſwallowed up of life; 2 Cor. ii. 3, 4. He would not be without a body at that day (for of that time he ſpeaks) but he is deſirous that a celeſtial form ſhould be put upon terreſtrial matter.

There is a queſtion leſs curious than that which has been put, but exceedingly more than uſeful; and it is this;

What ſhall we do that we may come at theſe ſeveral great advantages of living at laſt in an heavenly body?

This is a very proper conſideration for the exerciſe of our thoughts. For, in vain, do we philoſophize about a celeſtial Paradiſe, and a ſpiritual body, and an heavenly world, without knowing and uſing the means of being happy in them all.

Thoſe means are the conditions of the covenant of grace to which Chriſtians on their parts have ſolemnly conſented, and which, by the aſſiſtance of God's grace, they may and muſt perform, by their ſincere obedience to him. The way to have better bodies is to have more virtuous ſouls. God hath put us into this body, as into the habit of a pilgrim on earth, as probationers for a more excellent clothing. And, according to our patience, our ſelf-denial; our keeping the body in ſubjection to the mind; our governing the appetites and paſſions of it; ſo ſhall the reſurrection and aſcenſion of it be. Righteouſneſs (ſaith the Book of Wiſdom) is immortal; Wiſd. i. 15. and the giving heed to her laws is the aſſurance of incorruption; and incorruption maketh us near unto God; ch. vi. 18, 19. And he that will not awake to righteouſneſs ſhall not aſcend to a ſtate of incorruption. God will not receive ſuch a violater of his laws into his eſpecial preſence. He will not admit ſo brutal a creature into his kingdom, where there is nothing to gratify the inclination of fleſh and blood. Such a creature would ſtill be deſirous to eat and drink, and to enjoy the pleaſures of a corruptible body.

We riſe to glory as members of Chriſt, who, (ſaith the Apoſtle) died for all, that they which live ſhould not live to themſelves, but unto him who died for them, and roſe again, 2 Cor. v. 15. His true members we cannot call our ſelves with any propriety, if we fulfil not the holy vow we made to him when we were initiated into his Church, by renouncing and forſaking all the ſinful luſts of the fleſh. Paul hath told the world in expreſs terms, That he who ſoweth to the fleſh, ſhall of the fleſh reap corruption, Gal. vi. 8. (He ſhall die, after all the pampering of the body with Epicurean art, and, for that it may be, much the ſooner; he ſhall fat himſelf for ſlaughter) but he who ſoweth to the Spirit, (who feeds and cultivates the ſoul with wiſdom and holineſs) ſhall of the Spirit reap life everlaſting; the life of an immortal ſoul in an immortal body. Can it ever be imagined (or, if it be, is it any other than mere imagination, and a very falſe and groſs one too) that Chriſt ſhall raiſe the temple of this body to a celeſtial houſe, making that ſecond temple much more glorious than this firſt, after it has been wilfully profaned by man, and put to the vileſt uſes of inſobriety and luſt. Such ſenſualities render this body more earthly ſtill, and bury the ſoul in it, ſo far are they from promoting it to an heavenly eſtate.

The impenitent ſinner hopes againſt all grounds of hope, if he has expectation of ſeeing God face to face with eyes which have been full of adultery? And of praiſing God in Heaven with a tongue that has been ſet on fire from Hell, that has inſolently blaſphemed him on Earth, and bitterly reviled his ſervants, perhaps, becauſe they were his ſervants, or for reviling ſake. The like may be ſaid of every wickedneſs done by the ſoul in this earthly tabernacle. For we muſt all appear before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt, that every man may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or evil, 2 Cor. v. 10. And this is part of the confeſſion of our faith, ſet forth by Athanaſius, in theſe words: "At [Chriſt's] coming all men ſhall riſe again with their bodies, and give an account of their own works; and they that have done good, ſhall go into life everlaſting, and they that have done evil, into everlaſting fire. Wherefore, Seeing, that all theſe things ſhall be diſſolved, What manner of perſons ought we to be in all holy converſation and Godlineſs, looking for, and haſtning unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the Heavens being on fire, ſhall be diſſolved, and the elements ſhall melt with fervent heat? 2 Pet. iii. 11, 12, 13.

Nevertheleſs we, according to his promiſe, look for new Heavens, and a new Earth, wherein dwelleth righteouſneſs.

As ſure as Chriſt is riſen, theſe dry bones ſhall live, as well as thoſe did which the Prophet ſpake of in a political ſenſe, meaning by them the Houſe of Iſrael. See Ezek. xxxvi 3—11—14.

It ſhould, therefore, be the peculiar care of Chriſtians, not to put this vile body into far worſe condition, but to conſult the good of it; ſeeing the more heavenly its frame is made, the felicity of the ſoul in it will be the greater.

Men of light and deſultory humours affect alterations, without conſidering the events of them. Wiſe men chuſe them alſo, when they foreſee plainly they will turn to their exceeding benefit. And here they have a plain proſpect of a moſt conſiderable advantage, of changing corruption for incorruption, and mortality for immortality.

If any are extremely concerned at deformities of the body, as ſo many marks of ſhame, (though nothing, which is not of our own doing, can be a juſt reproach to us) why have they not the innocent ambition of deſiring a celeſtial body, which will be without wrinkle or blemiſh? And the way to procure ſo decent a body, is to rectify the diſtractions of our reaſon, and the monſtrous choice of our ungoverned wills; and to ſubdue all diſhonourable paſſions and vices; and to keep our ſelves unſpotted from the world. If divers are very covetous of life in this body, as burthenſome as it is, and wiſh their years were not ſo many as they are, and that they would ſtill be many more, even then when the wheel is almoſt broken at the ciſtern, and the blood can ſcarce creep on in its circle; Why are they averſe to Chriſtian piety, which will provide for them an immortal body? Why do not they ſeriouſly think upon the exhortation of the great Apoſtle, Awake thou that ſleepeſt, and riſe from the dead, and Chriſt ſhall give thee life, Eph. v. 14. And not ſay as the Epicures, mentioned in this chapter, at ver. 32. Let us eat and drink, for to morrow we die: But rather, let us be ſober and vigilant, that whenever we die the firſt death, we may overcome the ſecond. Seeing Chriſt is riſen, and we ſhall riſe and be changed by his power, let it not be murmured upon any difficulties about Chriſtian religion, Why ſtand we in jeopardy every hour? Why do we die daily? Why do we fight with beaſts, or men as ſavage as they? See ver. 30, 31, 32. Why do we not rather conſult the eaſe of fleſh and blood? But rather let us reſolve (as Paul in the concluſion of this diſcourſe exhorts) To be ſteafaſt, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, foraſmuch as we know that our labour ſhall not be in vain in the Lord, ver. 58. For this is the only way, to glorify him with our bodies, and with our ſouls, that he may glorify both. Then may we, upon good and comfortable grounds, join with the ſame Apoſtle in theſe words of ſpiritual triumph, as it follows in the context,

O death! Where is thy ſting? O grave! Where is thy victory? The ſting of death is ſin, and the ſtrength of ſin is the law. But thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, ver. 55, 56, 57.

Ver. 57. But thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.] Theſe words are the reſult of the Apoſtle's joyful pre-apprehending by the eye of faith, that victory which ſhall hereafter be compleated to believers over the laſt great enemy, ver. 54. For he ſaith, When this corruptible ſhall have put on incorruption, and this mortal ſhall have put on immortality, then ſhall be brought to paſs the ſaying that is written, Death is ſwallowed up in victory. Whereupon he ſubjoineth a confident challenge to death, or rather, he manfully defieth it, ver. 55. O death, where is thy ſting? O grave, where is thy victory? Which he further amplifieth, by repreſenting the length and ſtrength of death's weapons, ver. 56. The ſting of death is ſin, and the ſtrength of ſin is the law. And concludes with this ſong of triumph, in the words I have choſen to inſiſt upon; but thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Wherein we have this bleſſed Apoſtle expreſſing the courage, and yet the humility of a Chriſtian: His confidence through faith, and withal the lowly deference that he owns to Almighty God, through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Or, more particularly, we have the true Chriſtian's victory over death:

Firſt, Joyfully reported, to be a victory to us Chriſtians over death.

Secondly, Thankfully commemorated, thanks be to him that giveth us this victory.

Thirdly, The author of it acknowledged and magnified, thanks be to God.

Fourthly, The procuring or meritorious cauſe of this victory ſignified, through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

The firſt thing to be obſerved in this text is, the joyful report of this victory over death: And here note, this word victory, is a martial term, and intimateth;

Firſt, That death is an enemy. There may be an obliging victory in the friendly conteſts of lovers, who endeavour to outſtrip each other in offices of kindneſs and good-will. But this victory is of another nature; it is like the battle of the warrior, with confuſed noiſe, and garments rolled in blood, Iſa. ix. 5. It is the overcoming of a great and formidable enemy. Such is death; and that,

Firſt, To the natural concerns of man. To deſtroy either the ſoul or body of man, is a work beyond the reach of death, or any other, on this ſide that infinite power that made them both. But what death aims at, is the ſeparating of theſe old friends, and diſſolving the union that was ſo intimate between them.

And this is that which nature ſo induſtriouſly endeavoureth to maintain, that the diſſolution muſt be an act of great violence to it.

To maintain this union, nature is not only forward to gratify ſenſe, by eating and drinking what is pleaſant and delightful; but ſometimes content to affront and annoy it, by ſubmitting to ſevere abſtinences, laborious exerciſes, ungrateful and nauſeous doſes of phyſick. To maintain this, the moſt greedy mammoniſt will break off ſome pieces of his adored idol, employing his bags to compaſs this greateſt purchaſe of continued health. Yea, the induſtrious merchant will diſcharge his ſhip of the moſt promiſing return, to ſecure what he accounts the moſt precious thing aboard, and his life. To continue this union, how many are content to undergo the tediousneſs of a lingering diſtemper, and chuſe a dying life before death it ſelt? To maintain this, how many do meet force with force, and make their neighbours life a commutation for their own? Yea, for this end, how oft do men expoſe, and ſometimes yield to part with ſome of the leſs uſeful members of their own bodies, to ſecure, by compoſition, the health of the whole?

All which ſheweth, how earneſt deſires, and what diligent care nature hath inſpired us with, of maintaining this union of ſoul and body, and perpetuating it as far as may be: And conſequently, what an enemy death is, in attempting the diſſolution thereof.

Secondly, to a man in his moral concerns, death is an enemy. Even a criminal, while he can eſcape the arreſt of the law, thinks the beſt of his own condition; and a ſinner, while he can hold up his head in the land of the living, is apt to bleſs himſelf in his own ſanguine conceits, and to laugh at the doctrine of a judgment to come.

But to look what an enemy the malefactor eſteems him, that hales him before an earthly tribunal; or a debtor him that calls him to account for his ſcores; ſuch an enemy doth every man that knows himſelf to have offended, and hath not ſued out his pardon; every man that hath run in ſcore to God's juſtice, and hath not applied himſelf to that ſurety that ſo graciouſly offers to pay his debts, eſteems death, that comes to bring him before Almighty God, as a Righteous Judge, from whom he may expect a dreadful ſentence, and the great creditor, to whom he knows himſelf not reſponſible.

Secondly, this term victory, ſuppoſeth a conflict. Over a coward that dares not to fight, or a town that ſurrenders upon ſummons, we are not ordinarily ſaid to obtain a victory. This is properly the effect of ſtruggling and ſtriving for maſtery. And with this enemy, death, every man hath a great conflict. And that both

Firſt, At a diſtance, when it threatens us, and thus it begetteth fear; which is a paſſion that commonly makes impreſſion, eſpecially upon perſons of ſoft and tender natures, not inferior to thoſe that attend the approaches of evil. Eſpecially, O death, how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that lives peaceably in the enjoyment of his friends, to him that is quiet and proſperous in his buſineſs, and to him that hath an appetite, and can reliſh his meat? Eccluſ. xli. 1.

This is ſuch a conflict as diſquiets thoſe that are at eaſe in Sion, and diſturbs them that are ſettled npon their lees. To think, that this healthy body muſt e're long be diſtempered with diſeaſes; that thoſe pleaſures that have been the darlings of their ſouls, muſt everlaſtingly forſake them; that thoſe riches for which they have toiled and laboured, muſt take themſelves wings and for ever fly away; yea, that this ſtately and beautiful ſtructure of the body muſt yield to diſſolution, and (which is more dreadful than all the reſt) that when the duſt ſhall return to the earth, the ſpirit ſhall return to God that gave it, Eccl. xii. 2. to paſs an account of the things which it hath done in the body, and to receive a reward according to them, whether they be good or evil, 2 Cor. v. 10. This is that terror of the Lord, through which ſo many are all their life-time ſubject to bondage, Heb. ii. 16.

Secondly, and eſpecially, when death comes to conflict us hand to hand, when the battle is ſet in array, and pila minantia pilis. Can thy heart endure, or thy hands be ſtrong in the day when God thus dealeth with thee? Ezek. xxii. 14.

When death is repreſented in its moſt ordinary habit, this ghaſtly skeleton, armed with ſcythe and ſpade, beſet with the skulls and bones of dead men, as trophies of its multiplied conqueſts; how diſmally doth it look! how far from the aſpect of one that deſigns to court delicate ladies! yea, more like to a mormo deſigned to affright mankind.

But eſpecially when it clothes itſelf in an habit of extraordinary terror, when it appears in the ſcarlet cloak of a violent calenture, in the purple robes of a peſtilential fever; when it enamels its weapons with the ſtone, or ſtains them with the ſtrangury; or when it comes raging in a violent and maſterleſs phrenzy. In a word, when it endeavours to appear more formidable than it ſelf, who ever could pretend to ſuch ſtrength as ſhould not grow feeble, or to ſuch hardineſs as ſhould not be diſmayed before it?

Its firſt encounter baffles the appetite, and cauſeth it to languiſh, it diſturbeth and interrupteth the ſleep, weakens the joints, commands a ceſſation of the uſual exerciſes, ſpreads paleneſs and wanneſs upon the skin.

Its next proceedings ſubject a ſtaff for the neceſſary ſupport of the enfeebled ſtructure; call in the druggiſt to ſupply the place of the cook and confectioner; caſt a man upon his bed as the retirement of his wearied and fainting limbs; and by degrees invade the ſeats of the vital and animal ſpirits; afflict the heart with faintings, the head with pains; obſtruct the veſſels ſerving for the paſſage of the blood and ſpirits, cauſe the keepers of the houſe to tremble, the ſtrong men to bow themſelves, and thoſe that look out of the windows to grow dim for want of the uſual ſupply of animal ſpirits. Till at the laſt cold ſweat takes poſſeſſion of the hypocritical face; the diſturbed ſoul ſits upon the trembling lip, threatning to take its leave of that body, where the enfeebled ſpirits will not prevail to fetch up that phlegm that lies ratling and betokening ſuffocation: And then is the duſt prepared to return to the duſt, whence it was taken. Eccl. xii. 7. Then doth man ſet forward in his journey toward his long home, and the mourners go about the ſtreets. Then comes a ſhrowd to be the modiſh apparel, and a ſepulchre the bed for repoſe; then begins this proud, aſpiring Nimrod to know himſelf, and to own his original, ſaying to corruption, thou art my father, and to the worms, ye are my brethren and ſiſters, Job xvii. 14. Then he that ſo buſtled above ground, as to think the world too ſtrait for him, is content tent with ſix foot of earth for his patrimony. A rare conqueſt, the fruit of a ſignal conflict!

Thirdly, victory, as it is here applied, ſuppoſeth death accuſtomed to conquer. That challenge, or triumphant inſultation, ver. 55. O death, where is thy victory? ſeems to ſuppoſe death a tried champion, fleſhed in conqueſt. And if

Firſt, we look to its power over man's body, we muſt confeſs it an irreſiſtible enemy, and a conſtant victor,

Pallido mors æquo, &c.

It is not the robes and palaces of kings, any more than the rags and cottages of beggars, that exempt them from the arreſt of this ſergeant; neither are thoſe ſo high as to affrigh deatht from attempting them, nor theſe ſo low that it ſhould ſcorn to meddle with them. It is not the long delay and forbearance of death in demanding its due, that can make it forget the debt that is owing by the aged. The ſhort hiſtories of the ſtrangely long lives of thoſe antedeluvians, that ſurvived the elapſing of ſeveral hundred years, are every where cloſed up with, and he died, Gen. 5. Nor is it the pitiful cryings and pulings of the infant in ſwadling clothes (that is loth to be ſnatched away from its beloved breaſt, and ſeems to plead that it hath taſted nothing of the pleaſures, nor underſtood the deſign of its being ſet a-ſhore upon the earth) that can move this ſkeleton, void of bowels, to hold its hand, and to draw back its envenomed darts: But theſe things are done in the green tree, yea, in the tender plant, as well as in the dry, Luke xxiii. 31.

The wiſdom of Solomon, or of the ſeven ſages of Greece, would in vain have attempted to out-wit death. The ſtrength of Samſon, or of David's worthies, (whoſe countenances were like the countenances of lions, 2 Sam. xvii. 10.) could not daunt this meſſenger of God's Juſtice, or prevail in the laſt conflict with it; but theſe alſo yielded to be led in triumph by death. In Golgotha are ſkuls of all ſorts and ſizes, as tokens of the impartial conqueſt that death is making. There lies Abſalom ſo perfect in beauty, as well as Mephiboſheth a deformed cripple. There lies the wanton and amorous youngſter, as well as the old man that doted and leaned on his ſtaff. There lies Goliah a man of overgrown nature, as well as David a ruddy youth. There lies Hector and Achilles ſo famous for manly valour, as well as Theſites a cowardly and ſeditious brawler. We may ſee there, that wiſe men die, as well as the fooliſh and brutiſh perſons, Pſal. xlix. 10. There have Xerxes and all his vaſt army, that threatned to level the mountains, and to drink the oceans dry, laid down their ſkuls, and owned death's ſovereignty. Nor could thoſe many million of millions, that like piles of graſs have ſtood before death, yet blunt the edge of its ſcythe, but hitherto it goes on conquering and to conquer.

Secondly, if we take the meaſure of its ſtrength in arreſting the ſoul of man, we muſt needs own it as an abſolute victor. It hath a ſting put into it by ſin, which makes it aſſault the ſinner with deadly ſtrength and violence. Man by his wilful and diſingenuous tranſgreſſion incurred the ſentence of the law, which was death in the comprehenſive notion of it. To bring men to that which the Scripture calls the ſecond death, Rev. xx. 6. the former death hath commiſſion. And who is able to withſtand a meſſenger of the Almighty, or refuſe appearance, when he ſummons us to that tribunal?

It is not mens hiding their ſins like Adam, nor covering them with fig-leaves of trifling excuſes; it is not gilding over the potſherd of abomination with the ſilver droſs of phariſaical pretences, or outſide holineſs: It is no palliating colours, no cunning conveyances, no ſubtle evaſions, no critical ſubterfuges, can deliver a man in that laſt encounter, or ſtand him in ſtead when death ſummons him to appear before the judgment ſeat of Chriſt, 2 Cor. v. 10. So that in every reſpect death pleads cuſtom for the victory it demands over mankind.

But yet fourthly, the term here uſed and applied to a Chriſtian, doth ſignify, that a good man may obtain a victory over this mortal enemy, in the great conflict, though ſo accuſtomed to conquer, and ſo proud with ſucceſs. And the joining of the ſubject we with the adjunct victoriouſneſs, ſhews, that it is the peculiar privilege of true Chriſtians, ſo that ſtrangers do not intermeddle with this joy, Prov. xiv. 10.

Not that a good man can expect to be exempt from the ſtroke of death, nor be ſecure as to any particular time or ſeaſon of his life, nor plead exemption from any ſort of diſeaſe, or circumſtance of death; for what man is he that liveth and ſhall not ſee death? ſhall he deliver his ſoul from the power of the grave? Pſal. lxxxix. 48. And it is appointed for men (indefinitely, and without diſtinction) once to dye, Heb. ix. 27. This being the paſſage through which we are to enter into another world. But yet (tho' it may ſeem a wonder) even when good men are killed all the day long, they are not only victors, but more than conquerors, Rom. viii. 36, 37. And even in dying they are troubled but not diſtreſſed; they are perplexed, but not in deſpair; perſecuted, but not forſaken; caſt down, but not deſtroyed, 2 Cor. iv. 9. More particularly,

Firſt, they are victors over the fear of death. That fear ariſeth from an apprehenſion of turning their backs upon the fruit of their labours, they overcome by conſidering, that in heaven they have a better and more enduring ſubſtance, Heb. x. 34. Even an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reſerved in heaven for them, 1 Pet. i. 4.

That which ſprings from the thoughts of the diſſolution of this beautiful and majeſtick piece of God's workmanſhip, which hath been ſo much adored and deified, Phil. iii. 19. is overcome by conſidering, that if their earthly houſe of this tabernacle were diſſolved, they have a building of God, an houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, 2 Cor. v. 1.

That which ariſeth from the pre-apprehenſion of the pains of death, in the violent ejecting of this old inhabitant the ſoul, from its beloved manſion of the body, is overcome by conſidering, both the neceſſity of this violence, and our being but once moleſted with it, (which are thoughts that offer themſelves to all mens conſideration) and withal, that death is a paſſage, though a ſtrait one, unto life; a porter, though a rugged and ſurly one, that lets us into the palace of the great King.

And who will dread that which delivers him from ſo much ſin and miſery, and puts him into poſſeſſion of ſo great good in another place; though like the Angels to Lot, it uſe ſome friendly violence in haling him hence? Gen. xix. 16.

This makes a good man not only to ſubmit to death, and ſay, the will of the Lord be done, Acts xxi. 14. and, it is the Lord, let him do what ſeemeth good in his ſight, 1 Sam. iii. 18. but further, to be deſirous to depart, and to be with Chriſt, as eſteeming that to be far better, Phil. i. 23. yea, to groan, being burdened, deſiring to be clothed upon with their houſe which is from Heaven, 2 Cor. v. 2. and to account death as great gain, Phil. i. 21.

Secondly, they are conquerors over the pains of death, which are a great evil, and ſorely preſſing to human nature. Theſe a good man overcomes, not ſo as to be exempt from the ſame exquiſite ſenſe of pain, which other perſons feel; yea, God is oft-times pleaſed, for moſt wiſe and gracious ends, to exerciſe the beſt of men, under moſt tedious and exquiſite pains: But yet they are conqueror in the conflict, though the encounter be ſharp.

Partly, through that great meaſure of patience which God gives them under his hand, which then hath the beſt opportunity for ſhewing its perfect work, Jam. i. 3. And it is a glorious victory, when patience holds out to the end, and this ſtrong man cannot be brought to bow under the greateſt burden of extremity that can be laid upon it; witneſs the caſe of Job, whoſe invincible patience under the greateſt ſufferings, was to the glory of God, and to his own comfort and eaſe at preſent, and future honour.

Partly, through the ſtrength of that other grace of faith, whereby they look unto that fatherly hand that lays theſe things upon them, and thereby are not only drawn to a filial ſubmiſſion, (which gives eaſe to the mind under ſufferings) but alſo take the advantage of deriving comfort from him that ſmites, and will alſo heal them. So that when the outward man decayeth, the inward is renewed day by day, 2 Cor. iv. 16. And withal, this grace enables a good man to look up into Heaven in the midſt of the pains of death, as Stephen did, Acts vii. 55. and to ſee his Saviour there ſtanding ready to receive him to himſelf in glory. And this makes him, though not to hate which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Wherein we have this bleſſed Apoſtle expreſſing the courage, and yet the humility of a Chriſtian: His confidence through faith, and withal the lowly deference that he owns to Almighty God, through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Or, more particularly, we have the true Chriſtian's victory over death:

Firſt, Joyfully reported, to be a victory to us Chriſtians over death.

Secondly, Thankfully commemorated, thanks be to him that giveth us this victory.

Thirdly, The author of it acknowledged and magnified, thanks be to God.

Fourthly, The procuring or meritorious cauſe of this victory ſignified, through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

The firſt thing to be obſerved in this text is, the joyful report of this victory over death: And here note, this word victory, is a martial term, and intimateth;

Firſt, That death is an enemy. There may be an obliging victory in the friendly conteſts of lovers, who endeavour to outſtrip each other in offices of kindneſs and good-will. But this victory is of another nature; it is like the battle of the warrior, with confuſed noiſe, and garments rolled in blood, Iſa. ix. 5. It is the overcoming of a great and formidable enemy. Such is death; and that,

Firſt, To the natural concerns of man. To deſtroy either the ſoul or body of man, is a work beyond the reach of death, or any other, on this ſide that infinite power that made them both. But what death aims at, is the ſeparating of theſe old friends, and diſſolving the union that was ſo intimate between them.

And this is that which nature ſo induſtriouſly endeavoureth to maintain, that the diſſolution muſt be an act of great violence to it.

To maintain this union, nature is not only forward to gratify ſenſe, by eating and drinking what is pleaſant and delightful; but ſometimes content to affront and annoy it, by ſubmitting to ſevere abſtinences, laborious exerciſes, ungrateful and nauſeous doſes of phyſick. To maintain this, the moſt greedy mammoniſt will break off ſome pieces of his adored idol, employing his bags to compaſs this greateſt purchaſe of continued health. Yea, the induſtrious merchant will diſcharge his ſhip of the moſt promiſing return, to ſecure what he accounts the moſt precious thing aboard, and his life. To continue this union, how many are content to undergo the tedIouſneſs of a lingering diſtemper, and chuſe a dying life before death it ſelf? To maintain this, how many do meet force with force, and make their neighbours life a commutation for their own? Yea, for this end, how oft do men expoſe, and ſometimes yield to part with ſome of the leſs uſeful members of their own bodies, to ſecure, by compoſition, the health of the whole?

All which ſheweth, how earneſt deſires, and what diligent care nature hath inſpired us with, of maintaining this union of ſoul and body, and perpetuating it as far as may be: And conſequently, what an enemy death is, in attempting the diſſolution thereof.

Secondly, to a man in his moral concerns, death is an enemy. Even a criminal, while he can eſcape the arreſt of the law, thinks the beſt of his own condition; and a ſinner, while he can hold up his head in the land of the living, is apt to bleſs himſelf in his own ſanguine conceits, and to laugh at the doctrine of a judgment to come.

But to look what an enemy the malefactor eſteems him, that hales him before an earthly tribunal; or a debtor him that calls him to account for his ſcores; ſuch an enemy doth every man that knows himſelf to have offended, and hath not ſued out his pardon; every man that hath run in ſcore to God's juſtice, and hath not applied himſelf to that ſurety that ſo graciouſly offers to pay his debts, eſteems death, that comes to bring him before Almighty God, as a Righteous Judge, from whom he may expect a dreadful ſentence, and the great creditor, to whom he knows himſelf not reſponſible.

Secondly, this term victory, ſuppoſeth a conflict. Over a coward that dares not to fight, or a town that ſurrenders upon ſummons, we are not ordinarily ſaid to obtain a victory. This is properly the effect of ſtruggling and ſtriving for maſtery. And with this enemy, death, every man hath a great conflict. And that both

Firſt, At a diſtance, when it threatens us, and thus it begetteth fear; which is a paſſion that commonly makes impreſſion, eſpecially upon perſons of ſoft and tender natures, not inferior to thoſe that attend the approaches of evil. Eſpecially, O death, how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that lives peaceably in the enjoyment of his friends, to him that is quiet and proſperous in his buſineſs, and to him that hath an appetite, and can reliſh his meat? Eccluſ. xli. 1.

This is ſuch a conflict as diſquiets thoſe that are at eaſe in Sion, and diſturbs them that are ſettled upon their lees. To think, that this healthy body muſt e're long be diſtempered with diſeaſes; that thoſe pleaſures that have been the darlings of their ſouls, muſt everlaſtingly forſake them; that thoſe riches for which they have toiled and laboured, muſt take themſelves wings and for ever fly away; yea, that this ſtately and beautiful ſtructure of the body muſt yield to diſſolution, and (which is more dreadful than all the reſt) that when the duſt ſhall return to the earth, the ſpirit ſhall return to God that gave it, Eccl. xii. 2. to paſs an account of the things which it hath done in the body, and to receive a reward according to them, whether they be good or evil, 2 Cor. v. 10. This is that terror of the Lord, through which ſo many are all their life-time ſubject to bondage, Heb. ii. 16.

Secondly, and eſpecially, when death comes to conflict us hand to hand, when the battle is ſet in array, and pila minantia pilis. Can thy heart endure, or thy hands be ſtrong in the day when God thus dealeth with thee? Ezek. xxii. 14.

When death is repreſented in its moſt ordinary habit, this ghaſtly ſkeleton, armed with ſcythe and ſpade, beſet with the ſkulls and bones of dead men, as trophies of its multiplied conqueſts; how diſmally doth it look! how far from the aſpect of one that deſigns to court delicate ladies! yea, more like to a mormo deſigned to affright mankind.

But eſpecially when it clothes itſelf in an habit of extraordinary terror, when it appears in the ſcarlet cloak of a violent calenture, in the purple robes of a peſtilential fever; when it enamels its weapons with the ſtone, or ſtains them with the ſtrangury; or when it comes raging in a violent and maſterleſs phrenzy. In a word, when it endeavours to appear more formidable than it ſelf, who ever could pretend to ſuch ſtrength as ſhould not grow feeble, or to ſuch hardineſs as ſhould not be diſmayed before it?

Its firſt encounter baffles the appetite, and cauſeth it to languiſh, it diſturbeth and interrupteth the ſleep, weakens the joints, commands a ceſſation of the uſual exerciſes, ſpreads paleneſs and wanneſs upon the ſkin.

Its next proceedings ſubject a ſtaff for the neceſſary ſupport of the enfeebled ſtructure; call in the druggiſt to ſupply the place of the cook and confectioner; caſt a man upon his bed as the retirement of his wearied and fainting limbs; and by degrees invade the ſeats of the vital and animal ſpirits; afflict the heart with faintings, the head with pains; obſtruct the veſſels ſerving for the paſſage of the blood and ſpirits, cauſe the keepers of the houſe to tremble, the ſtrong men to bow themſelves, and thoſe that look out of the windows to grow dim for want of the uſual ſupply of animal ſpirits. Till at the laſt cold ſweat takes poſſeſſion of the hypocritical face; the diſturbed ſoul ſits upon the trembling lip, threatning to take its leave of that body, where the enfeebled ſpirits will not prevail to fetch up that phlegm that lies ratling and betokening ſuffocation: And then is the duſt prepared to return to the duſt, whence it was taken. Eccl. xii. 7. Then doth man ſet forward in his journey toward his long home, and the mourners go about the ſtreets. Then comes a ſhrowd to be the modiſh apparel, and a ſepulchre the bed for repoſe; then begins this proud, aſpiring Nimrod to know himſelf, and to own his original, ſaying to corruption, thou art my father, and to the worms, ye are my brethren and ſiſters, Job xvii. 14. Then he that ſo buſtled above ground, as to think the world too ſtrait for him, is content with ſix foot of earth for his patrimony. A rare conqueſt, the fruit of a ſignal conflict!

tent

Thirdly, victory, as it is here applied, ſuppoſeth death accuſtomed to conquer. That challenge, or triumphant inſultation, ver. 55. O death, where is thy victory? ſeems to ſuppoſe death a tried champion, fleſhed in conqueſt. And if

Firſt, we look to its power over man's body, we muſt confeſs it an irreſiſtible enemy, and a conſtant victor,

Pallido mors æquo, &c.

It is not the robes and palaces of kings, any more than the rags and cottages of beggars, that exempt them from the arreſt of this ſergeant; neither are thoſe ſo high as to affrigh deatht from attempting them, nor theſe ſo low that it ſhould ſcorn to meddle with them. It is not the long delay and forbearance of death in demanding its due, that can make it forget the debt that is owing by the aged. The ſhort hiſtories of the ſtrangely long lives of thoſe antedeluvians, that ſurvived the elapſing of ſeveral hundred years, are every where cloſed up with, and he died, Gen. 5. Nor is it the pitiful cryings and pulings of the infant in ſwadling clothes (that is loth to be ſnatched away from its beloved breaſt, and ſeems to plead that it hath taſted nothing of the pleaſures, nor underſtood the deſign of its being ſet a-ſhore upon the earth) that can move this skeleton, void of bowels, to hold its hand, and to draw back its envenomed darts: But theſe things are done in the green tree, yea, in the tender plant, as well as in the dry, Luke xxiii. 31.

The wiſdom of Solomon, or of the ſeven ſages of Greece, would in vain have attempted to out-wit death. The ſtrength of Samſon, or of David's worthies, (whoſe countenances were like the countenances of lions, 2 Sam. xvii. 10.) could not daunt this meſſenger of God's Juſtice, or prevail in the laſt conflict with it; but theſe alſo yielded to be led in triumph by death. In Golgotha are skuls of all ſorts and ſizes, as tokens of the impartial conqueſt that death is making. There lies Abſalom ſo perfect in beauty, as well as Mephiboſheth a deformed cripple. There lies the wanton and amorous youngſter, as well as the old man that doted and leaned on his ſtaff. There lies Goliah a man of overgrown nature, as well as David a ruddy youth. There lies Hector and Achilles ſo famous for manly valour, as well as Theſites a cowardly and ſeditious brawler. We may ſee there, that wiſe men die, as well as the fooliſh and brutiſh perſons, Pſal. xlix. 10. There have Xerxes and all his vaſt army, that threatned to level the mountains, and to drink the oceans dry, laid down their skuls, and owned death's ſovereignty. Nor could thoſe many million of millions, that like piles of graſs have ſtood before death, yet blunt the edge of its ſcythe, but hitherto it goes on conquering and to conquer.

Secondly, if we take the meaſure of its ſtrength in arreſting the ſoul of man, we muſt needs own it as an abſolute victor. It hath a ſting put into it by ſin, which makes it aſſault the ſinner with deadly ſtrength and violence. Man by his wilful and diſingenuous tranſgreſſion incurred the ſentence of the law, which was death in the comprehenſive notion of it. To bring men to that which the Scripture calls the ſecond death, Rev. xx. 6. the former death hath commiſſion. And who is able to withſtand a meſſenger of the Almighty, or refuſe appearance, when he ſummons us to that tribunal?

It is not mens hiding their ſins like Adam, nor covering them with fig-leaves of trifling excuſes; it is not gilding over the potſherd of abomination with the ſilver droſs of phariſaical pretences, or outſide holineſs: It is no palliating colours, no cunning conveyances, no ſubtle evaſions, no critical ſubterfuges, can deliver a man in that laſt encounter, or ſtand him in ſtead when death ſummons him to appear before the judgment ſeat of Chriſt, 2 Cor. v. 10. So that in every reſpect death pleads cuſtom for the victory it demands over mankind.

But yet fourthly, the term here uſed and applied to a Chriſtian, doth ſignify, that a good man may obtain a victory over this mortal enemy, in the great conflict, though ſo accuſtomed to conquer, and ſo proud with ſucceſs. And the joining of the ſubject we with the adjunct victoriouſneſs, ſhews, that it is the peculiar privilege of true Chriſtians, ſo that ſtrangers do not intermeddle with this joy, Prov. xiv. 10.

Not that a good man can expect to be exempt from the ſtroke of death, nor be ſecure as to any particular time or ſeaſon of his life, nor plead exemption from any ſort of diſeaſe, or circumſtance of death; for what man is he that liveth and ſhall not ſee death? ſhall he deliver his ſoul from the power of the grave? Pſal. lxxxix. 48. And it is appointed for men (indefinitely, and without diſtinction) once to dye, Heb. ix. 27. This being the paſſage through which we are to enter into another world. But yet (tho' it may ſeem a wonder) even when good men are killed all the day long, they are not only victors, but more than conquerors, Rom. viii. 36, 37. And even in dying they are troubled but not diſtreſſed; they are perplexed, but not in deſpair; perſecuted, but not forſaken; caſt down, but not deſtroyed, 2 Cor. iv. 9. More particularly,

Firſt, they are victors over the fear of death. That fear ariſeth from an apprehenſion of turning their backs upon the fruit of their labours, they overcome by conſidering, that in heaven they have a better and more enduring ſubſtance, Heb. x. 34. Even an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reſerved in heaven for them, 1 Pet. i. 4.

That which ſprings from the thoughts of the diſſolution of this beautiful and majeſtick piece of God's workmanſhip, which hath been ſo much adored and deified, Phil. iii. 19. is overcome by conſidering, that if their earthly houſe of this tabernacle were diſſolved, they have a building of God, an houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, 2 Cor. v. 1.

That which ariſeth from the pre-apprehenſion of the pains of death, in the violent ejecting of this old inhabitant the ſoul, from its beloved manſion of the body, is overcome by conſidering, both the neceſſity of this violence, and our being but once moleſted with it, (which are thoughts that offer themſelves to all mens conſideration) and withal, that death is a paſſage, though a ſtrait one, unto life; a porter, though a rugged and ſurly one, that lets us into the palace of the great King.

And who will dread that which delivers him from ſo much ſin and miſery, and puts him into poſſeſſion of ſo great good in another place; though like the Angels to Lot, it uſe ſome friendly violence in haling him hence? Gen. xix. 16.

This makes a good man not only to ſubmit to death, and ſay, the will of the Lord be done, Acts xxi. 14. and, it is the Lord, let him do what ſeemeth good in his ſight, 1 Sam. iii. 18. but further, to be deſirous to depart, and to be with Chriſt, as eſteeming that to be far better, Phil. i. 23. yea, to groan, being burdened, deſiring to be clothed upon with their houſe which is from Heaven, 2 Cor. v. 2. and to account death as great gain, Phil. i. 21.

Secondly, they are conquerors over the pains of death, which are a great evil, and ſorely preſſing to human nature. Theſe a good man overcomes, not ſo as to be exempt from the ſame exquiſite ſenſe of pain, which other perſons feel; yea, God is oft-times pleaſed, for moſt wiſe and gracious ends, to exerciſe the beſt of men, under moſt tedious and exquiſite pains: But yet they are conqueror in the conflict, though the encounter be ſharp.

Partly, through that great meaſure of patience which God gives them under his hand, which then hath the beſt opportunity for ſhewing its perfect work, Jam. i. 3. And it is a glorious victory, when patience holds out to the end, and this ſtrong man cannot be brought to bow under the greateſt burden of extremity that can be laid upon it; witneſs the caſe of Job, whoſe invincible patience under the greateſt ſufferings, was to the glory of God, and to his own comfort and eaſe at preſent, and future honour.

Partly, through the ſtrength of that other grace of faith, whereby they look unto that fatherly hand that lays theſe things upon them, and thereby are not only drawn to a filial ſubmiſſion, (which gives eaſe to the mind under ſufferings) but alſo take the advantage of deriving comfort from him that ſmites, and will alſo heal them. So that when the outward man decayeth, the inward is renewed day by day, 2 Cor. iv. 16. And withal, this grace enables a good man to look up into Heaven in the midſt of the pains of death, as Stephen did, Acts. vii. 55. and to ſee his Saviour there ſtanding ready to receive him to himſelf in glory. And this makes him, though not to hate his own body, nor ſimply to deſire to be unclothed, yet willing and deſirous to be clothed upon, that mortality might be ſwallowed up of life, 2 Cor. v. 4. and comfortably to bear thoſe difficult methods, whereby the Divine Wiſdom thinks fit to bring this to paſs.

Thirdly, over the ſting of death. There is a ſharp and poiſonous thing put into the tail of this ſerpent, through our tranſgreſſing the law of God; and this is that which is moſt dreadful in death, to a conſidering perſon, and that which even a Roman courage could not prevail to maſter. But a Chriſtian finds that in the word of God that fortifies him againſt this alſo.

Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that juſtifieth, who is he that condemneth? It is Chriſt that died, yea, rather that is riſen again, who is even at the right hand of God, and maketh interceſſion for us: Who ſhall ſeparate us from the love of Chriſt? I am perſuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor any other creature, ſhall be able to ſeparate us from the love of God which is in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord, Rom. viii. 33, 34, 35—38, 39. Here then is the ſtrong man diſarmed, the lions mouth ſhut, the ſerpents ſting taken from him.

Fourthly, Over the power of death. To reaſon not improved by the ſupplemental light of Divine Revelation it ſeemed incredible, that God ſhould raiſe the dead, Acts xxvi. 8. And to him that conſiders the ſeverity of God's juſtice, it might ſeem that when "the judge ſhould have delivered us to the officer, and he caſt us into priſon; we muſt by no means come out thence, till we ſhould have paid the utmoſt farthing," Matt. v. 25, 26. That is never at all. But when we conſider, that as Chriſt was delivered for our offences, ſo he roſe again for our juſtification, Rom. iv. 25. we may thence very reaſonably conclude, that he that raiſed up the Lord Jeſus from the dead, will alſo quicken our mortal bodies, Rom. viii. 11. And upon this account a good man hath confident hopes of victory over the power of death, and can ſay, I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he ſhall ſtand at the latter day upon the earth: And though after my ſkin worms deſtroy this fleſh, yet with mine eyes ſhall I ſee God, Job xix. 26.

Such reflections as theſe which flow from the text may be uſeful;

Firſt, to ſhew us the excellency of the Chriſtian Faith above all other notions of a deity, that have been entertained in the world, in that it enables us for the great conflict, and gives us victory over the worſt of our enemies. Indeed the ancient Romans have ſhewed themſelves ſufficiently audacious in looking death in the face; but their confidence was ſupported by ſlender props, a deſire to advance and enlarge the city whereof they were freemen, and to erect a monument of their own praiſe to poſterity; this made them prodigal of their lives, and fearleſs of death. But a Chriſtian hath a deſire to depart hence, that he may be near unto Chriſt, and upon a full and mature conſideration, finds this to be beſt for him, Phil. i. 23.

Amor patriæ, laudumque immenſa cupido.

An Heathen may take ſome ſatisfaction in reflecting upon his life paſt, with Vixi, & quem dederat curſum natura peregi.

I have lived, and filled up the ſtation wherein nature hath placed me. But this comes ſhort of the ſtable confidence of the Apoſtles, when in leaving the world he could ſay, I have fought a good fight, I have finiſhed my courſe, I have kept the faith: Henceforth, there is laid up for me a crown of righteouſneſs, which the Lord the righteous Judge ſhall give me in that day, 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8.

A Socrates from principles of philoſophy might conclude the immortality of the ſoul, and conſider his wages in ſome ſort. An opera noſtra ſit probaturus Deus neſcio: Certe ſedulo conati ſumus ut ei placerent: Eſt mihi tamen certa ſpes conatus noſtros eum fore accepturum.

But by what means imperfect good works could obtain acceptation with the ſtrict juſtice of God, and how ſin could obtain pardon with him, this philoſophy could not teach them. But the Scripture tell us, that God will own his people in the day when he maketh up his jewels, and will ſpare them as a man ſpareth his own ſon that ſerveth him, Mal. iii. 17. That with the Lord there is mercy, and with him there is plenteous redemption; and that he ſhall deliver Iſrael from all their ſins, Pſal. cxxx. 18. So that we may ſay, Bleſſed be the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who of his abundant mercy hath begotten us again to a lively hope, by the reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt, from the dead, 1 Pet. i. 3. and hath hereby given us comfort through faith, in our conflict with this laſt and mortal enemy.

Secondly, If a true Chriſtian is conqueror over death, why then ſhould he fear it? The ſpirit of a man will help him to ſuſtain his infirmities, or bodily pains, Prov. xviii. 14. Manly courage ſhould help to bear us up under outward trials. And the Spirit of God, bearing witneſs with our ſpirits that we are the children of God, Rom. viii. 16. will help us to maſter the fear of death, as an enemy to the ſoul.

Why then ſhould we fear that ſerpent that is diſarmed of his ſting? That lion whoſe mouth is ſhut, and his jaw-teeth pulled out? That adverſary whoſe weapons are taken from him? It is enough for them that know no better place to go unto, to be afraid and unwilling to leave the world; enough for them that have not a God to ſupport them, to ſink under pains and ſickneſs; enough for them that do not believe themſelves to have an advocate with the Father, Jeſus Chriſt the righteous, who is a propitiation for their ſins, 1 Joh. ii. 1. to be afraid to appear before God's tribunal. Chriſtian Religion hath taught better things to all that duly embrace it. And therefore, let us comfort ourſelves therewith, and with joy draw water out of theſe wells of ſalvation, Iſa. xii. 3.

Thirdly, If we have overcome death, why ſhould we ſink under the fear of any other troubles? Death is called the king of terrors, Job xviii. 14. in the ſame ſenſe as the lion is called king among the beaſts, and the eagle among birds, becauſe it is the chief of all the reſt. And if the leader of terrors be overcome, why ſhould we fear thoſe that follow, and are leſs formidable! The uttermoſt that can be threatned by any worldly miſery, is to bring us to death, under diſadvantageous and dreadful circumſtances. And if this be conquered, what need we fear that which can but threaten to bring us thither? Therefore let us not fear theſe fears, nor be afraid; but ſanctify the Lord of hoſts himſelf, and let him be our fear and our dread, Iſa. viii. 12, 13. Let us with chearfulneſs expect, and with patience endure all the troubles of this life, becauſe we have victory over the laſt enemy, death. Therefore,

Secondly, Let us always rejoice, and in the midſt of a terrible death ſay, thanks be to him that giveth us the victory.

How thankfully every good man ſhould, and doth reſent the victory vouchſafed unto him over death, will appear by conſidering how great a privilege this is. And that will be evident to him that conſiders on the one hand the miſerable eſtate of him that lies under the dominion of death, and at its mercy; and on the other, the happy eſtate of him that through God's mercy hath obtained this victory.

Firſt, For the miſery of thoſe that are in ſubjection to death, whoſe tender mercies are cruelty; this will appear, if we take notice of their eſtate, either when death is apprehended at a diſtance, and under a remote proſpect; or when it is at hand, and comes to do execution upon them.

Firſt, Let us take notice of them when death is apprehended at a diſtance, and under a remote proſpect; and ſo the thoughts of death as victorious over them, do

Firſt, Allay the generoſity, and abate the ſweetneſs of all worldly comforts. He that duly conſiders, that his time is in God's hands, Pſal. xxxi. 15. and that himſelf is not maſter of the next moment that is to paſs by; that man goeth down to his grave, and returneth no more; and if a man die, ſhall he live again? Job xiv. 14. What a cooler doth this afford to his ſpirits, when warmed and made briſk with the enjoyment of worldly affluence? This is apt to make a man deſpair of all his labour under the ſun, and to reckon all but vanity and vexation of ſpirit, Eccleſ. ii. 20. Conſidering, that the riches for which he hath toiled, and about which he hath diſturbed himſelf; the pleaſures in which he hath delighted to wallow;

the honours to which he hath aſpired, and climbed up by ſuch a ſteep and ſlippery aſcent, ſhall then ceaſe from affording him any more ſatisfaction: And withal, that he is not within the proſpect of a better enjoyment, that may recompence his loſs of theſe preſent good things, but muſt go naked out of the world in all reſpects, as he came naked in, and ſo lie down in eternal miſery.

Secondly, this abates the lively and generous actings of the ſoul, and diſmays it for any noble deſigns and attempts. When a man ſeriouſly conſiders all his endeavours under the ſun to be like ſpiders webs, ſpun with a great deal of painful labour, and exenterating care and contrivance, and after this, in a moment ſwept down and deſtroyed by the beſom of death; that when man's breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, and in the ſame day all his thoughts periſh, Pſal. cxlvi. 4.

And if withal, there be not a greater and more noble deſign which ſuch a man hath propoſed to himſelf, and hath attained probable hopes of the accompliſhment of it; this is apt to make him conclude, that truly man walketh in a vain ſhadow, verily, they diſquiet themſelves in vain; and that every man living, upon ground, or in what capacity ſoever he ſtands, is altogether vanity, Pſal. xxxix. 5, 6. and to cry out with the wiſe man, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity, Eccl. i. 2.

And if the profit, that is in all labour, do encourage a man to take pains, and to endeavour to ſhew himſelf wiſe under the ſun; then ſure theſe thoughts, of the vanity of human deſigns and attempts, do take a man off from ſtriving to do wiſely and worthily in his generation.

Thirdly, It dulls the edge of the ſoul for good duties. He that fancies himſelf to lye down under the burden of inſuperable difficulties, that apprehends God to be an auſtere maſter, Heaven to be unattainable, and hell unavoidable, will have very little mind to ſtir up himſelf to lay hold upon God, or to work out his own ſalvation, Iſa lxiv. 7. Phil. ii. 12. or to uſe that violence of holy endeavours that is required in taking the kingdom of Heaven, Matt. xi. 12. For it is hope of ſucceſs that quickens endeavours, and deſpair of this doth diſpirit a man, and make him dull and unactive.

Secondly, Let us take notice of ſuch a man when death is at hand, and begins to encounter him; and here we find him in a very miſerable eſtate that hath not attained victory over death, for Firſt, It diſpoſſeſſeth him at once of all the fruits of his labours, and ejects him from the enjoyment of all his worldly acquiſitions; Though whilſt he lived he bleſſed his own ſoul, he ſhall go to the generation of his fathers, and ſhall no more ſee the light of comfort; and therefore, man that is in honour and underſtandeth not, is like the beaſts that periſh, Pſal. xlix. 18, 19, 20. And is it not a diſmal condition, for a man that hath toiled and beſtowed great induſtry, that hath plotted and contrived to the diſturbing of his head, and interrupting of his ſleep, that hath pinched and denied himſelf the enjoyments of many worldly comforts, to increaſe his heap by parſimony; yea, that hath too often ſtained his conſcience, and hazarded his ſoul, to heap up that which might be called a plentiful eſtate in this world; this man, I ſay, to hear on a ſudden that dreadful and heart-breaking voice, Thou fool, this night ſhall thy ſoul be taken from thee, and then whoſe ſhall all thoſe things be, for which thou haſt laboured? Luke xii. 20.

Secondly, It daſheth all thoſe vain hopes of Heaven, with which ſuch a man had flattered himſelf. As there are politick projecting hypocrites, who know themſelves to be no better than whited ſepulchres, Matt. xxiii. 37. ſo are there many fooliſh virgins, who bear about the lamp of an outward profeſſion in their hands, and want oil to make it burn, Matt. xxv. 3. and yet are ſo ſimple as to expect at laſt to enter in with the bridegroom as well as the beſt.

And how ſad will it be to them, when, at death coming to the door, and crying, Lord, Lord, open unto us, they ſhall be repulſed with, Verily, I ſay unto you, I know you not. What is the hope of the hypocrite, though he have gained applauſe from the world, when God taketh away his ſoul? Will God then hear his cry, when trouble cometh upon him? Will he then delight himſelf in the Almighty? Will he always call upon God? Job xxvii. 8, 9, 10.

Beſide, there are many, who though they could not find in their hearts to day, while it was called to day, to hear God's voice, Heb. iii. 8. yet they verily intended to take a time more convenient for theſe things. But now theſe mens hopes are over; the bridegroom is come on a ſudden, thoſe that were ready are entered with him, and the doors are ſhut.

Thirdly, Death puts an end to his day of grace. Some men, indeed, have ſo long hardned their hearts againſt hearing the voice of God, that he hath already given them up to their own hearts luſts, Pſal. lxxxi. 12. they have ſo long reſiſted the Holy Ghoſt in its ſtrivings, Acts vii. 51. that God hath reſolved that his Spirit ſhall no more ſtrive with them, Gen. vi. 3. But ordinarily mens days of grace is commenſurate with the day of their lives, and whilſt men are alive, there is no man ſo bad, but he may become better. But death puts an end to theſe expectations, it ſhuts men up in an unalterable condition; and as the tree falls, ſo it ſhall lye for ever, whether toward the ſouth, or toward the north, Eccleſ. xi. 3.

Fourthly, Death commonly brings to a man's remembrance thoſe ſins, which before he was unmindful of. In the day of health and proſperity men are apt to put far from them the troubleſome and ungrateful remembrance of their ſins paſt. Worldly buſineſs, and company, and divertiſements, worldly pleaſures and delights ſuggeſt more ſanguine thoughts to the mind. But when death cometh, God doth ordinarily, to them that are of ſound mind and memory, ſhew that he hath ſet their iniquities before him, and their ſecret ſins in the light of his countenance, Pſal. xc. 8. Yea, after his long ſilence, he doth then uſe to reprove men, and ſet their ſins in order before their eyes, Pſal. l. 21, and cauſeth mens iniquities to compaſs them about, as at their heels, Pſal. xlix. 5. and lets them ſee and feel that it is an evil thing, and a bitter, that they have forſaken the living Lord, and that his fear hath not been before their eyes, Jer. ii. 19. And judge how unwelcome this is to a man's mind, that hath long lain aſleep in ſecurity, when it makes him cry out with Ahab to Elijah, haſt thou found me, O my enemy? 1 Kings xxi. 20.

Fifthly, Death puts the greateſt affront imaginable upon the beautiful and majeſtick fabrick of the body. This pile of duſt and aſhes that appeareth ſo ſtately through the Divine Architecture, that is ſo fearfully and wonderfully made in its contexture, Pſal. cxxxix 14. that is rendred ſo glorious, by the enſtamping of God's image upon it, that is by God's ordination become ſo awful and formidable to inferior animals of far greater ſtrength: This painted piece of dirt, that hath been ſo much doted upon, and adored for its delicate feature, and amiable intermixture of lillies and roſes; this well-formed ſtatue, which voluptuous perſons have adored as a terreſtrial deity. Phil. iii. 19. to which they have conſtantly ſacrificed whole hetacombs of all the dainties which the earth, the air, and the ſea could afford; this fleſh for which men have made proviſion to fulfil its luſts, Rom. xiii. 14. This muſt then become equal to the beaſts that periſh, a prey to the inferior animals, the very worms, loathſome to the eye of its former admirers; ſo that they that loved it beſt, when informed with a ſoul, can afford it now no better compliment than, let me bury my dead out of my ſight, Gen. xxiii. 4.

This, that was ſometime fed and clothed by the contrivance and induſtry of ſo many heads and hands, muſt go naked out of the world, as it came naked in, and lye ſolitary and neglected in the grave, keeping an everlaſting faſt; yea, inſtead of faring deliciouſly every day, itſelf muſt afford a meal to the worms, and ſay to corruption, thou art my father, Job xvii. 14. But this is not all, nor the worſt yet

Sixthly, Death ſends the ſoul to be a prey to the worm that never dies. Here is the moral of Prometheus's vulture, the preying of the conſcience upon itſelf, with the ungrateful and corroding remembrance of the pleaſures of this life, when they are to part as never to return; of the ſins of a man's life, for which God doth now bring him into judgment; of the day of grace, which he neglected, being like the fool that had a price put into his hands to get wiſdom, but had no heart to make uſe of it, Prov. xvii. 16.

This is a vengeance worthy of God, a puniſhment ſuitable to the nature of a ſeparate ſoul, when it hath not the company of the body to partake of the other torment, the fire that never ſhall be quenched, Mark ix. 44. To this torment death ſends the ſoul, as judgment ſhall hereafter ſend the body to the other. This is the unhappineſs of thoſe that ſo live as to fear death, and juſtly to fear it, becauſe under its power and dominion in the worſe and ſevereſt ſenſe.

But as we have ſeen the dark ſide, let us alſo take a view of the bright ſide of the cloud, let us,

Secondly, Conſider the happy and comfortable condition of thoſe that have attained a bleſſed victory over death, and live in the enjoyment of the ſenſe thereof, and ſo it will appear to be matter of thankful memorial, and worthy of giving praiſe to the author thereof: For,

Firſt, ſuch a man enjoys more comfort in the world than another man doth or can. God, as a bountiful Creator, hath given us variety of comforts in the things of this world, and it is his will that we ſhould ſerve him with gladneſs and chearfulneſs of heart in the abundance of all things, Deut. xxviii. 47. And he is beſt able to rejoice and take comfort in the fruits of God's goodneſs, who hath overcome the danger and fear of death. For,

Firſt, This ſets his affections above the world. It is moſt certain, that whatſoever we have of worldly enjoyments, either imperat, aut ſervit; to ſome the world is a maſter, to others a ſervant. And as it is a very uſeful and obſequious ſervant when it is kept under, ſo it is a very imperious and tyrannical maſter when we ſubject our ſelves to it.

Now he only is a truly free man, who hath placed his moſt lively affections upon better things. This frees him from thoſe eager deſires after getting more, which like a βȣλιμία in the body, do gnaw the mind with perpetual unquietneſs: From thoſe diſtracting ſollicitudes about worldly matters, which keep the ſoul continually upon the rack, drawing it this way and that way. And in the affluence of the things deſired, this prevents that puffing up with pride, which like a flatus in the hippocondries, or a tumor in any part of the body, renders the mind ſubject to an uneaſy calenture: That pinching greedineſs in keeping together the heap, which like a compreſſed veſſel in nature hindring the free motion of the blood and ſpirits, bindeth the ſoul, and hinders it from a comfortable enjoyment of its portion. This diſchargeth the mind from that anxiety as to loſing theſe things, which in many takes away the pleaſure they ſhould reap from the enjoyment of them; and finally ſo ſuits the ſpirit to a compliance with the Divine Providence, that it reckons the lines fallen to it in a pleaſant place, Pſal. xvi. 8. and ſhakes off that repining and diſcontent, which like an unfit ſhoe, makes a man ſtep uneaſily in the condition wherein he walketh.

Now this is the victory whereby we overcome the world, even our faith, 1 John v. 4. This raiſeth the heart above it, when we with comfort look on our ſelves as ſtrangers and pilgrims in it, and ſuch as ſeek a better country, that is an heavenly, Heb. xi. 16.

Secondly, This ſatisfies a man's mind that his main concerns are ſecured, and the greateſt of fears overcome. Go thy way, eat thy bread, drink thy drink with a merry heart, for God accepteth thy works, Eccl. ix. 7. In worldly matters, then are we at eaſe, and can enjoy a friend, or take ſatisfaction in any other comfort, when our greateſt concerns are ſecured, and our main buſineſs over. And eſpecially in ſpiritual affairs, then do a man's morſels go down ſweetly, and he doth ſleep with freedom and ſecurity, when the fear of God's wrath is removed, and an intereſt in his love and favour ſecured.

This is bread that the world knows not of, hidden manna, Rev. ii. 17. ſuch joy as a ſtranger intermeddleth not with, Prov. xiv. 10. Such is the ſweetneſs and ſatisfaction that this affords, that the like is in vain ſought for in worldly acquiſitions. Lord lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us: And this puts gladneſs into our hearts more than the men of the world have in the time when their corn, and wine, and oil encreaſeth, Pſal. iv. 6, 7.

Secondly, Such a man goes along in the way of his duty with vigour and delight. It is a great happineſs as well as a duty, to cut with a keen edge in doing the will of God, to proceed with vigour, and to take delight and complacency in doing well. And there is nothing ſo much conduceth to work in us this temper of mind, as confidence of a reward added to a conſcientious ſenſe of God's command. Be not weary of well-doing, knowing that in due time ye ſhall reap, if ye faint not, Gal. vi. 7. Be ſtedfaſt, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; foraſmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord, as it follows at ver. 58.

Thirdly, He will paſs through the difficulties of a Chriſtian courſe with courage and ſerenity of ſpirit. The Apoſtle tells us, that we have need of patience, that after we have done the will of God, we may inherit the promiſes, Heb. x. 36. becauſe through much tribulations we paſs into the kingdom of Heaven, Acts xiv. 22. And if we faint in the day of adverſity, it ſheweth our ſtrength to be ſmall, Prov. xxiv. 10.

Now this conſideration, that death will put an end to all theſe troubles, and a confident perſwaſion, that death ſhall be an happy change to us, will help us to hold out with courage and chearfulneſs, in oppoſition to fainting or fretting at the difficulty of the way. Thus Moſes choſe rather to ſuffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleaſures of ſin: becauſe he had reſpect to the recompence of reward, Heb. xi. 25, 26. Yea, the maſter of that houſe, in which Moſes was faithful as a ſervant, was by the joy that was ſet before him, encouraged to endure the croſs, and deſpiſe the ſhame, Heb xii. 2.

Fourthly, He will be fit for every condition, and know how to behave himſelf aright in it. It is an hard matter, in the day of proſperity to rejoice in the Lord, and to carry that full cup ſo evenly as not to ſpill it. And it is as hard, in the day of adverſity to conſider, Eccl. vii. 14. to be mindful, that we ought thankfully to receive evil as well as good from the hand of God, Job ii. 10. To keep from deſpiſing the chaſtning of the Lord, alſo from fainting, when we are corrected by him, Heb. xii. 5.

Now nothing will better teach us theſe hard leſſons than a true victory over death. This will moderate our joy in proſperity, and make us rejoice with trembling, and as though we rejoiced not, becauſe the time is ſhort, 1 Cor. vii. 29. It will moderate our ſorrow in the time of trouble, as conſidering, that theſe are light afflictions, and endure but for a moment; and that they work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, 2 Cor. iv. 17. So every way happy is that couragious Chriſtian, that hath obtained victory over this laſt enemy. Therefore,

Let thoſe that are ſo happy as to live in the comfortable ſenſe of their having obtained this bleſſed victory over death, be careful to walk as children of the kingdom.

Firſt, In holineſs and righteouſneſs before God. Becauſe thou haſt delivered my ſoul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling, I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living, Pſal. cxvi. 8—19. Seeing that all theſe things muſt be diſſolved, and we know ſo much, and are not afraid to know and conſider it, what manner of perſons ought we to be in all holy converſation and godlineſs? And ſeeing we look for ſuch things, a great conflict, and a glorious victory over a formidable enemy, let us be diligent, that we may be found of him in peace at that day, without ſpot, and blameleſs, 2 Pet. iii. 11—16.

Thoſe that fight or run for victory do diet themſelves, and are temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we obſerve rules that we may obtain that which is incorruptible, 1 Cor. ix. 25. Well may we then be content to deny ourſelves, to keep under our bodies, and bring them into ſubjection, that the ſenſual appetite being ſubdued, may not clog us in that great congreſs.

Secondly, Let our temper ſavour of Heaven. If ye be riſen with Chriſt, and have a ſenſe of the benefit of his death and reſurrection, in order to the overcoming of death, ſeek thoſe things that are above: Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth, Col. iii. 1, 2. Let thoſe that believe death to be the end of all pleaſure and comfort, give themſelves up wholly to enjoy the good things that are preſent, but let us declare plainly that we ſeek a country, Heb. xi. 14.

Thirdly, Let us walk humbly with our God, Mic. vi. 8. Let us ſay, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us; but to thy name be the glory of of this victory, Pſal. cxv. 1. Let us be duly ſenſible that it is the Lord that delivereth us from the paw of the lion, and of the bear, and from this great Goliah. For this is a princely favour, beſtowed by the royal hand of the King of Glory, it is God's gift: For,

Firſt, as all good things do come from God, ſo in particular all ſpiritual gifts, all the graces and comforts of a Chriſtian, are the products of his ſavour and bounty. Every good gift, and every perfect gift, cometh down from above, even from the Father of lights, James i. 17. even from that Supreme Being, and firſt cauſe of all things, in whom we live, and move, and have our being, Acts xvii. 28. Particularly, he it is that bleſſeth us with all ſpiritual bleſſings in heavenly things in Chriſt, Eph. i. 3. He is called the God of all grace, that God who hath called us into his eternal glory by Chriſt Jeſus, and who, after we have ſuffered a while, will make us perfect, ſtabliſh, ſtrengthen, and ſettle us, 1 Pet. v. 10. He is the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort, who comforteth us in all our tribulation, 2 Cor. i. 3. And therefore this eſpecial comfort that ariſeth from victory over death, is to be owned with thankfulneſs, as his gift.

Secondly, it is a gift which none but himſelf can beſtow. Human reaſon and manly courage may, in part, ſupport us under the thoughts of leaving the world, and ſleeping in the grave, by telling us that the world is vanity and vexation of ſpirit; and helping us to conſider that we are every way as well at eaſe when we are aſleep, and forget the world, as when we are awake to enjoy it.

But what ſtrength or courage of a mortal man can bear up, without fainting under weakning decays of bodily vigour, and endure, without complaining, that tedious pain and anguiſh with which it pleaſeth God ſometimes to afflict our bodies; except he that lays on his hand to afflict, do alſo put underneath his everlaſting arms to ſupport? Thou, even thou art to be feared, and who may ſtand in thy ſight when once thou art wrath? Pſal. lxxvi. 7. Can thy heart endure, or thy hand be ſtrong in the day when God ſhall viſit thee? Ezek. xxii. 14.

Eſpecially, who can bear up under the dreadful apprehenſion of appearing before Almighty God, as the judge of all the world, except he hath comfortable apprehenſions of God being reconciled, and the judge become his friend? They were no cowards, nor ſorry, mean-ſpirited perſons, but the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every freeman, as well as every bondman, that thought to hide themſelves in dens and in the rocks of the mountains: that courted the mountains and rocks to fall on them, and to hide them from the face of him that ſat on the throne, and from the face of the Lamb: for when the great day of his wrath ſhould come, who, ſay they, ſhall be able to ſtand bfore him? Rev. vi. 15, 16, 17.

Thirdly, This enemy death, is in perfect ſubjection to God as his ſervant, and therefore, he is able to bleſs us with victory, and to command deliverance to Jacob. No man can enter the houſe of a ſtrong man armed, and ſpoil his goods, except he firſt bind the ſtrong man, Mark iii. 27. Now this can God do, not only in reſpect of his infinite power to which all creatures in Heaven and earth do bow and obey, whereby he can ſtop the mouths of lions, ſuſpend the natural influence of fire, appeaſe the rage and ſwelling of the ſea: But alſo becauſe death is his ſervant, the miniſter of his wrath, the executioner of his juſtice. And therefore, he that ſaith to the raging ſea, peace and be ſtill; yea, that hath placed the friable body of ſand to be a rampart againſt its fury, by a perpetual decree, which it cannot paſs, nor return again to cover the earth, Jer. v. 22. He alſo gives laws to death, and ſets bounds to its rage, giving victory over it to them that fear him.

Fourthly, The conferring of this victory is a favour, that will eminently ſhew the great love and kindneſs of God to his people, for naturally we are under the power and dominion of death by reaſon of ſin; it being as due as the wages to the workman when he hath ended his buſineſs. And it was the meer mercy and undeſerved good will of God toward the workmanſhip of his own hand, now degenerated and become miſerable through their own wilfulneſs, that helped them to overcome that enemy, which themſelves had formed to be a thorn in their ſides, and a prick in their eyes.

Yea, it was a peculiar favour to mankind, not vouchſafed to the ſuperior order of reaſonable creatures, to be able to vanquiſh that death, that miſery, which their ungrateful revolting from their Maker had brought upon themſelves; for verily the Son of God took not on him the nature of Angels, nor helped them up, but he took on him, and relieved the ſeed of Adam, and for them did by death overcome him that had power over death, even the Devil, and delivered them, who otherwiſe through fear of death muſt all their life time have been ſubject to bondage, Heb. ii. 14, 15, 16.

Yea, it is a mercy not vouchſafed to all mankind, as to the actual enjoyment of it, but to thoſe only that believe in him. To as many as received him, he gave power to become the ſons of God, John i. 12. to have part in the firſt reſurrection, ſo that the ſecond death ſhould have no power over them, Rev. xx. 6.

Fifthly, Conſequently this garland of victory doth greatly oblige the hearts of God's people unto himſelf. It being the fruit of that preventing love, that remembred us in our low and loſt eſtate, even becauſe his mercy endureth for ever, Pſal. cxxxvi. 23. the manifeſtation of the kindneſs and bounty of God to procure for us ſo great a privilege as this victory hath appeared to be; and that at ſo dear a rate, as the moſt precious blood of his own Son, that Lamb without ſpot and blemiſh, 1 Pet. i. 19. So God loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whoſoever believeth in him ſhould not periſh, but have everlaſting life, John iii. 16. This tends to draw us with the cords of a man, with cords of love, Hoſ. xi. 4. It ſets us upon our legs, to run the way of God's commandments; it renders us ſubjects capable of ingenuous ſervice, by ſetting us free with the glorious liberty of the ſons of God, Rom. viii. 21. And withal it layeth the ſtrongeſt engagements of love and gratitude upon us, to give up our ſelves, both ſouls and bodies, as living ſacrifices unto him, Rom. xii. 1. and being delivered from our enemies, to ſerve him without ſlaviſh fear, in holineſs and righteouſneſs before him all the days of our life, Luke i. 74, 75.

And therefore, What ſhall we return unto the Lord for this, and all other his benefits! What thanks offering can be of due value to preſent unto him! What fruit of the lips, what obedience of heart and life can be ſufficient to expreſs our remembrance of this favour? O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever. Let the redeemed of the Lord ſay ſo, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy. O that men would praiſe the Lord for his goodneſs, and for his wonderful works towards the ſons of men! Pſal. cvii. 1, 2, 8.

——— Through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.] Here note, The main argument whereby the Apoſtle had eſtabliſhed that great article of our faith, the reſurrection of the body, in the precedent part of this chapter, was grounded upon the reſurrection of Chriſt from the dead: Who not only ſhewed that it was neither impoſſible, nor yet incredible, that God ſhould raiſe the dead, Acts xxvi. 8. becauſe he himſelf overcome the ſharpneſs of death, and broke its bonds; but alſo by riſing as a publick perſon, the ſecond Adam, the firſt-fruits from the dead, hath made way for us alſo to follow him in the reſurrection of our bodies.

And this expreſſion in the text ſeems to be the Epiphonema, or cloſe of that diſcourſe and arguing. It is in Chriſt that God bleſſeth us with all ſpiritual bleſſings in Heavenly things, Eph. i. 3. And particularly this bleſſed victory over death is derived unto us through Chriſt; ſeveral ways hath Chriſt overcome death, and made way for our being victorious over it.

Firſt, He hath deſtroyed the ſting of death, even ſin, by his merits and ſufferings. The ſting is the moſt formidable part in thoſe animals that are armed therewith: And ſin which rendred us obnoxious to the wrath of God, and curſe of the law, was the chief thing that made death dreadful to mankind, as arreſting us, in order to bringing us before the judge of all the earth, who will render to every man according to his works, Rom. ii. 6.

But this ſting hath Chriſt plucked out from death, by his voluntary and meritorious obedience anſwering the exaction of the law, and by his unparallell'd and meritorious ſufferings enduring the malediction thereof. So that there is now no condemnation to them that are in Chriſt Jeſus, Rom. viii. 1. As a great high-prieſt he hath by one offering perfected for ever them that are ſanctified, Heb. x. 14. As our ſurety he hath paid our debts, and cancelled the hand-writing that was againſt us. As our Goel he hath re-redeemed us, not with corruptible things, as ſilver and gold, but with his own moſt precious blood, 1 Pet. i. 19. And in each reſpect God is juſt, and yet the juſtifier of the ungodly, when he believeth in Jeſus, Rom. iii. 26. In him mercy and truth are met together, righteouſneſs and peace have kiſſed each other. Pſal. lxxxv. 10.

Secondly, He hath overcome the pains of death by his example and promiſes. By his example, who as the captain of our ſalvation was made perfect through ſufferings, Heb. ii. 10. He ſuffered perfectly all that the law of God could exact, or the rage of his enemies inflict. And he was perfect under his ſufferings, ſo as not to entrench the leaſt upon the bounds of compleat patience, Jam. i. 2. He was led as a lamb to the ſlaughter, and as a ſheep before the ſhearers is dumb, ſo he opened not his mouth, Iſa. liii. 7. When he was reviled, he reviled not again; when he ſuffered, he threatned not, 1 Pet. ii. 23.

Further, by his ſufferings he perfected the work of our redemption, and fully ſatisfied Divine Juſtice. And hereby he hath engaged, and encouraged us to arm ourſelves likewiſe with the ſame mind, becauſe Chriſt hath ſuffered in the fleſh for us, 1 Pet. iv. 1.

And by his promiſes he hath encouraged us, telling us, that this ſtrait way leadeth to life; that in the mean time he will never fail us, nor forſake us, Heb. xiii. 5. But when we paſs through the fire and water, he will be with us, Iſa. xliii. 1, 2. and that theſe light afflictions that endure but for a ſeaſon, do work for us a far more excellent and eternal weight of glory, 2 Cor. iv. 17.

Thirdly, He hath wiped away the ſcandal of death, by his leading the way, in ſuffering death, and lying in the grave. It is a great affront to this ſtately piece of well-formed earth, to own kindred with corruption and worms, Job xvii. 14. But Chriſt, the beſt of men, yea the Son of God, hath led us on the way to Golgotha, and we need not be aſhamed to follow him in the ſteps he hath troden. He ſuffered before he was glorified, he endured the croſs, and did not deſpiſe the ſhame of that ſcandalous death, before he ſet down at the right hand of the Majeſty on high, Heb. xii. 3. And therefore it is no diſgrace to us to die, and be laid in the grave.

Yea, it was a far bitterer cup that he drank off for us, than what God uſeth to put into the hands of his people; and therefore we ſhould not ſcruple at drinking our own portion. He hath perfumed the grave, by laying his own body there before us: This unicorn, by dipping his own horn before-hand, hath rendred theſe waters ſafe and wholeſom: So that we ſhall reſt in our graves, as in beds; every man that hath walk'd before him in his uprightneſs, Iſa. lvii. 2.

Fourthly, He hath vanquiſhed the power of death by his reſurrection. Bleſſed be the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who of his abundant mercy hath begotten us again to a lively hope, by the reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt from the dead, 1 Pet. i. 3. Hereby he ſhewed to the world that he had by death overcome him that had the power of death, even the Devil, Heb. ii. 14. Yea, that he hath not only commanded a paſſage for himſelf, whom death could not poſſibly hold any longer than was neceſſary for the ſatisfying of Divine Juſtice, Acts ii. 24. but hath alſo taken away the keys of power from this ſurly porter, and made way for his own people to follow him: And becauſe I live, ye ſhall live alſo, John xiv. 19.

Fifthly, He killed the hopes of death by his aſcenſion. Thereby he made it evident, that he had fully accompliſhed his mediatory function upon earth, and that Chriſt being riſen from the dead, dieth no more, death muſt have no more dominion over him, Rom. vi. 9. that he ſhould no more ſubmit to take on him the form of a ſervant, and to be obedient to death, Phil. ii. 8.

And conſequently it may encourage believers, that as it is appointed for men once to die, Heb. ix. 27. ſo this trouble ſhall be diſpatched at once; ſo that they that have part in the firſt reſurrection, over them the ſecond death ſhall have no power, Rev. xx. 6.

Sixthly, He ſhall deſtroy the very being of death at the laſt day. Death hath its commiſſion extended to the end of this world; and then the rod that hath ſo long been uſed for the trial and chaſtiſement of mankind, ſhall it ſelf be caſt into the fire. The laſt enemy that ſhall be deſtroyed is death, 1 Cor. xv. 26. Then ſhall be brought to paſs the ſaying that is written, I will ranſom them from the power of the grave, I will redeem them from death. O death I will be thy plagues, O grave I will be thy deſtruction; repentance is hid from mine eyes, Hoſea xiii. 14.

As conſequents of this that hath been laſt ſpoken, Firſt, We may conſider how glorious was the conqueſt of Chriſt in his ſufferings: Well might it be ſaid that he was made perfect by them, Heb. ii. 10. For he obtained by death a moſt compleat victory over death in all its circumſtances; and over him that had the power of death, both for himſelf, and alſo for all his people.

Secondly, Therefore how great was God's love in ſending his Son into the world! John iii. 16. So God loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son: Scarcely for a righteous man would one die: Yet peradventure for a good, or uſeful man, ſome might be found, that would even dare to die. But God commended his love to us, in that when we were ſo far from being good and uſeful men, that we were not ſo much as righteous and innocent men, yet in due time Chriſt died, even for the ungodly, Rom. v. 7, 8.

Thirdly, Let us hence learn to fly unto Chriſt, and to ſecure our intereſt in him. This is the way to have a right to that comfort that flows from his incarnation and death, and thereby to have ſatisfaction and comfort both in our life-time, and at our death; to be ſecure under the pre-apprehenſions of it, and to entertain it with joy and comfort when it cometh. If his wrath be kindled, yea, but a little, bleſſed are all they that put their truſt in him; therefore let us kiſs the Son, Pſal. ii. 11, 12. and give all diligence to make our calling and election ſure, 2 Pet. i. 10. let us examine ourſelves, whether we be in the faith; and prove, and know our own ſelves, whether Chriſt Jeſus be formed in us, 2 Cor. xiii. 5. that when death ſhall ſummon us to an encounter we may be victorious over it.

Fourthly, Let the redeemed of the Lord walk with joy and thankfulneſs before him, as in a ſenſe of all other his mercies, ſo particularly of this bleſſed fruit of our Saviour's death and reſurrection, the glorious victory thereby obtained for us over death. Bleſs the Lord, O our ſouls, and all that is within us bleſs his holy name. Bleſs the Lord, our ſouls, and forget not all his benefits. Who forgiveth all our iniquities, who healeth all our diſeaſes. Who redeemeth our life from deſtruction, who crowneth us with loving kindneſs and tender mercies, Pſal. ciii. 1, 2, 3, 4. And let us walk chearfully before God in a ſenſe of our great privilege, amongſt all the troubles of the world that accompany us in our abode here, and under the thoughts of leaving this world at laſt; foraſmuch as this laſt enemy is vanquiſhed, let us not fear any thing elſe; but under our dependencies let us call up our ſouls to a more comfortable and chearful temper; let us chide away dejectedneſs and drooping, and ſay, Why art thou caſt down, O my ſoul, and why art thou diſquieted within me? Hope in God, for I ſhall yet praiſe him, who is the help of my countenance, and my God, Pſal. xlii. 11.

CHAP. XVI.

1 He exhorteth them to relieve the want of the brethren at Jeruſalem. 10 Commendeth Timothy; 13 And after friendly admonitions, 16 Shutteth up his Epiſtle with divers ſalutations.

NOW concerning the collection for the ſaints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even ſo do ye.

2 Upon the firſt day of the week, let every one of you lay by him in ſtore, as God hath proſpered him, that there be no gatherings when I come.

3 And when I come, whomſoever you ſhall approve by your letters, them will I ſend to bring your liberality unto Jeruſalem.

4 And if it be meet that I go alſo, they ſhall go with me.

5 Now I will come unto you, when I ſhall paſs through Macedonia (for I do paſs through Macedonia.)

6 And it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you, that ye may bring me on my journey, whitherſoever I go.

7 For I will not ſee you now by the way, but I truſt to tarry a while with you, if the Lord permit.

8 But I will tarry at Epheſus until Pentecoſt.

9 For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adverſaries.

10 Now if Timotheus come, ſee that he may be with you without fear: for he worketh the work of the Lord, as I alſo do.

11 Let no man therefore deſpiſe him: but conduct him forth in peace, that he may come unto me: for I look for him with the brethren.

12 As touching our brother Apollos, I greatly deſired him to come unto you with the brethren: but his will was not at all to come at this time; but he will come when he ſhall have convenient time.

13 Watch ye, ſtand faſt in the faith, quit you like men, be ſtrong.

14 Let all your things be done with charity.

15 I beſeech you, brethren (ye know the houſe of Stephanas, that it is the firſt-fruits of Achaia, and that they have addicted themſelves to the miniſtry of the ſaints.)

16 That ye ſubmit your ſelves unto ſuch, and to every one that helpeth with us, and laboureth.

17 I am glad of the coming of Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus: for that which was lacking on your part, they have ſupplied.

18 For they have refreſhed my ſpirit and yours: therefore acknowledge ye them that are ſuch.

19 The churches of Aſia ſalute you. Aquila and Priſcilla ſalute you much in the Lord, with the church that is in their houſe.

20 All the brethren greet you. Greet ye one another with an holy kiſs.

21 The ſalutation of me Paul with mine own hand.

22 If any man love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, let him be anathema, maranatha.

23 The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you.

24 My love be with you all in Chriſt Jeſus. Amen.

¶ The firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians was written from Philippi, by Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, and Timotheus.

This chapter (being the concluſion of the whole epiſtle) contains

I. Diverſe directions, as (1) concerning the collection for the Saints, ver. 1. ſhewing the time and proportion; with the reaſon, ver. 2. (2) Concerning the manner of conveyance thereof; ver. 3, 4. (3) Concerning the coming to them, and his intention to abide with them; ver. 5—7. (4) Concerning his preſent abode at Epheſus; ver. 8. amplified by the reaſon; ver. 9 (5) Concerning their entertainment and treament of Timothy: ver. 10, 11. (6) Concerning the coming of Apollos; ver. 12.

II. Exhortations to diverſe duties, ſuch as watchfulneſs, ſtedfaſtneſs, courage, ver. 13. charity, ver. 14. and reverend reſpect to the family of Stepanas, &c. ver. 15, 16. amplified by his rejoicing at their coming, with the reaſons; and an exhortation to require their kindneſs to him; ver. 17, 18.

III. Salutations, from others his companions at Epheſus to them of Corinth; ver. 19, 20. From himſelf; ver. 21. amplified by a curſe denounced againſt the new lovers of Chriſt; ver. 22. To which he adds his Apoſtolical benediction; ver. 23, and concludes with a full aſſurance of his love to them; ver. 24.

Ver. 1. The collection for the ſaints.] See Acts xi. 29. and xxiv. 17. Rom. xv. 26. 2 Cor. viii. 4. and ix. 1, 2, 12. — As I have given orders to the Churches of Galatia.] See Gal. ii. 10.

Ver. 2. Upon the firſt day of the week.] See Acts xx. 27. and Revel. i. 10. This being one of the texts by which we Chriſtians prove our duty keep the Sunday inſtead of the Jewiſh ſabbath, or the Saturday, holy unto the Lord, which has cauſed many debates and bitter controverſies among ſober and religious Chriſtians, who thinking themſelves obliged to keep the Satuday holy in order to fulfil the fourth commandment. I ſhall clear up that ſcruple by the following hiſtorical account of the ſabbath.

A Diſſertation on the Sabbath-Day.

In this Diſſertation I ſhall (1) enquire whether the ſabbath was a moral or natural inſtitution; and (2) whether Sunday, or the Lord's Day, in the Chriſtian worſhip, was ſubſtituted in the place thereof, by Chriſt or his Apoſtles. By which means we ſhall arrive at the true notion and reaſon of the ſabbath, and the Lord's Day; and ſo diſpel thoſe doubts and fears, and confute thoſe cavillings and ſects, which are raiſed about the due and right performance of the fourth precept in the ten commandments.

I. As to the Jewiſh ſabbath. It is written in the book of Geneſis, that when God had finiſhed the work of the Creation in ſix days, he reſted on the ſeventh day from all his works which he had made; and God bleſſed the ſeventh day and ſanctified it; becauſe that in it he reſted from all his work, which God created and made; Gen. ii. 2, 3.

Unto this paſſage of the text, and this point of time, ſome have referred the inſtitution and original of the ſabbath: taking theſe words to be a plain narration of a thing then done, according to that very time, wherein the Scripture doth report it: and that the ſanctifying of the ſeventh day therein mentioned, was a commandment given by God to our father Adam, touching the ſanctifying of that day to his publick worſhip. Conceiving alſo that there is ſome ſpecial myſtery and morality in the number of ſeven, for which that day, and none but that, could be deſigned and ſet apart for this employment. Others, and thoſe the ancienter, and of more authority, conceive theſe words to have been ſpoken by a prolepſis or anticipation; and to relate unto the times wherein Moſes wrote: and that it was an intimation only of the reaſon why God impoſed upon the Jews, the ſanctifying rather of the ſeventh day, than of any other; no precept to that purpoſe being given to Adam and to his poſterity; nor any myſtery in that number, why of it ſelf it ſhould be thought moſt proper for God's publick ſervice: as I ſhall ſhew in the ſequel hereof. For,

Firſt, It is conceived by many learned men, that Moſes in the ſecond of Geneſis relates unto the times in the which he lived, and wrote the hiſtory of the Creation: when God had now made known his Holy Will unto him, and the commandment of the ſabbath had by his miniſtry been delivered to the houſe of Iſrael. This is indeed the ancienter and more general account unanimouſly delivered both by Jew and Chriſtian; and not ſo much as queſtioned 'till theſe later days: tho' ſome aſcribe it to Toſtatus, in Gen. ii. who makes this quere firſt; "Whether the ſabbath being ſanctified by God in the firſt infancy of the world, had been obſerved of men, by the law of nature? To which he returns this anſwer: That God commanded not the ſabbath to be ſanctified in the beginning of the world, but that it was commanded afterwards by the law of Moſes; when God did publickly make known his will upon Mount Sinai. And that whereas the Scripture ſpeaketh of ſanctifying the ſeventh day, in the ſecond of Geneſis, it is not to be underſtood, as if the Lord did then appoint it, for his publick worſhip; but it is to be referred unto the time wherein Moſes wrote, which was in the wilderneſs. And ſo the meaning of the Prophet will be briefly this, that God did ſanctify that day, that is to us, to that are his people of the houſe of Jacob, that we might conſecrate it to his ſervice." In which I muſt confeſs, that I ſee not any thing, but what Joſephus ſaid before him, though in other words; who ſpeaking (Antiqu. l. 1, 2.) of the world's Creation, doth conclude it thus, Καὶ τὸν κόσμον, &c. So that Moſes ſaith, that the world and all that is therein was made in ſix whole days, and that upon the ſeventh day God took reſt, and ceaſed from his labours. Ὅθεν καὶ ἡμεῖς, &c. By reaſon whereof we likewiſe deſiſt from labour on that day, which we call the ſabbath, i. e. reſt. So that the inſtitution of the ſabbath by Toſtatus, and the obſervation of it, by Joſephus, are both of them referred, by their us, and we, unto the times of Moſes, and the houſe of Iſrael. Nor is Joſephus the only learned man among the Jews, that ſo interpreteth Moſes's meaning. Solomon Iarchi, one of the principal of the Rabbins ſpeaks more expreſly to this purpoſe; and makes this gloſs or comment upon Moſes's words. Benedixit ei, i. e. in manna, &c. God bleſſed the ſeventh day, i. e. in mannah, becauſe for every day of the week, an homer of it fell upon the earth, and a double portion on the ſixth, and ſanctified it, i. e. in mannah, becauſe it fell not on the ſeventh day at all. And in this place (ſaith he) the Scripture ſpeaks as of a thing that was to come. But what need more be ſaid. Mercer, in Gen. ii. a learned Proteſtant, and one much converſant in the Rabbins, confeſſeth that the Rabbins generally referred this place and paſſage to the following times, even to the ſanctification of the Sabbath, eſtabliſhed by the law of Moſes. And howſoever, for his own part; he is of opinion that the firſt Fathers being taught by God, kept the ſeventh day holy; yet he conceives, withal, that the commandment of keeping holy the Sabbath-Day, was not made till afterwards. Nam hinc (from God's own reſting on that day) poſtea præceptum de Sabbato natum eſt, as he there hath it. Doubtleſs, the Jews, who ſo much doted on their Sabbath, would not by any means have robbed it of ſo great antiquity, had they had any ground to approve thereof, or not known the contrary. So that the ſcope of Moſes in this preſent place, was not to ſhew the time when, but the occaſion, why the Lord did after ſanctify the ſeventh day for a Sabbath-Day, viz. becauſe on that day he reſted from the works which he had created.

Nor was it otherwiſe conceived, than that Moſes here did ſpeak by way of prolepſis, or anticipation, till Ambroſe Catharin, one of the great ſticklers in the Council of Trent, broached the contrary. He, in his comment on that text, falls very foul upon Toſtatus; and therein leads the dance to others, who have ſince taken up the ſame opinion. It is a fooliſh thing, ſaith he, in Gen. ii. that (as a certain writer fancieth) the ſanctification of that day which Moſes ſpeaks of, ſhould not be true as of that very point of time whereof he ſpeaks it, but rather is to be referred unto the time wherein he wrote; as if the meaning only were, that then it ſhould be ſanctified when it was ordered and appointed by the law of Moſes. And this he calleth a fooliſh and abſurd conceit, contrary unto Moſes's words, and to his meaning. Yet the ſame Catharin doth affirm in the ſelf-ſame book, that nothing is more frequent in the Holy Scriptures than theſe anticipations. See Heylin's hiſt. of the ſabbath, p. 6, 7.

Others, that have took part with Catharinus againſt Toſtatus, have had as ill ſucceſs as he, in being forced either to grant the uſe of anticipation in the Holy Scripture, or elſe to run upon a tenet, wherein they are not like to have any followers. I will inſtance only in two particulars, both Engliſhmen, and both exceeding zealous in the preſent cauſe. The firſt was Dr. Bound, who was the firſt broached Sabbatarian ſpeculations in the Church of England. I deny not, ſaith he, but that the Scripture ſpeaketh often of things, as though they had been ſo before, becauſe they were ſo then when the things were written. As when it is ſaid of Abraham, that he removed unto a mountain eaſtward of Bethel, whereas it was not Bethel till above a hundred years after. The like may be ſaid of another place in the book of Judges, called Bochin, &c. yet in this place of Geneſis it is not ſo. And why not ſo in this, as well as thoſe? Becauſe, ſaith he, Moſes treateth there of the ſanctification of the Sabbath, not only becauſe it was ſo then, when he wrought that book, but eſpecially becauſe it was ſo then even from the Creation. Which, by his leave, is not ſo much a reaſon of his opinion, as a plain begging of the queſtion. The ſecond was Dr. Ames, the firſt that ſowed Bound's doctrine of the ſabbath in the Netherlands. Who ſaith expreſly firſt, and in general terms, that no example of the like anticipation can be found in Scripture; the contrary whereof is clearly proved by Dr. Heylin, as quoted before. And we find it in the ſixteenth of Exodus, ver. 32. that this is the thing which the Lord commandeth: Fill an omer of it [of the mannah] to be kept for your generations, that they may ſee the bread wherewith I have fed you in the wilderneſs, when I brought you forth from the land of Egypt.

It followeth in the text, ver. 34. That as the Lord commanded Moſes, ſo Aaron laid it up before the teſtimony to be kept. Here is an ordinance of God's, an inſtitution of the Lord, and this related in the ſame manner, by anticipation, as the former was. Lyra upon the place affirms expreſly, that it is ſpoken there per anticipationem: And ſo doth Uatablus, in his annotations on that Scripture. Therefore, Calvin tells us on this text of Moſes, that indeed it could not well be otherwiſe interpreted. For how could Aaron lay up a pot of manna to be kept before the teſtimony, when as yet there was neither ark nor tabernacle, and ſo no teſtimony before which to keep it. So to conclude, Moſes hath told us in the place before remembred, that the children of Iſrael did eat manna forty years, ver. 35. which is not otherwiſe true, in that place and time, in which he tells it, but by the help and figure of anticipation; and doth relate unto the time wherein Moſes wrote: And therefore no ſufficient warrant to fetch the inſtitution of the ſabbath, from the firſt beginnings.

One only thing I have to add, and that is the reaſon which moved Moſes, to make this mention of the ſabbath, even in the firſt beginning of the Book of God, and ſo long time before the inſtitution of the ſame. Which doubtleſs was, the better to excite the Jews to obſerve that day, from which they ſeemed at firſt to be much averſe; and therefore, were not only to be minded of it, by a memento in the front of the commandment; but by an intimation of the equity and reaſon of it, even in the entrance of God's Book, derived from God's firſt reſting on that day after all his works, as Theodoret hath reſolved it, in his queſtions on the Book of Geneſis, qu. 21.

I ſay an intimation of the equity and reaſon of it, for that is as much as can be gathered from that place; tho' ſome have laboured what they could, to make the ſanctifying of the ſeventh day, therein mentioned, a precept given by God to our father Adam, touching the ſanctifying of that day, to his publick worſhip. Of this I ſhall not now ſay much, becauſe the practice will diſprove it. Only I cannot but report the mind and judgment of Pererius a learned Jeſuit; who amongſt other reaſons that he hath alledged, to prove the obſervation of the ſabbath not to have took beginning in the firſt infancy of the world, makes this for one; that generally the fathers have agreed on this, &c. That God impoſed no other law on Adam, than that of the forbidden fruit of the tree of knowledge. Which law, (ſaith Tertullian, adv. Jud.) had been ſufficient for the juſtification of man, had it been obſerved. For in that law, all other precepts were included, which afterwards were given by Moſes. Then Baſil ſaith, the firſt commandment given by God to Adam was, that he ſhould not eat of the tree of knowledge, de Jejunio. The very ſame is affirmed by Ambroſe, lib. de Elia & Jejunio, c. 3. So perfectly agree in this, the greateſt lights both of African, the eaſtern, and the weſtern Churches. If ſo, if that the law of abſtinence had been alone ſufficient for the juſtification of our father Adam, as Tertullian thinks; or if it were the firſt law, given by God unto him, as both Baſil and Ambroſe are of opinion; then was there no ſuch law at all then made, as that of ſanctifying of the ſabbath; or elſe not made according to that time and order, wherein this paſſage of the Scripture is laid down by Moſes. And if not then, there is no other ground for this commandment in the Book of God, before the wandring of God's people in the wilderneſs, and the fall of manna. A thing ſo clear, that ſome of thoſe, who willingly would have the ſabbath to have been kept from the firſt creation, have not the confidence to aſcribe the keeping of it, to any ordinance of God, but only to the voluntary imitation of his people.

Much leſs did any of the fathers, or other ancient Chriſtian Writers, conceive that ſanctifying of the ſabbath, or one day in ſeven, was naturally ingrafted in the mind of man, from his firſt creation. 'Tis true, they tell us of a law, which naturally was ingrafted in him. So Chryſoſtom (in Rom. vii. 12. hom. 12.) affirms, that neither Adam, nor any other man, did ever live without the guidance of this law; and that it was imprinted in the ſoul of man, aſſoon as he was made a living creature. But neither he nor any other, did ever tell us that the ſabbath was a part of this law of nature; nay, ſome of them expreſly have affirmed the contrary. Thus Theodoret ſays, that theſe commandments, Thou ſhalt not kill, Thou ſhalt not commit adultery, Thou ſhalt not ſteal, and others of that kind, were generally implanted by the law of nature, in the minds of men: But for the keeping of the ſabbath, it came not in by nature, but by Moſes's law, At ſabbati obſervandi non natura magiſtra, ſed latio legis, in Ezek. xx. But hereof we ſhall ſpeak more largely, when we are come unto the promulgation of the law, in the time of Moſes; where it will evidently appear to be a poſitive inſtitution only, adapted peculiarly to the Jews; and never otherwiſe eſteemed of, than a Jewiſh ordinance.

It is true, that all men generally have agreed on this, that it is conſonant to the law of nature, to ſet apart ſome time to God's publick ſervice; but that this time ſhould rather be the ſeventh day, than any other, that they impute not unto any thing in nature; but either to Divine, Legal, or Eccleſiaſtical Inſtitution. The School-men, Papiſts, Proteſtants, men of almoſt all perſuaſions in religion, have ſo reſolved it. And for the antients, our venerable Bede aſſures us, that to the fathers before the law, all days were equal; the ſeventh day having no prerogative before the others: And this he calls, naturalis ſabbati libertatem, in Luc. 19. the liberty of the natural ſabbath, which ought, ſaith he, to be reſtored at our Saviour's coming. If ſo, if that the ſabbath or time of reſt unto the Lord, was naturally left free and arbitrary, then certainly it was not reſtrained more unto one day than another; or to the ſeventh day, more than to the ſixth or eighth. Even Ambroſe Catharin, as ſtout a champion as he was for the antiquity of the ſabbath, finds himſelf at a loſs about it. For having taken for granted, as he might indeed, that men by the preſcript of nature, were to aſſign peculiar times for the ſervice of God, and adding, that the very Gentiles uſed ſo to do; is fain to ſhut up all with an ignoramus. We cannot well reſolve what day eſpecially was obſerved by thoſe, who worſhipped God in the times of old. Doctor Bound, the Engliſh ſabbitarian patriarch, who firſt amongſt us here endeavoured to advance the Lord's-day into the place of the Jewiſh ſabbath; and fained a pedigree of the ſabbath even from Adam's infancy; hath herein ſaid enough to betray his cauſe, and thoſe that ſince have either built upon his foundation; or beautified their undertakings with his collections. Indeed, ſaith he, this law was given in the beginning, not ſo much by the light of nature, as the reſt of the nine commandments were; but by expreſs words when God ſanctified it. For though this be in the law of nature, that ſome days ſhould be ſeparated to God's worſhip, as appears by the practice of the Gentiles; yet that it ſhould be every ſeventh day, the Lord himſelf ſet down in expreſs words; which otherwiſe by the light of nature they could never have found, 2d Edit. p. 11. and 16. So that by his confeſſion, there is no ſabbath to be found in the law of nature; no more than by the teſtimony of the fathers, in any poſitive law, or Divine Appointment, until the decalogue was given by Moſes. But

In regard to any myſterioufneſs in the number ſeven, much hath been ſaid therein; indeed, ſo much, that we may wonder at the ſtrange niceties of ſome men, and the unprofitable pains they have taken, in ſearching out the myſteries of this number; the better to advance, as they conceive, the reputation of the ſabbath. Aug. Steuchius, in Gen. 2. hath affirmed in general, that this day and number is moſt natural, and moſt agreeable to Divine Employments, and therefore accounted in all times and nations, as moſt venerable; and ſo have many others ſaid ſince him. But he that lead the way unto him, and to all the reſt, is Philo the Jew; who being a great follower of Plato, took up his way of trading in the myſteries of ſeveral numbers; wherein he was ſo intricate and perplexed, that numero Platonis obſcurius, did grow at laſt into a proverb, Tull. ad Attic. l. 7 Epl. 13. This Philo therefore platonizing, firſt tells us of this number of ſeven, De mundi opificio, that he perſuades himſelf, there is not any man able ſufficiently to extol it; as being far above all the powers of rhetorick; and that the Pythagoreans, from whom firſt Plato learned thoſe trifles, did uſually reſemble it, τῷ ἡγεμόνι τῶν συμπάντων, even to Jove himſelf. To theſe might be added Hippocrates, de leg. alleg. l. 1. and apud Euſeb. Prepar. l. 8. c. 7. Cenſorinus de die natal. c. 10. Varro in Gellius, l. 3. c. 10, &c.

But other men as good as they, find no ſuch myſtery in this number; and ſome of thoſe which ſo magnify the ſeventh, have found, as weighty myſteries in many of the others alſo. In which I could prove, the exceeding great, both contradiction and contention, that is between them in theſe needleſs curioſities; by which we may the better find the ſlightneſs of thoſe arguments, which ſeem to place a great morality in this number of ſeven; as if it were by nature the moſt proper number for the ſervice of God. And firſt, whereas the learned men before-mentioned, affix a ſpecial power unto it in the works of nature, Juſtin the Martyr plainly tells us, πρὸς τὴν δύναμιν τῆς φύσεως, &c. That the accompliſhment of the works of nature is to be aſcribed to nature only, not unto any period of time accounted by the number of ſeven, &c. See this more at large, and many teſtimonies collected in Heylin's hiſt. of the ſabbath, page 18, &c.

And, if we conſult the Scriptures, they will not help us, or give the ſeventh day naturally, and in itſelf, more capacity or fitneſs for God's worſhip, then the ninth or tenth. For firſt, the Scriptures give not more honour to this number in ſome texts thereof, than it detracts from it in others; ſee Pererius in Gen. 6. n. 17. And ſecondly, they ſpeak as highly of the other numbers, as they do of this; ſee Cracanthorp cont. Spalat. c. 30. Hence we conclude, that by the light of Scripture, we find not any thing in nature, why either every ſeventh day ſhould; or every ſecond day ſhould not be a ſabbath. Not to ſay any thing of the other numbers, of which the like might be affirmed, if we would trouble our ſelves about it.

It is true, this trick of trading in the myſteries of numbers, is of long ſtanding in the Church, and of no leſs danger; firſt borrowed from the Platoniſts and the Pythagoreans; by the ancient hereticks, Marcion, Valentinus, Baſilides, and the reſt of that heretical crew; the better to diſguiſe their errors, and palliate their impieties. Some of the fathers afterwards took up the deviſe, perhaps to foil the hereticks at their own weapons; though many of them purpoſely declined it. Chryſoſtom, ex. g. diſlikes it. Who on thoſe words in the 7th. of Geneſis, hom. 24. by ſeven and by ſeven (which is the number now debeated) inſtructs us thus. Many, ſaith he, tell ſtrange matters of this fact, and taking an occaſion hence, make many obſervations out of ſeveral numbers. Whereas not obſervation, but only an unſeaſonable curioſity hath produced thoſe fictions, Ὅθεν καὶ αἱ πλείους τῶν αἱρέσεων ἐτεχθήσαν, from whence ſo many hereſies had their firſt orginal. For oftentimes (that out of our abundance we may fit their fancies) we find the even or equal number no leſs commemorated in Holy Scripture, as when God ſent out his diſciples by two, and two; when he choſe twelve Apoſtles, and left four Evangeliſts. But theſe things it were needleſs to ſuggeſt to you, who have ſo many times been taught, to ſtop your ears againſt ſuch follies. Auguſtin alſo, though he had deſcanted awhile upon the myſteries of this number; De Civit. Dei, l. 11. c. 31. yet he cuts off himſelf, in the very middle, as it were, leaſt he ſhould ſeem to ſhew his reading, with more pride, than profit. And thereupon he gives this excellent rule, which I could wiſh had been more practiſed in this caſe: We muſt not take, ſaith he, ſo much heed of numbers, as to forget at the laſt, both weight and meaſure. And this we ſhould the rather do, becauſe that generally there is no rule laid down, or any reaſon to be given in nature, why ſome particular numbers have been ſet apart for particular uſes, when other numbers might have ſerved; why Jericho ſhould be rather encompaſſed ſeven times, than ſix or eight; why Abraham rather trained three hundred and eighteen of his ſervants, than three hundred and twenty; or why his ſervant took ten camels with him into Padan-Aram, and not more or leſs; with infinite others of this kind in the Levitical law. Yet I deny not, but that ſome reaſon may be given, why in the Scripture, things are ſo often ordered by ſevens and ſevens; as Juſtin Martyr tells, the better to preſerve the memory of the world's creation, Reſponſ. ad qu. 69. Another reaſon may be added, which is, by this inculcating of the number of ſeven, unto the Jews, to make that people, who otherwiſe were at firſt averſe from it, continually mindful of the ſabbath. Numerum ſeptenarium propter ſabbatum Judæis familiarem eſſe, was the obſervation of Hierom, in Eſaiæ 4. So that it appears from the premiſes, that there is no ſabbath to be found in the beginning of the world, nor mentioned as a thing conſtituted in the ſecond of Geneſis. Yet,

I grant that from thence we may, and ought to, gather a ſufficient intimation of the equity and reaſon for ſuch an inſtitution, becauſe God reſted upon that day after he had finiſhed all his works. Not that we are falſely to ſuppoſe with Celſus, that this reſt of God was the effect of any wearineſs or fatigue in the Deity, or that God had need of ſleep; ſee Origen, contr. Celſum; for we are to underſtand nothing leſs, and the meaning of the text is plainly this, God deſiſted then from adding any thing, de novo, or more, unto the world by him created; but not from governing the ſame; which is a work to be as highly prized by us, as the firſt creation, and from which God never reſted. —— Sabbaths, and all days are alike in reſpect of providence, in reference to the univerſal government of the world and nature, "there is no ſabbath, ſaith an ancient author, whereon God doth reſt from the adminiſtration of the world by him created; whereon he doth not make his ſun to ſhine both on the juſt and unjuſt;" ſee Origen hom. 23. in Numb. which is agreeable to that ſaying of the Son of God, I work and my Father alſo worketh; ſee Auſtin contr. Fauſt. Manich. l. 16. c. 6. Therefore, when we read, that God reſted on the ſeventh day, we underſtand no more than his reſting from creation only, and not from preſervation alſo; his reſt was a ceſſation or leaving off from adding any thing, as then, unto the world by him created. And thus laid a foundation of a future inſtitution of an holy ſabbath, that ſo the Jews, by his example, might learn to reſt from their worldly labours, and be the better enabled to meditate on the works of God, and to commemorate his goodneſs maniſeſted in the creation of the world. Whence I conclude, that we have no teſtimony from Scripture, of any other ſanctification of this day by the Lord our God, than only that he reſted on it now, and afterwards commanded the Jews that they ſhould ſanctify the ſame. And conſequently, the Chriſtian Fathers have unanimouſly agreed with ſome of the Jewiſh Rabbins, that there was no ſabbath kept amongſt men, till the days of Moſes's miniſtration; ſee Juſtin Martyr's dial. cum Tryphone, Irenæus adv. hereſ. lib. 4. c. 30. Tertullian adv. Judæos and Euſebius, who ſhewing, that the religion of the Patriarchs before Moſes, was nothing different from Chriſtianity, argues by this gradation; They were not circumciſed, no more are we; they kept not any ſabbath, no more do we; they were not bound to abſtinence from ſundry kind of meats, which are prohibited by Moſes, no more are we; as it is to be found in his Eccl. hiſt. lib. i. c. 4. Demonſt. Evang. l. 1. c. 6. de Præperat. Evang. l. 7. In which argument he is followed by Epiphanius, adv. her. lib. i. n. 5. But,

Though all this be granted, that there was no poſitive inſtitution of a ſabbath in the days of our firſt parents; yet ſome have thought that the ſabbath began to be kept in the days of Enos, the ſon of Seth, or grandſon to Adam, becauſe we read in the fourth chapter of Geneſis, that in his days, Men began to call upon the name of the Lord. But this is a pitiful ſhift, and certainly they that pretend to argue thence for a ſabbath, are quite ignorant of the meaning of theſe words in the original; which ſignifies that then in thoſe days men began to ſet up idols both in the name and after the likeneſs of God, ſays Hierom. in loc. or, profanely to call upon the name of the Lord, Ainſworth on this text. For in thoſe days idolatry began, and the people worſhipped the ſtars and all the hoſt of Heaven ſo generally, that at laſt there were few left that acknowledged God, as Enoch, Methuſelah, Noah, Sem, and Heber. And of Enoch Tertullian leaves us this remarkable ſentence: "Enoch, that righteous man, being neither circumciſed, nor a ſabbath-keeper, was by the Lord tranſlated, and ſaw not death, for our inſtruction, that we, without the burden of the law of Moſes, ſhall be found acceptable unto God." Adv. Judæos.

Again, ſome obſerving that Noah ſent the dove out of the ark on the ſeventh day from the time of her return, Gen. viii. 10—12. would argue from thence, that Noah kept the ſabbath-day: So Hoſpinian de Feſt. c. 3. To which I anſwer, with Toſtatus, in Gen. viii. Noah wanting to know whether the waters were decreaſed, was to regard the motions of the moon, by which the waters are regulated; for, as ſhe is either in oppoſition or conjunction with the ſun, in her increaſe or in her decreaſe, there muſt be a proportionable increaſe or falling of the waters: Therefore Noah, conſidering the moon in her ſeveral quarters, which are commonly at ſeven days diſtance, ſent forth his birds to bring him tidings; for, the text tells us, that he ſent out the raven and the dove four times. And the fourth time, the moon being then in its laſt quarter, when both by the ordinary courſe of nature the waters uſually are, and were then actually, by the will of God, much decreaſed, the dove, which had been ſent out, finding dry land whereon to ſet her foot, returned no more." This is a good reaſon why Noah there mentions the ſeventh day, and ſhews, that he did it not in regard of the ſuppoſed ſabbath: Neither did he leave any commandment for the obſervation of a ſabbath-day, though he enjoined them ſeven other precepts; Firſt, to deal juſtly with all men: Secondly, to bleſs and magnify the name of God: Thirdly, to abſtain from idolatry and the worſhip of falſe gods: Fourthly, to forbear all unlawful luſts: Fifthly, not to ſhed blood: Sixthly, not to ſteal: And ſeventhly, not to eat the fleſh, nor any member of a beaſt taken from it when it was alive; thereby to prevent all inhumanity and cruelty. See Schindler. in Lexico, p. 1530. Cunæus de Republica Heb. ii. 19. and R. Maimon de ſabbath, c. 20. ſect. 14.

Seeing then there is no proof of its being obſerved in the days of Noah's own children, much leſs can it be expected in the confuſion and diſperſion of his children's children, the builders of the tower of Babel. They that durſt bid defiance to the Heaven or Throne of God, were unlikely perſons to keep a ſabbath to the God of Heaven. Beſides, it was morally impoſſible for them to obſerve the ſame ſabbath-day in every nation into which they were diſperſed, becauſe in diſtant longitudes, or according to the diſtances from the firſt meridian, every day varieth, in ſome places a quarter, in ſome half, and in others a greater or proportionable diſtance a whole day; as may be proved in this manner.

If the earth be ſpherical, and the ſun revolves about it every twenty-four hours, then it muſt be granted, that the places in the eaſt ſee the ſun ſooner than thoſe regions that lie in the weſt, in this proportion of time: To every hour of the ſun's motion we aſſign a certain number of miles upon the terreſtrial globe; that is to ſay, we compute every fifteen degrees, which is the diſtance of the meridians, to make one hour, and every fifteen miles upon the earth, correſpond to one minute of that hour: So that if one city ſtands three meridians, which make 27000 miles on the terreſtrial globe eaſtward of another, ſuch eaſtern city ſhall have the ſun in its meridian, or noon-day, three hours ſooner than the other 27000 miles in the weſt thereof, and conſequently in 10800 miles, which is computed to be half the compaſs of the earth, we ſhall find twelve hours difference in the riſing and ſetting of the ſun, and likewiſe in the noon and midnight: For, as it is noted before, coſmographers allotting fifteen degrees of the ſun's diurnal motion to every hour, if thoſe fifteen degrees be multiplied by twenty-four hours, which is the compaſs of a natural day, the product will be 360, which is the number of degrees in the whole circle. Hence we obſerve, that as the ſons of Noah diſperſed themſelves, ſome eaſtward, others weſtward, ſome further, and ſome at a ſhorter diſtance, and thereby changing longitudes with their habitations, muſt of neceſſity alter the difference of times and days, and conſequently could not poſſibly keep all one and the ſame ſabbath-day; much leſs can it be ſaid to be poſſible in their numerous poſterity, if we conſider the various and manifold tranſportation of colonies, and tranſmigration of people from one nation to another region, whereby the times muſt of neceſſity be ſuppoſed to vary: Therefore, ſays the author of the Practice of Piety, the Jewiſh ſabbath cannot be preciſely kept in the ſame inſtant of time, every where in the world.

I could continue my account till the time that Moſes, by God's command, publiſhed and enjoined the obſervation of the ſabbath-day to the Iſraelites, after their departure out of Egypt; but as that would be too tedious for our intended purpoſe, I refer my reader, at greater leiſure, to Dr. Heylin's hiſtory of the ſabbath, c. 3. part 1. and proceed to the time in which the ſabbath was made known to the people of God.

The firſt mention we find in the Scripture of the people of God keeping a ſabbath, in Exodus, To morrow is the reſt of the holy ſabbath unto the Lord: And then when the morrow was come, he ſaid, To day is a ſabbath unto the Lord.—Six days ye ſhall gather it [manna] but on the ſeventh day, which is the ſabbath, in it there ſhall be none.—See, for that the Lord hath given you the ſabbath, therefore he giveth you on the ſixth day the bread of two days; abide ye every man in his place, let no man go out of his place on the ſeventh day, ſo the people reſted on the ſeventh day; ſee Exodus xvi. 23—31. In which ſtory, and its context, from the fifth verſe of the ſame chapter, it is manifeſt, that by this miracle the people came to know which was preciſely the ſeventh day from the world's creation, whereof they had lived before in profound ignorance; becauſe, though they had on the ſixth day gathered twice as much manna as they uſed to do, according as the Lord had directed by his ſervant Moſes; they underſtood not what they did, at leaſt why they did it. The rulers of the congregation, ver. 22. informs us, came and told Moſes of it; and he, as God before had taught him, acquainted them, that on the morrow ſhould be the reſt of the holy ſabbath unto the Lord, ver. 23. and that they were to keep the overplus until the morning. Nay, ſo far were the people from knowing any thing of the ſabbath, or of God's reſt upon that day, that though the Prophet had thus preached unto them of a ſabbath's reſt, the people gave ſmall credit to him. For, it is ſaid, that ſome of the people went out to gather on the ſeventh day, ver. 27. (which was the ſeventh day after, or the ſecond ſabbath, as ſome think) notwithſtanding all that had been ſpoken, and that the manna ſtank not, as on other days. So that this reſting of the people, was the firſt ſanctifying of the ſabbath mentioned in the Scriptures; and God's great care to make proviſion for his people on the day before, the bleſſing he beſtowed upon it. And this is that which Solomon Jarchi, ch. i. n. 2. and tells us, as we before noted, benedixit ei, [i. e. in manna quia omnibus diebus ſeptimanæ deſcendit Omer pro ſingulis, & ſexto panis duplex; & ſanctificavit eum,] the Hebrew Doctors generallo affirm; aſſuring us, that the commandment of the ſabbath is the foundation and ground of all the reſt, as being given before them all at the fall of manna, De feſt Judæor. c 3. apud Hoſpin. This happened on the two and twentieth day of the ſecond month, after their coming out of Egypt, and of the world's creation, Anno 2044, the people being then in the wilderneſs of Sin, which was their ſeventh ſtation.

The ſeventh day after, being the nine and twentieth of the ſecond month, is thought by ſome, I know not upon what authority, to be that day whereon ſome of the people, diſtruſting all that Moſes ſaid, went out to gather manna, as on other days; but whether they were then in the wilderneſs of Sin, or were encamped in Dophkath, Aluſh, or Rhephidim, which were their next removes, we dare not aſcertain, becauſe not clear in the Scripture account. Moſt likely, that they were in the laſt ſtation, conſidering the great buſineſſes there performed; the fight with Amalek, and the new ordering of the government by Jethro's council; and that upon the third day of the third month, which was the Thurſday following, they were advanced ſo far as to the wilderneſs of Sinai. I ſay, the third day of the third month; for where the text hath it, In the third month when the children of Iſrael were gone forth out of Egypt, the ſame day came they into the wilderneſs of Sinai, Exod. xix. 1. by the ſame day is meant the ſame day of the month, which was the third day, being Thurſday, after our account. The morrow after, Exod xix ver. 3—10, 11. Moſes went up unto the Lord, and had commandment from him to ſanctify the people that day, and to morrow, and to make them ready againſt the third day; God meaning on that day to come down in the eyes of all the people in Mount Sinai, and to make known his will unto them, ver. 17. That day being come, which was the Saturday, or Sabbath, the people were brought out of the camp to meet with God, and placed Moſes at the nether part of the mountain; Moſes aſcending firſt to God, and deſcending after to the people, to charge them that they did not paſs their bounds before appointed.

It ſeems the Sabbath's reſt was not ſo eſtabliſhed, but that the people were inclined to take the pains to climb the mountain, and to behold the wonders which were done upon it, ver. 21. had they not had a ſpecial charge unto the contrary. Things being thus ordered, it pleaſed the Lord to publiſh and proclaim his law unto the people, in thunder, ſmoak, and lightnings, and the noiſe of a trumpet, uſing therein the miniſtry of his Holy Angels; which law we call the decalogue, or the ten commandments, and contains in it the whole moral law, or the law of nature. This had before been naturally imprinted in the minds of men; however, that in tract of time the character thereof had been much defaced, ſo dimmed and darkned, that God's own people ſtood in need of a new impreſſion; and therefore was proclaimed in this ſolemn manner, that ſo the letter of the law might leave the clearer ſtamp in their affections. A law which in it ſelf was general and univerſal, equally appertaining both to Jew and Gentile; the Gentiles which know not the law, doing by nature the things contained in the law, as Paul hath told us, Rom. ii. 14. but as at this time publiſhed on Mount Sinai, and as delivered to the people by the hand of Moſes, they obliged only thoſe of the houſe of Iſrael, becauſe if the decalogue, as given by Moſes to the Jews, did concern the Gentiles, the Gentiles had been bound by the fourth commandment to obſerve the Sabbath in as ſtrict a manner as the Jews. Since therefore it is manifeſt that the Gentiles never were obliged to obſerve the Sabbath, it followeth that they neither were, nor poſſibly could be bound to any of the others, as given by Moſes to the Jews. We may conclude from hence, that had the fourth commandment been merely moral, it had no leſs concerned the Gentiles. See Zanchius de Redemp. l. 1. c. ii. th. 1. But here let no one be deceived, in taking this commandment to be only ceremonial, for it is, indeed, of a mixed or middle nature; it is moral as to the duty, that there muſt be a time appointed for the ſervice of God; and ceremonial, as unto the day, to be one of ſeven, and to continue that whole day, and to reſt that day from all kind of work. As moral, it is placed amongſt the ten commandments, extending unto all mandkind, and written naturally in our hearts by the hand of nature; as ceremonial, it appertains to the Levitical law, peculiar only to the Jews, and to be reckoned with the reſt of Moſes's inſtitutes. See Aquinas, 2. 2æ. qu. 122. art. 4. reſp. ad primum. Toſtatus in Exod. xx. qu. 11. Petr. Galatinus lib. 11. cap. 9. and Bonadventure, in his ſermon on the fourth commandment, and divers others. And,

If we would enquire on what motives God was pleaſed to preſcribe a ſabbath to the Jews, more at this time than any of the former ages; both the fathers and Scripture inform us. Juſtin Martyr, gives this general reaſon, becauſe of their hard-heartedneſs, and irregular courſes; ſo ſaith Auſtin alſo in Qu. ex Nov. Teſt. 69. but Gregory Nyſſen, in Teſtim. adventus Dei in carne; makes the ſpecial motive to be this, ad ſedandum nimium eorum pecuniæ ſtudium, to reſtrain the people from the love of money. For coming out of Egypt very poor and bare, and having almoſt nothing but what they borrowed of the Egyptians; they gave themſelves, ſaith he, unto continual and inceſſant labour, the ſooner to attain to riches. Therefore ſaid God, that they ſhould labour ſix days, and reſt the ſeventh. Damaſcen, de fide Orth. l. 4. c. 24. ſaith ſomewhat to this purpoſe, εἰδὼς ὁ θεὸς τὸ, πασχὺ και φιλόσαρκον, &c. God, ſaith he, ſeeing the carnal and the covetous diſpoſition of the Iſraelites, appointed them to keep a ſabbath, that ſo their ſervants and their cattle might have of reſt. And then he adds, ἅμα δὲ καὶ σχολὴν ἄγοντες, &c. That thus reſting from their worldly buſineſs, they might repair unto the Lord in Pſalms, and hymns and ſpiritual ſongs, and meditation of the Scriptures; there were many more of the ſame opinion. But to proceed:

A ſecond motive might be this, to make them always mindful of that ſpiritual reſt, which they were to keep from the acts of ſin; and that eternal reſt that they did expect from all toil and miſery. In reference unto this eternal reſt, Auguſtin tells us, that the ſabbath was commanded to the Jews, as a ſhadow of the things to come, which God doth promiſe unto thoſe that do the works of righteouſneſs, de Gen. adlitl. l. 4. c. 11. And in relation to the other, the Lord himſelf hath told us, that he had given his ſabbath unto the Jews, to be a ſign between him and them, that they might know, that he was the Lord that ſanctified them, Exod. xxxi. 13. which is again repeated by Ezech. cap. xx. 12. That they might know that I am the Lord which ſanctifieth them. For God, as Gregory Nyſſen, de reſurrect. chr. orat. 1. notes it, ſeems only to propoſe this unto himſelf, that by all means he might at leaſt deſtroy in man, his inbred corruption, τȣ̃το ἐν περιτομῆ, τȣ̃το ἐν τῷ σαββάτῳ. This was his aim in circumciſion, and in the ſabbath, and in forbidding them ſome kind of meats; for by the ſabbath he informed them of a reſt from ſin. Hence I conclude, that the ſabbath was intended for the Jews alone. For, had God given the ſabbath to all other people, as he did to them, it muſt have alſo been a ſign, that the Lord had ſanctified all people, as he did the Jews.

There is another motive yet to be conſidered, and that concerns as well the day, as the inſtitution. God might have given the Jews a ſabbath, and yet not tied the ſabbath to one day of ſeven, or to the ſeventh preciſely from the world's creation. God, ſaith Toſtatus, in Exod. xx. qu. 11. might have ordered it, to have his ſabbath on the Saturday, or on the Tueſday, or any other day whatever of the week, he might have appointed it, once or twice a year, or every month, as he had pleaſed. And might not God as well exceed this number, as fall ſhort thereof? Yes, ſay the Proteſtant Doctors, he might. He might have made each third, or fourth, or fifth day a ſabbath; indeed, as many as he pleaſed. But Juſtin Martyr ſays, God made this choice, to keep God always in their minds, Cyril anſwers to that point exceeding fully. The Jews, ſaith he, de feſt. Paſchal. hom. 6. became infected with the idolatries of Egypt, worſhipped the ſun, and moon, and ſtars, and the Hoſt of Heaven; which ſeems to be inſinuated in the fourth of Deut. ver. 19. Therefore, that they might underſtand the Heavens to be God's workmanſhip, eos opificem ſuum imitari jubet, he propoſeth to them that they imitate their Creator; that reſting on the ſabbath-day, they might the better underſtand the reaſon of the feſtival. Which if they did, ſaith he, in caſe they reſted on that day, whereon God had reſted, it was a plain confeſſion that all things were made by him; and conſequently, that there were no other God's beſides him, Et hæc una ratio ſabbato indictæ quietis; indeed the one, and only reaſon that is mentioned in the body of the commandment, which reflects only on God's reſt from all his work, which he had made, and leaves that as the abſolute and ſole occaſion, why the ſeventh day was rather choſen for the ſabbath, than the ſixth, or eighth, or any other. Lay all that hath been ſaid together, and we muſt conclude, that as the ſabbath was not known till Moſes's time; ſo being known, it was peculiar unto Iſrael only. Non niſi Moſaicæ legis temporibus in uſu fuiſſe ſeptimi diei cultum; nec poſtea niſi penes Hebræos perduraſſe, as Torniellus witneſſeth; Annal. d. 7.

Thus having ſettled the time when the Jewiſh ſabbath was inſtituted, and ſhewn that the keeping the ſabbath on the ſeventh day of the week was not a moral, but only a ceremonial duty commanded by the Levitical law, I might now proceed to ſhew in what manner the Jews kept their ſabbath, and how God puniſhed ſome of them for the violation of his command to keep it holy unto him; but as ſuch an account would be foreign to our purpoſe, I refer you to Heylin's hiſtory of the ſabbath, part 1. ch. v, vi, vii, viii. and ſhall only obſerve, what our Redeemer taught and did to rectiſy the abuſes of, and in the ſabbath.

Had there been no other buſineſs for our Saviour to do the inventions of men in the ſabbath-worſhip ſeemed to require his preſence, to rectify thoſe dangerous errors, which the ſcribes and Phariſees had introduced concerning the ſabbath-day.

The Phariſees had taught, that it was unlawful on the Sabbath-day, either to heal the impotent, or relieve the ſick, or feed the hungry; but he confutes them in them all, both by his acts, and by his diſputations. Whatever he maintained by argument, he made good by practice. Did they accuſe his followers of gathering corn upon the Sabbath, being then an hungred? He lets them know what David did in the like extremity. Their eating, or their gathering on the Sabbath-day, take you which you will, was not more blameable, nay, not ſo blameable by the law; as David's eating of the ſhew-bread; which plainly was not to be eat by any, but the prieſt alone. The cures he did upon the Sabbath, what were they more than which themſelves did daily do, in laying ſalves unto thoſe infants whom on the Sabbath-day they had circumciſed. His bidding of the impotent man to take up his bed, and get him gone, which ſeemed ſo odious in their eyes, was it ſo great a toil, as to walk round the walls of Jericho, and bear the ark upon their ſhoulders? or any greater burden to their idle backs, than to lift up the ox, and ſet him free out of that dangerous ditch, into the which the haſty beaſt might fall as well upon the Sabbath, as the other days? Should men take care of oxen, and not God of man? Not ſo. The Sabbath was not made for a lazy idol, which all the nations of the world ſhould fall down and worſhip, but for the eaſe and comfort of the labouring man, that he might have ſome time to refreſh his ſpirits. The Sabbath, ſaith our Saviour, was made for man; man was not made to ſerve the Sabbath. Nor had God ſo irrevocably ſpoke the word, touching the ſanctifying of the Sabbath, that he had left himſelf no power to repeal that law, in caſe he ſaw the purpoſe of the law perverted; the Son of man, even he that was the Son both of God and man, being Lord alſo of the Sabbath. Nay, it is rightly marked by ſome, that Chriſt our Saviour did more works of charity on the Sabbath-day than on all days beſides. What then? Shall it be thought our Saviour came to deſtroy the law? No, God forbid. Himſelf hath told us, that he rather came to fulfil it. He came to let them underſtand the right meaning of it, that for the reſidue of time wherein it was to be in force, they might no longer be led by the Scribes and Phariſees; and ſuch blind guides as did abuſe them. Thus I have briefly ſummed together what I find ſcattered in the writings of the ancient Fathers; which, who deſires to find at large, may look into Irenæus, l. 4. c. 19. & 20. Origen. in Num. hom. 23. Tertull. l. 4. contr. Marcion. Athanaſ. hom. de Semente. p. 1072. edit. gr. lat. Victor Antioch. c. 3. in Marcum. Chryſoſt. hom. 39. in Matth. 12. Epiphan. l. 1. hæreſ. 30. n. 32. Hierom. in Matth. 12. Ambroſ. in c. 3. Luk. l. 3. Auguſtin. cont. Fauſtum. l. 16. c. 28. & lib. 19 c. 9. With one of which laſt Fathers ſayings, we conclude this liſt. Our Saviour's purpoſe, ſaith the Father, cont. adimant. ca. 2. was not to take away the law, but to expound it.

Not then to take away the law; it was to laſt a little longer. He had not yet pronounced, conſummatum eſt, that the law was abrogated. Nor might it ſeem ſo proper for him, to take away one ſabbath from us, which was reſt from labour; until he had provided us of another, which was reſt from ſin. And to provide us ſuch a ſabbath was to coſt him dearer, than words and arguments. He healed us by his word before. Now he muſt heal us by his ſtripes, or elſe no entrance into his reſt, the eternal ſabbath. Beſides the temple ſtood as yet, and whilſt that ſtood, or was in hope to be rebuilt, there was no end to be expected of the legal ceremonies. And

That the ſabbath was to end with other legal ceremonies, is apparent, firſt, becauſe it was an inſtitution of Moſes, and ſecondly, an inſtitution peculiar to the Jewiſh nation; both which we have already proved: And therefore, was to end with the law of Moſes, and the ſtate of the Jewiſh nation.

Which is fully come to paſs, yet we do not ſay there is no ſabbath to be now kept. We know there is a Chriſtian ſabbath, a ſabbath figured out unto us in the fourth commandment, which every Chriſtian muſt keep, that deſires to enter into the reſt of God. This is that ſabbath which the Prophet Iſaiah hath commended to us. Bleſſed is the man that keepeth the ſabbath from polluting it. What ſabbath is it, ſaith Hierom, that is here commanded. The following words, ſaith he, will inform us, that, keeping our hands from doing evil, is the ſabbath here commanded, becauſe in doing what is good we reſt from ſin. The like ſpiritual ſabbath is deſcribed by the man of God in Iſaiah lviii. 13, 14. If thou turn away thy foot from the ſabbath, from doing thy pleaſure on my holy day, &c. not doing thine own way, nor finding thine own pleaſure, nor ſpeaking thine own words; then ſhalt thou delight thy ſelf in the Lord, and I will cauſe thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, &c. Which ſaith Hierom, in loc. muſt be underſtood, ſpiritually. Otherwiſe, if thoſe things are prohibited only on the ſabbaths, than were it lawful for us on the other days, to follow our own ſinful courſes, ſpeak our own idle words, and to purſue our own voluptuous pleaſures; which none can be ſo ſtupid to imagine. And now we have done with the enquiry concerning the Jewiſh ſabbath. So that the next thing to be treated of, is the obſervation of the Lord's-day in the Chriſtian Church, which ſome have thought is ſubſtituted in the place of the Jewiſh ſabbath abrogated by Chriſt. The abrogation of the ſabbath, ſhews plainly that it was no part of the moral law, or law of nature; there being no natural law, which is not perpetual. Tertullian, contr. Marc. l. 2. takes it for confeſſed, or at leaſt makes it plain and evident, temporale fuiſſe mandatum quod quandoque ceſſaret, that it was only a temporary conſtitution, which was in time to have an end. And after him, Procopius Gazæus, in his notes on Exodus, lays down two ſeveral ſorts of laws, whereof ſome were to be perpetual, and ſome were not: Of which laſt ſort were circumciſion, and the ſabbath, Quæ duraverunt uſque in adventum Chriſti, which laſted till our Saviour's coming; and he being come, went out inſenſibly of themſelves. For as Ambroſe rightly tells us, in Col. ii. 16. When the emperor is abſent, we give ſome honour to his ſtate, or repreſentation; but none at all, when he is preſent. And ſo, ſaith he, the ſabbaths, and new-moons, and the other feſtivals, before our Saviour's coming, had a time of honour, during the which they were obſerved; but he being preſent with us, they became neglected leiſurely and by degrees.

There were preparatives unto the ſabbath, before it was proclaimed, as a law, by Moſes; and there were ſome preparatives required, before that law of Moſes was to be repealed. Theſe we ſhall eaſily diſcover, by looking on our Saviour's actions; who gave the firſt hint to his diſciples, for the aboliſhing of the ſabbath, amongſt other ceremonies. It is true, that he did frequently repair unto the ſynagogues on the ſabbath-days; and on thoſe days, did frequently both read and expound the law unto the people. And he came to Nazareth, ſaith the text, Luke iv. 16. where he had been brought up, and as his cuſtom was, he went into the ſynagogue on the ſabbath-day, and ſtood up to read. It was his cuſtom ſo to do, both when he lived a private life, to frequent the ſynagogue; that other men might do the like, by his good example: And after when he undertook the miniſtry, to expound the law unto them, there; that they might be the better by his good inſtructions. Yet did not he conceive, that teaching or expounding the word of God, was annexed only to the ſynagogue, or to the ſabbath. That moſt Divine and Heavenly Sermon, which takes up three whole chapters of Matthew's Goſpel, was queſtionleſs a week day's work; and ſo were moſt of thoſe delivered to us in John; as alſo that, which he did preach unto them from the ſhip-ſide, and divers others. Nay, the text tells us, that he went through every city and village, preaching, and ſhewing the glad tidings of God, Luke viii. 1. Too great a taſk to be performed only on the ſabbath-days; and therefore doubt we not, but that all days equally were taken up, for ſo great a buſineſs. So when he ſent out his Apoſtles to preach the kingdom of God, he bound them not to days and times, but left all at liberty; that they might take their beſt advantages, as occaſion was; and loſe no time in the advancing of their maſter's ſervice. Now, as in this, he ſeemed to give all days the like prerogative, with the ſabbath, for the work of the Goſpel; ſo many other ways, did he abate that eſtimation, which generally the people had conceived of the ſabbath-day. And howſoever the opinion which the people generally had conceived thereof, was grounded, as the times then were, on ſuperſtition, rather than true ſenſe of piety; yet that opinion once abated, it was more eaſily prepared for a diſſolution; and went away at laſt, with leſs noiſe and clamour.

Particulars of this nature we will take along, as they lye in order. His caſting out the unclean ſpirit out of a man, in the ſynagogue of Capernaum, on the ſabbath-day, his curing of Peter's wife's mother, and healing many which were ſick of divers diſeaſes on the ſelf-ſame day; being all works of marvellous mercy, and effected only by his word, brought no clamour with them. But when he cured the impotent man at the pool of Bethſaida, John v. and had commanded him to take up his bed and walk; then did the Jews begin to perſecute him, and ſeek to ſlay him. And how did he excuſe the matter? My Father worketh hitherto, ſaith he, and I alſo work. Whereby, ſaith Origen, Hom. 23. in Numer. he let them underſtand, that there was never any ſabbath wherein God reſted or left off, from having a due care of mankind; and therefore, neither would he intermit ſuch a weighty buſineſs, in any reference to the ſabbath. Which anſwer when it pleaſed them not, but that they ſought their times to kill him; he then remembreth them how they upon the ſabbath uſed to circumciſe a man, John vii. and that he might as lawfully do the one, as they the other. This precedent made his diſciples a little bolder, than otherwiſe perhaps they would have been, Pulling the ears of corn, and rubbing them with their hands, Matt. xii. and eating them to ſatisfy and allay their hunger; which Epiphanius, lib. 1. hæreſ. 30. n. 32. thinks they would not have done, though they were an hungred, had they not found both by his doctrine and example, that the ſabbath did begin to be in its declination. For which, when he, and they, were jointly queſtioned by the Phariſees, he choaks them with the inſtances of what David did in the ſame extremity, when he eat the ſhew-bread; and what the prieſts did every ſabbath, when they ſlew the ſacrifices. In which it is to be conſidered, that in theſe ſeveral defences, our Saviour goes no higher than the legal ceremonies, the ſacrifice, the ſhew-bread, and the circumciſion. No argument or parallel caſe drawn for his juſtification, from the moral law; or any ſuch neglect thereof on the like occaſions. Which plainly ſhews, that he conceived the ſabbath to be no part or member of the moral law; but only to be ranked amongſt the Moſaical ordinances.

It happened on another ſabbath, that in the ſynagogue he beheld a man with a withered hand, Luke vi. 6. and called him forth, and made him come into the midſt, and ſtretch out his hand, and then reſtored it. Hereupon Athanaſius (hom. de ſemente,) notes, that Chriſt reſerved his greateſt miracles for the ſabbath-day; and that he bade the man ſtand forth, in defiance, as it were, of all their malice, and informing humour. His healing of the woman which had been crooked eighteen years, and of the man that had the dropſy; one in the ſynagogue, the other in the houſe of a principal Phariſee, are a ſtanding proof that he feared not their accuſations. But that great cure he wrought on him that was born blind, is moſt remarkable to this purpoſe, John ix. Firſt, in relation to our Saviour, who had before healed others with his word alone; but here he ſpit upon the ground, and made clay thereof, and anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay; ἔργον δὲ ἔϛι πῆλον φυρᾶσαι, but to mould clay and make a plaiſter, was moſt certainly a work, as Epiphanius, l. 1. hæreſ. 30. n. 32. notes. Next, in relation to the patient, whom he commanded to go into the pool of Siloam, and then waſh himſelf; which certainly could not be done without bodily labour.

Theſe words and actions of our Saviour, as before we ſaid, gave the firſt hint to his diſciples for the aboliſhing of the ſabbath, amongſt other ceremonies, which were to have an end, with our Saviour's ſufferings; to be nailed with him, to his croſs, and buried with him, in his grave, for ever. Now, where it was objected in Auſtin's time, why Chriſtians did not keep the ſabbath, ſince Chriſt affirms it of himſelf, that he came not to deſtroy the law, but to fulfil it: The father thereto makes reply, (Cont. Fauſt. l. 19. c. 9.) that therefore they obſerved it not, becauſe our Saviour had fulfilled whatever was intended in that law, by calling us to a ſpiritual reſt, in his own great mercy. For as it is moſt truly ſaid by Epiphanius, lib. 1. hær. 30. n. 32. He was the great and everlaſting ſabbath, whereof the leſs (and temporal) ſabbath was a type and figure, which had continued till his coming; by him commanded in the law, in him deſtroyed, and yet by him fulfilled in the Holy Goſpel.

Neither did he, or his diſciples, ordain another ſabbath in the place of this, as if they had intended only to ſhift the day; and to transfer this honour to ſome other time. Their doctrine and their practiſe are directly contrary, to ſo new a fancy. It is true, that in ſome tract of time, the Church in honour of his reſurrection, did ſet apart that day on the which he roſe, to holy exerciſes; but this upon their own authority, and without warrant from above, that we can learn out of the New Teſtament; more than the general warrant which God gave his Church, that all things in it be done decently, and in comely order. This is that which is told us by Athanaſius, hom. de ſemente, we honour the Lord's-day for the reſurrection; ſo Maximus Taurinenſis, hom. 3. de Pentecoſt. That the Lord's-day is therefore ſolemnly obſerved, becauſe thereon our Saviour, like the riſing ſun, diſpelled the clouds of helliſh darkneſs, by the light of his moſt glorious reſurrection. Hence Auſtin declares, in Epiſt. 119. The Lord's-day was made known unto us Chriſtians, by the reſurrection; and from that began to be accounted holy; ſee the like, lib. 22. de Civit. Dei. c. 30. & ſerm. 15. de Verbis Apoſtoli. But then it is alſo to be obſerved, that this was only done on the authority of the Church, and not by any precept of our Lord and Saviour, or any one of his Apoſtles. To theſe I could add the teſtimonies of Socrates, lib. 5. c. 22. Nicephorus, lib. 12. c. 32. and Athanaſius, de ſabb. & circumciſ. But as they are all ſummed up in Toſtatus, I ſhall only quote his words in the Old Teſtament, (ſaith Toſtatus,) God appointed all the feſtivals that were to be obſerved in the Jewiſh Church; but in the New, there were no feſtivals at all preſcribed by Chriſt, as being left unto the prelates of the Church, by them to be appointed, as occaſion was.

As for theſe words of our Redeemer, in Matthew's Goſpel, Pray that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the ſabbath-day, ch. xxiv. 20. They have indeed been much alledged, to prove that Chriſt did intimate, at the leaſt, unto his Apoſtles and the reſt, that there was a particular day by him appointed, whereof he adviſed them to be careful; which being not the Jewiſh ſabbath, muſt of neceſſity, as they think, be the Lord's-day. But certainly the fathers tell us no ſuch matter, nay, they ſay the contrary; and make theſe words a part of our Redeemer's admonition to the Jews, not to the Apoſtles. Chryſoſtom, in Math. xxiv. hath it ſo expreſly. Behold, ſaith he, how he addreſſeth his diſcourſe unto the Jews, and tells them of the evils which ſhould fall upon them; for neither were the Apoſtles bound to obſerve the ſabbath, nor were they there, when thoſe calamities fell upon the Jewiſh nation. Not in the winter, nor on the ſabbath, and why ſo ſaith he? Becauſe their flight being ſo quick and ſudden, neither the Jews would dare to fly on the ſabbath, [for ſuch was their ſuperſtition,] and the winter would be very troubleſome in ſuch diſtreſſes. Theophylact, in Matt. xxiv. is of the ſame opinion; adding withal, that before any of thoſe miſeries fell upon that Jewiſh nation, the Apoſtles were all departed from out of Jeruſalem; ſee alſo Jerom in loc. and Epiſt. ad Algaſ. and Euſeb. Eccl. hiſt. l. 3. c. 5.

We ſay then, that the chief reaſon, why the Chriſtians of the primitive times, did ſet apart the firſt day of the week to religious uſes, was becauſe Chriſt did on that day, riſe again from death to life, for our juſtification; ſo there was ſome analogy or proportion, which this day ſeemed to hold with the former ſabbath, which might more eaſily induce them to obſerve the ſame. For as God reſted on the ſabbath from all the works which he had done in the creation; ſo did the Son of God reſt alſo on the day of his reſurrection, from all the works which he had done in our redemption, as Gregory Nyſſen, orat. in ſanct. Paſcha. notes it for us. Yet, as the Father reſted not on the former ſabbath, from the works of preſervation; ſo neither doth our Saviour reſt at any time, from perfecting this work of our redemption, by a perpetual application of the benefit and effects thereof. This was the cauſe, and theſe the motives, which did induce the Church in ſome tract of time, to ſolemnize the day of Chriſt's reſurrection, as a weekly feſtival; though not to keep it as a ſabbath in the Jewiſh ſenſe.

The firſt particular paſſage which doth occur in Holy Scripture, touching the firſt day of the week, is that upon that day, the Holy Ghoſt did firſt come down on the Apoſtles; and that upon the ſame Peter preached his firſt ſermon unto the Jews, and baptized ſuch of them as believed; there being added to the Church, that day, three thouſand ſouls. This happened on the feaſt of Pentecoſt, which fell that year upon the Sunday, or firſt day of the week, as elſewhere the Scripture calls it; but as it was a ſpecial and a caſual thing, ſo can it yield but little proof, if it yield us any, that the Lord's-day was then obſerved; or, that the Holy Ghoſt did by ſelecting of that day for his deſcent on the Apoſtles, intend to dignify it for ſabbath. For, firſt, it was a caſual thing, that Pentecoſt ſhould fall that year upon the Sunday. It was a moveable feaſt as unto the day, ſuch as did change and ſhift itſelf, according to the poſition of the feaſt of Paſſover; the rule being this, that on what day ſoever the ſecond of the paſſover did fall, upon that alſo fell the great feaſt of Pentecoſt, as Scaliger hath rightly noted, Emend. Temp. l. 2. So that as often as the Paſſover did fall upon the Saturday or ſabbath, as this year it did; then Pentecoſt fell upon the Sunday; but when the Paſſover did chance to fall upon the Tueſday, the Pentecoſt fell that year, upon the Wedneſday; & ſic de cæteris. And if the rule be true, as I think it is, that no ſufficient argument can be drawn from a caſual fact; and that the falling of the Pentecoſt, that year, upon the firſt day of the week, be merely caſual; the coming of the Holy Ghoſt upon that day, will be no argument nor authority, to ſtate the firſt day of the week in the place and honour of the Jewiſh ſabbath.

There may be other reaſons given, why God made choice of that time, rather than of any other; as firſt, becauſe about that very time before, he had proclaimed the law upon mount Sinai; and ſecondly, that ſo he might the better countenance and grace the Goſpel, in the ſight of men, and add the more authority unto the doctrine of the Apoſtles. The feaſt of Pentecoſt was a great and famous feſtival, at which the Jews, all of them, were to come to Jeruſalem, there to appear before the Lord; and amongſt others, thoſe which had their hands in our Saviour's blood. And therefore, as Chryſoſtom notes it, in Acts ii. did God ſend down the Holy Ghoſt, at that time of Pentecoſt; becauſe thoſe men that did conſent to our Saviour's death, might publickly receive rebuke for that bloody act; and ſo bear record to the power of our Saviour's Goſpel, before all the world: So that the thing being caſual, as unto the day; and ſpecial, as unto the buſineſs then by God intended; it will afford us little proof, as before I ſaid, either that the Lord's-day was, as then, obſerved; or, that the Holy Ghoſt did ſelect that day for ſo great a work, to dignify it for a ſabbath.

The next Scripture is, that where we are told what Paul did at Troas, upon the firſt day of the week: The whole paſſage in the text ſtands thus. Upon the firſt day of the week when the diſciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them ready to depart on the morrow, and continued his ſpeech until midnight, Acts xx. 7. Take notice here, that Paul had tarried there ſeven days before this happened. Now, in this text there are two things to be conſidered; firſt, what was done upon that day; and ſecondly, what day it was that is there remembred. Firſt, for the action, it is ſaid to be breaking of bread, which ſome conclude to be adminiſtring the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and Paul's diſcourſe, which followed on it, to be a Sermon. But Chryſoſtom, in locum. tells us plainly otherwiſe: Their meeting at that time, ſaith he, was not eſpecially to receive inſtruction from Paul, but to eat bread with him; and there, upon occaſion given, he diſcourſed unto them. See, ſaith the Father, how they all made bold with Paul's table, as it had been common to them all; and as it ſeems to me, ſaith he, Paul ſitting at the table, did diſcourſe thus with them. Therefore, it ſeems by him, that as the meeting was at an ordinary ſupper; ſo the diſcourſe there happening was no ſermon properly, but an occaſional diſpute. Lyra affirms the ſame in theſe words: They came together to break bread, for the refreſhment and ſupport of their bodies only; and being there, Paul preached unto them, or as the Greek and Latin have it, he diſputed with them, prius eos reficiens pane verbi divini, refreſhing of them firſt with the bread of life. This alſo ſeems to be the meaning of the Church of England, who, in the margin of the Bible, allowed by Canon 80, doth refer us unto the ſecond of the Acts, ver. 46. where it is ſaid of the diſciples, that they did break their bread from houſe to houſe, and eat their meat together with joy and ſingleneſs of heart; which plainly muſt be meant of ordinary and common meats. Therefore, no Sabbath or eſtabliſhed day of publick meeting can be collected from hence.

This action of Paul at Troas is placed by our chronologers in Anno 57 of our Saviour's birth; in which year alſo he wrote this firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians; wherein, amongſt many other things, we read, that he gives them this direction touching collections for the poorer brethren at Jeruſalem. Concerning the gathering for the Saints, ſaith he, as I have ordained in the Churches of Galatia, ſo do ye alſo. And how was that? Every firſt day of the week let every one of you ſet aſide by himſelf, and lay up as God hath proſpered him, that there be no gatherings when I come. This ſome have made a principal argument to prove the inſtitution of the Lord's Day to be Apoſtolical; yet, though ſhould we grant it to be Apoſtolical, certainly it never can be proved ſo from this text of Scripture. For, What hath this to do with a Lord's Day duty, or how may it appear from hence, that the Lord's Day was ordered by the Apoſtles to be weekly celebrated, inſtead of the now antiquated Jewiſh Sabbath; being an intimation only of Paul's deſire to the particular Churches of the Galatians and the Corinthians, what he would have them do in a particular and preſent caſe? Agabus had ſignified by the Spirit, Acts xi. 28, 29. That there ſhould be a great dearth over all the world; and thereupon the Antiochians purpoſed to ſend relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea. It is not to be thought that they made this collection on the Sunday only, but ſent their common bounties to them when and as often as they pleaſed. Collections for the poor, in themſelves conſidered, are no Lord's Day duties, no duties proper to the day; and therefore are not here appointed to be made in the congregation, but every man is ordered to lay up ſomewhat by himſelf, as it were in ſtore, that when it came to a large ſum, it might be ſent away unto Jeruſalem; which being but a particular caſe, and ſuch a caſe as was to end with the occaſion, can be no general rule for a perpetuity. For, Might it not fall out in time, that there might be no poor, nay, no ſaints at all in all Jeruſalem; as when the town was razed by Adrian, or after people by the Saracens? Surely, if not before, yet then this duty was to ceaſe, and no collection to be made by thoſe of Corinth; and conſequently, no Lord's Day to be kept amongſt them, becauſe no collection, in caſe collections for the ſaints, as ſome do gather from this place, were a ſufficient argument to prove the Lord's Day inſtituted by Divine Authority. But let us take the text, with ſuch obſervations as have been made upon it by the Fathers. Upon the firſt day of the week, i. e. as generally they conceive it, on the Lord's Day. And why on that? Chryſoſtom, in locum. gives this reaſon of it, that ſo the very day might prompt them to be bountiful to their poor brethren, as being that day whereon they had received ſuch ineſtimable bounties at the hands of God, in the Reſurection of our Saviour. What is to be done on that day? Unuſquiſque apud ſe reponat, Let every man lay by himſelf, ſays the Apoſtle, ȣ̓κ εἶπεν, εἰς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν φερέτω. He ſaith not, as Chryſoſtom obſerves, let every man bring it to the Church: And why? ἵνα μὴ διὰ τὸ μιχυώνται, for fear leſt ſome might be aſhamed at the ſmallneſs of their offering; but let them lay it by, ſaith he, and add unto it week by week, that at my coming it may grow to a fit proportion, That there be no gathering when I come, but that the money may be ready to be ſent away immediately upon my coming; and being thus raiſed up by little and little, they might not be ſo ſenſible thereof, as if, upon his coming to them, it were to be collected all at once, and upon the ſudden, ut paulatim reſervantes non una hora gravari ſe putent, as Hierom, in locum. hath it. Now, as it is moſt clear, that this makes nothing for the Lord's Day, or the tranſlation of the Sabbath thereunto, by any Apoſtolical precept; ſo it is not ſo clear, that this was done upon the firſt day of the week, but that ſome learned men have doubted thereof. Calvin upon the place, takes notice how Chryſoſtom expounds the μία σαββάτȣ of the Apoſtle, by primo ſabbati, the firſt day of the week, as the Engliſh reads it; but likes it not, cui ego non aſſentior, as his phraſe is, conceiving rather this to be the meaning of Paul, that on ſome Sabbath-day or other, until his coming, every man ſhould lay up ſomewhat towards the collection. And in the ſecond of his inſtitutes, ch. viii. n. 38. he affirms expreſly, that the day deſtinate by Paul to theſe collections, was the Sabbath-day. The like is obſerved by Victorinus, Strigelius, Hunnius, and Aretius, all Proteſtant writers. Singulis ſabbatis, ſaith Strigelius, per ſingula ſabbata; ſo Aretius, diebus ſabbatorum, ſaith Egidius Hunnius; all rendring κατὰ μίαν σαββάτȣ, on the Sabbath-days; yet Hemingius is more particular, who, in his comment on the place, takes it indefinitely for any day in the week, ſo they fixed on one, vult enim ut quilibet certum diem, in ſeptimana, conſtituat, in quo apud ſe ſeponat, quod irrogaturus eſt in pauperes. Take which you will, either of the Fathers, or the Moderns, and we ſhall find no Lord's Day inſtituted by any Apoſtolical command, no Sabbath ſet on foot by them upon the firſt day of the week, as ſome would have it; much leſs that any ſuch ordinance ſhould be hence collected out of theſe words of the Apoſtle.

Indeed, it is not probable, that he, who ſo oppoſed himſelf againſt the old Sabbath, would erect a new. This had not been to abrogate the ceremony, but to change the day; whereas he laboured what he could to beat down all the difference of days and times, which had been formerly obſerved. In his Epiſtle to the Galatians, written in Anno 59, he lays it home unto their charge, that they obſerved days, and months, and times, and years, cap. 4. ver. 10. and ſeems a little to bewail his own misfortune, as if he had beſtowed his labour in vain amongſt them. I know it is conceived by ſome, that Paul ſpake it of the obſervation of thoſe days and times, that had been uſed among the Gentiles, and ſo had no relation to the Jewiſh Sabbath, or any difference of times obſerved amongſt them. Ambroſe and Auguſtin, in locum, were both of this opinion. Hence it ſhould be obſerved, that the legal Sabbath began to ceaſe upon the preaching of the Goſpel, inſenſibly and by degrees, not being afterwards obſerved as it had been formerly, or counted any neceſſary part of God's publick worſhip. Only ſome uſe was made thereof for the enlargement of God's Church, by reaſon that the people had been accuſtomed to meet together on that day, for the performance of religious ſpiritual duties. This made it more regarded than it would have been, eſpecially in the eaſtern parts of Greece and Aſia, where the provincial Jews were more numerous; and being a great acceſſion to the Goſpel, could not ſo ſuddenly forſake their ancient cuſtoms: Yet ſo, that the firſt day of the week began to grow into ſome credit towards the end of this firſt age; eſpecially after the final deſolation of Jeruſalem and the Temple, which happened Anno 72 of Chriſt's nativity. So that the religious obſervation of this day beginning in the age of the Apoſtles, no doubt, but with their approbation and authority, and ſince continuing in the ſame reſpect for ſo many ages, may be very well accounted amongſt thoſe Apoſtolical traditions, which have been univerſally received in the Church of God: For, being it was the day which our Redeemer honoured with his reſurrection, it eaſily might attain unto that eſteem, as to be honoured by the Chriſtians with the publick meetings, that ſo they might with greater comfort preſerve and cheriſh the memorial of ſo great a mercy, in reference unto which the world's creation ſeemed not ſo conſiderable. By reaſon of which work wrought on it, it came, in time, to be entitled, κατ' ἐξοχὴν, the Lord's Day; which attribute is firſt found in the Revelation, ch. x. writ by John, about the 94th year of our Saviour's birth. So long it was before we find the Church took notice of it by a proper name; for, I perſwade my ſelf, that had that day been deſtinate at that time to religious duties, or honoured with the name of the Lord's Day when Paul preached at Troas, or wrote to the Corinthians, which, as before, we ſhewed was in the fifty-ſeventh, neither Luke nor the Apoſtle had ſo paſſed it over, and called it only the firſt day of the week, as they both have done. And when it had this attribute affixed unto it, it only was κατ' ἐξοχὴν, as before we ſaid, by reaſon of our Saviour's reſurrection performed upon it, and that the congregation might not be aſſembled as well on them, as on the other. For, firſt, it was not called the Lord's Day excluſively, but by way of eminency, in reference to the reſurrection only, all other days being the Lord's as well as this, prima ſabbati ſignificat diem Dominicum, quo Dominus reſurrexit, & reſurgendo iſti ſeculo ſubvenit, mundumque ipſo die creavit qui ob excellentiam tanti miraculi proprie dies Dominica appellatur, i. e. dies Domini, quamvis omnes ſunt Domini. So Bruno Herbipolenſis, in Pſal. xxiii. hath reſolved it. And next, it was not ſo deſigned for the publick meetings of the Church, as if they might not be aſſembled as well on every day as this. For, as Hierom, in Gal. iv. hath determined, all days are equal in themſelves, as the Father tells us. Chriſt was not crucified on the Friday only, nor did he riſe only upon the Lord's Day, but that we may make every day the holy day of his reſurrection, and every day eat his bleſſed body in the ſacrament. When therefore certain days were publickly aſſigned by godly men for the aſſemblies of the Church, this was done only for their ſakes, qui magis ſeculo vacant quam Deo, who lean more to the world than to him that made it, and therefore either could not, or rather would not, every day aſſemble in the Church of God. Upon which ground, as they made choice of this, (even in the age of the Apoſtles) for one, becauſe our Saviour roſe that day from amongſt the dead, ſo choſe they Friday for another, by reaſon of our Saviour's paſſion; and Wedneſday, on the which he had been betrayed; the Saturday, or ancient Sabbath, being mean while retained in the eaſtern Churches: Nay, in the primitive times, excepting in the heat of perſecution, they met together every day for the receiving of the ſacrament; that being fortified with that viaticum, they might with greater courage encounter death, if they chanced to meet him. So that the greateſt honour which in this age was given the firſt day of the week, or Sunday, is that about the cloſe thereof, they did begin to honour it with the name or title of the Lord's Day, and made it one of thoſe ſet days whereon the people met together for religious exerciſes; though much differing from a Sabbath-day's obſervance.

I have already produced ſufficient evidence out of the Acts of the Apoſtles, and other Monuments of the Apoſtolick age, that the Jewiſh Sabbath, or ſeventh day's reſt, was abrogated by Chriſt, as a part of the ceremonial law of Moſes; and that the Chriſtian Sabbath, or Lord's Day, which is the firſt day of the week, roſe by degrees by Apoſtolical Authority, and not by Divine Sanction.

As for the duties of that day, they were moſt likely ſuch as formerly had been uſed in the Jewiſh ſynagogues, reading the Law and Prophets openly to the congregation, and afterwards expounding part thereof, as occaſion ſerved; calling upon the Lord their God for the continuance of his mercies, and ſinging pſalms and hymns unto him, as by way of thankſgiving. Theſe the Apoſtles found in the Jewiſh Church, and approving of the ſame, commended them unto the care of the Diſciples, by them to be obſerved as often, and on what day ſoever they met together.

Firſt, for the reading of the law, Origen ſaith, in Joſ. hom. 15. expreſly, that it was ordered ſo by the Apoſtles, Judaicarum hiſtocriarum libri traditi ſunt ab Apoſtolis legendi in Eccleſiis, as he there informs us. To this was joined in proceſs of time, the reading of the Holy Goſpel, and other Evangelical Writings; it being ordered by Peter, that Mark's Goſpel ſhould be read in the congregation, as Euſebius, hiſt. l. i. 15. tells us; and by Paul, 1 Theſſ. ca. ult. v. 17. that his Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians ſhould be read unto all the holy brethren; and alſo, that to the Coloſſians, to be read in the Church of the Laodiceans; ca. ult. v. 16. as that from Laodicea, in the Church of the Coloſſians. By which example, not only all the writings of the Apoſtles, but many of the writings of Apoſtolical men, were publickly read unto the people; and for that purpoſe one appointed, to exerciſe the miniſtry of a reader, in the congregation. So ancient is the reading of the Scriptures in the Church of God. To this by way of comment or application, was added as we find by Paul's directions, 1 Cor. xiv. 3. the uſe of prophecy or preaching, interpretation of the Scriptures, to edifying, and to exhortation, and to comfort; this exerciſe to be performed with the head uncovered, as well of the preacher, as of the hearer, Every man praying or propheſying with his head covered, diſhonoureth his head, as the Apoſtle hath informed us, 1 Cor. xi. 4. See our note on the place. Where we have an authority for publick prayers for the congregation: The prieſt to offer to the Lord, the prayers and ſupplications of the people; and they to ſay Amen unto thoſe prayers, which the prieſt made for them. Theſe to contain in them all things neceſſary for the Church of God, which are the ſubject of all ſupplications, prayers, interceſſions, and giving of thanks; and to extend to all men alſo, eſpecially unto kings and ſuch as be in authority, that under them we may be godly and quietly governed, leading a peaceable life in all godlineſs and honeſty, 1 Tim. ii.

For the performance of which laſt duties, with the greater comfort, it was diſpoſed that Pſalms and hymns ſhould be intermingled with the reſt of the publick ſervice; which comprehending whatſoever is moſt excellent in the Book of God, and being ſo many notable forms of praiſe and prayer, were chearfully and unanimouſly to be ſung amongſt them. And thereupon Paul reprehended thoſe of Corinth, 1 Cor. xiv. 26. in that they joined not with the aſſembly, but had their Pſalms unto themſelves. Whereby it ſeems that they had left the true uſe of Pſalms, which being ſo many acclamations, exultations, and holy provocations, to give God the glory; were to be ſung together by the whole aſſembly; their ſinging at that time, being little more than a melodious kind of pronunciation, ſuch as is commonly now uſed in ſinging of the ordinary Pſalms and prayers in cathedral Churches. And ſo it ſtood, till in the entrance of this age, Ignatius Biſhop of Antiochia, one who was converſant with the Apoſtles, brought in the uſe of ſinging alternatim, courſe by courſe, according as it ſtill continues in our publick quires, where one ſide anſwers to another; ſome ſhew whereof is left in Parochial Churches, in which the miniſter and the people anſwer one another, in their ſeveral turns; ſee Socrat. hiſt. li. 6. c. 8. in which caſe, we muſt not omit the account which the ancient Heathen author Pliny gives to the emperor Trajan, concerning this very practice. Their greateſt crime, ſaid he, was this, that at a certain day, they did meet together before day-light, and there ſing hymns to Chriſt as unto a God, one with another in their courſes; and after bind themſelves together by a common ſacrament, not unto any wicked or unjuſt attempt, but to live orderly without committing robbery, theft, adultery, or the like offences.

Now the day there meant by Pliny, muſt be Saturday or Sunday, if it were not both; both of them being in thoſe times, and in thoſe parts, where Pliny lived, much obſerved; as may be gathered from Ignatius, who flouriſhed at that time. For the world being full of dangerous fancies, and heretical dotages, the Church was much diſquieted about the worſhip of God, e. g. The Ebionites ſtood hard for retaining the Jewiſh ſabbath, and ſtrove to have it celebrated, as it had been formerly; obſerving yet the Lord's-day, as the Chriſtians did, in honour of the reſurrection of our Lord and Saviour, as Euſebius tells, hiſt. l. 3. c. x. 3. Epiphanius, l. i. hæreſ. 30. n. 2. ſaith the very ſame. And on the other ſide, there was a ſort of hereticks in the eaſtern parts, (whereof, ſee Irenæus, li. i. ca. 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25.) who thought that this world being corruptible, could not be made but by a very evil author. Therefore, as the Jews did by the feſtival ſolemnity of their ſabbath, rejoice in God that created the world, as in the author of all goodneſs; ſo they in hatred of the maker of the world, ſorrowed, and wept, and faſted on that day, as being the birth-day of all evil. And whereas the orthodox Chriſtians did ſolemnize the Sunday in a joyful memory of Chriſt's reſurrection; ſo likewiſe at the ſelf-ſame time, ſuch hereticks as denied the reſurrection faſted, when the reſt rejoiced. Againſt which two laſt hereſies, it was, that Ignatius affirmed with ſuch zeal and earneſtneſs, That if any one did faſt either upon the Lord's-day, or the ſabbath, except one ſabbath in the year, (which was Eaſter eve) he was a murderer of Chriſt. So he in his Epiſtle, ad Philippenſes, Ann. 102. Now as Ignatius labours here, to advance the ſabbath, in oppoſition of thoſe hereticks, who made it an equal feſtival with the Lord's-day; ſo being to deal with thoſe, which too much magnified the ſabbath, and thought the Chriſtians bound unto it, as the Jews had been; he bends himſelf another way, and reſolves it thus; Μηκέτι οὖν σαββατίζωμεν Ἰουδαϊκῶς, ὡς ἀργίαις χαίροντες, &c. Let us not keep the ſabbath in a Jewiſh manner, in ſloth and idleneſs, for it is written, that he that will not labour ſhall not eat, and in the ſweat of thy brows ſhalt thou eat thy bread. But let us keep it after a ſpiritual faſhion, not in bodily eaſe, but in the ſtudy of the law; (i. e. of Chriſt) not eating meat dreſt yeſterday, or drinking luke-warm drinks, or walking out a limited ſpace, or ſettling our delights, as they did, on dancing; but in the contemplation of the works of God. And after we have ſo kept the ſabbath, let every one that loveth Chriſt, keep the Lord's-day feſtival, the reſurrection-day, the queen and empreſs of all days; in which our life was raiſed again, and death was overcome by our Lord and Saviour. So that we ſee, that he would have both days obſerved; the ſabbath firſt, though not as like the Ebionites, in a Jewiſh manner; and after that the Lord's-day, which he ſo much magnifieth, the better to abate that high eſteem, which ſome had caſt upon the ſabbath. Agreeable unto this, we find that in the conſtitutions of the Apoſtles, both days are ordered to be kept holy, one in memorial of the creation, the other of the reſurrection.

And ſo it was obſerved in the eaſtern parts, where thoſe of the diſperſion had took up their ſeats; and having continued their meetings on the ſabbath-day, could not ſo eaſily be perſuaded from it. But in the weſtern Churches, in the which the Jews were not ſo conſiderable, and where thoſe hereticks before remembred, had been ſcarcely heard of, it was plainly otherwiſe: That day not only not being honoured with their publick meetings, but deſtinate to a ſettled or conſtant faſt. But Juſtin Martyr, who then lived in Rome, ſpeaks to this purpoſe, in Apolog. 2. Upon the Sunday all of us aſſemble in the congregation; as being that firſt day wherein God ſeparating the light and darkneſs, did create the world; and Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour roſe again from the dead. Upon the day called Sunday, all that abide within the cities or about the fields, do meet together in ſome place, where the records of the Apoſtles, and writings of the Prophets, as much as is appointed, are read unto us. The reader having done, the prieſt or prelate miniſtreth a word of exhortation, that we do imitate thoſe good things which are there repeated. Then ſtanding up together, we ſend up our prayers unto the Lord; which ended, there is delivered unto every one of us, bread, and wine with water. After all this, the prieſt or prelate offers up our prayers and thankſgiving as much as in him is, to God; and all the people ſay Amen; thoſe of the richer ſort, ἕκαστος κατὰ προαίρεσιν, every man as he would himſelf, contributing ſomething towards the relief of the poorer brethren; which was diſpoſed amongſt them afterwards by the prieſt or prelate.

Tertullian, who flouriſhed in the very firſt beginnings of the 3d century, calls this day by three ſeveral names. Firſt, he calls it, Dies ſolis, Sunday, as we now commonly call it; The ſecond name by which Tertullian calls this day, is the eighth day ſimply; Ethnicis ſemel annuus dies quiſquis feſtus eſt, tibi octavo quoque die, de Idolat. c. 14. The third is, Dies Dominicus, or, the Lord's-day, de corona mil. c. 3. To him we might add, Origen in Gen. hom. 10. contr. celſ. l. 8. Cyprian, lib. 2. ep. 5. and de pict. & eleem. decret. lib. 5. c. 7, &c.

Now in theſe various names of the Sunday, to ſet thoſe right who may be offended at the retaining ancient names, for this day, not found in Scripture, we muſt take notice, that the Jews in honour of their ſabbath, uſed to refer their times to that; diſtinguiſhing their days by Prima Sabbati, Secunda Sabbati, and ſo until they came to the ſabbath it ſelf; as on the other ſide the Gentiles, following the motions of the planets, gave to each day the name of that particular planet, by which the firſt hour of the day was governed, as their Aſtrologers had taught them, as, Sunday, Monday, &c. Now the Apoſtles being Jews, retained the cuſtom of the Jews; and for that reaſon called that day on which our Saviour roſe, μία σαββάτου, una ſabbati, the firſt day of the week, as our Engliſh tranſlation reads it. The fathers, many of them followed their example. Auſtin thereupon calls Thurſday, by the name of Quintum Sabbati, Epiſt. 118. and ſo doth venerable Beda, hiſt. lib. 4. c. 25. Hierom, calls Tueſday, Tertium Sabbati, in Epitaph. Paulæ; Tertullian, Friday, by the old name, paraſceve, l. 4. adverſ. Marcion. Saturday they called generally the ſabbath; and Sunday, ſometimes Dies Solis, and is ſometimes Dominicus. Pope Silveſter, as Polydore Virgil is of opinion, de invent. rerum, l. 5, 6. hating the name and memory of the Gentile-gods, ordered, that the days ſhould be called by the name of Feriæ; and the diſtinction to be made by Prima feria, ſecunda feria, &c. the ſabbath and the Lord's-day, holding their names, and places, as before they did. Hence that of Honorius Auguſtodunenſis, de imagine mundi, cap. 28. Hebræi nominant dies ſuos, una vel prima ſabbati, &c. Pagani ſic, dies ſolis, lunæ, &c. Chriſtiani vero ſic dies nominant, viz. Dies Dominicus, feria prima, &c. ſabbatum. But I muſt obſerve, this is no univerſal rule; the writers of the Chriſtian Church not tying up their hands ſo ſtrictly, as to give the days what names they pleaſed; ſave that the Saturday is called amongſt them by no other name, than that which formerly it had, the ſabbath. So that whenever, for a thouſand years, and upwards, we meet with ſabbatum, in any writer of what name ſoever, it muſt be underſtood of no day but Saturday. As for the other day, the day of the reſurrection, all the Evangeliſts, and Paul, take notice of no other name, than of the firſt day of the week. John, and after him, Ignatius, call it κυριακὴν, the Lord's-day. But then again, Juſtin Martyr for the ſecond century, doth in two ſeveral paſſages call it no otherwiſe than τὴν τοῦ ἡλίου ἡμέραν, Sunday, as then the Gentiles called it, and we commonly call it now; and ſo Tertullian for the third, who uſeth both, and calls it ſometimes diem ſolis, and ſometimes Dominicum, as before was ſaid. Which neither of them would have done, on any reſpect ſoever, had it been either contrary to the word of God, or ſcandalous unto his Church. So for the after-ages, in the edicts of Conſtantine, Valentinian, Valens, Gratian, Honorius, Arcadius, Theodoſius; all Chriſtian Princes, it hath no other name than Sunday, or dies ſolis; and for many years after them, the ſynod held at Dingulofinum, in the lower Bavaria, Anno 772, calls it plainly, Sunday. But we never find this Lord's-day, diſtinguiſhed in any author, or council or decretal, or edict by the name of the ſabbath-day.

So far you have read of the Lord's-day, as taken up to be obſerved in the peculiar worſhip of God, by the common conſent of the Church, and not inſtituted or eſtabliſhed by any text of Scripture, nor ſo much as by the edict of an emperor, or decree of a council. But,

Now in the ſequel, you may ſee that the emperors, from the reign of Conſtantine the Great, and the councils of the Chriſtian Church, from his time were very particular in their orders, about the appointment of this ſet day of Chriſtian Worſhip, and concerning the publick ſervice to performed therein. As,

Conſtantine the Great, who was the firſt Chriſtian Emperor that publickly profeſſed the Goſpel, made this particular law for keeping the Lord's-day, or Sunday, as Euſebius informs us in his life, lib. 4. c. 18. That all the ſubjects of his empire ſhould take their reſt from labour, on that day of the week, which had been inſtituted in memory of our Saviour's reſurrection. Conſequently, as his army conſiſted of a mixture of Chriſtians and Gentiles, the Chriſtian ſoldiers were permitted and ordered to go to, and offer up their prayers to Almighty God in their proper Churches, upon the Sunday, as it is there particularly ſtiled. And the Heathen part of his camp, who remained in their ancient errors, were ordered to aſſemble in the open fields on the ſame day, and on a ſignal given, to pray unto the Lord in the following terms, or form of prayer :

Te ſolum Deum agnoſcimus, te regem profitemur, te adjutorem invocamus, per te victorias conſecuti ſumus, per te hoſtes ſuperavimus, a te & præſentem felicitatem conſecutos fatemur, & futuram adepturos ſperamus ; tui omnes ſupplices ſumus, a te petimus, ut Conſtantinum Imperatorem noſtrum una cum piis ejus liberis, quam diutiſſime nobis ſalvum & victorem conſerves.

In Engliſh, thus ;

We do acknowledge thee to be the only God, we confeſs thee to be the King, we call upon thee as our helper and defender , by thee alone it is, that we have got the victory, and ſubdued our enemies, to thee as we refer all our preſent happineſs, ſo from thee alſo do we expect our future. Thee therefore we beſeech, that thou wouldſt pleaſe to keep in all health and ſafety, our noble emperor Conſtantine, with his hopeful progeny. See Euſeb. ib. c. 20, and 23.

Nor did he only take him to command or appoint the day, as to all his ſubjects ; and to preſcribe a form of prayer, as unto the Gentiles ; but to decree what works ſhould be allowed upon it, and what intermitted. In former times, though the Lord's-day, had got the credit, as to be honoured with the publick meetings of the congregation ; yet was it not ſo ſtrictly kept, no not in time of Divine-ſervice, but that the publick magiſtrates, judges and other miniſters of ſtate, were to attend thoſe great employments they were called unto, without relation to this day, or ceſſation on it, and ſo did other men that had leſs employments, and thoſe not ſo neceſſary. Theſe things this pious emperor taking into conſideration, and finding no neceſſity, but that his judges and other publick miniſters might attend God's ſervice on that day ; at leaſt not be a means to keep others from it : And knowing that ſuch as dwelt in cities had ſufficient leiſure to frequent the Church, and that artificers without any publick diſcommodity, might for that time forbear their ordinary labours ; he ordered and appointed, that all of them, in their ſeveral places ſhould this day lay aſide their own buſineſs, to attend the Lord's. But then withal conſidering, that ſuch as followed husbandry, could not ſo well neglect the times of ſeed and harveſt, but that they were to take advantage of the faireſt and moſt ſeaſonable weather, as God pleaſed to ſend it ; he left it free to them to follow their affairs on what day ſoever ; leſt otherwiſe they might loſe thoſe bleſſings, which God in his great bounty had beſtowed upon them. This is mentioned in the very edict he ſet forth about it ; ſee L. Omnes, cap. de feriis. This edict bears date, in the Nones of March, Anno 321, being the eleventh year of that prince's empire. Thus the firſt great work done by the firſt great Chriſtian Prince, was to declare his royal pleaſure about this day ; what things he thought moſt proper to permit, and what to diſallow upon it, teaching all other kings and princes which have ſince ſucceeded, what they ſhould alſo do on the ſame occaſion. To this I could add many more imperial conſtitutions for the obſervance of this day to the Lord, beſides a great number of eccleſiaſtical decrees, by biſhops in their particular dioceſſes, and general councils. But as they would ſwell this Diſſertation too much, I refer you to the hiſtory of the ſabbath, by Dr. Heylin, b. ii. c. 3. and ſhall now conclude.

Thus we ſee upon what grounds the Lord's-day ſtands ; on cuſtom firſt, and voluntary conſecration of it to religious meetings ; that cuſtom countenanced by the authority of the Church of God, which tacitly approved the ſame ; and finally confirmed and ratified by Chriſtian Princes throughout their empires. And as the day, ſo reſt from labours and reſtraint from buſineſs upon that day, received its greateſt ſtrength from the ſupreme magiſtrate, as long as he retained that power which to him belonged ; as after from the canons and decrees of councils, the decretals of popes, and orders of particular prelates, when the ſole managing of eccleſiaſtical affairs was uſurped or committed to them. I hope, it was not ſo with the former ſabbath, which neither took original from cuſtom, that people being not ſo forward to give God a day ; nor required any countenance or authority from the kings of Iſrael to confirm and ratify it. The Lord ſpake the word, that he would have one day in ſeven, preciſely the ſeventh day from the world's creation, to be a day of reſt unto all his people ; which ſaid, it was the Iſraelites duty, gladly to ſubmit and obey his pleaſure. And this was done all at once, not by degrees, by little and little, as he could ſee the people affected to it, or as he found it fitteſt for them. The Lord's-day had no ſuch command that it ſhould be ſanctified, but was left plainly to God's people, to pitch on this, or any other day for the publick worſhip of God. And being taken up amongſt them, and made a day of meeting in the congregation for religious exerciſes ; yet for 300 years there was neither law to bind them to it, nor any reſt from labour or from worldly buſineſſes required upon it. And when it ſeemed good unto Chriſtian Princes, the nurſing fathers of God's Church, to lay reſtraints upon their people, yet at the firſt they were not general ; but only thus, that certain men in certain places, ſhould lay aſide their ordinary and daily works, to attend God's ſervice in the Church ; thoſe whoſe employments were moſt toilſome, and moſt repugnant to the true nature of a ſabbath, being allowed to follow and purſue their labours, becauſe moſt neceſſary to the commonwealth. And in the following times, when as the prince and prelate, in their ſeveral places, endeavoured to reſtrain them from that alſo, which formerly they had permitted, and interdicted almoſt all kind of bodily labour upon that day ; it was not brought about with much ſtruggling, and oppoſition of the people ; more than a thouſand years being paſt, after Chriſt's aſcenſion, before the Lord's-day had attained that ſtate in which now it ſtandeth, as I could make it appear. And being brought unto that ſtate, wherein now it ſtands, it doth not ſtand ſo firmly and on ſuch ſure grounds, but that thoſe powers which raiſed it up, may take it lower if they pleaſe, yea, take it quite away, as unto the time, and ſettle it on any other day, as to them ſeems beſt, as ſome of the beſt authors among the School-Divines and Proteſtants of great name and credit in the world have taught. A power which no man will preſume to ſay was ever challenged by the Jews over the ſabbath. Beſides,

All things are plainly contrary in theſe two days, as to the purpoſe and intent of the inſtitution : For, in the Sabbath, that which was principally aimed at, was reſt from labour, that neither they nor any that belonged unto them, ſhould do any manner of work upon that day, but ſit ſtill and reſt themſelves. Their meditating on God's word, or on his goodneſs, manifeſted in the world's creation, was to that only an acceſſory ; and as for reading of the law in the congregation, that was not taken up till more than 1000 years after the law was given ; and being taken up, came in by eccleſiaſtical ordinance only, not by Divine Authority. But in the inſtitution of the Lord's Day, that which was principally aimed at, was the performance of religious and Chriſtian duties, hearing the word, receiving of the ſacraments, praiſing the Lord for all his mercies, and praying to him jointly with the congregation for the continuance of the ſame reſt and ceſſation from the works of labour, came not in till afterwards ; and then but as an acceſſory to the former duties, and that not ſettled and eſtabliſhed for a thouſand years, when all the proper and peculiar duties of the day had been at their perfection a long time before. So that if we regard either inſtitutions, or the authority by which they were ſo inſtituted, the end and purpoſe at the which they principally aimed, or the proceedings in the ſettling and confirming of them, the difference will be found ſo great, that no man can affirm in ſenſe and reaſon, that the Lord's Day is a Sabbath, or ſo to be obſerved as the Sabbath was, among the Jews.

Ver. 8. —— Pentecoſt.] Or, Whitſunday.

Ver. 9. —— There are many adverſaries.] See Acts xix. 22.

Ver. 10. —— Timotheus.] i. e. Timothy his diſciple. See the Introduction to the firſt of Tim.

Ver. 12. —— Apolios.] See ch. i. ver. 12.

Ver. 14. —— With charity.] As, and in ſuch manner as I deſcribed that excellent gift unto you in ch. xiii.

Ver. 16. That ye ſubmit your ſelves unto ſuch.] In eccleſiaſtical matters, becauſe they are the ſtewards of the myſteries of God through Chriſt. See ch. iv. ver. 1.

Ver. 22. —If any man love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, let him be anathema, maran-atha,] Here firſt, we are to obſerve, that they are wrong in the interpretation, who confound the meaning of theſe two words Anathεma and Anathήma, becauſe they ſhall be ſhewn to be really diſtinct, and of a different ſignification; for, Anathεma is always taken in a bad ſenſe, but Anathηma is generally uſed in a good and favourable ſenſe, and ſimply and abſolutely denotes any thing ſet apart for Divine Worſhip, which can be proved not only from the beſt claſſical Heathen authors, who uſed this word, but alſo from the Evangeliſt Luke, ch. xxi. 5. For all gifts and preſents whatſoever, conſecrated to God, are called by this name; and accordingly the uſual rendering of Anathηma, is donarium or donum, a gift conſecrated to God; for, 'Αναθεῖναι, or 'Ανατιθέναι, is reponere, ſurſum ponere, attollere, ſuſpendere, and thence is very appoſitely applied to theſe ſacred gifts, which being offered to God, were laid up, and hung up in the Temple for the ſervice and honour of the Numen, to which they were dedicated. See Platon. Polit. 2. 'Αναθήματα τοῖς θεοῖς ἀνατίθεσθαι & apud Herodian. 'Ανέθηκε καὶ ἀναθήματα.

And here let me have leave to offer my conjecture, which is this, that the Greeks giving that name 'Αναθήματα to thoſe gifts which were thus conſecrated, is an alluſion to the Hebrew name which that kind of Holy Preſents hath in the Old Teſtament, and which was given to it by God himſelf, as in many things it might be proved, that the profane Grecians borrowed from the ſacred book. This ſort of gifts was ſtiled Terumah, from Rum elevatus, exaltatus fuit, which we tranſlate an heave-offering, Numb. xv. 19. xviii. 24. becauſe it was heaved or lifted up before the Lord. And with this is joined Tenuphah, another holy oblation, which owes its original to the verb Kup, which ſignifies to ſhake and move to and fro, as well as to elevate, and thence that ſort of preſent is called a wave-offering, Lev. vii. 30. viii. 27. it being the particular uſage, it ſeems, at the tendering of it, not only to lift it up, (which was the main thing) but to wave it. Now, to this lifting up) whence Terumah more ſignally had its name, and was properly an oblation lifted up) 'Ανάθημα among the Greeks, exactly anſwers; and according to the fore-mentioned theme whence it is derived, may be rightly rendered donum elevatum, or ſuſpenſum. In the Pagan devotions, 'Αναθήματα were ſuch preſents as were beſtowed on the gods, and ſet up on ſome high and eminent place, as generally upon the walls and pillars of their Temples. This is well obſerved by Salmaſius in Solinum, a learned critick, who tells us, that, Not all thoſe gifts which were dedicated to the gods, were called by the Grecians 'Αναθήματα, but thoſe only which could be hung up, or ſet upon ſome high and conſpicuous place. And this is the true and ſimple acception of this word 'Ανάθημα, which is different from 'Ανάθεμα with an Epſilon, although you will find, that ſeveral writers obſerve not this difference. But it is certain that 'Ανάθεμα is of a quite contrary ſignification to 'Ανάθημα, this latter denoting a Holy, the former an Unholy thing or perſon; this ſignifying ſome thing or perſon conſecrated to God, that, on the contrary, ſome thing or perſon curſed of God and man, and deſtined to be deſtroyed; yea, ſometimes it ſignifies the very curſing itſelf, as you ſhall hear afterwards.

But here it is objected, that the Septuagint uſe the word in a good ſenſe, to ſignify that which is Holy to God, and dedicated to his ſervice, as in Lev. xxvii. 28. where the 'Ανάθεμα, or devoted thing, is ſaid to be Holy unto the Lord. So in Joſh. vi. 19 we read that all the ſilver and gold, and veſſels of braſs and iron, that the Iſraelites ſhould find in Jericho, when they took it, were to be conſecrated, or (as it is in the original) to be Holineſs unto the Lord, which very things have the name of 'Ανάθεμα given them in ver. 18. whence ſome infer, that the word with an ε, as well as with an η, is taken in a good ſenſe, and ſignifies a ſacred gift offered to God. But this is a palpable miſtake, for if you conſult the place in Leviticus, you will find that it ſpeaks of the Cherem, properly ſo called, the thing or perſon that was devoted to utter deſtruction, and therefore could not be redeemed, as you read there. How then could this be a gift to God, how could it be an offering conſecrated to God, and ſeparated to ſacred uſes, when it was utterly deſtroyed? But yet it may be ſaid to be Holy to God in this ſenſe, viz. That the deſtruction of it, which was appointed and commanded by God himſelf, was for his glory and honour. The curſing of the Canaanites, the devoting them to ruin, yea, and the actual deſtroying of them redounded to the honour of God, whilſt thereby he ſhewed himſelf the ſovereign and abſolute diſpoſer of the world, and at the ſame time gave undeniable proof of his irreconcileable hatred of all idolatry and idolaters. Thus the perſons and things devoted to deſtruction were Holy to the Lord. This is the true and genuine meaning of this place, and no man that looks into it, and conſiders it well, can interpret it otherwiſe. And hence, perhaps, it is, that in a remote ſenſe the verb Charam, (and conſequently the noun Cherem) may be taken, as in Mic. iv. 13. to ſignify conſecrating, or Holy Dedication. Not that the word hath any ſuch genuine ſignification; for, it is not Charam, but Kadaſh, that is the word conſtantly uſed to denote ſanctifying or conſecrating, i. e. ſetting a thing or perſon apart to a pious uſe, to God's peculiar honour and ſervice. I ſay, Kadaſh is the proper word for this every where in the Old Teſtament; yet, becauſe even curſing of things or perſons is to God's glory, and ſo may be ſaid to be Holy to the Lord, hence Charam and Cherem, and accordingly Anathema, come to have that ſenſe ſometimes, but in a very improper and forced manner.

The other text in Joſhua ſpeaks not of things that were to be deſtroyed, but to be preſerved, and therefore it is added there, they ſhall come into the treaſury of the Lord, and conſequently they are ſaid to be Holineſs unto the Lord. But this is foreign to the preſent buſineſs, for we are ſpeaking now of the primary and proper meaning of the word, not of any improper and ſecondary one. I grant, that 'Ανάθεμα is improperly, and, as it were at a diſtance, applied to the things which are conſecrated to God, and are reſerved for his particular uſe and ſervice; but thence to infer, that this is the firſt, genuine, and native ſignification of the word, is unreaſonable and illogical. The things ſpoken of in the fore-named place, viz. the city of Jericho, and all that was in it, are called 'Ανάθεμα in the Seventy's tranſlation; not becauſe they were to be reſerved for the uſe of the Temple, or becauſe they were conſecrated to the Lord: No, this is another conſideration of the things, and is nothing at all to the true import of the word, for this conſecrating to the Lord, refers to ſome perticular individual things only, and not to the reſt ſpoken of in that place. For, obſerve what is there ſaid, ver. 17. The city ſhall be (Anathema) accurſed, even it, and all that are therein, all things as well as perſons. For Kal takes in both, and the Seventy Interpreters particularly reſtrain it to things, πάντα ὅσα, &c. Now, that by 'Ανάθεμα, or being accurſed to the Lord, is meant here, that they ſhall be deſtroyed to the glory of God, is evident from the words immediately enſuing, Only Rahab the harlot ſhall live, ſhe, and all that are with her in the houſe. Theſe particularly are excepted from the general Anathema or curſe, which was to end in deſtruction: Therefore, it is undeniably true, that all other perſons and things were curſed by God, and deſtined to deſtruction. The whole city, and every perſon and thing in it, were thus an Anathema, yet ſo as God was pleaſed to ſpare the ſilver and gold, the braſs and iron for the ſervice of the Tabernacle. But ſtill theſe are included in the general notion of 'Αναθέματα, or accurſed things, and ſo are called in ver. 18. becauſe they did belong to that accurſed city Jericho, and ſhould have been involved in the actual curſe and deſtruction, if God had not in a peculiar manner exempted them, and thought good to reſerve them for holy and religious uſes, and thereby to cut off, as it were, the curſe entailed upon them. But if we conſider the things in themſelves, i. e. as they appertained to that city, which was devoted by God to perdition, they are 'Αναθέματα, accurſed things, and are ſo ſtiled, as you have heard. The words in ver. 18. run thus, Keep your ſelves from the accurſed thing, (viz. the gold and ſilver, &c. mentioned in the next verſe) leſt you make your ſelves accurſed when ye take of the accurſed thing, and make the camp of Iſrael a curſe. Or, you may read it according to the Septuagint, thus, Keep your ſelves from the Anathema, leſt you make your ſelves Anathema, when ye take of the Anathema, and make the camp of Iſrael an Anathema. Here is, you ſee, nothing contained in the primitive and genuine ſenſe of the word 'Ανάθεμα, but a curſe, and a devoting, or being devoted to miſchief and perdition, for there is no colour at all of reaſon to take 'Ανάθεμα here in contrary ſenſes; but all men muſt acknowledge, that the general ſenſe is the ſame in every clauſe of this verſe, or elſe it is impoſſible to make any ſenſe of it. Which ſhews us what is the true import of the word, viz. A being ſet apart and deſtined by a ſolemn curſe to deſtruction, and conſequently that the word is not to be taken in a good ſenſe, but the contrary, viz. for ſomething execrable and deteſtable, and (as the the conſequent of this) that it is far different from 'Ανάθημα, yea, is another word, which is the thing I was to prove.

But notwithſtanding this, we ſhall find that ſome writers are very defective here, and miſtake one word for another, and thence they tell us, that 'Αναθέματα are things dedicated to God. Thus Juſtin Martyr, Reſp. 21. ad Orthod. confounds the words, and ſo doth Chryſoſtom, Homil. 16. in Epiſt. ad Rom. whatever a late writer, Suicer. Theſaur. Eccleſ. ſuggeſts to the contrary. Nor do Theodoret, in cap. 13. Eſai. & in cap. 9. ad Roman. or Oecumenius, diſtinguiſh between them, as appears from ſome part of their writings, in 23 cap. Act. And Balſamon and Zonaras often confound the words 'Ανάθεμα and 'Ανάθημα, in their comments on the councils. The ſame is done by ſome modern commentators, as Cetterius, in Rev. xxii. 3. Gomarus, in Gal. i. 8. and others. But you may obſerve, that all the exact maſters of Grammar and Criticiſm make a real diſcrimination between theſe two: Thus, according to Heſychius, 'Ανάθεμα is ἐπάρατος, 'Ακοινώνητος, maledictus, excommunicatus: But 'Ανάθημα is κόσμημα donarium, ornamentum templi. The like diſtinction is made by Suidas and Pollux, and other Grammarians. Budæus, Annotat. in Pandect. a ſufficient judge in this caſe, aſſerts this difference, and by no means ſuffers them to be confounded. Eſtius, that judicious commentator, tells us, in Rom. ix. 3. that it is moſt certain the ancient Greeks made a diſtinction between 'Ανάθεμα and 'Ανάθημα. Heinſius, Exercitat. Sac. in cap. 4. ad Rom. wonders that any have aſſerted the promiſcuous uſe of theſe words; for they are (ſaith he) not only diverſe, but contrary. The learned Salmaſius, Exercitat. in Solin. p. 1089. agrees with him, and makes a real difference between theſe words. So Hofman, in his Univerſal Lexicon, in verbo Anathema, p. 99. carefully fixes the diſtinction between them.

If it be asked what was the reaſon, or occaſion rather of the fore-mentioned miſtake about theſe words, whence was it that the fore-named authors, and ſeveral others, whom I might have produced, confound theſe two? I anſwer, I conceive this is the ground of it, namely, becauſe offerings and gifts are ſometimes conſecrated to God, with the addition of a curſe: As Darius's decree for building and dedicating the Temple, ends with an execration, Ezra vi. 12. Thence, perhaps, Anathema hath been uſed to ſignify a gift dedicated to a Temple, and an accurſed thing, or ſuch a one as hath a curſe laid on it, viz. a curſe to him that ſhall meddle with it to alienate it. Thence Anathemata were ſaid to be thoſe gifts that were conſecrated to God, and which it was not lawful to convert to another uſe, becauſe the conſecration was under pain of a curſe to thoſe that altered the property of them. And it is, indeed, generally ſaid by the Jewiſh doctors, that one ſort of their Cherems were ſo ſet apart from common uſe, that there was implied, and ſometimes expreſſed, a curſing of them who ſhould attempt to alienate them. I conjecture, it is on this account, (viz. becauſe of this execration annexed to the donation) that theſe words have had a promiſcuous uſe, and have been thought by ſome to ſignify things conſecrated to Holy uſes, and alſo thoſe that are deſtined to deſtruction. Hence, as I ſuppoſe, Anathema, with a little variation in the writing, and ſometimes without it, is of an ambiguous meaning, and hath been taken by ſome in a good and a bad ſenſe, namely, for the gifts and offerings which religious votaries preſent to the Deity, and appropriate to ſacred uſes, and likewiſe for ſuch things and perſons as are wholly alienated from God, and are devoted to deſtruction by him. But the former acception is ſecondary and improper, and the riſe of that promiſcuouſneſs of the words which we have obſerved, is only from that curſe which is ſometimes annexed to the conſecration. Hence it is that the primitive meaning of the words 'Ανάθεμα and 'Ανάθημα is perverted; as we ſee there are many inſtances of the like nature. For there are ſome good words, (as τύραννος, φάρμακον, &c.) which afterward are uſed in a bad ſenſe; and, on the contrary, ſome words of ill meaning, (as μεθύειν, &c.) become good ſometimes. Thus it is here in the words before us, they are diſtorted from their proper ſenſe and primitive uſe, and one is made to ſignify the ſame with the other; whereas they really differ in themſelves, and are of a contrary ſignification.

Having thus cleared the way to what I intended, by ſhewing the difference between theſe two words 'Ανάθημα and 'Ανάθεμα, I come now to ſpeak particularly of this latter, and to offer a more diſtinct account of the genuine meaning of it. We muſt know then that 'Ανάθεμα hath its original from the ſame Greek word that 'Ανάθημα had, yet with this difference, that 'Αναθεῖναι or 'Αναθέσθαι ſignifies here ſeparare, removere, auferre, as alſo renuntiare, rejicere (for theſe are the known ſignifications of the Greek word in good claſſick authors; ſee Conſtantine's Lexicon). And conſequently, as 'Ανάθημα properly ſignifies that which is kept or laid up in ſome eminent place, ſo 'Ανάθεμα properly denotes that which is ſeparated, removed, taken away and rejected: Briefly, as the former ſignifies the preſerving of a thing, ſo this latter imports the utter deſtroying and conſuming of it. But not to rely wholly upon the etymology (which I know generally is but an uncertain proof,) I will make this good from other conſiderations, and offer the reaſons why I fix this interpretation on the word. Firſt, Let it be remembred that our Apoſtle often alludes and refers to the Old Teſtament, and makes uſe of ſeveral words, phraſes and expreſſions which he finds there. Thoſe that are converſant in the ſtile of this Hebraizing writer, will not ſhew any averſeneſs to acknowledge this, and therefore I need not inſiſt upon it. Now, it is probable, that he doth the like here, i. e. That he refers to that noted word Cherem ſo often mentioned in the Old Teſtament, which hath this very ſignification, and is applied in the ſame manner that this word is: So that any diſcerning perſon may perceive that this Greek word 'Ανάθεμα anſwers exactly to the Hebrew Cherem, and that the Apoſtle hath reſpect to it in this place. Secondly, This is made more probable from the famous verſion of the Seventy Interpreters, who conſtantly render the word Cherem by this word which the Apoſtle here uſeth, viz. 'Ανάθεμα, and from them without doubt this word was taken by this Sacred Writer, who in above a hundred places (as might eaſily be ſhewed) hath borrowed words from thoſe Greek interpreters, and applied them in the ſame ſenſe and meaning that they do. Wherefore, it is reaſonable to think that he doth the like here. Thirdly and laſtly, This may be called an eccleſiaſtick word, becauſe it is moſt uſed by the fathers and Church-writers, and from their rendring and explaining of the word, we may infer that it runs parallel with Cherem.

Here then we are concerned to look into the true import of this word Cherem, becauſe upon this depends the right underſtanding of the word 'Ανάθεμα. Firſt, we ſhall find that the more general ſignification of the verb Charam, whence this noun cometh, is ſeparavit, excommunicavit, and conſequently Cherem is a ſeparation, or the ſentence of excommunication whereby perſons are ſeparated and cut off from Holy Communion, Cherem, privatio vel ſeparatio plenaria. Avenar. lib. Radic. This is the uſual meaning of the word in Jewiſh writers, they underſtand by it an eccleſiaſtical puniſhment, or a ſolemn interdiction or proſcription, whereby contumacious offenders are forbid the uſe of holy things, and debarred the communion of the Church, and the benefits of it. But in the next place, the more particular import of the word is ſeparating with a curſe. For devovere, execrari is the uſual ſignification of the verb charam in Scripture, as in 1 Kings xx. 42. Iſa. xxxiv 5. and other places; whence cherem is not only a curſed thing, or perſon, but the curſing of them. This is that which is threatned by God to the Jews, if they reject the Meſſias, and is the concluſion of the Old Teſtament, That he will come and ſmite them with a curſe, Mal. iv. 6. Cherem is the word, and thence 'Ανάθεμα is frequently uſed to denote a curſe, and 'Αναθεματίζειν and Καταναθεματίζειν, as in Acts xxiii. 12. ſignify to curſe, or to ſwear with the addition of a curſe. It is a ſeparating and devoting of things or perſons by a ſolemn execration; it is a vowing, wiſhing and pronouncing their deſtruction and perdition. Therefore, thirdly, charam among the Hebrews is deſolavit, deſtruxit; and cherem is deſolatio, deſtructio, perditio omnimoda. As to the verb, it is acknowledged by all, that there are great numbers of texts, wherein it ſignifies to deſtroy utterly, as in Exod. xxii. 20. Deut. ii. 34. where the word can have no other ſenſe than this, and therefore is rendred by the Seventy Ἐξωλοθρεύειν and Ἐξωλοθρεύσεως. So in Iſa. xi. 15. it cannot poſſibly ſignify any thing elſe (as is plain from the words themſelves, and from the context) and therefore, Ἐρημοῦν devaſtare, deſolare is the verſion of the Septuagint. Again, in Jer. li. 3. and Dan. xi. 44. it cannot be underſtood otherwiſe than thus, and accordingly it is rendred in both places Ἀφανίζειν, abolere. And I queſtion not but this is the meaning of the word in Ezra x. 8. though we tranſlate it to forfeit; but the plain ſenſe and rendring of it is this, his ſubſtance ſhall be deſtroyed, as in the caſe of Achan; wherefore, Ἀναθεματισθήσεται, is the word uſed here by the Greek interpreters, becauſe Ἀνάθεμα anſwers to cherem, the proper meaning of which word is deſtruction.

And we may farther learn and be aſcertained of the true and genuine meaning of this word from the law of cherem, ſet down in Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. which there ſignifies a thing or perſon devoted to deſtruction, and alſo from the particular inſtances of this cherem, as thoſe idolatrous cities mentioned in Deut. xiii. 15, 16. Which were to be utterly deſtroyed, and all that was in them. Neither inhabitants nor cattle were to be ſpared, nay, all the ſpoil of them was to be gathered into the midſt of their ſtreets, and both city and ſpoil to be burnt to aſhes. The cities ſhall be a heap for ever, they ſhall never be built again, and there ſhall cleave nought of the accurſed thing (the Anathema) to thy hand, ver. 17. Jericho was a cherem, curſed and deſtined to deſtruction: So Amalek was devoted to be a cherem, 1 Sam. xv. 3. Utterly deſtroy all that they have, and ſpare them not, but ſlay both man and woman, &c. Charam and Ἀναθεματίζειν are the words here uſed. And hence perhaps were the Καθάρματα and devota capita, among the Greeks and Romans: For, as I have ſaid before, it was not unuſual with the Gentiles to borrow ſome practices from the Jews. They had a report among them, it is likely, of this remarkable uſage, viz. The devoting of certain cities, and the inhabitants of them, to ſlaughter and deſtruction, and that this was executed by the ſpecial command of God: Whence it is not improbable, that in an apiſh and ſuperſtitious manner they took up ſuch a practice as this, and devoted certain men to death and deſtruction, to pleaſe their gods. And this is the more probable, becauſe the very word Ἀναθέματα was uſed by the ancient Greeks to ſignify thoſe execrable wretches who were choſen out to be put to death, and to be devoted to the infernal dæmons. The Ἀναθέματα anſwer to the Jewiſh cherem, i. e. things or perſons devoted to utter deſtruction, for the word cherem retains the ſenſe of the verb charam, which ſignifies utterly to deſtroy, and that without mercy: Whence the critical Hebrews tell us, that charam is directly oppoſite to the verb racham, miſereri, i. e. to have mercy.

From charam the word chormah derives its pedigree, and ſo ſhould be tranſlated deſtruction, in Numb. xiv. 45. though you find it otherwiſe, for the vulgar Latin keeps the Hebrew word it ſelf, and our Engliſh tranſlators follow it, rendring the place thus, The Amalekite diſcomfited them even unto Hormah, whereas, I conceive, hormah or chormah, denotes not a place, but death and deſtruction, and the words ſhould be rendred thus, The Amalekite diſcomfited, or purſued them even unto utter deſtruction, i. e. death. Thoſe Pagan victors puſhed on their conqueſt even to the utmoſt extremity, according to what Moſes had foretold, ver. 43. that the Iſraelites ſhould fall by the ſword. Thus they were deſtroyed, as you expreſly read in Deut. i. 44. where this ſame paſſage is related again. And from ſuch a fatal event as this (but upon the contrary party, the Iſraelites afterwards overthrowing the Canaanites) the place where the execution was done was called Hormah, and not before, Numb. xxi. 3. They utterly deſtroyed them (Ἀναθεμάτισεν, is the word uſed by the Septuagint) and their cities, and called the name of the place Chormah, or (according to the Greek tranſlation) anathema: So it is as much as cherem, you ſee. But in the other text before-mentioned, hormah is no proper name, but an appellative; which is farther evident from this, that there is an He before it, whereas there are no prefixes to proper names. I am inclined to think, that harmageddon, Rev. xvi. 16. (a word that hath much exerciſed the critical wits) is of the ſame derivation, charmah denoting deſtruction, and Gad or Geddon an army, and ſo it ſignifies the deſtruction and ſatal overthrow of that army of antichriſt which was to rendezvous in that place: It takes its name from the event which you read in ver. 19. This, I conceive, is preferable to the other derivations that are uſually aſſigned of the word harmageddon.

I will alſo obſerve to you, that this word cherem in a metaphorical way ſignifies a net, in which fiſhes are taken to be killed and eaten, i. e. deſtroyed, Ezek. xxxii. 3. Mic. vii. 2. Hab. i. 15. All which I alledge, to ſhew you that cherem, if you reſpect the word from whence it is extracted, or the words that are of near affinity with it, denotes killing and deſtroying. This is the proper ſignification of it (for as to the catechreſtick acception of it, I have nothing to do with it here,) yea, this is its firſt and original ſignification, Brixian. Theſaur. Linguæ S. and Avenar. lib. Radic. By cherem we are principally to underſtand utter deſtruction and perdition, final extirpation and exciſion, and withal the wiſhing, vowing and denouncing of theſe. Thus Ἀνάθεμα in the New Teſtament is borrowed from cherem in the old, and anſwers exactly to it. I know ſome authors have taken notice of the reference of the one to the other, but I thought fit to ſuperadd a full and diſtinct account of the remarkable agreement that is between them, and this I have done by laying open the origination of the words, and the particular uſe of them. Ἤτω Ἀνάθεμα, is as much as, let him be a cherem, that is to ſay, in the full meaning of it, Let him be a perſon ſeparated, curſed, deſtroyed.

So that by this I have conducted you to the true and compleat meaning of the Apoſtle's words: Here is a tripple judgment denounced againſt thoſe that love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, thoſe who are ſo far from loving him, that they diſown and deny him. For, it is certain, here is a Meioſis, leſs is expreſſed than is intended; by not loving is meant hating and renouncing of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Let him that is guilty of this horrid ſin be anathema, ſaith the Apoſtle, that is,

1. Let him be ſeparated. In which theſe two things are included; Firſt, that he be ſeparated from Chriſt's Church, that he be excluded from being a member of that body. Ἀνάθεμα, anſwering to cherem, is rightly underſtood, as that was, of excommunication, which is a prohibition of communion with the Church, and a cutting a perſon off from the benefits which accrue from it. Thus our Apoſtle, in his holy zeal for the Jews his countrymen and kinſmen, profeſſes he could be content to be for their ſakes an anathema from Chriſt, Rom. ix. 3. i. e. to be ſeparated from Chriſt's Church, and the communion of ſaints: He could even wiſh himſelf excommunicated from the aſſemblies of the faithful, if this might any ways redound to the good of his brethren. So here, the leaſt puniſhment that can be inflicted on him who loves not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, is that he be deprived of the fellowſhip of the Church, of which he profeſſed himſelf to be a member. As he renounceth Chriſt, ſo it is but juſt he ſhould be caſt off by the Church, and debarred of all ſociety with it. So Chryſoſtom underſtands this place, homil. 16. in epiſt. ad Rom. Let him be Anathema, that is, ſaith he, Let him be ſeparated from all, let him be eſtranged from all, Let him be a ſtranger to the common body of the Church, ſaith Theodoret, in loc. Anathema is ſeparation or alienation, ſaith Theophylact, in Rom. ix. 3. And, indeed, among Chriſtian and Eccleſiaſtical Writers it hath this peculiar denotation, and is uſed to ſignify excommunication. And as he deſerves to be ſeparated from the Church, ſo likewiſe from Chriſt himſelf. Secondly, therefore, Let him be Anathema, i. e. Let him be ſeparated from Chriſt, let him have no part in Jeſus. So, indeed, the Apoſtle's words before-mentioned may be farther meant, I could wiſh that my ſelf were Anathema from Chriſt, i. e. ſeparated from Chriſt himſelf. If it were poſſible, (for it is but a ſuppoſition, and a ſtrain of paſſionate love and endearment,) if it might any ways promote my brethrens welfare, I could willingly be excluded from all benefit by our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. I could, methinks, endure any loſs, part with God's favour and my own bliſs curſe, and a devoting, or being devoted to miſchief and perdition, for there is no colour at all of reaſon to take Ἀνάθεμα here in contrary ſenſes; but all men muſt acknowledge, that the general ſenſe is the ſame in every clauſe of this verſe, or elſe it is impoſſible to make any ſenſe of it. Which ſhews us what is the true import of the word, viz. A being ſet apart and deſtined by a ſolemn curſe to deſtruction, and conſequently that the word is not to be taken in a good ſenſe, but the contrary, viz. for ſomething execrable and deteſtable, and (as the the conſequent of this) that it is far different from Ἀνάθημα, yea, is another word, which is the thing I was to prove.

But notwithſtanding this, we ſhall find that ſome writers are very defective here, and miſtake one word for another, and thence they tell us, that Ἀναθέματα are things dedicated to God. Thus Juſtin Martyr, Reſp. 21. ad Orthod. confounds the words, and ſo doth Chryſoſtom, Homil. 16. in Epiſt. ad Rom. whatever a late writer, Suicer. Theſaur. Eccleſ. ſuggeſts to the contrary. Nor do Theodoret, in cap. 13. Eſai. & in cap. 9. ad Roman. or Oecumenius, diſtinguiſh between them, as appears from ſome part of their writings, in 23 cap. Act. And Balſamon and Zonaras often confound the words Ἀνάθεμα and Ἀνάθημα, in their comments on the councils. The ſame is done by ſome modern commentators, as Cetterius, in Rev. xxii. 3. Gomarus, in Gal. i. 8. and others. But you may obſerve, that all the exact maſters of Grammar and Criticiſm make a real diſcrimination between theſe two: Thus, according to Heſychius, Ἀνάθεμα is ἐπάρατος, Ἀκοινώνητος, maledictus, excommunicatus: But Ἀνάθημα is κόσμημα donarium, ornamentum templi. The like diſtinction is made by Suidas and Pollux, and other Grammarians. Budæus, Annotat. in Pandect. a ſufficient judge in this caſe, aſſerts this difference, and by no means ſuffers them to be confounded. Eſtius, that judicious commentator, tells us, in Rom. ix. 3. that it is moſt certain the ancient Greeks made a diſtinction between Ἀνάθεμα and Ἀνάθημα. Heinſius, Exercitat. Sac. in cap. 4. ad Rom. wonders that any have aſſerted the promiſcuous uſe of theſe words; for they are (ſaith he) not only diverſe, but contrary. The learned Salmaſius, Exercitat. in Solin. p. 1089. agrees with him, and makes a real difference between theſe words. So Hofman, in his Univerſal Lexicon, in verbo Anathema, p. 99. carefully fixes the diſtinction between them.

If it be aſked what was the reaſon, or occaſion rather of the fore-mentioned miſtake about theſe words, whence was it that the fore-named authors, and ſeveral others, whom I might have produced, confound theſe two? I anſwer, I conceive this is the ground of it, namely, becauſe offerings and gifts are ſometimes conſecrated to God, with the addition of a curſe: As Darius's decree for building and dedicating the Temple, ends with an execration, Ezra vi. 12. Thence, perhaps, Anathema hath been uſed to ſignify a gift dedicated to a Temple, and an accurſed thing, or ſuch a one as hath a curſe laid on it, viz. a curſe to him that ſhall meddle with it to alienate it. Thence Anathemata were ſaid to be thoſe gifts that were conſecrated to God, and which it was not lawful to convert to another uſe, becauſe the conſecration was under pain of a curſe to thoſe that altered the property of them. And it is, indeed, generally ſaid by the Jewiſh doctors, that one ſort of their Cherems were ſo ſet apart from common uſe, that there was implied, and ſometimes expreſſed, a curſing of them who ſhould attempt to alienate them. I conjecture, it is on this account, (viz. becauſe of this execration annexed to the donation) that theſe words have had a promiſcuous uſe, and have been thought by ſome to ſignify things conſecrated to Holy uſes, and alſo thoſe that are deſtined to deſtruction. Hence, as I ſuppoſe, Anathema, with a little variation in the writing, and ſometimes without it, is of an ambiguous meaning, and hath been taken by ſome in a good and a bad ſenſe, namely, for the gifts and offerings which religious votaries preſent to the Deity, and appropriate to ſacred uſes, and likewiſe for ſuch things and perſons as are wholly alienated from God, and are devoted to deſtruction by him. But the former acception is ſecondary and improper, and the riſe of that promiſcuouſneſs of the words which we have obſerved, is only from that curſe which is ſometimes annexed to the conſecration. Hence it is that the primitive meaning of the words Ἀνάθεμα and Ἀνάθημα is perverted; as we ſee there are many inſtances of the like nature. For there are ſome good words, (as τύραννος, φάρμακον; &c.) which afterward are uſed in a bad ſenſe; and, on the contrary, ſome words of ill meaning, (as μεθύειν, &c.) become good ſometimes. Thus it is here in the words before us, they are diſtorted from their proper ſenſe and primitive uſe, and one is made to ſignify the ſame with the other; whereas they really differ in themſelves, and are of a contrary ſignification.

Having thus cleared the way to what I intended, by ſhewing the difference between theſe two words Ἀνάθημα and Ἀνάθεμα, I come now to ſpeak particularly of this latter, and to offer a more diſtinct account of the genuine meaning of it. We muſt know then that Ἀνάθεμα hath its original from the ſame Greek word that Ἀνάθημα had, yet with this difference, that Ἀναθεῖναι or Ἀνατιθέναι ſignifies here ſeparare, removere, auferre, as alſo renuntiare, rejicere (for theſe are the known ſignifications of the Greek word in good claſſick authors; ſee Conſtantine's Lexicon). And conſequently, as Ἀνάθημα properly ſignifies that which is kept or laid up in ſome eminent place, ſo Ἀνάθεμα properly denotes that which is ſeparated, removed, taken away and rejected: Briefly, as the former ſignifies the preſerving of a thing, ſo this latter imports the utter deſtroying and conſuming of it. But not to rely wholly upon the etymology (which I know generally is but an uncertain proof,) I will make this good from other conſiderations, and offer the reaſons why I fix this interpretation on the word. Firſt, Let it be remembred that our Apoſtle often alludes and refers to the Old Teſtament, and makes uſe of ſeveral words, phraſes and expreſſions which he finds there. Thoſe that are converſant in the ſtile of this Hebraizing writer, will not ſhew any averſeneſs to acknowledge this, and therefore I need not inſiſt upon it. Now, it is probable, that he doth the like here, i. e. That he refers to that noted word Cherem ſo often mentioned in the Old Teſtament, which hath this very ſignification, and is applied in the ſame manner that this word is: So that any diſcerning perſon may perceive that this Greek word Ἀνάθεμα anſwers exactly to the Hebrew Cherem, and that the Apoſtle hath reſpect to it in this place. Secondly, This is made more probable from the famous verſion of the Seventy Interpreters, who conſtantly render the word Cherem by this word which the Apoſtle here uſeth, viz. Ἀνάθεμα, and from them without doubt this word was taken by this Sacred Writer, who in above a hundred places (as might eaſily be ſhewed) hath borrowed words from thoſe Greek interpreters, and applied them in the ſame ſenſe and meaning that they do. Wherefore, it is reaſonable to think that he doth the like here. Thirdly and laſtly, This may be called an eccleſiaſtick word, becauſe it is moſt uſed by the fathers and Church-writers, and from their rendring and explaining of the word, we may infer that it runs parallel with Cherem.

Here then we are concerned to look into the true import of this word Cherem, becauſe upon this depends the right underſtanding of the word Ἀνάθεμα. Firſt, we ſhall find that the more general ſignification of the verb Charam, whence this noun cometh, is ſeparavit, excommunicavit, and conſequently Cherem is a ſeparation, or the ſentence of excommunication whereby perſons are ſeparated and cut off from Holy Communion, Cherem, privatio vel ſeparatio plenaria. Avenar. lib. Radic. This is the uſual meaning of the word in Jewiſh writers, they underſtand by it an eccleſiaſtical puniſhment, or a ſolemn interdiction or proſcription, whereby contumacious offenders are forbid the uſe of holy things, and debarred the communion of the Church, and the benefits of it. But in the next place, the more particular import of the word is ſeparating with a curſe. For devovere, execrari is the uſual ſignification of the verb charam in Scripture, as in 1 Kings xx. 42. Iſa. xxxiv 5. and other places; whence cherem is not only a curſed thing, or perſon, but the curſing of them. This is that which is threatned by God to the Jews, if they reject the Meſſias, and is the concluſion of the Old Teſtament, That he will come and ſmite them with a curſe, Mal. iv. 6. Cherem is the word, and thence Ἀνάθεμα is frequently uſed to denote a curſe, and Ἀναθεματίζειν and Καταναθεματίζειν, as in Acts xxiii. 12. ſignify to curſe, or to ſwear with the addition of a curſe. It is a ſeparating and devoting of things or perſons by a ſolemn execration; it is a vowing, wiſhing and pronouncing their deſtruction and perdition. Therefore, thirdly, charam among the Hebrews is deſolavit, deſtruxit; and cherem is deſolatio, deſtructio, perditio omnimoda. As to the verb, it is acknowledged by all, that there are great numbers of texts, wherein it ſignifies to deſtroy utterly, as in Exod. xxii. 20. Deut. ii. 34. where the word can have no other ſenſe than this, and therefore is rendred by the Seventy 'Εξωλοθρεύειν and 'Εξωλοθρεύσεως. So in Iſa. xi. 15. it cannot poſſibly ſignify any thing elſe (as is plain from the words themſelves, and from the context) and therefore, 'Ερεμῶν devaſtare, deſolare is the verſion of the Septuagint. Again, in Jer. li. 3. and Dan. xi. 44. it cannot be underſtood otherwiſe than thus, and accordingly it is rendred in both places 'Αφανίζειν, abolere. And I queſtion not but this is the meaning of the word in Ezra x. 8. though we tranſlate it to forfeit; but the plain ſenſe and rendring of it is this, his ſubſtance ſhall be deſtroyed, as in the caſe of Achan; wherefore, 'Αναθεματισθήσεται, is the word uſed here by the Greek interpreters, becauſe 'Ανάθεμα anſwers to cherem, the proper meaning of which word is deſtruction.

And we may farther learn and be aſcertained of the true and genuine meaning of this word from the law of cherem, ſet down in Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. which there ſignifies a thing or perſon devoted to deſtruction, and alſo from the particular inſtances of this cherem, as thoſe idolatrous cities mentioned in Deut. xiii. 15, 16. Which were to be utterly deſtroyed, and all that was in them. Neither inhabitants nor cattle were to be ſpared, nay, all the ſpoil of them was to be gathered into the midſt of their ſtreets, and both city and ſpoil to be burnt to aſhes. The cities ſhall be a heap for ever, they ſhall never be built again, and there ſhall cleave nought of the accurſed thing (the Anathema) to thy hand, ver. 17. Jericho was a cherem, curſed and deſtined to deſtruction: So Amalek was devoted to be a cherem, 1 Sam. xv. 3. Utterly deſtroy all that they have, and ſpare them not, but ſlay both man and woman, &c. Charam and 'Αναθεματίζειν are the words here uſed. And hence perhaps were the Καθάρματα and devota capita, among the Greeks and Romans: For, as I have ſaid before, it was not unuſual with the Gentiles to borrow ſome practices from the Jews. They had a report among them, it is likely, of this remarkable uſage, viz. The devoting of certain cities, and the inhabitants of them, to ſlaughter and deſtruction, and that this was executed by the ſpecial command of God: Whence it is not improbable, that in an apiſh and ſuperſtitious manner they took up ſuch a practice as this, and devoted certain men to death and deſtruction, to pleaſe their gods. And this is the more probable, becauſe the very word 'Αναθέματα was uſed by the ancient Greeks to ſignify thoſe execrable wretches who were choſen out to be put to death, and to be devoted to the infernal dæmons. The 'Αναθέματα anſwer to the Jewiſh cherem, i. e. things or perſons devoted to utter deſtruction, for the word cherem retains the ſenſe of the verb charam, which ſignifies utterly to deſtroy, and that without mercy: Whence the critical Hebrews tell us, that charam is directly oppoſite to the verb racham, miſereri, i. e. to have mercy.

From charam the word chormah derives its pedigree, and ſo ſhould be tranſlated deſtruction, in Numb. xiv. 45. though you find it otherwiſe, for the vulgar Latin keeps the Hebrew word it ſelf, and our Engliſh tranſlators follow it, rendring the place thus, The Amalekite diſcomfited them even unto Hormah, whereas, I conceive, hormah or chormah, denotes not a place, but death and deſtruction, and the words ſhould be rendred thus, The Amalekite diſcomfited, or purſued them even unto utter deſtruction, i. e. death. Thoſe Pagan victors puſhed on their conqueſt even to the utmoſt extremity, according to what Moſes had foretold, ver. 43. that the Iſraelites ſhould fall by the ſword. Thus they were deſtroyed, as you expreſly read in Deut. i. 44. where this ſame paſſage is related again. And from ſuch a fatal event as this (but upon the contrary party, the Iſraelites afterwards overthrowing the Canaanites) the place where the execution was done was called Hormah, and not before, Numb. xxi. 3. They utterly deſtroyed them ('Αναθεμάτισεν, is the word uſed by the Septuagint) and their cities, and called the name of the place Chormah, or (according to the Greek tranſlation) anathema: So it is as much as cherem, you ſee. But in the other text before-mentioned, hormah is no proper name, but an appellative; which is farther evident from this, that there is an He before it, whereas there are no prefixes to proper names. I am inclined to think, that harmageddon, Rev. xvi. 16. (a word that hath much exerciſed the critical wits) is of the ſame derivation, charmah denoting deſtruction, and Gad or Geddon an army, and ſo it ſignifies the deſtruction and fatal overthrow of that army of antichriſt which was to rendezvous in that place: It takes its name from the event which you read in ver. 19. This, I conceive, is preferable to the other derivations that are uſually aſſigned of the word harmageddon.

I will alſo obſerve to you, that this word cherem in a metaphorical way ſignifies a net, in which fiſhes are taken to be killed and eaten, i. e. deſtroyed, Ezek. xxxii. 3. Mic. vii. 2. Hab. i. 15. All which I alledge, to ſhew you that cherem, if you reſpect the word from whence it is extracted, or the words that are of near affinity with it, denotes killing and deſtroying. This is the proper ſignification of it (for as to the catechreſtick acception of it, I have nothing to do with it here,) yea, this is its firſt and original ſignification, Brixian. Theſaur. Linguæ S. and Avenar. lib. Radic. By cherem we are principally to underſtand utter deſtruction and perdition, final extirpation and exciſion, and withal the wiſhing, vowing and denouncing of theſe. Thus 'Ανάθεμα in the New Teſtament is borrowed from cherem in the old, and anſwers exactly to it. I know ſome authors have taken notice of the reference of the one to the other, but I thought fit to ſuperadd a full and diſtinct account of the remarkable agreement that is between them, and this I have done by laying open the origination of the words, and the particular uſe of them. Ἤτω 'Ανάθεμα, is as much as, let him be a cherem, that is to ſay, in the full meaning of it, Let him be a perſon ſeparated, curſed, deſtroyed.

So that by this I have conducted you to the true and compleat meaning of the Apoſtle's words: Here is a tripple judgment denounced againſt thoſe that love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, thoſe who are ſo far from loving him, that they diſown and deny him. For, it is certain, here is a Meioſis, leſs is expreſſed than is intended; by not loving is meant hating and renouncing of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Let him that is guilty of this horrid ſin be anathema, ſaith the Apoſtle, that is,

1. Let him be ſeparated. In which theſe two things are included; Firſt, that he be ſeparated from Chriſt's Church, that he be excluded from being a member of that body. 'Ανάθεμα, anſwering to cherem, is rightly underſtood, as that was, of excommunication, which is a prohibition of communion with the Church, and a cutting a perſon off from the benefits which accrue from it. Thus our Apoſtle, in his holy zeal for the Jews his countrymen and kinſmen, profeſſes he could be content to be for their ſakes an anathema from Chriſt, Rom. ix. 3. i. e. to be ſeparated from Chriſt's Church, and the communion of ſaints: He could even wiſh himſelf excommunicated from the aſſemblies of the faithful, if this might any ways redound to the good of his brethren. So here, the leaſt puniſhment that can be inflicted on him who loves not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, is that he be deprived of the fellowſhip of the Church, of which he profeſſed himſelf to be a member. As he renounceth Chriſt, ſo it is but juſt he ſhould be caſt off by the Church, and debarred of all ſociety with it. So Chryſoſtom underſtands this place, homil. 16. in epiſt. ad Rom. Let him be Anathema, that is, ſaith he, Let him be ſeparated from all, let him be eſtranged from all, Let him be a ſtranger to the common body of the Church, ſaith Theodoret, in loc. Anathema is ſeparation or alienation, ſaith Theophylact, in Rom. ix. 3. And, indeed, among Chriſtian and Eccleſiaſtical Writers it hath this peculiar denotation, and is uſed to ſignify excommunication. And as he deſerves to be ſeparated from the Church, ſo likewiſe from Chriſt himſelf. Secondly, therefore, Let him be Anathema, i. e. Let him be ſeparated from Chriſt, let him have no part in Jeſus. So, indeed, the Apoſtle's words before-mentioned may be farther meant, I could wiſh that my ſelf were Anathema from Chriſt, i. e. ſeparated from Chriſt himſelf. If it were poſſible, (for it is but a ſuppoſition, and a ſtrain of paſſionate love and endearment,) if it might any ways promote my brethrens welfare, I could willingly be excluded from all benefit by our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. I could, methinks, endure any loſs, part with God's favour and my own bliſs for their ſakes. But what the Apoſtle here utters only in a high ſtrain of affection, to expreſs his great concern for his kindred, (for you muſt look upon it as no other,) he moſt truly and directly wiſheth and denounceth againſt all thoſe that wilfully and obſtinately renounce Chriſt, that fall from the faith they once profeſſed, and abjure the Holy Jeſus. Let ſuch a one never in this world enjoy his favour, or ſhare in any advantage by his Bleſſed Undertakings for mankind.

2. Let him be a perſon accurſed of God and men, for that (as I have ſhewed) is contained in the notion of cherem, and conſequently of Anathema; and thence among the writers of the Church, to anathematize is to curſe, or to denounce accurſed. If any man love not, i. e. hate the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, it is a moſt equal recompenſe of that his hatred, that he himſelf be deteſted and abhorred, and that he be curſed upon earth. If he calls Chriſt Anathema, 1 Cor. xii. 3. i. e. looks upon him, and ſpeaks of him as an abominable execrable perſon, he certainly himſelf ought to be an Anathema, an execration, a malediction. As he is juſtly baniſhed from the communion of the Church (which we ſpoke of before,) ſo moreover, he is to be delivered to Satan, which in the Apoſtles times accompanied excommunication, 1 Cor. v. 5. 1 Tim. i. 20. This is a farther puniſhment of the apoſtate here ſpoken of. He is to be accounted a devoted perſon, he is to be conſigned over to the evil ſpirit, as a moſt deteſtable and curſed wretch, forſaken of God, and deſtined to deſtruction. Which is the Third thing contained in this word. Let him be Anathema, i. e. let him be deſtroyed; for that alſo is comprehended in the notion of Cherem, yea, is the primary import of it, as we have fully proved. Now, this Deſtruction includes in it both the temporal and eternal puniſhment which are entailed on theſe curſed miſcreants, the haters of Chriſt. Firſt, it is probable the Apoſtle means here thoſe temporal inflictions, as ſickneſſes, diſeaſes and torments of body which attended excommunication and delivering to Satan in thoſe days, and which are called the Deſtruction of the fleſh, 1 Cor. v. 5. which alſo may be included in the Apoſtle's wiſh before-mentioned, That himſelf were an Anathema from Chriſt, i. e. That (beſides what hath been ſaid before) he might feel all thoſe corporal puniſhments which uſually were inflicted on ſinners when they were delivered to Satan. I could be content, ſaith he, out of his exceſs of affection and kindneſs, to undergo all thoſe ſeverities and outward hardſhips of body, on condition that I might be really beneficial to the ſouls of my brethren, and reclaim them from their unbelief and impenitence. This the learned Dr. Hammond, (as well as Grotius) takes to be the Anathema of the text which is before us; it refers to the primitive diſcipline of anathematizing or excommunicating, which was followed with moſt diſmal effects, particularly with remarkable judgments on their outward man, which are called by Ignatius Κόλασις τȣ͂ διαβόλȣ, the plagues which the Devil inflicted. Let theſe execrable ſinners, who renounce their Lord and Saviour, be plagued with all thoſe bodily maladies; being thrown out of the communion of the Church, and debarred of ſpiritual benefits, let them ſuffer all the temporal evils and calamities of this life.

Secondly, A future eternal puniſhment in another world is here implied, which makes this denunciation of the Apoſtle to be moſt aſtoniſhing and dreadful. If any man love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and perſiſts in this vile temper and practice, let a curſe purſue him into the next world to his everlaſting perdition and confuſion. This is the higheſt ſenſe of this Anathema, this Cherem, this is a devoting to death, and utter and final deſtruction. So then in brief, the meaning of the words in their full latitude is this, If any man love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, ſo as not to confeſs him, but to renounce and deny him, eſpecially in time of perſecution (as ſome at that time, the Gnoſticks, ſaith our Annotator, affirmed it lawful to do) if any man hate and viliſy the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and diſown and reject that faith which he once embraced, let his reward be to be ſeparated and cut off from Chriſt Jeſus the Head, and from his Body the Church, let him be accurſed in body and ſoul, and be given up to the Prince of Darkneſs, and ſuffer all evils in this world and in the next, let him be deſtined to eternal miſery, and periſh everlaſtingly without remedy.

Thus ſpiritual, temporal, and eternal evils, but more eſpecially theſe laſt, are comprehended in this Apoſtolical Execration; therefore to this Anathema the Apoſtle adds Maran-atha, which is thought by ſome to anſwer to the third kind of Excommunication among the Jews, the ſevereſt and dreadfulleſt of all, which they ſtiled Shammatha, a final ſeparation from the Church, without hopes of returning. And ſome that embrace this opinion, tell us, that Maran-atha is a Talmudick word, and frequent in the Rabbies, and that the greateſt and moſt fearful excommunication among the Jews was called by this name, from the firſt words of the writing or inſtrument of excommunication. But our great Chriſtian Rabbi, Dr. Lightfoot, in hor. Hebr. gainſays this, That this, ſaith he, is a form of the higheſt excommunication, and is the ſame with Shammatha (which ſome aſſert) is utterly without the warrant of any Jewiſh antiquity at all. Nay, the words Maran-atha are not to be met with in the Jewiſh writings. I believe we may take it upon the Doctor's word (who knew as well as any man) that they are not there. However, this is certain, that if we look into both thoſe words, Shammatha and Maran-atha, we ſhall find that they are of the ſame ſignification; for Sham or Shem is nomen, which in ordinary ſpeech among the Jews ſignifies God, and atha is venit; and ſo the compound word is to be reſolved into this, God cometh, which is the ſame with Maran-atha, for Maran in the Syriack and other eaſtern tongues ſignifies Dominus, (and thence, as Grotius obſerves, the Syrian Maronites have their name, becauſe they call Chriſt Marani, i. e. our Lord) and atha, as was ſaid before, is rendred venit, he cometh; and ſo both Shammatha and Maran-atha exactly anſwer to that direful menace of Enoch, The Lord cometh, Jude v. 14. which was a Prophecy as well as an Execration, that was very famous in the Church of the Jews, and from this (it is very probable) thoſe forms of execration were taken; Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thouſands of his Saints, to execute judgment upon all, eſpecially on ſuch wicked and profligate ſinners that deny the Lord who bought them, and ſhamefully renounce the Chriſtian Faith and profeſſion. Theſe are they that love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Here then, all that I will remark is this, that this dreadful Execration which the Apoſtle here uſeth, hath peculiar reference to God's final judging the world, and his executing eternal vengeance on the wicked. For though we may grant, with the learned Lightfoot, that the Apoſtle here primarily ſpeaks to the unbelieving Jews, and accordingly expreſſeth himſelf in the very language which they uſed at that time, viz. Syriack, (whereas in Hebrew it ſhould have been Adonenu ba, not Maran-atha, which, ſaith he, in Hor. Hebr. evidently ſheweth, that this ſpeech refers more eſpecially to the Jewiſh Nation) and though we may grant that the words have ſome reference to our Lord's coming to deſtroy Jeruſalem and the Jewiſh polity, yet, (as this worthy Doctor afterwards acknowledgeth) they may have a larger ſenſe, as many other paſſages in Scripture have, and be underſtood more ſignally and eminently of the laſt doom and curſe which ſhall be pronounced not only againſt the unbelieving Jews, but all thoſe that love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, of what nation ſoever. This ſhall be at the general judgment of the world, which (we know) is by way of eminence called the Lord's coming, in the ſacred ſtyle of the New Teſtament: And we read that in that day, Go ye curſed, is the particular language uſed towards thoſe miſerable creatures. To this therefore I am of opinion, that Paul's execration in the text, doth more particularly and eſpecially refer. The ſhort is, thoſe that love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, thoſe who wilfully hate and oppoſe him and his laws, are accurſed perſons in this life, and are devoted to deſtruction; and likewiſe when our Lord ſhall come to judge the world, they ſhall be curſed more openly and ſolemnly; when they ſhall ſtand before that impartial Judge of the world, they ſhall receive from his infallible mouth a final malediction, an irreverſible execration, which ſhall immediately be ſucceeded with the eternal puniſhment of hell.

A Diſſertation

A Diſſertation on Baptiſm.

This ſacrament of baptiſm is that whereby we are admitted into the Chriſtian Covenant, it confers to as many as receive it through faith and repentance, the ſure promiſes of God, ſuch grace, as is able to make us the children of God and inheritors of the kingdom of Heaven, and without which, none, who wilfully neglects and refuſe to be baptized, can enter into the kingdom of God thro' Jeſus Chriſt, the Mediator of the new covenant.

We read of baptiſms, or purifyings, or outward waſhings very frequently in the Jewiſh Church: And of a baptiſm unto repentance by John the Baptiſt, the precurſor or fore-runner of our Saviour; but the ſacramental baptiſm is that we enjoy, which was foretold by John the Baptiſt; Matt. iii. 11. and inſtituted by Jeſus Chriſt, as a means whereby all men might have his merits applied unto their own ſouls, and be made members of his body, the Church, adoptive children of God, and coheirs with him of a kingdom of glory; and is inſtituted by theſe remarkable words, Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt; Matt. xxviii. 19. He that believeth and is baptized ſhall be ſaved, and he that believeth not ſhall be damned; Mark xvi. 16. In which Scripture you read of perſons ſent by our Lord, or commiſſioned by him to baptize and teach all nations; of a power granted unto thoſe that were ſent, viz. to teach and baptize; of a form preſcribed for their direction in the execution of their miſſion, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt; of the end or effect of their miſſion, he that believeth and is baptized ſhall be ſaved; and of the danger they incur, who do not receive their doctrine, and he that believeth not ſhall be damned. Therefore, I ſhall treat in ſhort of the following particulars.

I. I ſhall enquire, who thoſe perſons were, whom Chriſt ſent or commiſſioned to preach his Goſpel and baptize.

II. I will conſider the power with which thoſe perſons were inveſted.

III. I ſhall ſhew you the form by which they were to act.

I. The perſons, whom Jeſus Chriſt ſent or commiſſioned to preach his Goſpel to all nations, and to baptize them, were only his eleven Apoſtles, as the context evidently demonſtrates. For, a little before his aſcenſion our Bleſſed Saviour appointed his eleven Apoſtles only to go to a particular mountain in Galilee, which he had told them of; ver. 16. They obeyed his commands, were punctual to their time, and as the Lord had promiſed, met with him there, where he choſe to give them the full power and commiſſion to act as his miniſters in all nations, where they ſhould go in perſon, or ſend others with a delegated authority to the end of the world.

In the entrance, therefore, of this great act, to take away all manner of doubt of his power to confer ſuch an authority upon them, he peremptorily declares, All power is given unto me in Heaven and in earth, ver. 18. As if he had ſaid, Don't ye be offended or ſcandalized at the great power I pretend to commit to your charge, that I commiſſion you to execute; even a power to waſh away all ſtain of ſin by the laver of baptiſm, and ſo of children of wrath, to make men the children of God by a new birth in baptiſm, for I have power to ſave life and to deſtroy it; I, that ſaid unto the lame man, take up thy bed and walk, did alſo ſay, thy ſins are forgiven thee: Even ſo ſay I now unto you, that whoſoever you ſhall baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt, if they believe and repent of their ſins ſhall be ſaved, and foraſmuch as I have conſtituted you have been with me in my travels, have heard all my doctrine, ſeen all my marvellous works, abode with me in my temptations and ſufferings, forſook me not in my death, but are joyful witneſſes of my reſurrection, I now conſtitute and appoint you to be my Apoſtles to all the world, to found my Church, and to delegate that power of teaching and baptizing to others, as you ſee meet, Go ye therefore and teach, (or, as the original has it, diſciple) all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt, teaching them to obſerve all things whatſoever I have commanded you, and lo, I am with you always even unto the end of the world.

If then, as it is plain, this aſſembly to whom Chriſt gave this commiſſion, to whom he ſpake theſe words, Go, &c. on a mountain in Galilee were only his eleven diſciples; it muſt be as certain that ſuch a commiſſion was confined to them alone, and to thoſe whom they ſhould ordain or appoint to the ſame miniſtration, which is very particularly expreſſed in the twenty-third article of the Church of England, in oppoſition to that unſcriptural practice of lay baptiſm in the Church of Rome, which Church allows lay men or women to baptize infants in caſe of apparent death, when a prieſt cannot be found. The Church of England therefore affirms, from the original commiſſion cited above, "That it is not lawful for any man to take upon him the office of miniſtring the ſacraments, &c. before he be lawfully called, and ſent to execute the ſame:" For, "the adminiſtrators of the ſacraments, as ſhe gives the reaſon in the twenty-ſixth article, do not miniſter in their own name, but in Chriſt's, and by his commiſſion and authority." So that, the Church of England rightly confines the adminiſtration of baptiſm to a lawful miniſter, a Biſhop, prieſt or deacon (ſee the Preface to the conſecrating, &c. of Biſhops, &c.) and declares that the Divine Authority of the adminiſtrator or miniſter of Chriſtian Sacraments is an eſſential part of their inſtitution: And conſequently that the Divine Authority of the adminiſtrator of baptiſm, which is one of thoſe ſacraments neceſſary to ſalvation (ſee her Catechiſm) muſt be alſo an eſſential part of that Holy Inſtitution. All which is grounded not only upon the cleareſt Scripture, but the ſtricteſt reaſon. For,

Can any one aſſign any other inſtitution of this ſacrament of baptiſm than this already quoted? Can it be dedenied that Chriſt was at this time of commiſſioning his eleven diſciples, alone with them? Can it be produced from Scripture, in any of the Apoſtolic Writings, that theſe Apoſtles ever explained theſe words of inſtitution to give a power to all men, women and children to baptize one another? If this had been the manner or deſign of adminiſtration, the commiſſion muſt have run thus, Go ye and teach all nations to baptize one another in the name of, &c. Which, I preſume no body will aſſert. Did the Apoſtles ever give up this commiſſion in common? Or rather, don't we always find it confin'd to themſelves, or to thoſe that miniſtred about them, or in the Churches eſtabliſhed by them, in holy things? Certainly if the Apoſtles had laid this part of this their miniſtry in common, we muſt have met with it in their writings, as plain as we meet with our Saviour's commiſſion to them. Therefore, I conclude that the practice of lay baptiſm is ſinful, not warrantable by Scripture, and conſequently not valid, or the perſons pretended to be baptized by any other than a Lawful-Goſpel-Miniſter, is yet out of the Chriſtian covenant of grace. Again,

II. The power with which theſe commiſſioned perſons were inveſted is another clear proof of the nullity of lay baptiſm. The power hereby conferred was no leſs than to forgive ſins, to cleanſe us from, and waſh away the ſtain and guilt of original and actual ſin, that is, or may be incurred from our firſt parents, or perſonal tranſgreſſion before baptiſm. Certainly we have none ſo vainly conceited among the laity to think themſelves commiſſioned or ſent among their brethren with ſuch power? This I am ſure of, that no one can be baptized but by ſuch a commiſſioned adminiſtrator, and that no one can pretend to ſuch a commiſſion, or take to himſelf ſuch an honour, but ſuch as are called of God, as was Aaron, who was called not by his great gifts, and the inward dictates of the ſpirit, but by an external commiſſion, firſt given by God himſelf to Moſes, and then Moſes, by God's command, gave the ſame to Aaron. So that if it is granted that Chriſt had the power he declares himſelf to be inveſted with, i. e. all power in Heaven and earth, there can be no reaſon to doubt that he lodged ſuch part thereof, as he ſpecifies in this commiſſion with a proper order of men, his diſciples, or eleven Apoſtles, and their ſucceſſors in the Church of Chriſt. Now,

That our Saviour was inveſted with all power in Heaven and earth, ſhall be made appear from the following account collected from Scripture. The Jews, in their expectations of the Meſſiah, imagined to themſeves the character of a temporal prince, who ſhould deliver them from the yoke of their enemies, and reduce all the world under their dominion; who ſhould ſubdue the people under them, and the nations under their feet: who ſhould chuſe out an heritage for them, even the excellency of Jacob whom he loved, pſal. xlvii. 3. And this indeed our Saviour has begun, and will continue to accompliſh, according to the true intent of the Prophecy, tho' not after the manner of their interpretation. Unto them, tho' they know it not, a child is born; unto them, a ſon is given; and the government is upon his ſhoulder; and his name is Wonderful, Counſellor, the Mighty God; (not the everlaſting Father; Iſa. ix. 6. (For 'tis the Son here ſpoken of, and not the Father everlaſting; but) the Governor, the Father, or Lord of the age to come, (ſo the phraſe ought to be rendered) the Prince of peace: And he ſhall reign over the houſe of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there ſhall be no end, Luc. i. 33. The Jews, at the time of our Lord's appearing in the fleſh were extremely diſſappointed and prejudiced againſt him; becauſe his ſeeming meanneſs fell ſo much ſhort of that grandeur, wherein they expected their Meſſiah ſhould have ſhewn himſelf: and yet in reality his true power and authority was as much ſuperior even to that expected grandeur, as his ſeeming meanneſs, for which they deſpiſed him, was inferior to it. They expected a temporal deliverer, and he propoſed to them a ſalvation eternal: They looked for a prince of men, and he appeared to be the Lord of Angels: They expected a meſſiah endued with great power on earth, and he ſhewed himſelf to be inveſted with all power both in earth and Heaven. Thus did the Wiſdom of God put to ſilence the ignorance of fooliſh men; and while the lovers of worldly grandeur deſpiſed and reviled our Lord for his appearing meanneſs, under that meanneſs there lay concealed, and to all well-diſpoſed perſons (who looked for redemption in Iſrael) there diſcovered it ſelf a power, infinitely ſuperior even to the higheſt expectations of thoſe whoſe hearts were bent on nothing but worldly greatneſs. O the depth of the riches both of the Knowledge and Wiſdom of God! How unſearchable are his judgments, and his ways paſt finding out! Our Saviour, as he miniſtred to the Father in creating the world; (for by him the Scripture declares, God created all things) ſo in governing the world, he likewiſe ſupports all things by the word of his power. He does what he pleaſes in the armies of Heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; he is King of kings, and Lord of lords, and judges, puniſhes, or rewards as he pleaſes: For as the Father raiſes up the dead, and quickneth them; even ſo the Son quickneth whom he willeth, John v. 21. He ſearches the heart and reins, and declares that he will give to every man according to his work, Rev. ii. 23. He hath the keys of hell and of death, Rev. i. 18. the key of David, that openeth and no man ſhutteth, and ſhutteth and no man openeth, Rev. iii. 7. The words are of the ſame import with thoſe in Job, ch. xii. 14. where complete and irreſiſtible power is thus deſcribed; Behold, he breaketh down, and it cannot be built again; he ſhutteth up a man, and there can be no opening: And they are an application of that ancient Prophecy, to our Saviour; Iſa. xxii. 22. The key of the houſe of David will I lay upon his ſhoulder; ſo he ſhall open, and none ſhall ſhut, and he ſhall ſhut, and none ſhall open.

And this, as it is a full declaration of the extent of our Saviour's power, that it is univerſal, all power both in Heaven and earth; which leads us to the conſideration of the original of this unlimited power and authority. I will lay upon his ſhoulder the key of the houſe of David. I will inveſt him with all power, ſaith God in the Prophecy; and at the accompliſhment of the Prophecy, All power is given unto me, ſaith our Saviour in the text, i. e. given unto me by the Father. Underived power is peculiar to the perſon of the Father; the incommunicable property of him alone, Who is made of none, neither created, nor begotten, nor proceeding, nor in any manner whatſoever derived from another. All power is derivative from him; derivative from the Father to the Son; and from the Son, by the ſpirit to all creatures. In our Saviour therefore, is veſted all dominion and authority; becauſe in him dwelleth the fulneſs of the Godhead, (the fulneſs of Divine Power, and the glory of the Father) bodily, viſibly, as in the perſon of a man: And therefore he is ſtiled, The image of the inviſible God; becauſe (as the Apoſtle expreſſes it) It pleaſed the Father, that in him ſhould all fulneſs, the fulneſs of all power, dwell. This is, in a moſt lively figure, repreſented to us by the Prophet Daniel, ch. vii. 13. I ſaw in the night-viſions, and behold, One like the Son of man, came with the clouds of Heaven, and came to the ancient of days, and they brought him near before him; and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom; that all people, nations and languages ſhould ſerve him; his dominion is an everlaſting dominion, which ſhall not paſs away; and his kingdom, that which ſhall not be deſtroyed. And the expreſſions in the New Teſtament, wherein is recorded the fulfilling of this prophetick viſion, are exactly agreeable to it. The Angel, at the Annunciation, thus declares concerning him, before his conception; He ſhall be great, and ſhall be called the Son of the Higheſt; and the Lord God ſhall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he ſhall reign over the houſe of Jacob for ever, Luke i. 32. Concerning himſelf he profeſſes accordingly, Matt. xi. 27. All things are delivered unto me of my Father: And again, John xiii. 3. Knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands: And yet more expreſly, John v. 22. The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son; and ver. 26. As the Father hath life in himſelf, ſo hath he given to the Son to have life himſelf; and hath given him authority to execute judgment alſo, becauſe he is the Son of man; and ver. 19. Verily I ſay unto you, The Son can do nothing of himſelf, but what he ſeeth the Father do; for what things ſoever he doth, theſe alſo doth the Son likewiſe.

In the ſame manner with theſe declarations of our Lord concerning himſelf, do the Apoſtles alſo ſpeak of him in their Epiſtles. Whom God hath appointed heir of all things, ſaith Paul, Heb. i. 2. and chap. ii. 8. Thou haſt put all things in ſubjection under his feet. And ſtill more largely and particularly, Phil. ii. 9. Wherefore God alſo has highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jeſus every knee ſhould bow, (ſhould become ſubject to his dominion) of things in Heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue ſhould confeſs, (in acknowledgment of that ſubjection) that Jeſus Chriſt is Lord, to the glory of God the Father; and Eph. i. 20. he raiſed Chriſt from the dead, and ſet him at his own Right Hand in the heavenly places; far above all principalities and powers, and might and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but alſo in that which is to come; and hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the Church. And accordingly upon account of this derivation of our Lord's power, by way of delegation from the Father, it is, that the ſame Apoſtle declares, 1 Cor. xv. 24 that at the end he ſhall deliver up again the kingdom to God, even the Father, when he ſhall have put down all rule and all authority and power: for———when he ſaith all things are put under him, it is manifeſt that he is excepted, which did put all things under him: and when all things ſhall be ſubdued unto him, then ſhall the Son alſo himſelf be ſubject unto him that put all things under him, that God (even the Father) may be all in all.

It may here juſtly be thought a difficulty, how in this place it is declared, that our Lord ſhall at the end deliver up the kingdom to the Father; and yet in other paſſages before-mentioned it is expreſly affirmed, that he ſhall rule for ever, and of his kingdom there ſhall be no end.

But the anſwer is obvious; that, when it is ſaid, his kingdom ſhall have no end, and that it is a kingdom which ſhall never be deſtroyed; the meaning is, that it ſhall never be prevailed over by any oppoſite power, but ſhall ſubdue all things to it ſelf: In which ſubjection of all things to him, it is yet manifeſt that he cannot be included, by whoſe original power they were all made ſubject to him. But as our Lord was at firſt ſent forth by the good pleaſure of the Father, ſo unto him ſhall he at laſt return again; and when, by the power of judgment committed unto him, he ſhall have brought many ſons unto glory, he ſhall, together with them, deliver up again the power it ſelf alſo into the hands of the Father, when he preſents them faultleſs before the preſence of his glory, and inſtates them in the eternal kingdom of their Heavenly

Father: In which kingdom of the Father, he himſelf ſhall continue to reign over them that are ſaved, as King of Kings and Lord of Lords, for ever and ever. The Socinian writers, from theſe and ſome other the like texts of Scripture, have very unreaſonably preſumed to collect, that our Saviour was no greater a perſon than a mere man, born of the Virgin Mary without any former exiſtence, and exalted by the power of God to this ſtate of dignity in Heaven: But this their inference, I ſay, is very unreaſonable: For though the derivation of our Lord's Power from the Father, muſt and ought to be acknowledged; that all men's confeſſing Jeſus to be Lord, may be as Paul directs, to the glory of God the Father; yet from thoſe other texts of Scripture, wherein it is affirmed that by Chriſt God created all things; that he was in the form of God, before he appeared in the form of a ſervant; that he was with God, and had glory with God before the world was; from theſe texts, I ſay, it undeniably appears, that our Lord's having all power given him both in Heaven and earth, cannot ſignify the original exaltation of one who had no being before he was born of the Virgin; but the exaltation of him into the form of God, who voluntarily emptied himſelf of that glory he had before, and with unparalleled humility took upon himſelf the form of a ſervant, and ſuffered in that form for our ſakes, and therefore was worthy to receive power and riches and wiſdom, and ſtrength and honour, and glory and bleſſing, becauſe he was ſlain, and redeemed us to God by his own blood, out of every tongue and kindred, and people, and nation, Rev. v. 9—12.

Why then ſhould we doubt of the extent of the commiſſion which our Saviour grants his diſciples, upon his having received all power in Heaven and earth; when he bids them, Go ye therefore, and teach all nations. The word, therefore, is the aſcertaining of their authority, from the ſecurity of his own. All power is given unto me; Go ye therefore, and teach all nations. This particular is more fully expreſſed by John, ch. xx. 21. As my Father hath ſent me, even ſo ſend I you:—— Whoſoever ſins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whoſoever ſins ye retain, they are retained: Not that the Apoſtles were intruſted with any power, to pardon or condemn any man according to their own pleaſure. For this even our Saviour himſelf, does only according to the will of the Father which ſent him. But the meaning is, that they were intruſted to preach that doctrine of repentance, and baptize thoſe that repented and believed; by the terms of which it was to be determined, whoſe ſins ſhould be pardoned and whoſe retained. A like expreſſion is uſed by our Saviour to Peter, Matt. xvi. 19. I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of Heaven; and whatſoever thou ſhalt bind on earth, ſhall be bound in Heaven; and whatſoever thou ſhalt looſe on earth, ſhall be looſed in Heaven. Not that Peter, or any, or all the Apoſtles, had power to let whom they pleaſed into Heaven; but that they were appointed and commiſſioned to preach that doctrine, by the terms of which, men were to be admitted into, or excluded out of Heaven. Thus you ſee, that though the Apoſtles were not entruſted with an arbitrary power, it is as certain, that they alone were commiſſioned to forgive the ſins of thoſe, whom they ſhould baptize, having firſt declared their repentance and belief in Chriſt. Now in this commiſſion,

All nations, ſignify primarily, the nations of the Roman empire; and then, in a larger ſenſe, all the kingdoms of the world, Rom. x. 18. In Mark it is, preach the Goſpel to every creature, Mark xvi. 15. And, in the 1ſt chapter to the Coloſſians, what in the 6th verſe is expreſſed, the Goſpel came into all the world, is at the 23d verſe ſaid to have been preached to every creature under Heaven. The meaning of which is ſo obvious, that it would hardly need to be mentioned, but that it helps to illuſtrate a more difficult paſſage in the eighth to the Romans; where, when the Apoſtle had ſaid at the 21ſt verſe, The creature it ſelf alſo ſhall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God: He adds, ver. 23. And not only they, but ourſelves alſo which have the firſt-fruits of the Spirit, even we our ſelves groan within ourſelves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. So that the words, creature, or whole creation, ſeem to ſignify thoſe many nations, or the bulk of mankind, to whom the Goſpel was afterwards to be preached; in contradiſtinction to the firſt-fruits, who received it in the Apoſtle's time.

Here follows the form, or the doctrine, which all nations were to be taught, and into which they were to be baptized; baptizing them, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt. This is that brief ſummary of Chriſtian Faith, which, in the Apoſtle's time, men were taught, and profeſſed, and had explained to them at their baptiſm; and the explication of it was afterwards well expreſſed in that form of ſound words, which is now uſually called the Apoſtle's Creed.

To be baptized in the name of the Father, is to profeſs our belief, (as Paul words it) in the One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in all, even the Father Almighty, the Maker, and Lord, and ſupreme Governor of all things.

To be baptized in the name of the Son, is to profeſs our belief likewiſe in the one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the only begotten Son of God, the Meſſiah that was to come, the Redeemer and Saviour of mankind, the Author and Purchaſer of forgiveneſs to ſinners, or of the acceptation of repentance through his blood; our great High Prieſt or Interceſſor with God, and by the appointment of the Father, our Judge at the laſt day.

To be baptized in the name of the Son, ſignifies alſo further, to be baptized into his death: Know ye not, ſaith Paul, Col. ii. 12. that ſo many of us as were baptized into Jeſus Chriſt, were baptized into his death, Rom. vi. 3. And what that means, he tells us in the following verſe, We are buried with him by baptiſm into death, (that the body of ſin might be deſtroyed, ver. 6) that like as Chriſt was raiſed up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even ſo we alſo ſhould walk in newneſs of Life.

Laſtly, To be baptized in the name of the Holy Ghoſt, ſignifies our acknowledging the Holy Spirit of God, to be the inſpirer of the Apoſtles and Prophets; the Comforter and the Director of Chriſtians; that we ſubmit our ſelves to his Holy Guidance, receive the doctrine inſpired by him into the Apoſtles and Prophets, John iii. 3—5. expect to be juſtified from our paſt ſins, by the renewing of the Holy Ghoſt, 1 Cor. vi. 11. and to be preſerved from ſin for the future by his ſanctification and aſſiſtance, Tit. iii. 5. that we obey his good motions, take great care not to grieve or quench and drive him from us; and, foraſmuch as by one Spirit we are all baptized into one Body,—and have been all made to drink into one Spirit, 1 Cor. xii. 13. that therefore we endeavour by mutual charity and forbearance, to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of Peace. This is the meaning of being baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt, with reſpect to the ſeveral offices of theſe three Divine Perſons, in which regard it is that the Scripture always ſpeaks of them: As to their metaphyſical nature; the vanity of men ſpeculating about that beyond what is written, has been the occaſion of many fooliſh errors.

To the form of baptiſm, our Saviour adds in the text, the practice of thoſe who are to be baptized into this faith. Teaching them to obſerve all things whatſoever I have commanded you. And this is the great end and uſe of the whole. As faith without works is dead; 1 Pet. iii. 21. ſo baptiſm, without the anſwer of a good conſcience towards God, is but the waſhing away of the filth of the fleſh, Heb. x. 22 Eph. v. 26. He that is baptized, muſt put off, concerning the former converſation, the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful luſts; and be renewed in the ſpirit of his mind; and put on the new man, which after God is created in righteouſneſs and true Holineſs, Eph. iv. 22. He muſt, as Paul elſewhere expreſſes it, put on the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, Gal. iii. 27. As many of you as have been baptized into Chriſt, have put on Chriſt. The meaning is, he that is baptized into the religion of Chriſt, muſt conform himſelf to the ſame pattern, muſt obſerve all things whatſoever he has commanded us, muſt obey his laws delivered in the Goſpel; otherwiſe his baptiſm is vain, and his profeſſion but hypocriſy. Thus much is incumbent on the party baptized. But,

The promiſe of an effectual aſſiſtance, was made only to the Diſciples ſent forth upon this commiſſion: And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Be-ter of a temporal prince, who ſhould deliver them from the yoke of their enemies, and reduce all the world under their dominion; who ſhould ſubdue the people under them, and the nations under their feet: who ſhould chuſe out an heritage for them, even the excellency of Jacob whom he loved, pſal. xlvii. 3. And this indeed our Saviour has begun, and will continue to accompliſh, according to the true intent of the Prophecy, tho' not after the manner of their interpretation. Unto them, tho' they know it not, a child is born; unto them, a ſon is given; and the government is upon his ſhoulder; and his name is Wonderful, Counſellor, the Mighty God; (not the everlaſting Father; Iſa. ix. 6. (For 'tis the Son here ſpoken of, and not the Father everlaſting; but) the Governor, the Father, or Lord of the age to come, (ſo the phraſe ought to be rendered) the Prince of peace: And he ſhall reign over the houſe of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there ſhall be no end, Luc. i. 33. The Jews, at the time of our Lord's appearing in the fleſh were extremely diſſappointed and prejudiced againſt him; becauſe his ſeeming meanneſs fell ſo much ſhort of that grandeur, wherein they expected their Meſſiah ſhould have ſhewn himſelf: and yet in reality his true power and authority was as much ſuperior even to that expected grandeur, as his ſeeming meanneſs, for which they deſpiſed him, was inferior to it. They expected a temporal deliverer, and he propoſed to them a ſalvation eternal: They looked for a prince of men, and he appeared to be the Lord of Angels: They expected a meſſiah endued with great power on earth, and he ſhewed himſelf to be inveſted with all power both in earth and Heaven. Thus did the Wiſdom of God put to ſilence the ignorance of fooliſh men; and while the lovers of worldly grandeur deſpiſed and reviled our Lord for his appearing meanneſs, under that meanneſs there lay concealed, and to all well-diſpoſed perſons (who looked for redemption in Iſrael) there diſcovered it ſelf a power, infinitely ſuperior even to the higheſt expectations of thoſe whoſe hearts were bent on nothing but worldly greatneſs. O the depth of the riches both of the Knowledge and Wiſdom of God! How unſearchable are his judgments, and his ways paſt finding out! Our Saviour, as he miniſtred to the Father in creating the world; (for by him the Scripture declares, God created all things) ſo in governing the world, he likewiſe ſupports all things by the word of his power. He does what he pleaſes in the armies of Heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; he is King of kings, and Lord of lords, and judges, puniſhes, or rewards as he pleaſes: For as the Father raiſes up the dead, and quickneth them; even ſo the Son quickneth whom he willeth, John v. 21. He ſearches the heart and reins, and declares that he will give to every man according to his work, Rev. ii. 23. He hath the keys of hell and of death, Rev. i. 18. the key of David, that openeth and no man ſhutteth, and ſhutteth and no man openeth, Rev. iii. 7. The words are of the ſame import with thoſe in Job, ch. xii. 14. where complete and irreſiſtible power is thus deſcribed; Behold, he breaketh down, and it cannot be built again; he ſhutteth up a man, and there can be no opening: And they are an application of that ancient Prophecy, to our Saviour; Iſa. xxii. 22. The key of the houſe of David will I lay upon his ſhoulder; ſo he ſhall open, and none ſhall ſhut, and he ſhall ſhut, and none ſhall open.

And this, as it is a full declaration of the extent of our Saviour's power, that it is univerſal, all power both in Heaven and earth; which leads us to the conſideration of the original of this unlimited power and authority. I will lay upon his ſhoulder the key of the houſe of David. I will inveſt him with all power, ſaith God in the Prophecy; and at the accompliſhment of the Prophecy, All power is given unto me, ſaith our Saviour in the text, i. e. given unto me by the Father. Underived power is peculiar to the perſon of the Father; the incommunicable property of him alone, Who is made of none, neither created, nor begotten, nor proceeding, nor in any manner whatſoever derived from another. All power is derivative from him; derivative from the Father to the Son; and from the Son, by the ſpirit to all creatures. In our Saviour therefore, is veſted all dominion and authority; becauſe in him dwelleth the fulneſs of the Godhead, (the fulneſs of Divine Power, and the glory of the Father) bodily, viſibly, as in the perſon of a man: And therefore he is ſtiled, The image of the inviſible God; becauſe (as the Apoſtle expreſſes it) It pleaſed the Father, that in him ſhould all fulneſs, the fulneſs of all power, dwell. This is, in a moſt lively figure, repreſented to us by the Prophet Daniel, ch. vii. 13. I ſaw in the night-viſions, and behold, One like the Son of man, came with the clouds of Heaven, and came to the ancient of days, and they brought him near before him; and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom; that all people, nations and languages ſhould ſerve him; his dominion is an everlaſting dominion, which ſhall not paſs away; and his kingdom, that which ſhall not be deſtroyed. And the expreſſions in the New Teſtament, wherein is recorded the fulfilling of this prophetick viſion, are exactly agreeable to it. The Angel, at the Annunciation, thus declares concerning him, before his conception; He ſhall be great, and ſhall be called the Son of the Higheſt; and the Lord God ſhall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he ſhall reign over the houſe of Jacob for ever, Luke i. 32. Concerning himſelf he profeſſes accordingly, Matt. xi. 27. All things are delivered unto me of my Father: And again, John xiii. 3. Knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands: And yet more expreſsly, John v. 22. The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son; and ver. 26. As the Father hath life in himſelf, ſo hath he given to the Son to have life himſelf; and hath given him authority to execute judgment alſo, becauſe he is the Son of man; and ver. 19. Verily I ſay unto you, The Son can do nothing of himſelf, but what he ſeeth the Father do; for what things ſoever he doth, theſe alſo doth the Son likewiſe.

In the ſame manner with theſe declarations of our Lord concerning himſelf, do the Apoſtles alſo ſpeak of him in their Epiſtles. Whom God hath appointed heir of all things, ſaith Paul, Heb. i. 2. and chap. ii. 8. Thou haſt put all things in ſubjection under his feet. And ſtill more largely and particularly, Phil. ii. 9. Wherefore God alſo has highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jeſus every knee ſhould bow, (ſhould become ſubject to his dominion) of things in Heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue ſhould confeſs, (in acknowledgment of that ſubjection) that Jeſus Chriſt is Lord, to the glory of God the Father; and Eph. i. 20. he raiſed Chriſt from the dead, and ſet him at his own Right Hand in the heavenly places; far above all principalities and powers, and might and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but alſo in that which is to come; and hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the Church. And accordingly upon account of this derivation of our Lord's power, by way of delegation from the Father, it is, that the ſame Apoſtle declares, 1 Cor. xv. 24 that at the end he ſhall deliver up again the kingdom to God, even the Father, when he ſhall have put down all rule and all authority and power: for———when he ſaith all things are put under him, it is manifeſt that he is excepted, which did put all things under him: and when all things ſhall be ſubdued unto him, then ſhall the Son alſo himſelf be ſubject unto him that put all things under him, that God (even the Father) may be all in all.

It may here juſtly be thought a difficulty, how in this place it is declared, that our Lord ſhall at the end deliver up the kingdom to the Father; and yet in other paſſages before-mentioned it is expreſsly affirmed, that he ſhall rule for ever, and of his kingdom there ſhall be no end.

But the anſwer is obvious; that, when it is ſaid, his kingdom ſhall have no end, and that it is a kingdom which ſhall never be deſtroyed; the meaning is, that it ſhall never be prevailed over by any oppoſite power, but ſhall ſubdue all things to it ſelf: In which ſubjection of all things to him, it is yet manifeſt that he cannot be included, by whoſe original power they were all made ſubject to him. But as our Lord was at firſt ſent forth by the good pleaſure of the Father, ſo unto him ſhall he at laſt return again; and when, by the power of judgment committed unto him, he ſhall have brought many ſons unto glory, he ſhall, together with them, deliver up again the power it ſelf alſo into the hands of the Father, when he preſents them faultleſs before the preſence of his glory, and inſtates them in the eternal kingdom of their Heavenly

Father: In which kingdom of the Father, he himſelf ſhall continue to reign over them that are ſaved, as King of Kings and Lord of Lords, for ever and ever. The Socinian writers, from theſe and ſome other the like texts of Scripture, have very unreaſonably preſumed to collect, that our Saviour was no greater a perſon than a mere man, born of the Virgin Mary without any former exiſtence, and exalted by the power of God to this ſtate of dignity in Heaven: But this their inference, I ſay, is very unreaſonable: For though the derivation of our Lord's Power from the Father, muſt and ought to be acknowledged; that all men's confeſſing Jeſus to be Lord, may be as Paul directs, to the glory of God the Father; yet from thoſe other texts of Scripture, wherein it is affirmed that by Chriſt God created all things; that he was in the form of God, before he appeared in the form of a ſervant; that he was with God, and had glory with God before the world was; from theſe texts, I ſay, it undeniably appears, that our Lord's having all power given him both in Heaven and earth, cannot ſignify the original exaltation of one who had no being before he was born of the Virgin; but the exaltation of him into the form of God, who voluntarily emptied himſelf of that glory he had before, and with unparalleled humility took upon himſelf the form of a ſervant, and ſuffered in that form for our ſakes, and therefore was worthy to receive power and riches and wiſdom, and ſtrength and honour, and glory and bleſſing, becauſe he was ſlain, and redeemed us to God by his own blood, out of every tongue and kindred, and people, and nation, Rev. v. 9—12.

Why then ſhould we doubt of the extent of the commiſſion which our Saviour grants his diſciples, upon his having received all power in Heaven and earth; when he bids them, Go ye therefore, and teach all nations. The word, therefore, is the aſcertaining of their authority, from the ſecurity of his own. All power is given unto me; Go ye therefore, and teach all nations. This particular is more fully expreſſed by John, ch. xx. 21. As my Father hath ſent me, even ſo ſend I you:—— Whoſoever ſins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whoſoever ſins ye retain, they are retained: Not that the Apoſtles were intruſted with any power, to pardon or condemn any man according to their own pleaſure. For this even our Saviour himſelf, does only according to the will of the Father which ſent him. But the meaning is, that they were intruſted to preach that doctrine of repentance, and baptize thoſe that repented and believed; by the terms of which it was to be determined, whoſe ſins ſhould be pardoned and whoſe retained. A like expreſſion is uſed by our Saviour to Peter, Matt. xvi. 19. I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of Heaven; and whatſoever thou ſhalt bind on earth, ſhall be bound in Heaven; and whatſoever thou ſhalt looſe on earth, ſhall be looſed in Heaven. Not that Peter, or any, or all the Apoſtles, had power to let whom they pleaſed into Heaven; but that they were appointed and commiſſioned to preach that doctrine, by the terms of which, men were to be admitted into, or excluded out of Heaven. Thus you ſee, that though the Apoſtles were not entruſted with an arbitrary power, it is as certain, that they alone were commiſſioned to forgive the ſins of thoſe, whom they ſhould baptize, having firſt declared their repentance and belief in Chriſt. Now in this commiſſion,

All nations, ſignify primarily, the nations of the Roman empire; and then, in a larger ſenſe, all the kingdoms of the world, Rom. x. 18. In Mark it is, preach the Goſpel to every creature, Mark xvi. 15. And, in the 1ſt chapter to the Coloſſians, what in the 6th verſe is expreſſed, the Goſpel came into all the world, is at the 23d verſe ſaid to have been preached to every creature under Heaven. The meaning of which is ſo obvious, that it would hardly need to be mentioned, but that it helps to illuſtrate a more difficult paſſage in the eighth to the Romans; where, when the Apoſtle had ſaid at the 21ſt verſe, The creature it ſelf alſo ſhall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God: He adds, ver. 23. And not only they, but ourſelves alſo which have the firſt-fruits of the Spirit, even we our ſelves groan within ourſelves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. So that the words, creature, or whole creation, ſeem to ſignify thoſe many nations, or the bulk of mankind, to whom the Goſpel was afterwards to be preached; in contradiſtinction to the firſt-fruits, who received it in the Apoſtle's time.

Here follows the form, or the doctrine, which all nations were to be taught, and into which they were to be baptized; baptizing them, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt. This is that brief ſummary of Chriſtian Faith, which, in the Apoſtle's time, men were taught, and profeſſed, and had explained to them at their baptiſm; and the explication of it was afterwards well expreſſed in that form of ſound words, which is now uſually called the Apoſtle's Creed.

To be baptized in the name of the Father, is to profeſs our belief, (as Paul words it) in the One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in all, even the Father Almighty, the Maker, and Lord, and ſupreme Governor of all things.

To be baptized in the name of the Son, is to profeſs our belief likewiſe in the one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the only begotten Son of God, the Meſſiah that was to come, the Redeemer and Saviour of mankind, the Author and Purchaſer of forgiveneſs to ſinners, or of the acceptation of repentance through his blood; our great High Prieſt or Interceſſor with God, and by the appointment of the Father, our Judge at the laſt day.

To be baptized in the name of the Son, ſignifies alſo further, to be baptized into his death: Know ye not, ſaith Paul, Col. ii. 12. that ſo many of us as were baptized into Jeſus Chriſt, were baptized into his death, Rom. vi. 3. And what that means, he tells us in the following verſe, We are buried with him by baptiſm into death, (that the body of ſin might be deſtroyed, ver. 6.) that like as Chriſt was raiſed up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even ſo we alſo ſhould walk in newneſs of Life.

Laſtly, To be baptized in the name of the Holy Ghoſt, ſignifies our acknowledging the Holy Spirit of God, to be the inſpirer of the Apoſtles and Prophets; the Comforter and the Director of Chriſtians; that we ſubmit our ſelves to his Holy Guidance, receive the doctrine inſpired by him into the Apoſtles and Prophets, John iii. 3—5. expect to be juſtified from our paſt ſins, by the renewing of the Holy Ghoſt, 1 Cor. vi. 11. and to be preſerved from ſin for the future by his ſanctification and aſſiſtance, Tit. iii. 5. that we obey his good motions, take great care not to grieve or quench and drive him from us; and, foraſmuch as by one Spirit we are all baptized into one Body, — and have been all made to drink into one Spirit, 1 Cor. xii. 13. that therefore we endeavour by mutual charity and forbearance, to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of Peace. This is the meaning of being baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt, with reſpect to the ſeveral offices of theſe three Divine Perſons, in which regard it is that the Scripture always ſpeaks of them: As to their metaphyſical nature; the vanity of men ſpeculating about that beyond what is written, has been the occaſion of many fooliſh errors.

To the form of baptiſm, our Saviour adds in the text, the practice of thoſe who are to be baptized into this faith. Teaching them to obſerve all things whatſoever I have commanded you. And this is the great end and uſe of the whole. As faith without works is dead; 1 Pet. iii. 21. ſo baptiſm, without the anſwer of a good conſcience towards God, is but the waſhing away of the filth of the fleſh, Heb. x. 22 Eph. v. 26. He that is baptized, muſt put off, concerning the former converſation, the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful luſts; and be renewed in the ſpirit of his mind; and put on the new man, which after God is created in righteouſneſs and true Holineſs, Eph. iv. 22. He muſt, as Paul elſewhere expreſſes it, put on the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, Gal. iii. 27. As many of you as have been baptized into Chriſt, have put on Chriſt. The meaning is, he that is baptized into the religion of Chriſt, muſt conform himſelf to the ſame pattern, muſt obſerve all things whatſoever he has commanded us, muſt obey his laws delivered in the Goſpel; otherwiſe his baptiſm is vain, and his profeſſion but hypocriſy. Thus much is incumbent on the party baptized. But,

The promiſe of an effectual aſſiſtance, was made only to the Diſciples ſent forth upon this commiſſion: And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Being with them always, it is evident, did not ſignify his continuing perſonally with them; for this promiſe was made to them at the very time, when he had declared he was about to leave them, and aſcend unto the Father. But it ſignifies, that he would continue with them by the guidance and direction of his Spirit; which was in effect the ſame thing, as continuing with them himſelf. Thus God is in Scripture ſaid to dwell in us himſelf, when he dwells in us by his Spirit, Eph. ii. 22. and he that lies to the Spirit of God, Acts v. 4. is juſtly accuſed of lying conſequently to God himſelf; and he who rejects the preaching of an Apoſtle, is charged with rejecting Chriſt; and he that rejects Chriſt, with rejecting God himſelf who ſent him.

Chriſt's being with his Diſciples to the end of the world, therefore, is his being with them by his Spirit. And this imports two things: 1ſt, His giving them the Holy Ghoſt at Pentecoſt, to inſpire them with the doctrine of truth, and to enable them to confirm that doctrine with miraculous gifts, according to the promiſe, Mark xvi. 17. Theſe ſigns ſhall follow them that believe; in my name ſhall they caſt out Devils, they ſhall ſpeak with new tongues, they ſhall take up ſerpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it ſhall not hurt them; they ſhall lay hands on the ſick, and they ſhall recover. And 2dly, It implies, that after this foundation of the Church, by the teaching and miracles of the inſpired Apoſtles, the bleſſing of Providence, and the aſſiſtance of the Divine Spirit, ſhould continue to preſerve it; not by raiſing up infallible guides and unerring human authority, which never was in any others than the Apoſtles themſelves; but by enabling them to propagate their miniſtry to all future ages, who ſhould teach and baptize all nations in the courſe of ages, and ſupport the doctrine once delivered by the Apoſtles againſt all the violence and frauds of its oppoſers. Thou art Peter, ſays our Saviour, that is, a rock; and upon this rock will I build my Church, and the gates of Hell, i. e. perſecution, and even death itſelf, (for ſo the words properly ſignify) ſhall not be able to prevail againſt it, Matt. xvi. 18. And what is meant by Peter's being a rock, or ſtone, upon which the Church is built, is explained, Eph. ii. 20. where the Church is compared to a building, the Apoſtles to foundation-ſtones, and our Saviour himſelf to the head of the building: Ye are built, ſaith Paul, upon the foundation of the Apoſtles and Prophets, Jeſus Chriſt himſelf being the chief corner-ſtone; in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord; in whom you alſo are builded together, for an habitation of God through the Spirit. So that,

From the whole of this explication, it appears, without contradiction, that no one can be lawfully baptized into the Church of Chriſt, otherwiſe than in the name of Chriſt; And that Chriſt gave his commiſſion to baptize all nations to none but the Apoſtles, and their ſucceſſors in the miniſtry of the Goſpel. A doctrine of the utmoſt conſequence to be rightly underſtood, becauſe the effects of it are of the greateſt concern to all mankind.

Indeed, if the form, which no one but Quakers, will deny, is neceſſary and an eſſential part of baptiſm; becauſe Chriſt has ſo ordain'd it; in like manner it muſt be granted, that this form muſt be executed or adminiſtred by a lawful miniſter, and that Chriſt made a lawful miniſter an eſſential part of this ſacrament, when he ſaid to his diſciples or eleven Apoſtles, Go ye. Beſides, the neceſſity of an immediate, or mediate call or miſſion from God to any Divine Miniſtry, is always neceſſary in every particular Divine Function; the Scriptures are very clear in this particular; for if we look back into the old law, we ſhall find that Moſes did not take upon him the character of God's miniſter before he was ſent; Exod. iii. 10. iv. 12. and Pſal. cv. 26. The ſame was obſerved of the Jewiſh prieſts; Exod. xxviii. 1. Numb. xviii. 1—7. 2 Chron. xxvi. 16, 17, 18. compared with Heb. v. 1—3. The ſame might be obſerved in the ſeveral miſſions of the Prophets, but as ſuch an enumeration of texts ſeem needleſs, I ſhall proceed to thoſe where we find the miſſion of John the Baptiſt, the laſt of the Jewiſh Prophets, and immediate fore-runner of our Saviour, this is particularly deſcribed in John i. 6—8—33. and Mark i. 2. and xi. 10. But the great example of all is the miſſion of our Lord Jeſus, whoſe whole life and actions were for our example, that as he taught and did, ſo ſhould we: Yet this Divine Perſon, who thought it no robbery to be equal with God, confeſſeth his miſſion, that he came not of himſelf, but was ſent by the Father; ſee Matt. x. 40. John xiii. 20. iii. 17. iv. 34. v. 23, 24—30—36, 37. vi. 57. viii. 16—18. x. 36. xi. 42. xii. 49. xvii. 3—8—18——25. Luke x. 16. 1 John iv. 9, 10. Gal. iv. 4. Heb. iii. 1, 2. v. 5. So conſequently after this pattern we read of the miſſion of the Holy Spirit, the third perſon of the eternal Trinity; John xiv. 26. xv. 26. xvi. 7——13, 14. Gal. iv. 6. Then of the miſſion of Angels; Heb. i. 14. Luke i. 19——26. Acts xii. 11. Revel. i. 1. v. 6. xxii. 6. Of the miſſion of the Apoſtles; Matt. x. 5—7, 8. xxviii. 18, 19, 20. John xx. 21. Acts i. 24, 25, 26. ix. 15. xiii. 2, 3, 4. xxii. 21. with which compare 1 Cor. xii. 28. i. 1. 1 Tim. ii. 7. Rom. x. 15. Eph. iv. 11. Of the ſucceſſors of the Apoſtles; ſee Acts xiv. 23. Titus i. 5. 2 Tim. i. 6. ii. 2. and 1 Tim. v. 22. and Revel. i. 20. As for the miſſion of the ſeventy diſciples and of the deacons, that is alſo plain from Luke x. 1. and Acts vi. 3——5, 6. So that it is evident, that no one perſon is recorded to be a faithful miniſter of God's word and ſacraments, in either the Old or New Teſtament, but ſuch as could prove their mediate or immediate miſſion from God; that God had either ſent them by a ſpecial command from himſelf, or, by ſuch a power as he had inveſted in his original miniſters to ordain ſucceſſors from time to time till the end of time in his Church. And

This has been the conſtant received opinion of all orthodox divines, agreeable to the expreſs word of God, tho' I ſhan't detain you with any other quotations on this point, but ſuch as I can gather from that celebrated and truly Chriſtian Biſhop, Dr. Beveridge. This Prelate diſcourſing on theſe Apoſtolic words, ſeeing we have this miniſtry as we have received grace, we faint not, he ſays, "We muſt obſerve, that although the prieſts, if any be preſent, lay on their hands alſo, yet it is expreſly ordered, that the Biſhop ſhall ſay the words, Receive ye the Holy Ghoſt, &c. For, if a mere prieſt ſhould ſay them, or any one but a Biſhop, the ordination is reckoned null and void, &c." So in his ſermon on theſe words, When they had faſted, and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they ſent them away, he obſerves that, "As the right ordination of thoſe who adminiſter the means of grace, muſt needs be acknowledged to be neceſſary: For, ſeeing we can have no grace nor power to do good, but what is delivered to us from God through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, in the uſe of the means which he hath eſtabliſhed for that purpoſe, unleſs thoſe means be rightly and duly adminiſtred, they looſe their force and energy, and ſo can never attain the end wherefore they were eſtabliſhed; neither is there any thing more neceſſary to eſtabliſh the means of grace, than that they who adminiſter them be rightly ordained and authorized to do it according to the inſtitution and command of him that did eſtabliſh them. For, ſeeing they do not work naturally, but only by virtue of the inſtitution and promiſe annexed to it, unleſs that be duly obſerved, we have no ground to expect, that the promiſe ſhould be performed, nor by conſequence that they ſhould be effectual to the purpoſes for which they are uſed." So in another ſermon upon this text; We are ambaſſadors for Chriſt, &c. he ſays, "That can be done only by the power of God; accompanying, and aſſiſting his own inſtitution and commiſſion. In ſo much that if I did not think, or rather, was not fully aſſured, that I had ſuch a commiſſion to be an ambaſſador for Chriſt, and to act in his name, I ſhould never think it worth the while to preach, or execute my miniſterial office. For I am ſure, all that I did, would be null and void of it ſelf, according to God's ordinary way of working, and we have no ground to expect miracles." So in another part of the ſame diſcourſe he adds, "Any man may read a ſermon, or make an oration to the people, but it is not that the Scripture calls preaching the word of God, unleſs he be SENT by God to do it. For how can they preach, except they be ſent? Rom. x. 16. A butcher might kill an ox, or a lamb, as well as the high-prieſt, but it was no ſacrifice to God, unleſs a prieſt did it. How eaſily theſe paſſages may be applied to the caſe of adminiſtring baptiſm, I need not doubt, becauſe the ſame commiſſion impowers the preacher and baptizer, he to whom the Lord ſaid, Go ye teach all nations, at the ſame breath commanded them, and them alone to baptize all nations: Therefore, whoever preſumes to uſe the form preſcribed for baptiſm; and is not commiſſioned or authorized thereto by the Chriſtian Inſtitution, by a lawful or Evangelical call unto the miniſtry, is no more able to confer the grace promiſed to the faithful in that ſacrament, than a butcher, as Dr. Beveridge wiſely obſerves, was able to offer a ſacrifice; becauſe as God has to every ordinance appointed a proper miniſter; 1 Cor. xii. 28. So conſequently that ordinance can't be performed acceptably in the ſight of God, otherwiſe than, as he has appointed, by the hands or means of his ſaid preſcribed miniſter.

Critical and Explanatory ANNOTATIONS,
ON THE
Second Epiſtle of PAUL the APOSTLE,
TO THE CORINTHIANS.

The INTRODUCTION.

Paul having underſtood by Titus, whom he met at Macedonia, ch. vii. 5, 6. how great and hearty ſorrow, ſubmiſſion, and good diſpoſition his firſt Epiſtle had wrought in the Corinthians, towards him; he thought proper to write this ſecond Epiſtle alſo, and becauſe there ſtill remained ſome, who oppoſed him and his doctrine, he takes frequent opportunities to reprove them ſharply; yet, in ſuch a manner, as not to diſcourage the obedient to the faith, through his miniſtry and Apoſtleſhip.

In this Epiſtle it has, and may eaſily be obſerved, by a diligent reader, that the Apoſtle, in his great affection and concern for their eternal ſalvation, applies to them with much art and ingenious inſinuation; he both commends and threatens, and as he finds occaſion, frowns and ſmiles on them. And,

Firſt, he encourages them in trouble, from a conſideration of his own deliverance, and gives them an account of his delay in coming to them, that it was not out of inconſtancy, but chiefly to ſpare them, ch. i. 23. for that, not having heard of their reformation before the return of Titus, he was loath to come and correct them, according to the power given him by the Holy Ghoſt, which would have occaſioned an heavineſs, ch. ii. 1.

Secondly, He gives order concerning the inceſtuous perſon mentioned in the former Epiſtle, who had been excommunicated, and delivered over unto Satan, that both the cenſure and puniſhment ſhould be taken off. Then,

In the third chapter to the end of the eighth, he vindicates the Goſpel-miniſtry in general, as being much preferable to that under the law of Moſes, and aſſures them in particular of his own ſincerity and faithfulneſs, and the joy he conceived in their ſpiritual good, and their godly ſorrow and reformation; becauſe, one principal cauſe of the faction and diſorder among them, complained of in the former Epiſtle, proceeded from ſome falſe teachers having corrupted the Chriſtian Doctrine, and diſgraced the Apoſtle.

In the eighth and ninth chapters, he exhorts them to haſten their contributions for the relief of their poor brethren, the Chriſtians at Jeruſalem, after the example of the Church in Macedonia; on which occaſion he delivers many excellent motives and encouragements to the duty of liberal alms-giving, worthy to be often and ſeriouſly conſidered by all Chriſtians. Then,

In ch. x to the 14th verſe of the xiith chapter, he repeats his exhortation not to hearken to falſe Apoſtles, thoſe his oppoſers, who, by debaſing his perſon and authority amongthem, obſtructed the good effects of his doctrine and fruits of his miniſtry.--- Theſe ſlanderers obliged him to give ſome account of his own zeal in promoting the Goſpel, and of his labours and ſufferings for it, and of the favours he had of being wrapt up into the Third Heaven, where he had a glympſe of the joys above; nevertheleſs, he declares that his greateſt glory was in the croſs of Chriſt; then he acknowledged his own infirmities and afflictions, and the thorn in the fleſh, to be permitted, leſt he ſhould be acknowledged above meaſure.--- What was that particular infirmity or affliction here ſpoken of, is not particualrized; but we are ſure it could not be any motions to luſt, becauſe he had in a ſingular manner the gift of continency, 1 Cor. vii. 7. Nor would he have gloried therein, as he did in chap. xii. 9. So I ſuppoſe it was ſome extraordinary bodily pain or diſtemper, which was viſibly known, Gal. iv. 13, 14. in which manner God ſometimes exerciſes his beſt ſervants.

Laſtly, in chap. xii. 14, &c. to the end of the Epiſtle, he ſignifies his readineſs to ſee them again. In the mean time, he exhorts them to lay aſide their diſorders and factions, which are ſo commonly attended with debates, ſtrifes, back-bitings, and tumults; and alſo hopes he may not find any but what do ſufficiently repent of their fornications, uncleanneſs, and all other vices; leſt when he came, he ſhould not ſpare. And, as for a proof of his Apoſtleſhip, which the falſe teachers demanded, that appeared even by themſelves, and from the effect which the Goſpel had ſince Chriſt was mighty in them, by his grace and the gifts of the Spirit, ſo manifeſt among them.--- He exhorts them, therefore, to examine themſelves, whether they were in the truth, or no; and to lay aſide all their prejudices againſt him, that they might be ſtill approved of God; that ſo he might not be forced to exerciſe the Apoſtolical authority, and inflict the cenſure of the Church, or uſe ſharpneſs. But if it ſhould ſo happen, the main of his deſign would be, not their deſtruction, but edification: Concluding with a ſolemn charge, that they check all their old diviſions, and preſerve unity and peace among themſelves, and then the God of love and peace would be with them. For all which purpoſes he gives them that ſolemn benediction, the grace, or favour, of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the meritorious cauſe of our Redemption, and the love of God the Father, and the Communion or fellowſhip, or the partaking of the gifts and ſanctification of the Holy Ghoſt, be with you all.

CHAP. I.

3 The Apoſtle encourageth them againſt troubles, by the comforts and deliverances which God had given him, as in all his aſflictions, 8 ſo particularly in his late danger in Aſia. 12 And calling both his own conſcience, and theirs to witneſs, of his ſincere manner of preaching the immutable truth of the Goſpel, 15 He excuſeth his not coming to them, as proceeding not of lightneſs, but of his lenity towards them.

PAUL an apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt by the will of God, and Timothy our brother, unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the ſaints which are in all Achaia :

2 Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

3 Bleſſed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort ;

4 Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we our ſelves are comforted of God.

5 For as the ſufferings of Chriſt abound in us, ſo our conſolation alſo aboundeth by Chriſt.

6 And whether we be afflicted, it is for your conſolation and ſalvation, which is effectual in the enduring of the ſame ſufferings which we alſo ſuffer : or whether we be comforted, it is for your conſolation and ſalvation.

7 And our hope of you is ſtedfaſt, knowing that as you are partakers of the ſufferings, ſo ſhall ye be alſo of the conſolation.

8 For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Aſia, that we were preſſed out of meaſure, above ſtrength, inſomuch that we deſpaired even of life :

9 But we had the ſentence of death in our ſelves, that we ſhould not truſt in our ſelves, but in God which raiſeth the dead.

10 Who delivered us from ſo great a death, and doth deliver : in whom we truſt that he will yet deliver us :

11 You alſo helping together by prayer for us, that for the gift beſtowed upon us by the means of many perſons, thanks may be given by many on our behalf.

12 For our rejoycing is this, the teſtimony of our conſcience, that in ſimplicity and godly ſincerity, not with fleſhly wiſdom, but by the grace of God we have had our converſation in the world, and more abundantly to you-wards.

13 For we write none other things unto you, than what you read or acknowledge, and I truſt you ſhall acknowledge even to the end.

14 As alſo you have acknowledged us in part, that we are your rejoycing, even as ye alſo are ours in the day of the Lord Jeſus.

15 And in this confidence I was minded to come unto you before, that you might have a ſecond benefit :

16 And to paſs by you into Macedonia, and to come again out of Macedonia unto you, and of you to be brought on my way toward Judea.

17 When I therefore was thus minded, did I uſe lightneſs ? or the things that I purpoſe, do I purpoſe according to the fleſh, that with me there ſhould be yea, yea, and nay, nay ?

18 But as God is true, our word toward you, was not yea and nay.

19 For the Son of God, Jeſus Chriſt, who was preached among you by us, even by me, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, was not yea and nay, but in him was yea.

20 For all the promiſes of God in him are yea, and in him amen, unto the glory of God by us.

21 Now he which ſtabliſheth us with you in Chriſt, and hath anointed us, is God :

22 Who hath alſo ſealed us, and given the earneſt of the Spirit in our hearts.

23 Moreover, I call God for a record upon my ſoul, that to ſpare you I came not as yet unto Corinth.

24 Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy : for by faith ye ſtand.

This chapter contains,

I. A preface to the whole Epiſtle, compoſed of an inſcription, ver. 1. the Apoſtolick ſalutations, ver. 2, 3. and thankſgivings ; wherein God is deſcribed to be the object, by his relation to Chriſt and his goodneſs, ver. 3. and then you read of the ground of the Apoſtle's thankſgiving, God's comforting him ; amplified by the end or intent thereof, to comfort others, ver. 4. then by the frequency and ſeaſonableneſs thereof, ver. 5. thirdly, by the end both of his afflictions and conſolation, ver. 6. and finally, by his aſſurance of the benefit thereby, ver. 7.

II. A narrative of his troubles, which he deſcribes by the extremity of them, ver. 8. the good uſe he made of them ; not to truſt in himſelf, ver. 9. the happy iſſue, deliverance out of them, amplified by the uſe he made thereof ; truſt for the future deliverance, ver. 10. by the means thereof ; their prayers, ver. 11. and by the ground of his truſt. Where he gives us a teſtimony of his own conſcience, ence, concerning his faithfulneſs towards them, ver. 12. and takes notice of their acknowledgment, ver. 13, 14.

III. A declaration of his purpoſe of coming to them, with his end therein, ver. 15, 16. amplified by a vindication of himſelf from inconſtancy therein. This is propounded, at ver. 17. and proved by the conſtant uniform tenor of his preaching, generally aſſerted, ver. 18. and particularly ſpecified in his doctrine, (1.) concerning Chriſt, ver. 19. and (2.) concerning the certainty and confirmation of the promiſes by him, ver. 20. Then he amplifies it by the efficient cauſe of this conſtancy, whom he aſſerts to be God himſelf, and metaphorically deſcribes him to be the author of this and divers other bleſſings unto them, ver. 21, 22. And concludes the chapter with an account of the true cauſe of his not coming as yet, even becauſe he would ſpare them, ver. 23. amplified by ſhewing what kind of power he, and other lawful miniſters, have over the people committed to their inſtruction and direction.

Ver. 1. Paul.] See his life in the general preface to his Epiſtles.

——— Saints.] Or, thoſe who profeſs the name and faith, and practiſe the doctrine of Chriſt.

——— Achaia.] A province of Greece, of which Corinth was the capital city; ſee Acts xviii. 12.

Ver. 2. Grace be to you, &c.] See Rom. i. 7.

Ver. 4. —— By the comfort.] i. e. By ſhewing forth in our Chriſtian temper that comfort, which a good and pious ſoul receives from the ſpirit of God, which comforts and relieves as many as call upon him faithfully.

Ver. 5. —— Aboundeth by Chriſt.] Who has ſet us an example, that we ſhould never be weary in well-doing, nor faint when we are in trouble for his ſake, and ſuffer for the cauſe of God.

Ver. 8. For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble, which came to us in Aſia.] See Acts xix. 23, and 1 Cor. xv. 32.

Ver. 9. —— We had the ſentence of death in our ſelves, that we ſhould not truſt in our ſelves, but in God which raiſeth the dead, 10, 11.] On which Scripture it is remarkable, what we may even learn from the nature of things, that the intereſts of mankind are ſo mingled and mutually interwoven, that no ſingle perſon ſtands independent on the reſt. The natural ſoftneſs of our diſpoſitions, and the forming us into ſocieties, have ordered matters ſo, that none can; and the precepts of Chriſtianity have refined upon both theſe, by commanding that none ſhall think he can be truly happy or wretched alone. But tho' we are directed in the general, to rejoice with them that do rejoice, and to weep with them that weep. Yet how deep impreſſions the fortunes of others ſhall make, and how wide they ſhall ſpread, muſt depend chiefly upon their different ſtations and capacities in this world. For, where the eminence of the character gives an univerſal influence to the perſon, there all our intereſts are centred in one point; a point which cannot be touched, though never ſo tenderly, without imparting the motion to every line within its circle. Thus Paul repreſents his ſufferings here, as a common concern to the whole Church of Corinth, and we may very naturally improve theſe words by the following conſiderations, viz. The uſe God intends we ſhould make of great and long calamities. The ſlow and gradual advances even of thoſe deliverances which he is fully determined to grant. The ground of truſt in God, which good men may find in ſuch a condition as the Apoſtle here deſcribes. And finally the return proper to be made, when that truſt is anſwered and rewarded. Therefore,

I. The uſe which God intends we ſhould make of great and long calamities is, that when we have the ſentence of death in our ſelves, or, when matters are driven to ſuch an extremity, as leaves no longer hope from human and ordinary ſuccours, we ſhould not even then give up all for loſt, but truſt ſtill in God which raiſeth the dead, ver. 9.

Whatever thoſe preſſures were, to which the Apoſtle refers in this paſſage, the grievouſneſs of them need no other proof, than that they are here ſtiled a great death; and that his reſcue out of them is compared to that nobleſt inſtance of Almighty Power, by which God raiſeth the dead. And ſuch ſurprizing events, it ſeems evident, are ſometimes neceſſary to awake our careleſneſs, and to beget in us juſt notions of God, and of ourſelves.

While things glide on in a ſmooth and equal courſe, the greater part of them eſcape our very notice; for there is, in the reflecting faculty of our minds, ſomewhat that bears reſemblance to the organs of our bodies; on which nothing makes an impreſſion, that we are conſcious of, except it alter the ſtate they were in before. Thus all our common bleſſings of eaſe and health; the daily returns of light and heat; the ſtated kindly ſeaſons of the year; and a thouſand other moſt valuable mercies, are in a manner loſt upon the world, becauſe long familiarity hath brought them into contempt. But,

If it pleaſe God, in judgment, to inflict ſharp pains or a lingring ſickneſs; if he make, as the Scripture terms it, our Heaven over us iron, and our earth braſs; if he ſmite our fields with blaſting, or poiſon our air with peſtilence; we ſoon lament the loſs of that which was held ſo cheap before; and learn the worth of our bleſſings by the want of them.

Thus a mixture of good and evil is an advantage to human life, becauſe, in truth, we need ſome ſuch variety; if it were only to heighten our reliſh, and to recommend our enjoyments the more effectually to us.

But, when to this we add the dreadful conſequences of the ſin of ingratitude, and how apt we are to forget the Author and Director of all theſe events to us, religion will ſoon teach us, that it is an act of kindneſs and mercy in God to refreſh and awaken our memories, and make us wiſe, though at our own expence. And this is never done to better purpoſe, than by ſuch dangers and calamities, as plainly prove an over-ruling Providence, by baffling the wiſdom, and chaſtiſing the vanity of ſelf-conceited men; when they illuſtrate the glory of God with ſuch evidence, that they cannot but perceive and confeſs the deliverance out of them to be his work.

II. And yet in ſuch deliverances, I obſerved, God moves ſometimes by very ſlow ſteps. Thus, after Paul had eſcaped what he calls ſo great a death, there were other afflictions in which he felt the continuance of God's mercy; and more ſtill behind, in which he hoped to find the completion of it. He hath delivered us, and doth deliver, and in him we truſt, that he will yet deliver us, ver. 10.

The world is God's own, and we muſt be content he ſhould rule it acccording to his own pleaſure. It cannot therefore in reaſon be expected, that we ſhould fathom every depth of Providence, or be able to trace it, through all its dark and intricate paſſages. But, ſince God hath made ſome diſcovery of his ways, and the reaſons of them, it were a fault not to follow him, with all due modeſty, ſo far as his own revelations will conduct us.

Now, many inſtances in Scripture teach us, that men do not only provoke, but prolong their own miſeries. God tells his people, by the Prophet Iſaiah, chap. xlviii. that he had refined and choſen them, in the furnace of affliction. When this is the caſe, the purging off our droſs will determine the time of our ſtay in that fire. The phyſick of ſufferings muſt be ſuited to each patient's conſtitution; for, though ſudden and acute diſeaſes may be checked by a few ſtrong remedies; yet a tainted blood and inveterate ill humours require the whole maſs to be changed by a long courſe. From whence it follows, that ſo much as men under correction, contribute to their own amendment; ſo much they quicken the kind methods of Providence toward them.

But, of all the ſins that retard our bleſſings, none ſeem to have a more malignant influence, than impatience and ingratitude. This we find Iſrael often upbraided with; who ſoon forgot what had been done in Egypt, and at the Red-ſea; and upon every peeviſh diſguſt, were ready to fly in the face of God, and of the governor whom he had made the inſtrument of their happineſs. Let me leave their ſin and puniſhment with you in Paul's words, and let us look well to it, that the like never be our caſe. Theſe men (ſays he, 1 Cor. x.) were our enſamples, and thoſe things are written for our admonition, to the intent we ſhould not tempt God, as they alſo tempted. Neither murmur ye, as ſome of them alſo murmured, and were deſtroyed of the deſtroyer.

Again, The nature of that dependence God requires from us, is ſuch, as muſt ſurmount the diſcouragement of delays, and not be weary of waiting his good leiſure. It was Abraham's commendation, that he ſtaggered not at the moſt diſtant and unlikely promiſes; and the Apoſtle, (2 Tim. xi.) compares afflicted Chriſtians, to ſoldiers and huſbandmen, whoſe harveſts and triumphs cannot be come at, without much labour, and toil, and blood. But, if our trials work patience, and patience have her perfect work, our very troubles and temptations, another Apoſtle aſſures us, will at laſt be matter of profit and joy to us, according to that of James i. 2, 3, 4. But,

There is yet another thing fit to be attended to under this head: Which is, that God generally works by ordinary means, and gives ſucceſs in proportion to thoſe means. There are, indeed, ſome ſeaſons for the Almighty Arm to exert itſelf in miraculous interpoſitions; but we, who have no warrant to depend upon ſuch, muſt tarry for a bleſſing upon common methods, be well pleaſed that our fortunes are depoſited in ſo ſafe a hand, and, after Paul's example truſt on ſtill. The ground of which truſt is;

The third thing to be conſidered, and we find it to be two-fold:

1. The experience of God's great goodneſs to him heretofore: And,
2. The interceſſions of his Fellow-Chriſtians.

1. We ſee how Paul is animated by the former inſtances of God's goodneſs to him, from thoſe words, Who delivered us from ſo great a death, and doth deliver, in whom we truſt that he will yet deliver us. Among men, it is true, favours already beſtowed are looked upon commonly as a diſcharge to any farther expectations. The narrowneſs of our ſouls in part, and in part the inſufficiency of our condition, forbid a perpetual ſucceſſion of kindneſſes to the ſame perſons, and render it neceſſary for them, who cannot ſupply all that need, to ſcatter benefits among ſo many the more, by diſtributing ſparingly to each in particular. But it is far otherwiſe with that heavenly Benefactor, whoſe power is infinite, and whoſe goodneſs no more knows any bounds, than his power. He ſees the wants of all his ſervants, without diſtraction or perplexity, and relieves them all without difficulty, and gives liberally without upbraiding. From him one mercy received is a ſure pledge of a ſecond, of many, of greater, of better to follow; provided always, we be careful not to obſtruct the courſe of that bounty, which is ever overflowing, ever diffuſing it ſelf out of a ſource that cannot be exhauſted, and a diſpoſition that cannot be weary of doing good.

2. And yet to this we find another ground of truſt added, in ver. 11. You alſo helping together by prayer for us. What could make a more agreeable ſubject for the interceſſions of the Church, than the preſervation of an Apoſtle, ſo eminently zealous and uſeful? In proportion, we alſo may reaſonably conclude, that when bleſſings of great and general importance to the honour of God, the advancement of his truth, and the publick good, are the matter of our devotion; when the ſolemnity of thoſe devotions, the numbers, the importunity, and the piety of thoſe who offer them, happily meet together; theſe will have no denial, they do even δυσωπεῖν τ̃ Θεόν, (as Chryſoſtom ſpeaks) perfectly vanquiſh a good-natured Deity, and (allow me to expreſs my ſelf after the manner of men) as it were weary him at laſt into a compliance. If theſe phraſes carry a ſound ſomewhat harſh and bold, let it ſerve for my excuſe, that the beſt Fathers of the Church have thought their hardineſs in uſing them abundantly warranted, by that eminent parable of the importunate widow, Luke xviii. wherein our Bleſſed Saviour at once recommends the perſeverance, and ſets forth the irreſiſtible prevalence of our prayers.

So conſiderable (and yet I doubt too little conſidered) is the aſſiſtance which good men contribute, by bearing a part, neither the leaſt, nor the leaſt ſucceſsful, of thoſe difficulties wherein their friends, or the publick are involved. Let us obſerve now, Laſtly,

IV. The return proper to be made, when ſucceſſes of this kind are obtained; which is eaſy to be learnt from that laſt clauſe of the eleventh verſe, that for the gift beſtowed upon us by the means of many perſons, thanks may be given by many on our behalf. The deſign of which paſſage is certainly to inſtruct us; that as oft as affairs or perſons of a general concern have been (as they always ought to be) recommended to the peculiar care and mercy of God; the thanks for a favourable anſwer to ſuch prayers ſhould not fail to be equally publick and ſolemn. The neceſſity, the equity, and the decency of which duty, I ſhould eſteem my ſelf obliged to explain; were I not perſwaded, that every Chriſtian reader is ſo well ſatisfied of this duty, as to render ſuch an enlargement needleſs.

Ver. 12.—— Not with fleſhly wiſdom.] See Rom. i. and 1 Cor. ii. 4—10.

Ver. 13.—— Than what you read.] In the Law and the Prophets ſhould come to paſs.

—— Or acknowledge.] By approving my converſation to be ſincere and upright among you.

—— And I truſt ye ſhall acknowledge even unto the end.] And, I hope, that as ye ſhall never ſee it otherwiſe in or by me, ſo ye will perſevere and continue in your good opinion, and right judgment concering me to the end of yours and my life.

Ver. 14. As alſo you have acknowledged us in part.] By reforming your ſelves from thoſe things whereof I have reproved you in my former Epiſtle.

—— That we are your rejoicing.] That we give you cauſe to rejoice in the Lord Jeſus.

Ver. 15.—— A ſecond benefit.] viz. To be confirmed in the faith, which I taught and exhort you to perſevere in.

Ver. 17.—— Yea, yea, and nay, nay.] The meaning of yea and nay, or of yea, yea, and nay, nay, is diſtinctly this: When we do not agree, or are inconſtant to our ſelves; now yea, and anon nay, in our words and actions. Whence is that old word Naucus in Latin and Greek, for a light and wavering perſon, from nai ouchi, as it is derived by Feſtus. The difference of this from that in James v. 12. is cleared by the conſtruction, "Let your yea, be yea, and your nay, be nay," i. e. let your words and actions accord; ſo that the ſecond yea, and the ſecond nay, is not joined with the firſt, as here, but as the predicate affirmed of it; whereas here the two yeas being all one, are the ſubject of the ſpeech, and the two nays being all one, the predicate: According to that proverb of the Jews, The juſt man's yea, is yea, and his nay, nay. See alſo Matt. v. 37. Note, yea ſignifies true or certain, or eſtabliſhed; but nay ſignifies wavering or uncertain.

Ver. 18.—— Our word towards you was not yea and nay.] i. e. Our preaching among you was not wavering, nor trivolous. See ver. 12. and the preceding note.

Ver. 23.—— To ſpare you.] See 1 Cor. iv. 21.

Ver. 24.—— By faith ye ſtand. See Rom. xi. 20.

CHAP. II.

1 Having ſhewed the reaſon why he came not to them, 6 He requireth them to forgive, and to comfort that excommunicated perſon, 10 Even as himſelf alſo upon his true repentance had forgiven him, 12 declaring withal why he departed from Troas to Macedonia, 14 And the happy ſucceſs which God gave to his preaching in all places.

BUT I determined this with my ſelf, that I would not come again to you in heavineſs.

2 For if I make you ſorry, who is he then that maketh me glad, but the ſame which is made ſorry by me.

3 And I wrote this ſame unto you, leſt when I came, I ſhould have ſorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice, having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all.

4 For out of much affliction and anguiſh of heart, I wrote unto you with many tears; not that you ſhould be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you.

5 But if any have cauſed grief, he hath not grieved me, but in part: that I may not overcharge you all.

6 Sufficient to ſuch a man is this puniſhment, which was inflicted of many.

7 So that contrariwiſe, ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, leſt perhaps ſuch a one ſhould be ſwallowed up with overmuch ſorrow.

8 Wherefore I beſeech you, that ye would confirm your love towards him.

9 For to this end alſo did I write, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things.

10 To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive alſo: for if I forgave any thing, to whom I forgave it, for your ſakes forgave I it, in the perſon of Chriſt;

11 Leſt Satan ſhould get an advantage of us: for we are not ignorant of his devices.

12 Furthermore, when I came to Troas, to preach Chriſt's goſpel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord.

13 I had no reſt in my ſpirit, becauſe I found not Titus my brother: but taking my leave of them, I went from thence into Macedonia.

14 Now thanks be unto God, which always cauſeth us to triumph in Chriſt, and maketh manifeſt the ſavour of his knowledge by us in every place.

15 For we are unto God a ſweet ſavour of Chriſt, in them that are ſaved, and in them that periſh.

16 To the one we are the ſavour of death unto death; and to the other, the ſavour of life unto life: and who is ſufficient for theſe things?

17 For we are not as many, which corrupt the word of God: but as of ſincerity, but as of God, in the ſight of God ſpeak we in Chriſt.

In this chapter the Apoſtle proceeds in his diſcourſe concerning his coming to them, ſhewing his reſolution not to come ſo as to grieve them, ver. 1. becauſe their grief would be his grief, ver. 2. Then,

He declares the purpoſe of his former writing to them, was to prevent further ſorrow, ver. 3. and to teſtify his love, ver. 4. And ſo

Proceeds to the inceſtuous perſon, in which obſervation he ſhews that this miſcarriage was matter of grief to them, as well as to him, ver. 5. Then he urges the abſolution and releaſe of him from the cenſure, becauſe he had ſufficiently been humbled, ver. 6. and leſt he ſhould be overwhelmed with ſorrow, ver. 7. Whereupon,

He entreats his releaſe, ver. 8. becauſe he had now diſcovered their obedience, ver. 9. and on his part, he had forgiven him for their ſakes, ver 10. leſt Satan get an advantage againſt him, ver. 11.

After this he acquaints them with the ſucceſs of his journey to Troas, (1.) with his great encouragement there, ver. 12. and, (2.) with his trouble for want of Titus, ver. 13. And Concludes, by ſhewing the ſucceſs of his miniſtry every where. And here he declares that God is the Author of his ſucceſs; that he is thankful for the ſame, becauſe thereby the knowledge of Jeſus Chriſt is ſpread abroad, ver. 14, 15. but differently, according to the different ſubjects, ver 16. To which he adds the cauſe of this ſucceſs, in reſpect of the Apoſtles themſelves, their ſincer preaching the Goſpel, expreſſed both negatively and poſitively, ver. 17.

Ver. 5. If any have cauſed grief.] See 1 Cor. v. 1.

Ver. 6. —— Puniſhment.] Or cenſure. See 1 Cor. v.

Ver. 12. —— When I came to Troas.] See Acts xvi. 8. and the general Preface to the Epiſtles.

CHAP. III.

1 Leſt their falſe teachers ſhould charge him with vainglory, he ſheweth the faith and graces of the Corinthians, to be a ſufficient commendation of his miniſtry. 6 Whereupon entring a compariſon between the miniſters of the law, and of the Goſpel, 12 he proveth that his miniſtry is ſo far the more excellent, as the Goſpel of life and liberty, is more glorious than the law of condemnation.

DO we begin again to commend our ſelves? or need we, as ſome others, epiſtles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you?

2 Ye are our epiſtle written in our hearts, known and read of all men:

3 For as much as ye are manifeſtly declared to be the epiſtle of Chriſt, miniſtred by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of ſtone, but in fleſhly tables of the heart.

4 And ſuch truſt have we through Chriſt to God-ward:

5 Not that we are ſufficient of our ſelves to think any thing as of our ſelves: but our ſufficiency is of God.

6 Who alſo hath made us able miniſters of the new teſtament, not of the letter, but of the ſpirit: for the letter killeth, but the ſpirit giveth life.

7 But if the miniſtration of death written and ingraven in ſtones, was glorious, ſo that the children of Iſrael could not ſtedfaſtly behold the face of Moſes, for the glory of his countenance, which glory was to be done away;

8 How ſhall not the miniſtration of the ſpirit be rather glorious?

9 For if the miniſtration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the miniſtration of righteouſneſs exceed in glory.

10 For even that which was made glorious, had no glory in this reſpect, by reaſon of the glory that excelleth.

11 For if that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious.

12 Seeing then that we have ſuch hope, we uſe great plainneſs of ſpeech.

13 And not as Moſes, which put a vail over his face, that the children of Iſrael could not ſtedfaſtly look to the end of that which is aboliſhed.

14 But their minds were blinded: for until this day remaineth the ſame vail untaken away, in the reading of the old teſtament; which vail is done away in Chriſt.

15 But even unto this day, when Moſes is read, the vail is upon their heart.

16 Nevertheleſs when it ſhall turn to the Lord, the vail ſhall be taken away.

17 Now the Lord is that Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.

18 But we all with open face, beholding as in a glaſs the glory of the Lord, are changed into the ſame image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.

In this chapter the Apoſtle commends his miniſtry among the Corinthians; they themſelves being a real teſtimony thereof, ver. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5. Then he declares the ſubject-matter of his miniſtry, the Goſpel-diſpenſation, and ſo makes a compariſon between the legal and evangelical miniſtry, in regard of their operation, ver. 6, 7, 8. the excellency of the one above the other, ver. 9, 10. their duration, ver. 11. and manner of delivery, ver. 12. which he proves by the ſign thereof, ver. 13. the effect, the ignorance and blindneſs of the Jews ſtill remaining, ver. 14, 15. amplified by a prediction of the removal of this blindneſs, in their converſion, ver. 16. by the Spirit of the Lord Jeſus, ver. 17, 18.

CHAP. IV.

1 He declareth how he hath uſed all ſincerity and faithful diligence in preaching the Goſpel, 7 and how the troubles and perſecutions which he daily endured for the ſame, did redound to the praiſe of God's power, 12 to the benefit of the Church, 16 and to the Apoſtle's own eternal glory.

THerefore ſeeing we have this miniſtry, as we have received mercy, we faint not:

2 But have renounced the hidden things of diſhoneſty, not walking in craftineſs, nor handling the word of God deceitfully, but by manifeſtation of the truth, commending our ſelves to every mans conſcience in the ſight of God.

3 But if our goſpel be hid, it is hid to them that are loſt:

4 In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, leſt the light of the glorious goſpel of Chriſt, who is the image of God, ſhould ſhine unto them.

5 For we preach not our ſelves, but Chriſt Jeſus the Lord; and our ſelves your ſervants for Jeſus ſake.

6 For God who commanded the light to ſhine out of darkneſs, hath ſhined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jeſus Chriſt.

7 But we have this treaſure in earthen veſſels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us.

8 We are troubled on every ſide, yet not diſtreſſed; we are perplexed, but not in deſpair;

9 Perſecuted, but not forſaken; caſt down, but not deſtroyed;

10 Always bearing about in the body, the dying of the Lord Jeſus, that the life alſo of Jeſus might be made manifeſt in our body.

11 For we which live, are alway delivered unto death for Jeſus ſake, that the life alſo of Jeſus might be made manifeſt in our mortal fleſh.

12 So then death worketh in us, but life in you.

13 We having the ſame ſpirit of faith, according as it is written, I believed, and therefore have I ſpoken: we alſo believe, and therefore ſpeak;

14 Knowing that he which raiſed up the Lord Jeſus, ſhall raiſe up us alſo by Jeſus, and ſhall preſent us with you.

15 For all things are for your ſakes, that the abundant grace might, through the thankſgiving of many, redound to the glory of God.

16 For which cauſe we faint not, but though our outward man periſh, yet the inward man is renewed day by day.

17 For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory;

18 While we look not at the things which are ſeen, but at the things which are not ſeen: for the things which are ſeen, are temporal; but the things are not ſeen, are eternal.

In this chapter the Apoſtle,

I. Declares the manner of his miniſtry or preaching the Goſpel (by way of inference from the foregoing diſcourſe, concerning the Goſpel-miniſtry, that he did it with courage, ver. 1. and not craftily, but with an open undiſguiſed ſincerity, ver. 2. which he amplifies by a ſuppoſition, of its being hid to ſome, notwithſtanding the plain preaching thereof; and by a deſcription of the perſons to whom it is hid; even ſuch as are loſt, ver. 3. to which he adds the cauſe of their being loſt, even the Devil with his deſign therein, ver. 4. and ſo concludes that ſuch his preaching was not for any private intereſt or ſelfiſh end of his own, but purely for the honour of Chriſt, ver. 5. Whence he proceeds, and,

II. Shews the ground and reaſon of his preaching thus; God's purpoſe in revealing the Goſpel to him, ver. 6. amplified by the frail condition of the perſons intruſted with ſo great a bleſſing, and God's end therein, ver. 7. Whereupon,

III. He falls into a large narrative or deſcription, both of their manifold ſufferings, and of their ſupport in them, from ver. 8, to 10. amplified by (1.) God's deſign herein; the diſcovery of Chriſt's power, ver. 11. (2.) The different, yea, oppoſite ſtate or condition of the Corinthians and Apoſtles, ver. 12. But he preſently ſubjoins alſo in what they are alike, viz. in point of faith, that God will deliver them out of all their troubles, ver. 13. and ſhews the ground of this faith and confidence, their reſurrection to future glory, ver. 14. amplified by the end of theſe various diſpenſations, the profit of the Church, ver. 15. Then he ſhews the effect of this hope of glory wrought in them, namely, courage and renewed ſtrength, ver. 16. To which he adds the ground of this courage in their troubles, viz. the eternal advantage that will redound to them thereby, ver. 17. and ſo concludes with the ground of their confidence, that they ſhould be ſuch gainers by their afflictions, viz. their Heavenly temper of mind, ver. 18.

Ver. 7. But we have this treaſure in earthen veſſels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us.] By the treaſure in this text we are to underſtand the Goſpel of Chriſt; the glorious Goſpel of the bleſſed God; 1 Tim. i. 11. in which is ſet before us, and offer'd to us, the unſearchable riches of Chriſt, Eph. iii. 8. 'Tis this treaſure, this which his heart was ſo much upon, and ſo full of. This, which in the verſe before he had call'd the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jeſus Chriſt. That's the treaſure which we Chriſtians have, and glory in. And a noble deſcription it is of the everlaſting Goſpel which is preached to us, and profeſs'd by us.

It is light, 'tis ſuch a light as in the dawning of the Day of the creation ſhone out of darkneſs, ver. 6. when the Almighty Word ſaid, Let there be light, and was the firſt-born of this viſible world; 'tis ſuch a light as every morning ſhines out of the darkneſs of the night, that, as the Goſpel did, it may take hold on the ends of the earth, which is turned to it as clay to the ſeal, Job xxxviii. 13, 14. What's more bright and glorious than the light? What more pure? What more ſelf-evident, and what more welcome to them that ſit in darkneſs? Light is indeed a treaſure, and we have it from the Father of lights.

It recommends itſelf to thoſe who would improve their natural reaſon, for it gives knowledge, ſound knowledge, uſeful knowledge, the knowledge of duty, the knowledge of ſalvation by the remiſſion of ſins, a knowledge infinitely preferable to that which the inquiſitive part of mankind amuſed and perplexed themſelves with in the Gentile philoſophy, which did but darken counſel by words without knowledge;———xxxviii. 2. the light of joy which the Goſpel brings, reſults from the light of knowledge, and that's no Chriſtian Devotion which has ignorance for the mother of it.

It recommends itſelf likewiſe to thoſe who would improve their natural religion, for it gives us the knowledge of the glory of God, the founder and center of all religion; it ſets that glory before us as the object both of all our adorations, and of all our aims. The Heavens indeed declare the glory of God, but they ſhew us not how and which way we may glorify him, much leſs be glorified with him: Here, therefore, where natural reaſon and religion do both leave us at a loſs, the Goſpel of Chriſt takes us up, and leads us on, ſhews us the glory of God ſhining in the face of Chriſt, where it ſhines clearer and ſtronger, and brighter, and with more ſatisfaction than it doth in the face of the whole creation; for it declares the glory of God reconcilable to us, and acceſſible by us, nay, and in Chriſt reconciling the world to himſelf, 2 Cor. v. 19. and taking a remnant of the children of men into covenant and communion with himſelf, through a Mediator. In it life and immortality are brought to light, 2 Tim. i. 10. are brought to hand; ſuch a knowledge as this well deſerves to be called a treaſure, and it is this treaſure here ſpoken of.

By the earthen veſſels here it is plain we are to underſtand the Apoſtles and the Miniſters of the Goſpel, here in the preſent ſtate, while they are in the body. We have this treaſure lodged with us for the uſe of others, whoſe bodies are as earthen veſſels. Theſe were the gifts Chriſt gave unto men when he aſcended up on high, Eph. iv. 11. (and valuable gifts indeed, if we conſider the treaſure lodged in them;) not only Prophets and Apoſtles, but Paſtors and Teachers, whoſe office and buſineſs it is to preach the glad tidings of redemption, by the redeemer's offering himſelf to be a ſacrifice for us, and a Saviour to us.

The very ſame Goſpel that was preached by the Apoſtles and Evangeliſts then, is preached by the Paſtors and Teachers ſtill; only the buſineſs of the firſt Preachers of the Goſpel was to propagate it to diſtant nations, Rom. x. 18. to carry it from place to place, that Chriſt might be known ſalvation to the ends of the earth; the buſineſs of the Paſtors and Teachers ſince has been rather to propagate it to ſucceeding generations, to carry it from age to age, the name of Chriſt might endure for ever, and his throne as the days of Heaven, Pſal. lxxxix. 29. The former was intimated in the command, Go, diſciple all nations; the latter in the promiſe, Lo, I am with you always, with you and your ſucceſſors, even to the end of the world, Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.

Now thoſe who are employed in this work are here ſaid to be earthen veſſels; we have it ἐν ὀστρακίνοις, σκεύεσι, in veſſels made of ſhells of fiſhes, ſo the learned Dr. Hammond thinks it might be read; the ſhells of oyſters (which have their name from the word here uſed) and other the like, reſemble our bodies, in which our ſouls dwell, as a fiſh in the ſhell, and are faſtned to them; and he obſerves from Grotius, that the Platoniſts making two bodies of a man, one more inward, which the ſoul was immediately lodged in, which they called Ὄχημα ψυχῆς, the chariot, or vehicle of the ſoul, an aerial body: The other which is terreſtrial, more groſs and carnal, which we ſee and touch, they call'd Ὀστράκινον, the word here uſed, the ſhell of the ſoul. But he owns that the word ſignifies likewiſe an earthen veſſel which has paſſed the fire, and is therefore brittle, and ſoon broke, ſuch as that earthen bottle which the Prophet broke for a ſign before the ancients of the people, Jer. xix. 10.

The force of the reaſon why God has been pleaſed to put ſuch a treaſure in earthen veſſels is alſo plain, that the excellency of the power may be, that is, may appear to be of God, and not of us. We carry bodies about us (ſo Dr. Hammond paraphraſeth it) ſubject to all manner of oppoſitions, preſſures, and afflictions: And this on purpoſe deſigned by God alſo, that all the good ſucceſs we have in our Apoſtleſhip may be imputed to Chriſt, and not to us, as it would be if we came with any ſecular power or Grandeur to plant the Goſpel. And a very conſiderable proof it was of the Divine Original of the Goſpel, that though the Preachers were not only deſtitute of all worldly advantages, but laboured under all imaginable diſadvantages, yet it made its way, gained its point, and did wonders, which was an evidence that there was an excellency of power above that of any creature, going along with it. Hence obſerve,

Firſt, That in having the Goſpel of Chriſt known and owned among us, we have a treaſure truly valuable; nay, invaluable. It is our happineſs as Chriſtians that we have the Goſpel written to us in the Scriptures, which are of Divine Inſpiration, preached to us by a miniſtry of Divine Inſtitution, under the direction of a Divine Warrant, and the influence of a Divine Promiſe, and profeſſed in the world by a Church called out of the world, and incorporated by a Divine Charter. For,

1. There is in it an abundance of that which is of ineſtimable value. If the things themſelves be truly precious, and there be plenty of them, then we call them treaſure; and ſuch things there are, and ſuch a fulneſs of them in the Goſpel of Chriſt. As the merchandiſe and trade of this wiſdom, Prov. iii. 14. ſo its ſtores and treaſures are better than that of ſilver, or of fine gold, or precious ſtones. The topaz of Ethiopia cannot equal them, the onyx or the ſapphire, Job. xxviii. 19.

There are treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge in the truths which the Goſpel diſcovers to us, about which the underſtanding finds the beſt employment, the beſt entertainment, tainment, Col. ii. 3. There are treaſures of comfort and joy in the offers which the Goſpel makes us, and the bleſſings it aſſures to all believers, in which not only the neceſſities of the ſoul are well provided for, but its deſires abundantly ſatisfied, and its true and laſting happineſs inviolably ſecured. There is a treaſure of merit and righteouſneſs in Chriſt, and in his mediation, his ſacrifice and interceſſion for us; a treaſure of grace and ſtrength in the ſpirit, and his operations on us; a fulneſs of grace, grace for grace, John i. 16. grace for all gracious exerciſes, which it pleaſed the Father ſhould dwell in Jeſus Chriſt, that from thence we might receive; Col. i. 9.

Theſe are things of value to the ſoul of man, and which every ſoul puts a high value upon, that truly deſires to know, and love its God, to ſerve him, enjoy him, and be for ever happy in them. Things which Angels themſelves put ſuch a value upon, that they deſire to look into them; and which Chriſt himſelf put ſuch a value upon, that he thought it worth while to pour out his ſoul unto death, to purchaſe them for us, ſince they could not be gotten for gold, nor ſhould ſilver be weighed for the price of them.

And there is an abundance of them, infinitely exceeding that of light in the ſun, or water in the ſea. In Chriſt there is enough of that, of all that which our ſouls need, enough for all, enough for each, enough for you and me; enough for as many as will come and take of theſe waters of life. Lord, it is done as thou haſt commanded, and yet there is room. When God entred into covenant with Abraham (and it was the covenant of grace that he made with him) he engaged to be to him el-ſhaddi, Gen. xvii. 1. a God all-ſufficient, a God that is enough. Juſtly therefore is that Goſpel which proclaims this covenant called a treaſure, for in the moſt valuable durable riches it infinitely exceeds the peculiar treaſures of kings and provinces: It is an inexhauſtible fountain of life and living waters; it is a bottomleſs treaſure, not a treaſure in a cheſt, but a treaſure in a mine, continually ſpent upon, but never waſted.

2. This is ſafely laid up for a perpetuity, and therefore it is a treaſure; it is depoſited in good hands, whence we may draw from it, but cannot be deprived of it: It is hid treaſure, not hid from us, but hid for us: It is a treaſure under lock and key, and it is in the hand of Chriſt that this key of David is. The riches of Chriſt, which fill thoſe treaſures are unſearchable riches, are ſuch as eye hath not ſeen, nor ear heard, nor can it enter into the heart of man to conceive; 1 Cor. ii. 9. Eph. iii. 9.

It his hid in God, in his wiſdom and counſel, and that eternal purpoſe which he hath purpoſed in himſelf, which can never be altered; it is hid in his glorious perfections, which are all made over to true believers for the conſtituting and enſuring of their happineſs by that all-comprehending article of the new covenant, I will be to them a God, which is treaſure enough.

It is hid in Chriſt, and in his undertaking for us, which contains all that we need as ſinners, as God's being to us a God, contains all we need as reaſonable creatures. He is the treaſurer of this treaſure, is intruſted as Joſeph was in Egypt to diſpoſe of it, as he was to lay it up; and in him it is ſafe. All the promiſes of God, which are real treaſures, and the beſt ſecurities, are in him, yea, and Amen.

It is hid in the Scripture, there it may be found, thence it may be fetched by faith acted on Divine Revelation, aſſenting to it with application and reſignation. It is in the parable a treaſure hid in a field, where it muſt be digged for, and the Scripture is that field, which we muſt make ours, and make uſe of, and then the treaſure is ours; the word is nigh us, and Chriſt in the word, Rom. x. 8. It is hid from the wiſe and prudent, Luke x. 21. the worldly wiſe, who look with contempt upon the field of the Scripture, as Naaman upon the waters of Jordan, preferring before them Abana and Pharphar, rivers of Damaſcus; 2 Kings v. 12. leaving God's fields for a rock, and for the ſnow of Lebanon, as the Prophet ſpeaks, Jer. xviii. 14. margin. But it is hid for the humble and holy, the willing and obedient; they have an unconteſtable, indefeaſible title to it; in it they have a portion that is ſafe, which neither moth nor ruſt can corrupt, nor thieves break through and ſteal; Matt. vi. 20. a good part, which ſhall never be taken away from them, Luke x. ult.

It is a treaſure, for it is laid up for hereafter; the bulk of theſe riches is that which is reſerved in Heaven for us, 1 Pet. i. 4. a glory that is to be revealed in due time; it is a treaſure, that will not only ſuit the preſent exigencies of the ſoul, but will laſt as long as it laſts, and run parallel with its never-failing duration. It is an everlaſting Goſpel that is preached to us, Rev. xiv. 6. that word of the Lord which endures for ever, when all the glory of man is withered as the graſs, 1 Pet. i. 25. It is a treaſure, which glorified Saints will be living plentifully and pleaſantly upon to eternity.

3. It is of univerſal uſe to us, and therefore it is a treaſure; it is not only valuable in itſelf, but every way ſuitable and ſerviceable to us. He that has a treaſure hath that which anſwers all things, Eccl. x. 19. and that the Goſpel doth; it is accommodated to the caſe of our ſouls in all reſpects; and the riches of God's glory in Chriſt Jeſus will, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, ſupply all our needs, Phil. iv. 19.

In our contemplations, in our devotions, and in our whole converſation in the world, the Goſpel of Chriſt is of conſtant uſe to us, doth that for us which we need, and which nothing elſe could do for us. We could have no acquaintance or communion with God, but under the conduct and direction of the Goſpel; no comfortable enjoyment of ourſelves, nor peace in our own conſciences, but upon Goſpel-grounds; nor any ſure rule of ſpeaking and acting, but that which the Goſpel furniſheth us with in the law of Chriſt; nor any powerful principle of well-doing, but what is wrought by the Spirit of Chriſt.

It is a treaſure of food for all thoſe that hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſs. It is manna, bread from Heaven, not a pot of manna, but a cloud of manna: The bread which the Son of Man ſhall give, is that which endures to eternal life, is the pledge of it, and nouriſheth believing ſouls to it, John vi. 27. It is a treaſure of phyſick for deceaſed ſouls that apply themſelves to Chriſt as their phyſician, and there is in it a ſalve for every ſore, a remedy for every malady. And the univerſal cures which Chriſt wrought when he was here upon earth, were an indication of that inexhauſtible fulneſs of healing virtue that there is in the Goſpel of Chriſt; as his feeding thouſands with a little food was of the abundant nouriſhment that there is in it to them who by faith live upon it, to whom his fleſh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed.

It is a treaſure of arms and ammunition for our ſpiritual warfare, a divine magazine, whence the good ſoldiers of Jeſus Chriſt may be furniſhed with anſwers to every temptation, and with the whole armour of God, with which they may not only ſecure themſelves, but reſiſt and vanquiſh their ſpiritual enemies, and become more than conquerors, Eph. vi. 16, 17.

It is a treaſure in the world, it puts honour upon it, and puts good into it; God's love to the world, in ſending his only begotten Son, that through him righteouſneſs and life might be brought in where ſin and death had reigned, is the beſt treaſure that ever was in it, far exceeding the riches of the ſea, or the treaſures hid in the ſand, Deut. xxxiii. 10. The enlarging of the borders of the Church, by the ſpreading of the Goſpel, is called the riches of the world, the riches of the Gentiles, Rom. xi. 12. and thoſe parts of the world that have the Goſpel, have no reaſon to envy thoſe that have the gold, nor ſhould wiſh to change with them.

It is a treaſure to any nation or people; thoſe are truly rich among whom the word of Chriſt's Goſpel has free courſe and is glorified; that have it in its purity, power and plenty, and Chriſt in that chariot going forth and going on, conquering and to conquer, Rev. vi. 2. As wiſdom and knowledge are the ſtability of our times, ſo the fear of the Lord is our treaſure, Iſa. xxxiii. 6. Bibles and miniſters are the wealth of a nation; the growth of Scripture-knowledge, and the increaſe of the gifts and graces of miniſters, of their zeal for Chriſt, and love to the ſouls of men, may be reckoned the growth of a kingdom's wealth, of its honour and of its ſtrength.

It is a treaſure in the heart of every true believer that receives it, embraces it, and is delivered into it, as into a mold. So that if the Goſpel of Chriſt has, as it ought to have, the innermoſt and uppermoſt place in our ſouls, if it command us, if it conſtrain us, and ſo we become intereſted in its promiſes and privileges, we are rich, and increaſed with goods, we are truly rich, rich towards God, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom, Matt. xii. 35. And out of this good treaſure in the heart, a good man upon all occaſions brings forth good things, Matt. xiii. 52. for his own uſe, and for the ſervice of others: As the good houſholder, ſo the good ſcribe, who is well inſtructed concerning the glory of God, as it ſhines in the face of Jeſus Chriſt, from that treaſury produceth things new and old, to the glory of God's grace and truth, Matt. xiii. 52. And,

If we have not yet our hearts enriched with this treaſure by a true and lively faith in Chriſt and his Goſpel, we are wretchedly and miſerably poor till we do; and then, and not till then, we begin to be wiſe for our ſelves.

Secondly, Miniſters are earthen veſſels in whom this treaſure is put: What is laid up in order to its being uſed hereafter, is laid up in ſome veſſel or other, where it may be ready when there is occaſion for it, or to which thoſe that have occaſion may have recourſe, Eſth. iii. 13. now the treaſure of the Goſpel is committed to the Preachers of it, as proclamations to the meſſengers of the government, to be diſperſed, and this is like putting a treaſure into earthen veſſels.

They are ſaid to have this treaſure, not only becauſe they ought to have it, in their hearts themſelves, firmly to believe it, and to abide under the impreſſions and influences of it; for, How can they expect to be inſtrumental in bringing others to the belief and obedience of that which they do not themſelves believe and obey? But becauſe they have the exhibiting and diſpenſing of it to others. They have (as the Levites under the Law) the charge of the holy things, 1 Cor. iv. 1. becauſe if there were not ſome to whom this charge were committed, that which is every body's work, would be no body's work. The Miniſters of Chriſt are ſaid to be the ſtewards of the myſteries of God, 1 Cor. ix. 17. and have the keys of the ſtores committed to them, that they may give to each of the houſhold their portion of meat in due ſeaſon; it is a diſpenſation, not a dominion that is committed to them. The Goſpel is ſaid to be committed to their truſt, 1 Tim. i. 11. to the uſe and behoof of the Church of God, and all the members of it; their concern, therefore, is to purſue the truſt, and to be faithful to that.

The preacing of the Goſpel is put into their mouths, and they are like John Baptiſt, the voice of one crying in the wilderneſs, crying as to travellers in a wilderneſs that have loſt their way, and if not called to, will wander endleſly; and they are but the voice, God is the ſpeaker. The applying of the ſeals is put into their hands, the admitting ſeal, the confirming ſeal, by which thoſe are ſacramentally inveſted in the privileges of the Goſpel, who by the work of the Spirit on their hearts are become entitled to them: And thus they have the treaſure.

1. They are but veſſels, that afford no more, no other than what is put into them, nor can give but juſt as they have received. God is the fountain of light and life, and living waters, and all our ſprings are in him, Jer. ii. 14. They are, as all other creatures are (Angels themſelves not excepted) that, and all that, and that only that God makes them to be, Cant. iv. 15. It is Chriſt that is the fountain of gardens, they are but ciſterns: It is the commandment that is the lamp, and the law is light; they are but as candleſticks in which this light is ſet up, and by which it is held forth.

Miniſters muſt remember this, and religiouſly adhere to their inſtructions; and as they muſt dare to declare the whole counſel of God, ſo they muſt not dare to declare any thing elſe under the name and ſhadow of that; but muſt be able to ſay they have received from the Lord that which they have delivered unto you, John iii. 27. for a man can receive nothing, which he can depend upon himſelf, or recommend to others with any aſſurance, unleſs it be given him from above. You like not the liquor that taſtes of the veſſel, nor will a gracious ſoul reliſh the doctrine that is of man and by man; it is the pure river of water of life, clear as cryſtal, which proceeds out of the throne of God and the Lamb, that waters the New Jeruſalem, and makes it glad, Rev. xxii. 1.

People muſt remember this, and not expect any more from their Miniſters than from veſſels; we have a Goſpel to preach, not a Goſpel to make; we can but declare the grace of God, we cannot beſtow that grace, and therefore why look ye at us, as if we could ſpeak to the heart? What is Paul, or what is Apollos? They are but miniſters, not maſters, 1 Cor. iii. 5. it is the Lord God that muſt do the work.

2. They are but earthen veſſels; it was agreeable enough to the eternal glory of the Old Teſtament diſpenſation, that the lights of the ſanctuary ſhould be put into golden candleſticks, of pure gold. But the glory of the New Teſtament being ſpiritual, the exhibiting of the light of that is in earthen lamps, like Epictetus's. Some think here is an alluſion to Gideon's ſoldiers, that advancing to battle in the night, took lamps in their earthen pitchers, with the glaring light of which, upon the breaking of the pitchers, the enemy was terrified, and ſo diſcomfited, Jude vii. 16. By ſuch unlikely methods is Chriſt's cauſe carried on, and yet is victorious.

Let us ſee why the Miniſters of the Goſpel are here compared to earthen veſſels; in nine things.

Firſt, They are made of the ſame mould with other people; all the children of men are earthen veſſels; the body is the veſſel of the ſoul, and it is of the earth, earthy, 1 Theſſ. iv. 4. and Miniſters are partakers of fleſh and blood, as other men are, hewn out of the ſame rock, and digged out of the ſame hole of the pit.

God hath not ſent us his Goſpel by thoſe meſſengers of his that are ſpirits, and a flame of fire, but by ſuch as have bodies, and are clods of clay, and worms of the earth, as thoſe are to whom they are ſent: They are to you in God's ſtead, indeed, and their embaſſy is high and honourable; but, as Elihu ſpeaks, they alſo are formed out of the clay, Job xxxiii. 6, 7. and God, in compaſſion to us, chuſeth to ſpeak to us by men like our ſelves, becauſe, as it follows there, their terrors ſhall not make us afraid, as that of Angels would, if God ſhould ſend his errands to us by them; nor ſhall their hand be heavy upon us.

Secondly, They are oftentimes in reſpect of their outward condition mean and low, and of ſmall account, as earthen veſſels are; not only men, but men of low degree; ſons of earth, as the Hebrew phraſe is. Their family, perhaps, like Gideon's, poor in Manaſſeh, and they the leaſt in their Father's houſe, Judg. vi. 15. that have nothing diſtinguiſhing in their extraction of parentage, their birth or education; they have no reaſon to rejoice (as Chriſt tells his diſciples) that their names are written in Heaven, but they muſt never expect to have a name, like the names of the great ones of the earth; Luke x. 20.

The firſt Preachers of the Goſpel were poor fiſhermen; earthen veſſels indeed, bred up to the ſea, and before they were intruſted with this treaſure were unlearned and ignorant men. Chriſt's Kingdom not being of this world, he did not make uſe of the princes of this world, not men of honours and eſtates, not their learning or politicks, but as the poor received the Goſpel, ſo the poor preached it, Matt. xi. 5.

And ſtill they are not many mighty, not many noble, that are called to this work, 1 Cor. i. 26. 'tis honourable enough itſelf, and needs not borrow any additional luſtre from the glory of this world, which God would thus put contempt upon, and give more abundant honour to that part which lacked, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks with reference to the diſpenſing of ſpiritual gifts, 1 Cor. xii. 23, 24. The poor in the world are often made rich in faith, rich in the Goſpel-treaſure.

Thirdly, They are ſubject to many infirmities, to like paſſions as other men, and upon that account they are earthen veſſels, they have their faults, their flaws, their blemiſhes, as earthen veſſels uſe to have, James v. 17. John Baptiſt takes notice of it, that 'tis Chriſt only who cometh from Heaven, and is above all, that is perfectly pure and ſpotleſs, but he that is of the earth is earthly, and ſpeaketh of the earth; John iii. 31. the treaſure is wiſdom from above, 'tis all Heavenly and Divine, but the veſſel in which it is put, has too much in it of the wiſdom from beneath, for it is earthen, and ſavours of its original.

God hath choſen not only the weak, but the fooliſh things of the world, by them to carry on his cauſe, and by them to carry it at laſt. The law made men prieſts that had infirmity, Heb. vii. ult. and ſo doth the Goſpel too. Jonah was a Prophet of the Lord, and yet peeviſh and paſſionate, and often out of temper; Elijah himſelf tainment, Col. ii. 3. There are treaſures of comfort and joy in the offers which the Goſpel makes us, and the bleſſings it aſſures to all believers, in which not only the neceſſities of the ſoul are well provided for, but its deſires abundantly ſatisfied, and its true and laſting happineſs inviolably ſecured. There is a treaſure of merit and righteouſneſs in Chriſt, and in his mediation, his ſacrifice and interceſſion for us; a treaſure of grace and ſtrength in the ſpirit, and his operations on us; a fulneſs of grace, grace for grace, John i. 16. grace for all gracious exerciſes, which it pleaſed the Father ſhould dwell in Jeſus Chriſt, that from thence we might receive; Col. i. 9.

Theſe are things of value to the ſoul of man, and which every ſoul puts a high value upon, that truly deſires to know, and love its God, to ſerve him, enjoy him, and be for ever happy in them. Things which Angels themſelves put ſuch a value upon, that they deſire to look into them; and which Chriſt himſelf put ſuch a value upon, that he thought it worth while to pour out his ſoul unto death, to purchaſe them for us, ſince they could not be gotten for gold, nor ſhould ſilver be weighed for the price of them.

And there is an abundance of them, infinitely exceeding that of light in the ſun, or water in the ſea. In Chriſt there is enough of that, of all that which our ſouls need, enough for all, enough for each, enough for you and me; enough for as many as will come and take of theſe waters of life. Lord, it is done as thou haſt commanded, and yet there is room. When God entred into covenant with Abraham (and it was the covenant of grace that he made with him) he engaged to be to him el-ſhaddi, Gen. xvii. 1. a God all-ſufficient, a God that is enough. Juſtly therefore is that Goſpel which proclaims this covenant called a treaſure, for in the moſt valuable durable riches it infinitely exceeds the peculiar treaſures of kings and provinces: It is an inexhauſtible fountain of life and living waters; it is a bottomleſs treaſure, not a treaſure in a cheſt, but a treaſure in a mine, continually ſpent upon, but never waſted.

2. This is ſafely laid up for a perpetuity, and therefore it is a treaſure; it is depoſited in good hands, whence we may draw from it, but cannot be deprived of it: It is hid treaſure, not hid from us, but hid for us: It is a treaſure under lock and key, and it is in the hand of Chriſt that this key of David is. The riches of Chriſt, which fill thoſe treaſures are unſearchable riches, are ſuch as eye hath not ſeen, nor ear heard, nor can it enter into the heart of man to conceive; 1 Cor. ii. 9. Eph. iii. 9.

It his hid in God, in his wiſdom and counſel, and that eternal purpoſe which he hath purpoſed in himſelf, which can never be altered; it is hid in his glorious perfections, which are all made over to true believers for the conſtituting and enſuring of their happineſs by that all-comprehending article of the new covenant, I will be to them a God, which is treaſure enough.

It is hid in Chriſt, and in his undertaking for us, which contains all that we need as ſinners, as God's being to us a God, contains all we need as reaſonable creatures. He is the treaſurer of this treaſure, is intruſted as Joſeph was in Egypt to diſpoſe of it, as he was to lay it up; and in him it is ſafe. All the promiſes of God, which are real treaſures, and the beſt ſecurities, are in him, yea, and Amen.

It is hid in the Scripture, there it may be found, thence it may be fetched by faith acted on Divine Revelation, aſſenting to it with application and reſignation. It is in the parable a treaſure hid in a field, where it muſt be digged for, and the Scripture is that field, which we muſt make ours, and make uſe of, and then the treaſure is ours; the word is nigh us, and Chriſt in the word, Rom. x. 8. It is hid from the wiſe and prudent, Luke x. 21. the worldly wiſe, who look with contempt upon the field of the Scripture, as Naaman upon the waters of Jordan, preferring before them Abana and Pharphar, rivers of Damaſcus; 2 Kings v. 12. leaving God's fields for a rock, and for the ſnow of Lebanon, as the Prophet ſpeaks, Jer. xviii. 14. margin. But it is hid for the humble and holy, the willing and obedient; they have an unconteſtable, indefeaſible title to it; in it they have a portion that is ſafe, which neither moth nor ruſt can corrupt, nor thieves break through and ſteal; Matt. vi. 20. a good part, which ſhall never be taken away from them, Luke x. ult.

It is a treaſure, for it is laid up for hereafter; the bulk of theſe riches is that which is reſerved in Heaven for us, 1 Pet. i. 4. a glory that is to be revealed in due time; it is a treaſure, that will not only ſuit the preſent exigencies of the ſoul, but will laſt as long as it laſts, and run parallel with its never-failing duration. It is an everlaſting Goſpel that is preached to us, Rev. xiv. 6. that word of the Lord which endures for ever, when all the glory of man is withered as the graſs, 1 Pet. i. 25. It is a treaſure, which glorified Saints will be living plentifully and pleaſantly upon to eternity.

3. It is of univerſal uſe to us, and therefore it is a treaſure; it is not only valuable in itſelf, but every way ſuitable and ſerviceable to us. He that has a treaſure hath that which anſwers all things, Eccl. x. 19. and that the Goſpel doth; it is accommodated to the caſe of our ſouls in all reſpects; and the riches of God's glory in Chriſt Jeſus will, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, ſupply all our needs, Phil. iv. 19.

In our contemplations, in our devotions, and in our whole converſation in the world, the Goſpel of Chriſt is of conſtant uſe to us, doth that for us which we need, and which nothing elſe could do for us. We could have no acquaintance or communion with God, but under the conduct and direction of the Goſpel; no comfortable enjoyment of ourſelves, nor peace in our own conſciences, but upon Goſpel-grounds; nor any ſure rule of ſpeaking and acting, but that which the Goſpel furniſheth us with in the law of Chriſt; nor any powerful principle of well-doing, but what is wrought by the Spirit of Chriſt.

It is a treaſure of food for all thoſe that hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſs. It is manna, bread from Heaven, not a pot of manna, but a cloud of manna: The bread which the Son of Man ſhall give, is that which endures to eternal life, is the pledge of it, and nouriſheth believing ſouls to it, John vi. 27. It is a treaſure of phyſick for deceaſed ſouls that apply themſelves to Chriſt as their phyſician, and there is in it a ſalve for every ſore, a remedy for every malady. And the univerſal cures which Chriſt wrought when he was here upon earth, were an indication of that inexhauſtible fulneſs of healing virtue that there is in the Goſpel of Chriſt; as his feeding thouſands with a little food was of the abundant nouriſhment that there is in it to them who by faith live upon it, to whom his fleſh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed.

It is a treaſure of arms and ammunition for our ſpiritual warfare, a divine magazine, whence the good ſoldiers of Jeſus Chriſt may be furniſhed with anſwers to every temptation, and with the whole armour of God, with which they may not only ſecure themſelves, but reſiſt and vanquiſh their ſpiritual enemies, and become more than conquerors, Eph. vi. 16, 17.

It is a treaſure in the world, it puts honour upon it, and puts good into it; God's love to the world, in ſending his only begotten Son, that through him righteouſneſs and life might be brought in where ſin and death had reigned, is the beſt treaſure that ever was in it, far exceeding the riches of the ſea, or the treaſures hid in the ſand, Deut. xxxiii. 10. The enlarging of the borders of the Church, by the ſpreading of the Goſpel, is called the riches of the world, the riches of the Gentiles, Rom. xi. 12. and thoſe parts of the world that have the Goſpel, have no reaſon to envy thoſe that have the gold, nor ſhould wiſh to change with them.

It is a treaſure to any nation or people; thoſe are truly rich among whom the word of Chriſt's Goſpel has free courſe and is glorified; that have it in its purity, power and plenty, and Chriſt in that chariot going forth and going on, conquering and to conquer, Rev. vi. 2. As wiſdom and knowledge are the ſtability of our times, ſo the fear of the Lord is our treaſure, Iſa. xxxiii. 6. Bibles and miniſters are the wealth of a nation; the growth of Scripture-knowledge, and the increaſe of the gifts and graces of miniſters, of their zeal for Chriſt, and love to the ſouls of men, may be reckoned the growth of a kingdom's wealth, of its honour and of its ſtrength.

It is a treaſure in the heart of every true believer that receives it, embraces it, and is delivered into it, as into a mold. So that if the Goſpel of Chriſt has, as it ought to have, the innermoſt and uppermoſt place in our ſouls, if it command us, if it conſtrain us, and ſo we become intereſted in its promiſes and privileges, we are rich, and increaſed with goods, we are truly rich, rich towards God, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom, Matt. xii. 35. And out of this good treaſure in the heart, a good man upon all occaſions brings forth good things, Matt. xiii. 52. for his own uſe, and for the ſervice of others: As the good houſholder, ſo the good ſcribe, who is well inſtructed concerning the glory of God, as it ſhines in the face of Jeſus Chriſt, from that treaſury produceth things new and old, to the glory of God's grace and truth, Matt. xiii. 52. And,

If we have not yet our hearts enriched with this treaſure by a true and lively faith in Chriſt and his Goſpel, we are wretchedly and miſerably poor till we do; and then, and not till then, we begin to be wiſe for our ſelves.

Secondly, Miniſters are earthen veſſels in whom this treaſure is put: What is laid up in order to its being uſed hereafter, is laid up in ſome veſſel or other, where it may be ready when there is occaſion for it, or to which thoſe that have occaſion may have recourſe, Eſth. iii. 13. now the treaſure of the Goſpel is committed to the Preachers of it, as proclamations to the meſſengers of the government, to be diſperſed, and this is like putting a treaſure into earthen veſſels.

They are ſaid to have this treaſure, not only becauſe they ought to have it, in their hearts themſelves, firmly to believe it, and to abide under the impreſſions and influences of it; for, How can they expect to be inſtrumental in bringing others to the belief and obedience of that which they do not themſelves believe and obey? But becauſe they have the exhibiting and diſpenſing of it to others. They have (as the Levites under the Law) the charge of the holy things, 1 Cor. iv. 1. becauſe if there were not ſome to whom this charge were committed, that which is every body's work, would be no body's work. The Miniſters of Chriſt are ſaid to be the ſtewards of the myſteries of God, 1 Cor. ix. 17. and have the keys of the ſtores committed to them, that they may give to each of the houſhold their portion of meat in due ſeaſon; it is a diſpenſation, not a dominion that is committed to them. The Goſpel is ſaid to be committed to their truſt, 1 Tim. i. 11. to the uſe and behoof of the Church of God, and all the members of it; their concern, therefore, is to purſue the truſt, and to be faithful to that.

The preacing of the Goſpel is put into their mouths, and they are like John Baptiſt, the voice of one crying in the wilderneſs, crying as to travellers in a wilderneſs that have loſt their way, and if not called to, will wander endleſly; and they are but the voice, God is the ſpeaker. The applying of the ſeals is put into their hands, the admitting ſeal, the confirming ſeal, by which thoſe are ſacramentally inveſted in the privileges of the Goſpel, who by the work of the Spirit on their hearts are become entitled to them: And thus they have the treaſure.

1. They are but veſſels, that afford no more, no other than what is put into them, nor can give but juſt as they have received. God is the fountain of light and life, and living waters, and all our ſprings are in him, Jer. ii. 14. They are, as all other creatures are (Angels themſelves not excepted) that, and all that, and that only that God makes them to be, Cant. iv. 15. It is Chriſt that is the fountain of gardens, they are but ciſterns: It is the commandment that is the lamp, and the law is light; they are but as candleſticks in which this light is ſet up, and by which it is held forth.

Miniſters muſt remember this, and religiouſly adhere to their inſtructions; and as they muſt dare to declare the whole counſel of God, ſo they muſt not dare to declare any thing elſe under the name and ſhadow of that; but muſt be able to ſay they have received from the Lord that which they have delivered unto you, John iii. 27. for a man can receive nothing, which he can depend upon himſelf, or recommend to others with any aſſurance, unleſs it be given him from above. You like not the liquor that taſtes of the veſſel, nor will a gracious ſoul reliſh the doctrine that is of man and by man; it is the pure river of water of life, clear as cryſtal, which proceeds out of the throne of God and the Lamb, that waters the New Jeruſalem, and makes it glad, Rev. xxii. 1.

People muſt remember this, and not expect any more from their Miniſters than from veſſels; we have a Goſpel to preach, not a Goſpel to make; we can but declare the grace of God, we cannot beſtow that grace, and therefore why look ye at us, as if we could ſpeak to the heart? What is Paul, or what is Apollos? They are but miniſters, not maſters, 1 Cor. iii. 5. it is the Lord God that muſt do the work.

2. They are but earthen veſſels; it was agreeable enough to the eternal glory of the Old Teſtament diſpenſation, that the lights of the ſanctuary ſhould be put into golden candleſticks, of pure gold. But the glory of the New Teſtament being ſpiritual, the exhibiting of the light of that is in earthen lamps, like Epictetus's. Some think here is an alluſion to Gideon's ſoldiers, that advancing to battle in the night, took lamps in their earthen pitchers, with the glaring light of which, upon the breaking of the pitchers, the enemy was terrified, and ſo diſcomfited, Jude vii. 16. By ſuch unlikely methods is Chriſt's cauſe carried on, and yet is victorious.

Let us ſee why the Miniſters of the Goſpel are here compared to earthen veſſels; in nine things.

Firſt, They are made of the ſame mould with other people; all the children of men are earthen veſſels; the body is the veſſel of the ſoul, and it is of the earth, earthy, 1 Theſſ. iv. 4. and Miniſters are partakers of fleſh and blood, as other men are, hewn out of the ſame rock, and digged out of the ſame hole of the pit.

God hath not ſent us his Goſpel by thoſe meſſengers of his that are ſpirits, and a flame of fire, but by ſuch as have bodies, and are clods of clay, and worms of the earth, as thoſe are to whom they are ſent: They are to you in God's ſtead, indeed, and their embaſſy is high and honourable; but, as Elihu ſpeaks, they alſo are formed out of the clay, Job xxxiii. 6, 7. and God, in compaſſion to us, chuſeth to ſpeak to us by men like our ſelves, becauſe, as it follows there, their terrors ſhall not make us afraid, as that of Angels would, if God ſhould ſend his errands to us by them; nor ſhall their hand be heavy upon us.

Secondly, They are oftentimes in reſpect of their outward condition mean and low, and of ſmall account, as earthen veſſels are; not only men, but men of low degree; ſons of earth, as the Hebrew phraſe is. Their family, perhaps, like Gideon's, poor in Manaſſeh, and they the leaſt in their Father's houſe, Judg. vi. 15. that have nothing diſtinguiſhing in their extraction of parentage, their birth or education; they have no reaſon to rejoice (as Chriſt tells his diſciples) that their names are written in Heaven, but they muſt never expect to have a name, like the names of the great ones of the earth; Luke x. 20.

The firſt Preachers of the Goſpel were poor fiſhermen; earthen veſſels indeed, bred up to the ſea, and before they were intruſted with this treaſure were unlearned and ignorant men. Chriſt's Kingdom not being of this world, he did not make uſe of the princes of this world, not men of honours and eſtates, not their learning or politicks, but as the poor received the Goſpel, ſo the poor preached it, Matt. xi. 5.

And ſtill they are not many mighty, not many noble, that are called to this work, 1 Cor. i. 26. 'tis honourable enough itſelf, and needs not borrow any additional luſtre from the glory of this world, which God would thus put contempt upon, and give more abundant honour to that part which lacked, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks with reference to the diſpenſing of ſpiritual gifts, 1 Cor. xii. 23, 24. The poor in the world are often made rich in faith, rich in the Goſpel-treaſure.

Thirdly, They are ſubject to many infirmities, to like paſſions as other men, and upon that account they are earthen veſſels, they have their faults, their flaws, their blemiſhes, as earthen veſſels uſe to have, James v. 17. John Baptiſt takes notice of it, that 'tis Chriſt only who cometh from Heaven, and is above all, that is perfectly pure and ſpotleſs, but he that is of the earth is earthly, and ſpeaketh of the earth; John iii. 31. the treaſure is wiſdom from above, 'tis all Heavenly and Divine, but the veſſel in which it is put, has too much in it of the wiſdom from beneath, for it is earthen, and ſavours of its original.

God hath choſen not only the weak, but the fooliſh things of the world, by them to carry on his cauſe, and by them to carry it at laſt. The law made men prieſts that had infirmity, Heb. vii. ult. and ſo doth the Goſpel too. Jonah was a Prophet of the Lord, and yet peeviſh and paſſionate, and often out of temper; Elijah himſelf was ſo; Peter at Antioch was to be blamed, when he went in with Barnabas into a piece of diſſimulation; Gal. ii. 11—13. and I doubt Paul at Antioch, Acts xv. 39. was not altogether to be juſtified, when he fell out with Barnabas in a heat of contention. There were thoſe that preached Chriſt, even of envy and ſtrife, Phil. i. 15. ——18. and many that ſought their own things more than the things of Chriſt, and yet as long as they preached Chriſt, and held forth the Goſpel-treaſure, Paul rejoiced in it,——ii. 21. He was a great Apoſtle, who put himſelf in when he ſaid, If we ſay we have no ſin, we deceive our ſelves.

Miniſters are men, and therefore it cannot be thought they do what they do by their own power, they are ſinful men, and therefore cannot be thought to do it by their own holineſs, Acts iii. 12. They are preſſing towards perfection, but they have not yet attained, Phil. iii. 13. they own they have not, they own it to you; and deſire you will not think the worſe of the treaſure that is put into their hands, for any miſtake or defect of theirs in other things. You may ſee a Divine Excellency in that, though you ſee much human infirmity in the veſſel that keeps it. Bear with them then, and be not ſevere in judging them, whom you have ſo often heard going before you in judging themſelves.

Fourthly, They are made of different ſorts of earth, as earthen veſſels are; all of the ſame nature, but not all of the ſame natural conſtitution; the bodies of ſome are of a ſtronger make, and more cut out for labour, while others are feeble and ſoon foiled. Some have ſouls that ſeem to be made of a finer mould than others, Queis meliore luto finxit præcordia Titan, the capacities of their minds are more elevated and enlarged, while others who yet have their hearts upright with God, in compariſon with them, are but babes in underſtanding.

But thoſe of the fineſt mould, are but earthen ones; the head and the eye in it, are made of the ſame earth with the reſt of the body; 1 Cor. xii. 15. and thoſe that are of a coarſer mould, yet may as effectually anſwer the end in keeping the treaſure, as thoſe of the fineſt compoſition. The living creature in Ezekiel's viſion, that had the face of an ox, did as good ſervice in his place, as that which had the face of an eagle, Ezek. i. 10. Therefore, let not thoſe of eminent gifts be puffed up, they are but earthen veſſels, nor let thoſe of meaner abilities be caſt down or diſcourag'd, God can make them who ſeem poor, yet to enrich many.

A great deal of difference there is likewiſe between ſome and others of theſe earthen veſſels in reſpect of natural temper; ſome are more bold, others are more timorous. Some more warm and eager, others more ſoft and gentle. I remember Gregory in his book de paſtorali Cura, obſerves, that Paul writing to Timothy, bids him not ſtrive, but be gentle to all men, and to reprove with all long-ſuffering; 2 Tim. ii. 24. ——iv. 2. but writing to Titus, he bids him rebuke ſharply, and reprove with all authority, Tit. i. 13.——ii. 25. for which he gives this reaſon: That Titus was a man of a mild diſpoſition and needed a ſpur, Timothy more ſanguine and needed a bridle. Some are of a ſorrowful ſpirit, reſerved, and inclined to melancholy, and that is turned to their reproach, as it was to David's when he wept and chaſtened his ſoul with faſting, Pſal. lxix. 10. and to John Baptiſt's, who becauſe he came neither eating nor drinking, not converſing ſo familiarly with the world as others did, they ſaid, He has a Devil, He is a craz'd, diſtracted man: Others are of a chearful ſpirit, and jocular ſometimes, and that ſhall be made a blemiſh in their character, as becauſe Chriſt came eating and drinking, they called him a gluttonous man, and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and ſinners, Matt. xi. 18, 19.

So likewiſe as to the manner of exhibiting and diſpenſing the treaſure, there is a great variety of gifts; Apollos is an eloquent man, but Paul's ſpeech is contemptible, yet his letters are powerful; even among the inſpired writers, there is a great variety of phraſe and diction; much more among the other earthen veſſels, that are left more to themſelves. And all theſe as far as they have an aptitude to edify ſome or other, either the learned or the unlearned, are wrought by one and the ſelf-ſame ſpirit; 1 Cor. xii. 7--11. and yet by men of corrupt minds, both the one and the other is expoſed to contempt. He that delivers his meſſage as Paul did in tears, is ridiculed as a whining preacher; he that delivers it now and then with a pleaſing ſupriſing turn, is ridiculed as a facetious one; as Iſaiah was bantered for ſaying, Precept muſt be upon precept, precept upon precept, line upon line, line upon line, which in the original is a jingle of words, Tſaf betſaf, kaf bekaf; Iſa. xxviii. 10. and this they made a ſong of, ver. 13. The word of the Lord was unto them precept upon precept. Jeremiah is jeered for ſaying, The burthen of the word of the Lord, and they ſaid of Ezekiel, Doth he not ſpeak parables? And yet after all, laid to their charge a thouſand things which they knew not; but wiſdom is, and will be juſtified of all her children.

Fifthly, They are of different ſhapes and ſizes as earthen veſſels, and veſſels of ſhells uſe to be; notwithſtanding which they may all receive and keep ſafe, and miniſter the treaſure, according to their different capacities. While they hold the foundation, Chriſt and him crucified, and the truth as it is in Jeſus, yet in matters of leſſer moment that do not ſo immediately affect the treaſure, there may be a great variety of ſentiments, and of practice accordingly.

It was ſo in the Apoſtle's times, one believes he may eat all things, another who is weak eats herbs; one eſteems one day above another, another eſteems every day alike; Rom. xiv. 2--5. both cannot be in the right; yet the Apoſtle interpoſeth not his Apoſtolical authority in the matter, to determine it either one way or other; but rather chuſeth to give a rule, which would be of laſting uſe to the Church, in all differences of that kind, when Apoſtolical authority ſhould ceaſe: And that is, each to practiſe according to their ſentiment, with true devotion to God, giving him thanks, and with true charity towards their brethren, not impoſing upon them their own ſentiments, no nor ſo much as judging and cenſuring theirs, or judging and deſpiſing them for practiſing according to them; that both ſides may reſerve their zeal for the weightier matters of the law and Goſpel, faith in Chriſt, and holineſs of heart and life.

Sixthly, They are all what God the Great Potter makes them; for if they are earthen veſſels, they are in his hand, as the clay in the hand of the potter, Jer. xviii. 6. who has a ſovereign power over them, and it is not to be asked, Why hath he made them thus? The wiſe God knows what he deſigns men for, and what uſe he will make of them, and faſhioneth their hearts accordingly: Before I formed thee in the belly, ſaith God to the Prophet, I knew thee, and knew what ſervice I would employ thee in, and formed thee accordingly, fitted thee to be a weeping Prophet in calamitous times; Jer. i. 5. As God intruſts talents with his ſervants according to the ability he has given them; Matt. xxv. 15. ſo he gives them ability, according to the talents he deſigns to entruſt them with.

Seventhly, They are all veſſels of uſe and ſervice in the family, tho' they are but earthen ones. The Apoſtle obſerves, that in a great houſe, there are not only veſſels of gold and ſilver, (the Angels that are God's miniſters in the upper world, and employed in this, are veſſels of gold and ſilver, veſſels of honour) but there are alſo veſſels of wood and earth, which are comparatively veſſels of diſhonour; 2 Tim. ii. 20. If the feet ſhall ſay, becauſe I am not the hand, or the ear ſhall ſay, becauſe I am not the eye, I am not of the body, Is it therefore not of the body? 1 Cor. xii. 15, 16. God knows how to make uſe even of earthen veſſels, how to make them truly beautiful and valuable, by putting a treaſure into them, which may be and muſt be received from them, and uſe made of it.

Eighthly, They are oftentimes deſpiſed and trampled upon by men, notwithſtanding the honour God has put upon them, and are thrown by as deſpiſed broken veſſels, and veſſels in which is no pleaſure. So this ſimilitude of the earthen veſſels is explained here, in the following verſes, 8, 9, 10. where the Apoſtle ſhews, that he called himſelf and his Fellow-Apoſtles earthen veſſels, becauſe they were troubled on every ſide, perplexed, perſecuted, and caſt down; and becauſe they paſſed by ſo much diſhonour and evil report, as deceivers and unknown, though they were true and well known, ch. vi. 8, 9.

It has often been the lot of ſome of the moſt faithful, uſeful Miniſters of Chriſt, to be loaded with reproach and calumny, to be exceedingly filled with the ſcorning of them that are at caſe, and the contempt of the proud, and to have all manner of evil ſaid againſt them falſly, Pſal. cxxiii. 4 Thus the precious ſons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, and every way preferable, have been eſteemed as earthen pitchers, the work of the hands of the potter, Lam. iv. 2. Iſa. xlix. 7. Our Lord Jeſus himſelf was one whom men deſpiſed, whom the nation abhorred, and the diſciple is not better than his Lord; and Satan finds his account in it, for, by caſting dirt upon the earthen veſſels, he prejudiceth the minds of people againſt the treaſure that is put into them. But (as I remember, Archbiſhop Tillotſon ſomewhere expreſſeth it) it is no diſparagement to be laughed at, but to deſerve to be ſo; nor ought we to think the worſe of the food at Chriſt's table, becauſe it is not ſerved up in plate, but in earthen veſſels.

Laſtly, They are frail and mortal, and dying, and upon that account they are earthen veſſels. Thus the Apoſtle explains it here, at ver. 11. We which live are always delivered unto death; they are dying daily, 1 Cor. xv. 31. and yet this is ſo far from being any allay to the rejoicing, which they have in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord, that the Apoſtle proteſts the truth of it by that rejoicing, as a thing of unſhaken certainty. Theſe earthen veſſels are ſoon broke, and return to their earth. They muſt needs die, and are as water ſpilt upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up again, but bleſſed be God, the treaſure in them is not ſo. The word of the Lord abides, but the Prophets do not live for ever, Zech. i. 5.

They are worn out with their labours, and as they ſpend, they are ſpent in the ſervice of Chriſt and ſouls, 2 Cor. xii. 15. They are ſubject to the ſame decays of nature, the ſame diſtempers of body and mind, the ſame accidents, and the ſame infirmities of age as others; they are ciſterns at the beſt, and will ſhortly be broken ciſterns; flowers at the beſt, and will ſhortly be withered flowers. I have ſaid, ye are gods, but ye ſhall die like men, for ye are earthen veſſels. Therefore,

Thirdly, God has put the treaſure of the Goſpel into earthen veſſels, that the Divine Power which goes along with the Goſpel, may be ſo much the more glorified. The great deſign of the everlaſting Goſpel is to bring men to fear God, and give glory to him; and that he may be the more glorified, thoſe are employed in propagating it that were leaſt likely for ſuch a purpoſe, that his ſtrength may be manifeſted in the weakneſs of the inſtruments. He ordains ſtrength out of the mouth of babes and ſucklings, that thereby he may perfect praiſe; as if this were the perfection of the Divine Praiſe, not only to help the weak but to employ the weak. And he chuſeth to make uſe of ſuch, to confound the wiſdom of this world, and that he that glories, may glory in the Lord, and give glory to him, 1 Cor. i. 31.

There was an excellency of power going along with the Apoſtles, which appeared to be of God, and not of themſelves.

1. To ſtrengthen them for the work they were employed in; to preach down Judaiſm and Paganiſm, and to preach up the kingdom of a crucified Jeſus, was a ſervice that required a far greater ſtrength, both of judgment and reſolution than the Apoſtles had of themſelves, ſo that if they had not been full of power by the Spirit of the Lord of Hoſts, Mic. iii. 8. they could never have ſpoken as they did with that wiſdom, which all their adverſaries were not able to gain-ſay or reſiſt; could never have made ſuch vigorous attacks upon the Devil's kingdom, nor have gathered in ſuch a large harveſt of ſouls to Jeſus Chriſt. They were in labours more abundant, and yet like their maſter, did not fail nor were diſcouraged, for though they knew and owned that they were not ſufficient of themſelves for ſuch a ſervice, 2 Cor. iii. 5. yet they found their ſufficiency was of God, and they could do all things thro' Chriſt ſtrengthning them, Phil. iv. 13.

2. To ſupport them under the hardſhips that were put upon them. Therefore God choſe the ſervice of ſuch men as were deſpiſed and run upon, that he might magnify his own power in keeping the Spirit he had made, and made fit for his own uſe, from failing before him. One would wonder, how the Apoſtles kept up their ſpirits, it was not by any power of their own, but underneath them were the everlaſting arms; and when they were preſſed out of meaſure above ſtrength, ſo that they deſpaired of life, yet they did not faint, being born up by the power of a God that raiſeth the dead, 2 Cor. i. 8, 9. Then it was, that Chriſt's ſtrength was made perfect in Paul's weakneſs, Acts xx. 24. when he was enabled not only to bear reproaches, and perſecutions, and afflictions for Chriſt, and to ſay none of theſe things move me, but to rejoice that he was counted worthy to ſuffer ſhame for Chriſt; to glory in theſe tribulations, and even to take pleaſure in them, 2 Cor. xii. 9, 10. Let it never be ſaid, it was by any power of their own, that the Apoſtles were enabled to bear ſhame ſo boldly, and ſorrow ſo chearfully, and to die daily, and yet live pleaſantly; no, it was according to Chriſt's glorious power, and by his might that they were thus ſtrengthned unto all patience and long-ſuffering with joyfulneſs, Col. i. 11.

3. To give them ſucceſs in that great work to which they were called. The world was to be enlightned with the lamps, and enriched with the treaſure that was lodged in theſe earthen veſſels: By their agency the kingdom of the Redeemer was to be ſet up upon the ruins of the Devil's kingdom, the ſtream of the world was to be turned, the ſea muſt be made to fly, and Jordan muſt be driven back; this work ſhall be done; and therefore ſuch earthen veſſels ſhall be made uſe of in the doing of it, that it may appear, that the victorious power that doth it, is not that of the Apoſtles, but that it is a Divine Power; it is not what they have wrought, but what God has wrought by them to make the Gentiles obedient; it is mighty through God to the caſting down of imaginations, and the captivating of high thoughts. The Goſpel of Chriſt is the power of God to ſalvation, and in that as in his chariot the exalted Redeemer goes forth conquering and to conquer; ſee Rom. xv. 18. 2 Cor. x. 4, 5. Rom. i. 16. Rev vi. 2.

CHAP. V.

1 That in his aſſured hope of immortal glory, 9 and in expectance of it, and of the general judgment, he laboureth to keep a good conſcience, 12 not that he may herein boaſt of himſelf, 14 but as one that having received life from Chriſt, endeavoureth to live as a new creature to Chriſt only, 18 and by his miniſtry of reconciliation to reconcile others alſo in Chriſt to God.

FOR we know, that if our earthly houſe of this tabernacle were diſſolved, we have a building of God, an houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

2 For in this we grone earneſtly, deſiring to be clothed upon with our houſe which is from heaven:

3 If ſo be that being clothed, we ſhall not be found naked.

4 For we that are in this tabernacle do grone, being burdened: not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be ſwallowed up of life.

5 Now he that hath wrought us for the ſelf-ſame thing, is God, who alſo hath given unto us the earneſt of the Spirit.

6 Therefore we are always confident, knowing that whilſt we are at home in the body, we are abſent from the Lord:

7 (For we walk by faith, not by ſight)

8 We are confident, I ſay, and willing rather to be abſent from the body, and to be preſent with the Lord.

9 Wherefore we labour, that whether preſent or abſent we may be accepted of him.

10 For we muſt all appear before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.

11 Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we perſwade men; but we are made manifeſt unto God, and I truſt alſo, are made manifeſt in your conſciences.

12 For we commend not our ſelves again unto you, but give you occaſion to glory on our behalf, that you may have ſomewhat to anſwer them which glory in appearance, and not in heart.

13 For whether we be beſides our ſelves, it is to God: or whether we be ſober, it is for your cauſe.

14 For the love of Chriſt conſtraineth us, becauſe we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead:

15 And that he died for all, that they which live, ſhould not henceforth live unto themſelves, but unto him which died for them, and roſe again.

16 Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the fleſh: yea, though we have known Chriſt after the fleſh, yet now henceforth know we him no more.

17 Therefore if any man be in Chriſt, he is a new creature: old things are paſt away, behold, all things are become new.

18 And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himſelf by Jeſus Chriſt, and hath given to us the miniſtry of reconciliation.

19 To wit, that God was in Chriſt, reconciling the world unto himſelf, not imputing their treſpaſſes unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation.

20 Now then we are ambaſſadors for Chriſt, as though God did beſeech you by us: we pray you in Chriſts ſtead, be ye reconciled to God.

21 For he hath made him to be ſin for us, who knew no ſin; that we might be made the righteouſneſs of God in him.

The Apoſtle having ſhewn in the latter part of the former chapter, that the proſpect of eternal things kept him from fainting under all the croſſes and calamities of this preſent life; here in this chapter he gives the reaſon thereof.

Ver. 1. — Our earthly houſe.] See Job iv. 10.

Ver. 7. We walk not by faith, and not by ſight.] Becauſe faith is the ſubſtance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not ſeen; ſuch as our eternal ſtate in the next world; ſee Rom. viii. 23, 24. 1 Cor. xiii. 12. Heb. xi. 1.

Ver. 9. We labour.] Or, endeavour earneſtly.

——— Whether preſent.] Confined in the body, in this world.

——— Abſent.] Already ſeparated by death from the body.

Ver. 11. Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we perſwade men.] The Apoſtle in this, and in the former chapter, we have obſerved, profeſſeth his Chriſtian integrity with the conſtancy thereof, and that upon a double motive, viz. The expectancy of immortal glory, and the general judgment. Of the former he ſpeaks in the cloſe of the laſt chapter, and in the beginning of this; and as this motive was before his eyes, ſo was that of judgment to come alſo, ver. 10. For we muſt all appear before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad. Which laſt motive, or argument, he lays down by way of poſition or doctrine, and in the words of the text draws his inference from it by way of application to others. For when he ſays,

Knowing.] He means that being well aſſured of the certainty of judgment to come, which he calls the terror of the Lord, being the cauſe of terror, he and the reſt of the Apoſtles and miniſters of Chriſt do perſwade men, i.e. preſs and excite and ſtir up and exhort them to their Chriſtian duties, to Goſpel-piety and obedience. Where it will be neceſſary to obſerve, That

No leſs motive than this, viz. the infallible certainty, and ſeverity and dreadfulneſs of the future judgment, could put the Apoſtles and miniſters of Chriſt, upon the ſo earneſt preſſing and perſwading men to Goſpel-piety and obedience. For,

Can it be ſuppoſed, that they could be prevailed with to tell the world of a terror, that they thought they ſhould never feel, and themſelves did not believe; and thereupon to preſs Goſpel-piety and obedience, and that only as an engine of ſtate-policy, to keep men in awe, and obedience to their governors, and preſerve civil peace, as ſome prophane men would have it? If ſo, why then were they not more in eſteem with rulers and princes, with the great and noble? Why were they the mark of their malice and envy, of their rage and fury, if they were hired as their politick ſervants, and did them ſuch great and acceptable ſervice? Again,

2. Was it honour they had in their eye? Why then were they the object of the world's contempt and ſcorn, ſcoffed at, and derided, having tryal of cruel mockings, reviled, defamed, and accounted the filth of the world, and the off-ſcouring of all things? 1 Cor. iv. 13.

3. Was it profit that was the motive? Surely no: For then our Saviour, and his Apoſtles, and miniſters would have had a greater intereſt in the world; then they would have had full cheſts and barns to boaſt of, as well as others. But it is notorious, how great a degree of poverty did await them: Chriſt himſelf not having a houſe wherein to put his head, no lands or revenues to give him the title of rich or great. And his Apoſtles following him, left their gainful trades, and were not much richer than their maſter. Yea, may it not be truly obſerved to this day, that the employment of a miniſter is none of thoſe direct courſes to wealth and riches? Whereas other arts and employments can raiſe an eſtate, and advance a family, they who wait at the altar, with their dependants, for the moſt part live in meaner circumſtances. (Not but that God has a bleſſing for the poſterity and ſons of the clergy, as well as others; many of them arriving to eminent degrees of greatneſs and wealth in the world; but then that owes it ſelf not always ſo immediately to their fathers encouragement and eſtate in the world, but to their own, through God's bleſſing upon thoſe employments and gainful trades wherein they were educated)

None of theſe things then could be motives to the Apoſtles and miniſters of Chriſt to ſet on this buſineſs: What motives then could prevail? Would they be ſo mad and indiſcreet to preſs Goſpel-piety upon the ſuppoſition of a terror that they ſhould never hear of, or feel, and which themſelves did not believe, and not hope to be advantaged by it, either here or hereafter? What encouragement were this, nay what madneſs rather, to preſs an idle and unprofitable virtue, an uncommanded obedience, with deſign only to terrify and affright the world, and in the mean time expoſe themſelves to diſgrace, and ſhame, and contempt, and reproach, and hatred, and perſecution? With what courage or comfort could they hold out to preſs this impertinent, unprofitable buſineſs, and that with ſo much ſweat and labour, weakning their bodies, and waſting their ſpirits, endangering their lives and livelihood? If there were no other motive but this, how ſoon would they have hung the wing? How ſoon would the tongue have faltered, and been ſilent, and the ſpirits faint, and the hands and feet have been weary.

'Tis then certainly no leſs, no more inferior motive, than the certain knowledge of the terror of the Lord, that put them with ſuch earneſtneſs upon this great buſineſs.

'Twas this brought Chriſt from Heaven; Knowing the terror of the Lord, he came down to perſwade men; knowing, I ſay, the terror of the Lord, the diſpleaſure of the great God againſt ſin and ſinners, and the certainty of Divine Vengeance and everlaſting wrath, knowing this, he came into the world to perſuade men. This made him with ſo much zeal and earneſtneſs to ſet upon this buſineſs, to perſuade men; and that both by his doctrine and miracles, his life and dis death, by his bitter paſſion and ſufferings, his tears and blood, his reſurrection and aſcenſion, and miſſion of the Holy Ghoſt; and ſtill continues to perſuade them by his miniſters and ambaſſadors, whom he commiſſions and commands to perſuade, and entreat, and beſeech, by all the endearments and compellations of love, to flee from the wrath to come, to be reconciled to God, to embrace and improve the means of grace and ſalvation: Which hath tranſported their ſpirits with zeal and courage, counting nothing dear, but God's glory and mens ſouls; counting, I ſay, nothing dear, neither health, nor ſtrength, nor reputation, nor honour, nor livelihood, nor their deareſt blood, which they were content ſhould melt away in the flames, and be expoſed to the hands of violence, rather than ceaſe to perſuade men, knowing the terror of the Lord.

And this, by the way, may ſerve as an apology for miniſters. When you hear them boldly and ſeverely rebuking vice, and reproving ſin and ſinners, laying open the horrid and abominable nature, and ſad effects and conſequents of ſin, and ſo paſſionately and earneſtly perſuading men to repentance, to the practice of virtue and holineſs, and that from the conſideration of rewards and puniſhments to be diſpenſed in the other world, and thoſe dreſſed up in the different habit of recommending, or aſtoniſhing, and affrighting circumſtances, proper to each diſtant ſtate: When you hear this, do not cenſure it as a common lecture of terror to awe and affright children, and the weaker ſort, who are eaſily impoſed upon; as words of courſe, and ſo not much to be regarded; as a trial of skill, and a caſt of their office; much leſs as a deſign out of malice and hatred to any perſons to expoſe and abuſe them; which will provoke you to be angry, to ſtorm and rage at the word, and the preacher of it. No, but rather look upon it and receive it, as words ſpoken in the deepeſt ſeriouſneſs, and out of true compaſſion and charity to ſouls.

Alas! were not ſin ſo dangerous and hurtful to men, were there no future account to give at the tremendous audit, were there no ſuch flaming wrath and fiery vengeance as you hear of from the pulpit, were there no future rewards for good, and no puniſhments for bad men, miniſters would never trouble men with ſuch diſcourſes: For they come upon an unwelcome meſſage to many, to raviſh their dalilahs out of their arms, (which may turn their ſtomachs, and make them rage, as Herod did at John the Baptiſt) to take them off from that which they ſo dearly love, which 'tis ſo hard to part with, as to part with a dear member, with a right eye, or a right hand; and therefore ſin is compared to the members of the body: Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth: fornication, &c. Col. iii. 5.

And no wonder now that the ſinner ſtorms and grows angry; but we muſt not value that. The chirurgeon would be unfaithful, if he ſhould be loth, or forbear to put his patient to grief when he ſees his danger? No, he will cut and lance and ſearch the wound, or ſore to the bottom, though he put his patient to pain, though he cry and lament ſore, and grow angry; he will not ſpare a dear member, if a gangrene calls for amputation. The phyſician will deal plainly with his patient, and tell him the nature of his diſeaſe, and his danger, and will make him ſick with bitter pills, and loathſome potions, in order to his cure. The lawyer will deal faithfully with his client, and critically examine, and ſearch into every creek and corner of his evidences, and tell him the worſt, and not flatter him, if he finds any thing defective, that he may conſult a remedy.

Now, the work of the miniſtry is much like the work of theſe; like the Surgeon's, to cut and lance with the ſword of the Spirit, and the knife of mortification, and to ſearch the ſinners wounds and ulcerous ſores to the bottom; yea, and to amputate and diſmember too. Like the phyſicians, to tell men of their ſickneſs, and their danger, and doſe them with bitter pills, and loathſome potions: For miniſters are phyſicians in ordinary to the King of Kings, and the world is his great hoſpital, where do lie abundance of impotent folk, of blind, and lame, and ſick, and diſeaſed; they are bound ex officio to look after them, and muſt deal faithfully, and in ſuch methods as the nature of the diſeaſe requires. Like the lawyers, to ſearch and examine our peoples evidences for the heavenly inheritance; yea, like ambaſſadors, we muſt deliver our meſſage, whether of peace or war. And would you have us flatter and deceive?

We ought, therefore, to put a candid conſtruction on the ſevereſt lectures from the pulpit; to take the ſharpeſt reproofs, the moſt bitter invectives againſt ſin, the moſt earneſt and paſſionate adjurations, as inſtances of compaſſion and love to ſouls, and faithfulneſs to him that ſent the miniſter. Believe it, it is the ſin we hate, while we reprove, but yet love the ſinner. And though ſome perhaps may preach Chriſt out of envy (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, Phil. i. 15.) and others for the ſake of the bag, with Judas; yet, I doubt not, there are many, who have higher ends and aims, viz. God's glory, and the ſalvation of ſouls, who can truly ſay with the Apoſtle here, Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we perſwade men.

I will ſhut up this with that wholſome advice of James and Peter concerning hearing and receiving of the word preached, Jam. i. 19, 20, 21. Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be ſwift to hear, ſlow to ſpeak, ſlow to wrath: for the wrath of man worketh not the righteouſneſs of God. Wherefore lay apart all filthineſs, and ſuperfluity of naughtineſs, and receive with meekneſs the ingrafted word, which is able to ſave your ſouls. To which let me add that of Peter, 1 Pet. ii. 1, 2. Wherefore laying aſide all malice, and all guile, and hypocriſies, and envies, and evil ſpeakings; as new-born babes deſire the ſincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby.

But here may ſome ſay, if all this is true, that there is a future ſtate, a day of judgment coming, ſuch a terror of the Lord to be revealed hereafter, miniſters do well to be ſo earneſtly and paſſionately concerned for the ſouls of men, to cry aloud and ſpare not, to tell them of their ſins, and warn them to flee from the wrath to come: But are you ſure you are not under a miſtake, that you do not err in the foundation? Are you ſure there is ſuch a future judgment as you ſpeak of? What evidence or aſſurance have you of the certainty of it?

This I ſhall anſwer, by ſhewing you

The infallible certainty of the future judgment. Now, the certainty of a future judgment after death is declared and evidenced to the world by a three-fold voice, The voice of Scripture, the voice of Conſcience, and the voice of God's Juſtice.

Firſt, The voice of Scripture. The Jews had a confident tradition amongſt them, that bleſſed Enoch, who was tranſlated to Heaven, had left two pillars, as ſacred to poſterity, wherein were fairly engraven thoſe two great Prophecies, one of the firſt deſolation of, and judgment upon the world by water; not many years before which came, God removed him, as a Jewel, to an heavenly cabinet, that his eyes might not ſee it. The ſecond Prophecy in a pillar of ſtone, of the diſſolution of the world by fire againſt the final judgment. The latter Prophecy, concerning the final Judgment, is warranted by Scripture, Jude xiv. 15. And Enoch alſo, the ſeventh from Adam, propheſied of theſe, ſaying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thouſands of his Saints, to execute vengeance upon all, and of 9 Wherefore we labour, that whether preſent or abſent we may be accepted of him.

10 For we muſt all appear before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.

11 Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we perſwade men; but we are made manifeſt unto God, and I truſt alſo, are made manifeſt in your conſciences.

12 For we commend not our ſelves again unto you, but give you occaſion to glory on our behalf, that you may have ſomewhat to anſwer them which glory in appearance, and not in heart.

13 For whether we be beſides our ſelves, it is to God: or whether we be ſober, it is for your cauſe.

14 For the love of Chriſt conſtraineth us, becauſe we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead:

15 And that he died for all, that they which live, ſhould not henceforth live unto themſelves, but unto him which died for them, and roſe again.

16 Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the fleſh: yea, though we have known Chriſt after the fleſh, yet now henceforth know we him no more.

17 Therefore if any man be in Chriſt, he is a new creature: old things are paſt away, behold, all things are become new.

18 And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himſelf by Jeſus Chriſt, and hath given to us the miniſtry of reconciliation.

19 To wit, that God was in Chriſt, reconciling the world unto himſelf, not imputing their treſpaſſes unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation.

20 Now then we are ambaſſadors for Chriſt, as though God did beſeech you by us: we pray you in Chriſts ſtead, be ye reconciled to God.

21 For he hath made him to be ſin for us, who knew no ſin; that we might be made the righteouſneſs of God in him.

The Apoſtle having ſhewn in the latter part of the former chapter, that the proſpect of eternal things kept him from fainting under all the croſſes and calamities of this preſent life; here in this chapter he gives the reaſon thereof.

Ver. 1. — Our earthly houſe.] See Job iv. 10.

Ver. 7. We walk not by faith, and not by ſight.] Becauſe faith is the ſubſtance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not ſeen; ſuch as our eternal ſtate in the next world; ſee Rom. viii. 23, 24. 1 Cor. xiii. 12. Heb. xi. 1.

Ver. 9. We labour.] Or, endeavour earneſtly.

——— Whether preſent.] Confined in the body, in this world.

——— Abſent.] Already ſeparated by death from the body.

Ver. 11. Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we perſwade men.] The Apoſtle in this, and in the former chapter, we have obſerved, profeſſeth his Chriſtian integrity with the conſtancy thereof, and that upon a double motive, viz. The expectancy of immortal glory, and the general judgment. Of the former he ſpeaks in the cloſe of the laſt chapter, and in the beginning of this; and as this motive was before his eyes, ſo was that of judgment to come alſo, ver. 10. For we muſt all appear before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad. Which laſt motive, or argument, he lays down by way of poſition or doctrine, and in the words of the text draws his inference from it by way of application to others. For when he ſays,

Knowing.] He means that being well aſſured of the certainty of judgment to come, which he calls the terror of the Lord, being the cauſe of terror, he and the reſt of the Apoſtles and miniſters of Chriſt do perſwade men, i.e. preſs and excite and ſtir up and exhort them to their Chriſtian duties, to Goſpel-piety and obedience. Where it will be neceſſary to obſerve, That

No leſs motive than this, viz. the infallible certainty, and ſeverity and dreadfulneſs of the future judgment, could put the Apoſtles and miniſters of Chriſt, upon the ſo earneſt preſſing and perſwading men to Goſpel-piety and obedience. For,

Can it be ſuppoſed, that they could be prevailed with to tell the world of a terror, that they thought they ſhould never feel, and themſelves did not believe; and thereupon to preſs Goſpel-piety and obedience, and that only as an engine of ſtate-policy, to keep men in awe, and obedience to their governors, and preſerve civil peace, as ſome prophane men would have it? If ſo, why then were they not more in eſteem with rulers and princes, with the great and noble? Why were they the mark of their malice and envy, of their rage and fury, if they were hired as their politick ſervants, and did them ſuch great and acceptable ſervice? Again,

2. Was it honour they had in their eye? Why then were they the object of the world's contempt and ſcorn, ſcoffed at, and derided, having tryal of cruel mockings, reviled, defamed, and accounted the filth of the world, and the off-ſcouring of all things? 1 Cor. iv. 13.

3. Was it profit that was the motive? Surely no: For then our Saviour, and his Apoſtles, and miniſters would have had a greater intereſt in the world; then they would have had full cheſts and barns to boaſt of, as well as others. But it is notorious, how great a degree of poverty did await them: Chriſt himſelf not having a houſe wherein to put his head, no lands or revenues to give him the title of rich or great. And his Apoſtles following him, left their gainful trades, and were not much richer than their maſter. Yea, may it not be truly obſerved to this day, that the employment of a miniſter is none of thoſe direct courſes to wealth and riches? Whereas other arts and employments can raiſe an eſtate, and advance a family, they who wait at the altar, with their dependants, for the moſt part live in meaner circumſtances. (Not but that God has a bleſſing for the poſterity and ſons of the clergy, as well as others; many of them arriving to eminent degrees of greatneſs and wealth in the world; but then that owes it ſelf not always ſo immediately to their fathers encouragement and eſtate in the world, but to their own, through God's bleſſing upon thoſe employments and gainful trades wherein they were educated.)

None of theſe things then could be motives to the Apoſtles and miniſters of Chriſt to ſet on this buſineſs: What motives then could prevail? Would they be ſo mad and indiſcreet to preſs Goſpel-piety upon the ſuppoſition of a terror that they ſhould never hear of, or feel, and which themſelves did not believe, and not hope to be advantaged by it, either here or hereafter? What encouragement were this, nay what madneſs rather, to preſs an idle and unprofitable virtue, an uncommanded obedience, with deſign only to terrify and affright the world, and in the mean time expoſe themſelves to diſgrace, and ſhame, and contempt, and reproach, and hatred, and perſecution? With what courage or comfort could they hold out to preſs this impertinent, unprofitable buſineſs, and that with ſo much ſweat and labour, weakning their bodies, and waſting their ſpirits, endangering their lives and livelihood? If there were no other motive but this, how ſoon would they have hung the wing? How ſoon would the tongue have faltered, and been ſilent, and the ſpirits faint, and the hands and feet have been weary?

'Tis then certainly no leſs, no more inferior motive, than the certain knowledge of the terror of the Lord, that put them with ſuch earneſtneſs upon this great buſineſs.

'Twas this brought Chriſt from Heaven; Knowing the terror of the Lord, he came down to perſwade men; knowing, I ſay, the terror of the Lord, the diſpleaſure of the great God againſt ſin and ſinners, and the certainty of Divine Vengeance and everlaſting wrath, knowing this, he came into the world to perſuade men. This made him with ſo much zeal and earneſtneſs to ſet upon this buſineſs, to perſuade men; and that both by his doctrine and miracles, his life and his death, by his bitter paſſion and ſufferings, his tears and blood, his reſurrection and aſcenſion, and miſſion of the Holy Ghoſt; and ſtill continues to perſuade them by his miniſters and ambaſſadors, whom he commiſſions and commands to perſuade, and entreat, and beſeech, by all the endearments and compellations of love, to flee from the wrath to come, to be reconciled to God, to embrace and improve the means of grace and ſalvation: Which hath tranſported their ſpirits with zeal and courage, counting nothing dear, but God's glory and mens ſouls; counting, I ſay, nothing dear, neither health, nor ſtrength, nor reputation, nor honour, nor livelihood, nor their deareſt blood, which they were content ſhould melt away in the flames, and be expoſed to the hands of violence, rather than ceaſe to perſuade men, knowing the terror of the Lord.

And this, by the way, may ſerve as an apology for miniſters. When you hear them boldly and ſeverely rebuking vice, and reproving ſin and ſinners, laying open the horrid and abominable nature, and ſad effects and conſequents of ſin, and ſo paſſionately and earneſtly perſuading men to repentance, to the practice of virtue and holineſs, and that from the conſideration of rewards and puniſhments to be diſpenſed in the other world, and thoſe dreſſed up in the different habit of recommending, or aſtoniſhing, and affrighting circumſtances, proper to each diſtant ſtate: When you hear this, do not cenſure it as a common lecture of terror to awe and affright children, and the weaker ſort, who are eaſily impoſed upon; as words of courſe, and ſo not much to be regarded; as a trial of ſkill, and a caſt of their office; much leſs as a deſign out of malice and hatred to any perſons to expoſe and abuſe them; which will provoke you to be angry, to ſtorm and rage at the word, and the preacher of it. No, but rather look upon it and receive it, as words ſpoken in the deepeſt ſeriousneſs, and out of true compaſſion and charity to ſouls.

Alas! were not ſin ſo dangerous and hurtful to men, were there no future account to give at the tremendous audit, were there no ſuch flaming wrath and fiery vengeance as you hear of from the pulpit, were there no future rewards for good, and no puniſhments for bad men, miniſters would never trouble men with ſuch diſcourſes: For they come upon an unwelcome meſſage to many, to raviſh their dalilahs out of their arms, (which may turn their ſtomachs, and make them rage, as Herod did at John the Baptiſt) to take them off from that which they ſo dearly love, which 'tis ſo hard to part with, as to part with a dear member, with a right eye, or a right hand; and therefore ſin is compared to the members of the body: Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth: fornication, &c. Col. iii. 5.

And no wonder now that the ſinner ſtorms and grows angry; but we muſt not value that. The chirurgeon would be unfaithful, if he ſhould be loth, or forbear to put his patient to grief when he ſees his danger? No, he will cut and lance and ſearch the wound, or ſore to the bottom, though he put his patient to pain, though he cry and lament ſore, and grow angry; he will not ſpare a dear member, if a gangrene calls for amputation. The phyſician will deal plainly with his patient, and tell him the nature of his diſeaſe, and his danger, and will make him ſick with bitter pills, and loathſome potions, in order to his cure. The lawyer will deal faithfully with his client, and critically examine, and ſearch into every creek and corner of his evidences, and tell him the worſt, and not flatter him, if he finds any thing defective, that he may conſult a remedy.

Now, the work of the miniſtry is much like the work of theſe; like the Surgeon's, to cut and lance with the ſword of the Spirit, and the knife of mortification, and to ſearch the ſinners wounds and ulcerous ſores to the bottom; yea, and to amputate and diſmember too. Like the phyſicians, to tell men of their ſickneſs, and their danger, and doſe them with bitter pills, and loathſome potions: For miniſters are phyſicians in ordinary to the King of Kings, and the world is his great hoſpital, where do lie abundance of impotent folk, of blind, and lame, and ſick, and diſeaſed; they are bound ex officio to look after them, and muſt deal faithfully, and in ſuch methods as the nature of the diſeaſe requires. Like the lawyers, to ſearch and examine our peoples evidences for the heavenly inheritance; yea, like ambaſſadors, we muſt deliver our meſſage, whether of peace or war. And would you have us flatter and deceive?

We ought, therefore, to put a candid conſtruction on the ſevereſt lectures from the pulpit; to take the ſharpeſt reproofs, the moſt bitter invectives againſt ſin, the moſt earneſt and paſſionate adjurations, as inſtances of compaſſion and love to ſouls, and faithfulneſs to him that ſent the miniſter. Believe it, it is the ſin we hate, while we reprove, but yet love the ſinner. And though ſome perhaps may preach Chriſt out of envy (as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, Phil. i. 15.) and others for the ſake of the bag, with Judas; yet, I doubt not, there are many, who have higher ends and aims, viz. God's glory, and the ſalvation of ſouls, who can truly ſay with the Apoſtle here, Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we perſwade men.

I will ſhut up this with that wholſome advice of James and Peter concerning hearing and receiving of the word preached, Jam. i. 19, 20, 21. Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be ſwift to hear, ſlow to ſpeak, ſlow to wrath: for the wrath of man worketh not the righteouſneſs of God. Wherefore lay apart all filthineſs, and ſuperfluity of naughtineſs, and receive with meekneſs the ingrafted word, which is able to ſave your ſouls. To which let me add that of Peter, 1 Pet. ii. 1, 2. Wherefore laying aſide all malice, and all guile, and hypocriſies, and envies, and evil ſpeakings; as new-born babes deſire the ſincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby.

But here may ſome ſay, if all this is true, that there is a future ſtate, a day of judgment coming, ſuch a terror of the Lord to be revealed hereafter, miniſters do well to be ſo earneſtly and paſſionately concerned for the ſouls of men, to cry aloud and ſpare not, to tell them of their ſins, and warn them to flee from the wrath to come: But are you ſure you are not under a miſtake, that you do not err in the foundation? Are you ſure there is ſuch a future judgment as you ſpeak of? What evidence or aſſurance have you of the certainty of it?

This I ſhall anſwer, by ſhewing you

The infallible certainty of the future judgment. Now, the certainty of a future judgment after death is declared and evidenced to the world by a three-fold voice, The voice of Scripture, the voice of Conſcience, and the voice of God's Juſtice.

Firſt, The voice of Scripture. The Jews had a confident tradition amongſt them, that bleſſed Enoch, who was tranſlated to Heaven, had left two pillars, as ſacred to poſterity, wherein were fairly engraven thoſe two great Prophecies, one of the firſt deſolation of, and judgment upon the world by water; not many years before which came, God removed him, as a Jewel, to an heavenly cabinet, that his eyes might not ſee it. The ſecond Prophecy in a pillar of ſtone, of the diſſolution of the world by fire againſt the final judgment. The latter Prophecy, concerning the final Judgment, is warranted by Scripture, Jude xiv. 15. And Enoch alſo, the ſeventh from Adam, propheſied of theſe, ſaying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thouſands of his Saints, to execute vengeance upon all, and of convince all that are ungodly among them, of all their ungodly deeds, which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard ſpeeches which ungodly ſinners have ſpoken againſt him.

There is nothing that the Holy Scripture is more plain and poſitive in, than aſſerting a Day of Judgment. Death and Judgment are the twin-ſiſters of the ſame womb of decree. It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after that the Judgment, Heb. ix. 27. The ſad certainty of Judgment cloſeth up that ironical expreſſion of the wiſe man, or rather a wiſer than he, in reproof of wanton youthful ſinners, Eccleſ. ix. 11. Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy hear: cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and in the ſight of thine eyes: But know thou, that for all theſe things God will bring thee into Judgment. Our Saviour does often very poſitively and expreſly mention a Day of Judgment, as we may ſee in all the four Evangeliſts. And the Apoſtles are often beating upon this argument. It were endleſs to enumerate particulars. So poſitive is the Scripture in this point, that it obſerves to us, that the very day is appointed, and the Judge named, Acts xvii. 31. He hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteouſneſs, by that man whom he hath ordained, whereof he hath given aſſurance unto all men, in that he hath raiſed him from the dead.

There are three days have an emphatical note ſet upon them, the Day of Creation, the Day of Redemption, and the Day of Judgment.

1. The Day of Creation, which opened the Door of time.

2. The Day of Redemption, which is called, The fulneſs of time, Gal. iv. 4.

3. The day of judgment. This ſhall ſhut out time, and uſher in eternity. And this day is emphatically called the day of the Lord, the day of Chriſt, and the great day, and the great and terrible day of the Lord, and the day of Vengeance, and the day of Redemption, and the day of refreſhing; 1 Theſſ. v. 2. Phil. ii. 16. Jude 6. Joel. ii. 31. Eph. iv. 30.

That is the firſt evidence of the certainty of the future judgment, the voice of Scripture. The ſecond is,

Secondly, The voice of conſcience; and that both natural and enlightned.

1. Natural conſcience, which is affrighted at the hearing of a judgment to come. Felix trembled at it, Acts xxiv. 25. And as he had reaſoned of righteouſneſs and temperance and judgment to come, Felix trembled. As Paul preached to him of righteouſneſs and temperance, his guilty conſcience reflected on all his paſt acts of injuſtice and intemperance; and when he heard of the grand audit, the dreadful judgment, at which he muſt account for all his faults, the mighty Felix trembled. It was too harſh a note, and jarring ſound, and unpleaſant muſick for his delicate ears and accuſing conſcience to hear, and therefore preſently diſmiſſed the preacher, Go, get thee gone, ſays he, for this time, and when I have a more convenient ſeaſon, I will call for thee.

Though the Athenians mocked when they heard of the reſurrection of the dead, yet not at the hearing of the day of judgment. The Heathen, by the very light of nature, had a ſenſe of Divine Wrath and Vengeance, which would purſue ſinners. Thus the barbarous people in the iſland of Melita, where Paul arrived after his ſhipwreck, when they ſaw the viper leap out of the fire, and faſten upon his hand, they ſaid among themſelves, No doubt this man is a murderer; whom, though he had eſcaped the ſea, yet vengeance ſuffereth not to live; Acts xxviii. 3, 4. Why, whence had they this notion of vengeance? Where had this barbarous people theſe notices? What Goſpel-preacher ever arrived there before, to preach to them this doctrine of the Divine Wrath and Vengeance? This preacher dwelt within them. It was the witneſs and light of God within them, which made diſcoveries of the heinous nature, and guilt of murder, and the vindicative juſtice of the inviſible powers, which, they believed, will call every man to an account for his moſt ſecret guilts. That is a famous inſtance of the Heathen mariners in Jon. i. The mariners there being affrighted at the terrible and unuſual tempeſt, (which God, for Jonah's ſake, ſent out into the ſea) reſolve among themſelves (ver. 7.) to caſt lots, that they might know for whoſe cauſe that evil was upon them: Which intimates, that they believed that the moſt ſecret faults were not unknown to the Omniſcient Being; and therefore reſolved to caſt lots, which they apprehended, did not fall fortuitouſly and by chance, but by Divine Direction, and the guidance of an inviſible hand. So Solomon obſerves; Prov. xvi. ult. The lot is caſt into the lap; but the whole diſpoſing thereof is of the Lord. And though the lot fell upon Jonah, who confeſt that he was a fugitive Prophet, and that for his ſake the ſea was tempeſtuous, and that the only expedient to aſſwage its raging, was to caſt him over-board, which he bid them do; Jon. i. 12. yet the men were afraid, being loth to contract the guilt of murder, knowing that it was a crying ſin, and that the voice of his blood would cry aloud, and plead againſt them, before the Inviſible Judge of the world; and therefore they tugged hard to get the ſhip to land, but all would not do, the ſea being more and more tempeſtuous; wherefore being forced to throw him over-board for their own ſafety, yet they did it with cries and prayers, and earneſt ſupplications to the Great God, deprecating the guilt of murder, and the cry of innocent blood, ver. 14. Wherefore they cried unto the Lord, and ſaid, We beſeech thee, O Lord, we beſeech thee, let us not periſh for this man's life, and lay not upon us innocent blood.

And if natural conſcience is ſo much affrighted at the thoughts, and hearing of judgment, how much more,

2. An enlightned one: A conſcience enlightned by the light of Scripture, which gives the trueſt meaſures of ſin, and Divine Wrath and Vengeance. The Chriſtian has the beſt and trueſt account of the nature of ſin, and the ſad conſequents of it, is ſuppoſed to know and underſtand it beſt. And ſo he does, and therefore is ſufficiently affrighted at its ghaſtly looks, when he is under an apprehenſion of a ſpeedy approach to judgment: Witneſs the cries and groans, the ſighs and lamentations of the ſick dying ſinner, whom you may hear, if you ſtep into his chamber, as he lies languiſhing upon his ſick bed, lamenting and curſing his wicked life, and bewailing his ſins with all the agrravating inſtances of abhorrence and deteſtation. Why, what is the matter? What ails the man? How comes it, that he is now ſo troubled at ſin, who never before feared it? Why, it is the witneſs of God within him, whoſe mouth was ſtopped before, that thus ſpeaks. His conſcience is awakened, and does laſh and ſting him with a ſenſe of guilt, and the fiery vengeance ſhews him what he has done, and whither he is going, that he is making his trembling approach before the Judgment-ſeat of Chriſt.

That is the ſecond evidence of the certainty of judgment, viz. the voice of conſcience; the third is,

Thirdly; The voice of God's Juſtice, which requires that there ſhould be a future judgment. They who will not be convinced by Scripture, may perhaps by this argument; The conſideration of God's Juſtice, together with the ſtate of affairs, and things in this life.

They who have any ſenſe of religion, and believe there is a God, muſt believe him to be juſt, that He is the Juſt and Righteous Governor of the world, a Lover of juſtice, and will adminiſter juſtice to his creatures. Now, in regard we are not capable of an immediate converſe with God, who is a ſpirit, and inviſible, he is pleaſed to converſe with us by men, by creatures like our ſelves, and does appoint ſome as his vice-gerents, his delegates and ſubſtitutes here on earth, to execute the laws of juſtice, and make an equal diſtribution of it, in giving rewards, and inflicting puniſhments, according to the nature and merit of the actions of men, and to render to every one his due.

Now it is notorious, that juſtice is not univerſally and impartially executed in this life. The virtuous are not always rewarded, nor the vicious puniſhed, according to the different nature of their actions. Of which I could give you various inſtances: As, wandred about in ſheep skins, and goat skins, being deſtitute, afflicted, tormented; of whom the world was not worthy? On the other ſide, their perſecutors fared well, though they did ſo ill; did not receive the recompence of their vices, and wickedneſs, and cruelties, and blaſphemies; had not their puniſhment in this life, lived in pleaſure, and died in peace, i. e. outward peace.

1. In the caſe of perſecution. Good men, that fear God, are many times perſecuted for the true religion, as the martyrs in the days of our Queen Mary I. and other Proteſtants in Chriſtendom. Theſe were good, and yet received evil; they had not the reward of their virtue here. What ſhould I ſpeak of that cloud of witneſſes, that noble army of martyrs mentioned in the 11th of the Hebrews, who had tryal of cruel mockings and ſcourgings, yea, moreover of bonds and impriſonment, were ſtoned, were ſawn aſunder, were tempted, were ſlain with the ſword;

And now where is the juſtice of God, in rewarding virtue, and puniſhing vice, if there is no future audit of theſe matters, if theſe things eternally ſleep thus, if the perſecuted ſhall never be rewarded, and their perſecutors never be puniſhed?

But God is juſt, and will ſee juſtice done, and impartially executed. So the Apoſtle tells the perſecuted Chriſtians, 2 Theſſ. i. 6, 7. It is a righteous thing with God to recompence tribulation to them that trouble you; and to you who are troubled reſt with us, when the Lord Jeſus ſhall be revealed from Heaven, with his mighty Angels. Again,

2. In the times of confuſion, and licentiouſneſs, and rebellion, when there is no king in Iſrael, then every one does what ſeems good in his own eyes; vice and wickedneſs walk bare-faced and uncontrouled; and the plundering thief, the bloody murderer, and traytor goes perhaps to his grave in peace, yea, with the pompous ſolemnities of of a royal funeral.

3. Yea, in times of peace, and the regular adminiſtration of juſtice, vice, though it dare not walk ſo impudently, bare-faced and uncontrouled, yet may lurk in corners, and skulk up and down in ſecret, and eſcape the magiſtrate's eye; the thief, the murderer, the traytor may be quick of foot, and ſwift of wing, and fly from juſtice, and may never be overtaken by it in this life.

Yea, even in courts of judicature, it is impoſſible that juſtice ſhould be univerſally and equally adminiſtred, (let none miſtake me, as if I deſigned to aſperſe, or reflect on our governors, and the reverend judges of the land, but I obſerve in general that) it is impoſſible, even in courts of judicature, and the beſt upon earth too, (where judgment runs down as waters, and righteouſneſs as a mighty ſtream, Amos v. 24.) that juſtice ſhould be always equally diſtributed. For, not to ſpeak of the corruption of the judge's heart, and the blinding of his eyes by bribes, (which turns judgment into gall, and the fruit of righteouſneſs into hemlock, chap. vi. 12.) which is not impoſſible, conſidering that he is but a man: I ſay, not to ſpeak of this, but ſuppoſing the judge to be as juſt as Job, (of whom God teſtifies, that there was none like him in the earth, a perfect and upright man, one that feared God, and eſchewed evil, Job ii. 3.) one whoſe eyes cannot be blinded with bribes, or prejudice, or partial favour, or malice; yet they may be blinded with untruth upon miſ-information. Some perjured villain may deſperately ſwear his neighbour out of his eſtate, or good name, or life. And the judge notwithſtanding is to proceed ſecundum allegata & probata, according to the evidence, whether true or falſe; for he ſees through the eyes of others; and ſo every one may not have juſtice done him. Sometimes the guilty eſcapes, and receives not the demerit of his crimes, is not dealt with according to the evil he hath done in his body. On the other ſide, the innocent may fall a ſacrifice to miſtaken juſtice, receive according to the ſuppoſed evil he hath not, and not according to the real good he hath done in his body; the judge the mean while remaining really and invincibly ignorant of the truth upon miſ-information; and yet may be ſaid to do juſtice; he does it intentionally and formally, though materially and by accident it proves otherwiſe. But that is reſerved to the ſcrutiny of the Supreme Judge, it falls under his cognizance, who ſearcheth the hearts, and tries the reins; who, as Solomon ſpeaks, will bring every work into judgment; with every ſecret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil, Eccleſ. xii. ult.

The certainty of which judgment is, methinks, ſufficiently evinced by the obſervation of theſe things; that juſtice is not, no nor cannot be univerſally and impartially adminiſtred in this life, that good men have not always the reward of their virtue, nor wicked men the recompence of their vice and wickedneſs: Therefore, God being juſt, and the God of juſtice, and the juſt governor of the world, who is concerned in the affairs of mortals, and ſits in the ſeats of judicature, and ſees and records all that is done in his book of remembrance, the great regiſter of human actions, there muſt neceſſarily come a day, when all things ſhall be audited, and examined, and tried before him, and all things ſet to rights, and a juſt judgment paſs upon all, and every one receive, as it is worded in the context, the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good, or bad. Therefore,

III. Let us now enquire into the ſeverity and dreadfulneſs of the judgment, ſtyled here, The terror of the Lord; it being the cauſe of terror, and that both to good and bad, and that both in this life, and that to come.

In this life, it is a terror even to good men, which keeps them in a holy awe, and cauſeth them to work with fear and trembling. They often look back towards the laſt things, and caſt an eye on the dreadful tribunal of Jeſus Chriſt; which keeps them in a holy awe, fearing to offend him who ſhall be their judge. It frights them from ſin, makes them afraid of the very appearance of evil: For though a child of God acts from love, which is the great and ingenuous principle which moves him, yet that love is mixt with fear; it is the love of ſons, which is not a ſawcy, a malapert, a too bold and ſupercilious, a too familiar, wanton love; but a reverend, ſubmiſſive, humble love, a love that has an allay of fear, fear of diſpleaſing and offending their father, whom it reſpects not only as good, and hating vice, but as powerful, and able to puniſh it. In a word, it is not unmixed fear, which is the fear of ſlaves, nor unmixed love, which is the love of wantons, or at leaſt of equals, who may love, but do not fear. In this holy awe and fear the thoughts of the dreadful judgment do eſpecially keep the children of God, yea, their holy performances are mixt with fear; they work with fear and trembling, Phil. ii. 12. not ſuſpecting God's faithfulneſs, but their own, often thinking thus with themſelves, How ſhall I be able to hold out in the laſt hour, in my dying agonies? How ſhall I withſtand the ſtorms of hell, and quench the fiery darts of the Devil? Epheſ. vi. 16. How ſhall I be able to appear before the great tribunal? How ſhall I give up my accounts there? Should God be ſtrict to mark what I have done amiſs, how ſhould I be able to ſtand in judgment, or to anſwer him one of a thouſand? What if all theſe ſervices of mine ſhould be conſtrued then to be but hypocriſy and formality? What if God ſhould not accept my perſon, and own my performances? What if he ſhould fling back my ſervices as dung upon my face, accounting it, as he did the Jews, but as the cutting off of a dog's neck; and the offering of ſwines blood in ſacrifice? Iſaiah lxvi. 6. What if my ſins ſhould appear hereafter unpardoned, and my obligations uncancelled? What though I am not far from the kingdom of God, yet if for lack of one thing I ſhould fall ſhort of it? What if this covetouſneſs and baſe-ſpiritedneſs, this worldly-mindedneſs and uncharitableneſs, this paſſion and peeviſhneſs, this ſtubbornneſs, this ſtiffneſs, and oppoſition, and diſobedience to my governors, this deſire of revenge and heart-burning and animoſity; What if this, or any of theſe ſhould ruin all, and ſhut me out of Heaven? Lord, therefore, prays he, let me part with every thing that thou doſt hate, and embrace that which thou doſt love and command, that I may appear before thy tribunal with courage and comfort!

Thus the thoughts of judgment ſtrike a holy awe and dread into the hearts of God's children, and do ſucceſsfully affright them from ſin. It is thus a terror even to good men.

And eſpecially it is a terror to wicked men, and impenitent ſinners, when under any affliction, or the apprehenſion of approaching death. But after death, eſpecially, it will be ſo; when the Judgment-day is come, it will be terror with a witneſs.

It is ſuppoſed it will be a kind of terror to good men; which is gathered from that expreſſion in the Theſſalonians, 1 Theſſ. i. 10. To be admired in all them that believe. Even in admiration itſelf there is a kind of mixture of fear and terror, through an overplus and overflowing of expectation, and raviſhing, exuberant wonder, as ſome are obſerved to weep for joy.

But in wicked men all that is purely dreadful ſhall meet together.

But more particularly, this dread and terror, which will fall upon wicked men, the enemies of our Lord, ariſeth from theſe four things:

1. The ſight of the judge.
2. The manner of his coming to judgment.
3. The accuſation of their own conſciences.
4. The nature and characters of the judgment: Which will be,
    1. An univerſal, a general judgment.
    2. An exact, an accurate, and critical judgment.
    3. A juſt and righteous judgment.
    4. The final judgment.
    5. A judgment that will ſentence to an eternal ſtate, either of happineſs or miſery.

But perhaps ſome may be here diſſatisfied, being ready to demand, Whether none ſhall be ſentenced, to an eternal ſtate till the laſt and general judgment? What then ſhall become of departed ſouls after death, till the general judgment? Shall they be kept in ſome Middle Place, or Purgatory, in ſome Limbus Patrum, or Infantum?

To this I anſwer: As there is a general judgment, at which the body and ſoul being re-united, ſhall appear, and receive ſentence together; ſo there is a particular judgment of the ſoul by itſelf, at its departure from the body. That the ſouls of good men, immediately after death, are carried to Heaven by the Angels, to receive the ſentence of abſolution, which ſhall be pronounced by Chriſt, who will place them in the manſion of glory, is moſt certain: As may be gathered from the caſe of Lazarus, Luke xvi. 22. compared with the firſt verſe of this chapter.

And I humbly conceive, (with ſubmiſſion) which is not unwarrantable by Scripture, (as is intimated in the caſe of Dives, Luke xvi. 23.) that Chriſt Jeſus, the judge of the world, by virtue of his regal office (which he doth now execute) as he ſends out his Angels, which are miniſtring ſpirits, to carry holy ſouls into Heaven, ſo he commiſſions his Angels too, to take the ſouls of wicked men, immediately after their ſeparation, and deliver them to the Devil, that cruel jaylor, the keeper of the infernal priſon, who inſtantly drags them away to Hell, there to be bound (as 'tis ſaid of the evil angels) in everlaſting chains under darkneſs to the judgment of the great day, Jude 6. and in the mean time to be tormented, and puniſhed according to their capacity; and that in purſuance of the ancient ſentence, pronounced long ago; He that believeth not is condemned already, and the wrath of God abideth on him, John iii. 18.—36.

CHAP. VI.

That he hath approved himſelf a faithful miniſter of Chriſt, both by his exhortations, 3 And by integrity of life, 4 And by patient enduring all kinds of affliction and diſgraces for the Goſpel. 10 Of which he ſpeaketh the more boldly amongſt them, becauſe his heart is open to them. 13 And he expecteth the like affection from them again, 14 Exhorting to flee the ſociety and pollution of idolaters, as being themſelves temples of the living God.

WE then as workers together with him, beſeech you alſo, that ye receive not the grace of God in vain.

2 (For he ſaith, I have heard thee in a time accepted, and in the day of ſalvation have I ſuccoured thee: behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of ſalvation.)

3 Giving no offence in any thing, that the miniſtry be not blamed:

4 But in all things approving our ſelves as the miniſters of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in neceſſities, in diſtreſſes,

5 In ſtripes, in impriſonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in faſtings,

6 By pureneſs, by knowledge, by longſuffering, by kindneſs, by the Holy Ghoſt, by love unfeigned,

7 By the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armour of righteouſneſs on the right hand and on the left,

8 By honour and diſhonour, by evil report and good report: as deceivers, and yet true;

9 As unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and behold, we live; as chaſtned, and not killed;

10 As ſorrowful, yet alway rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich, as having nothing, and yet poſſeſſing all things.

11 O ye Corinthians, our mouth is open unto you, our heart is enlarged.

12 Ye are not ſtraitned in us, but ye are ſtraitned in your own bowels.

13 Now for a recompenſe in the ſame (I ſpeak as unto my children) be ye alſo enlarged.

14 Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowſhip hath righteouſneſs with unrighteouſneſs; and what communion hath light with darkneſs?

15 And what concord hath Chriſt with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth, with an infidel?

16 And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath ſaid, I will dwell in them, and walk in them, and I will be their God, and they ſhall be my people.

17 Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye ſeparate, ſaith the Lord? and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you,

18 And will be a Father unto you, and ye ſhall be my ſons and daughters, ſaith the Lord Almighty.

In this chapter the Apoſtle treats

I. About their going to law before Heathens; wherein he utterly condemns that practice. Then he directs them to make uſe of Chriſtian Arbitrators in caſe of differences, ver. 1. upon this weighty conſideration; becauſe they ſhall judge great matters; ver. 2, 3. Moreover, he exhorts them to the uſe of this courſe, ver. 4. ſhames them out of the other, ver. 5, 6. blames them for their litigiouſneſs upon trifling occaſions; amplified by an exhortation to the contrary duty, i. e. to take wrong, ver. 7. charges them with injuſtice herein, ver. 8. which he diſſwades them from, by reaſon of the danger; it will deprive them of the kingdom of Heaven, ver. 9.———Proved by parallel caſes of other ſins, ver.—9, 10. And ſo concludes this point with a declaration of his good opinion of their preſent condition, ver. 11.

II. About fornication; wherein he confutes their opinion about it, or plea for it, that it was indifferent. (1.) By ſhewing, that though it were indifferent, yet it may not be practiſed, becauſe it is not expedient; in that it enſlaves a man under its own power, ver. 12. (2.) By denying it to be indifferent, as meats are; whereupon he ſhews the diſparity between them, ver. 13, 14. And then he argues directly againſt it; becauſe (1) it is a ſin againſt the relation of their bodies to Chriſt, as his members. (2.) Becauſe thereby they make their bodies the members of an harlot, ver. 15. proved by the nature of the act, and teſtimony of Scripture, ver. 16. (3.) Becauſe every true believer is ſpiritually one with the Lord, ver. 17. (4.) Becauſe it is a ſin againſt the dignity of the body, more than other ſins, ver. 18. (5.) Becauſe it is againſt the inhabitation of the ſpirit, ver. 19. And, (6.) It is a ſin againſt the redemption of the body by Chriſt, ver. 20.

Ver. 1.——The grace of God.] i. e. The Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt by which we are made the children of grace and admitted by God's free gift to be his children and inheritors of the kingdom of Heaven.

Ver. 2. Now is the accepted time, now is the day of ſalvation.] Now, i. e. ſince Chriſt has redeemed mankind by the price of his blood.

Ver. 3. Giving no offence in any thing, that the miniſtry be not blamed.] This verſe relates to the perſons in whoſe name the Apoſtle ſpeaks at the firſt verſe, when he ſaid we, i. e. I Paul, and my coadjutors or fellow-labourers, in the Goſpel-miniſtry, and here, as elſewhere, in the premiſes of this Epiſtle, and in other places, having ſignified very plainly, that our Bleſſed Saviour having offered himſelf a ſacrifice for the expiation of the ſins of mankind, and having overcome death by his reſurrection from the grave, was conſtituted, and declared, Univerſal Lord and King: Lord both of the dead, and the living: Of things in Heaven, things in the earth, and things under the earth, i. e. All creatures, Angels, men, and devils, which were put in ſubjection under him, and obliged to own, and ſubmit to that ſovereign authority, and power, which was committed to him, before his departure from this world, began to exerciſe his royal power, and ſoon ordained, and conſtituted the miniſters of this kingdom. He ſent his Apoſtles, in like manner, as his Father had ſent him, and gave them a commiſſion to preach the Goſpel, in his name, to every creature, to Jew and Gentile, i. e. to all mankind, and aſſured them, and their lawful ſucceſſors, of his protection and aſſiſtance continually, even to the end of the world, Matt. xxviii. 20. But,

When he aſcended into Heaven, and ſat down at the right hand of the Majeſty on high, he entered upon the more compleat execution, and full poſſeſſion of that high authority, he had received from his Father: And in purſuance of thoſe great, and glorious ends, for which he had received it, He gave gifts to men, Eph. iv. 11, 12, 13. He gave ſome Apoſtles, and ſome Prophets, and ſome Evangeliſts, and ſome Paſtors and Teachers: He gave theſe gifts to the wiſeſt, and beſt ends and purpoſes; For the perfecting of the Saints, for the work of the miniſtry, for the edifying of the body of Chriſt; till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the meaſure of the ſtature of the fulneſs of Chriſt: And according to his own gracious promiſe, he hath hitherto, in ſpite of all oppoſition, continued a ſucceſſion of men to inſtruct, guide, and govern his people, and by their means, hath in a marvellous manner propagated his Goſpel, confounded its oppoſers, and made the kings and princes of the earth, bow before him, and worſhip him: And though his kingdom be not yet enlarged to its utmoſt extent, yet what he hath already done, is an earneſt, and a pledge to us, that he will go on conquering, and to conquer, till he hath made all his enemies his footſtool.

Now, whether we conſider the author of the miniſterial office, or the end of its inſtitution, or the favourable providence, which hath in all ages attended it. One would think, that not only the office, but the miniſters themſelves alſo, ſhould be out of the reach of reproach and contempt.

But it may be obſerved from this Scripture, that the Corinthians began to ſlight their miniſters in the Apoſtolick age; and yet the office itſelf is traduced by ſome, as a mere politick device and engine to ſupport fraud and impoſture, and to over-awe the ignorant and unthinking multitude, into tame, ſervile, and unworthy compliances: And the miniſters are defamed, as the great inſtruments of deluding and deceiving mankind, in the moſt groſs and palpable manner, in order to ſerve their own intereſt, and gratify their ambition, by lording it over mens conſciences, and thereby making them become an eaſy prey to them.

They who miniſter in holy things, very well know the falſhood and malice of the accuſation: They know religion itſelf is ſtruck at, and wounded through their ſides. They know, that the enemies of religion in general, and of the Chriſtian Religion in particular, are ſenſible, they cannot undermine it, while its miniſters are held in eſteem and honour, and therefore it is they rail, and rage ſo much againſt them; as the lewd Corinthians did at Paul.

So that the greateſt innocence, the moſt ſublime piety, fervent zeal, incomparable meekneſs, humility, patience, contempt of the world, and unwearied diligence to promote the glory of God, and the happineſs of mankind, are no abſolute and defence and ſecurity, againſt the arrows and venom, of a prophane, ſerpentine, malicious tongue. Our Bleſſed Lord, and his Holy Apoſtles, did not eſcape the moſt unworthy, and bitter reflections and cenſures. The diſciple, therefore, muſt not be above his maſter, nor the ſucceſſors of the Apoſtles, may not take it ill, and murmur, if they ſometimes fare, as the Apoſtles did; but muſt rather do as they did, commit their cauſe to God, and poſſeſs their ſouls in patience, till in his own appointed time, he bring forth their righteouſneſs as the light, and their judgment as the noon-day. Thus

They will learn to imitate, ſo far, as they are able, the great God, whom they ſerve, by extracting good out of evil, and making even the defamation of their enemies, redound the more to their praiſe and glory. They learn wiſdom of their adverſaries, ſince they muſt expect blame, they walk with the greater care and circumſpection: They, after the example of our Apoſtle, ſtrive ſo much the more earneſtly to give no offence in any thing, that the miniſtry be not blamed. But,

It may be asked, what it is to give offence. Now, (at leaſt ſo far as I know) there are but two notions in the Holy Scripture, of giving offence, and ſcandalizing another. The one is, the unneceſſary and cauſeleſs, grieving, moleſting, or troubling of him. The other is, the leading, or tempting of him, to any ſin, or error in faith or practice. I ſay,

1. There are ſome who tell us, that one notion of ſcandal, or giving offence, is a needleſs grieving, troubling, or vexing another man, either by doing or forbearing any thing, which we were under no obligation, either to do, or forbear, at leaſt in that juncture, and at that particular ſeaſon, when we either did, or forbore to do it. But whether this be the ſtrict and proper notion of giving offence, or ſcandal, is not, at preſent, very material to diſpute. For whether it be or no, I believe it is certain, that where I am at perfect liberty being under the obligation of no law, Divine or human, to do or forbear any thing, the doing or forbearing of which, creates grief and trouble to another, and makes his life leſs eaſy and comfortable, than otherwiſe it would be, I ſay, in ſuch caſe, it is very certain, I may abridge my ſelf of my liberty, nay, it is fit, requiſite and neceſſary that I ſhould deny my ſelf. I muſt uſe my liberty with prudence and charity. The law of humanity and courteſy muſt take place. It is not only unchriſtian, but it is ſelfiſh, unkind, inhuman, and argues much narrowneſs and ſowreneſs of ſpirit, to create grief, ſorrow and trouble to another, when I may as well, without any real or apparent detriment to myſelf, or others, for whom I am concerned, forbear the occaſion of it. If, indeed, I am under the reſtraint of any Divine Precept, or any juſt command of my lawful ſuperior, this as I may ſhew afterwards, alters the caſe: Here I muſt do my duty, and if offence come upon my ſo doing, it is an offence taken and not given, and he who takes it muſt anſwer for it. And it may be very fit for him, to examine himſelf, and ſee whether ignorance, or forwardneſs, or ſelf-conceit, or a deſire to preſcribe to me, do not influence him too much. But as I ſaid, where I am at perfect liberty, here it becomes me to deny my ſelf, rather than grieve and trouble my brother. Here the rule is, we that are ſtrong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and

1. The ſight of the judge.
2. The manner of his coming to judgment.
3. The accuſation of their own conſciences.
4. The nature and characters of the judgment: Which will be,
    1. An univerſal, a general judgment.
    2. An exact, an accurate, and critical judgment.
    3. A juſt and righteous judgment.
    4. The final judgment.
    5. A judgment that will ſentence to an eternal ſtate, either of happineſs or miſery.

But perhaps ſome may be here diſſatisfied, being ready to demand, Whether none ſhall be ſentenced, to an eternal ſtate till the laſt and general judgment? What then ſhall become of departed ſouls after death, till the general judgment? Shall they be kept in ſome Middle Place, or Purgatory, in ſome Limbus Patrum, or Infantum?

To this I anſwer: As there is a general judgment, at which the body and ſoul being re-united, ſhall appear, and receive ſentence together; ſo there is a particular judgment of the ſoul by itſelf, at its departure from the body. That the ſouls of good men, immediately after death, are carried to Heaven by the Angels, to receive the ſentence of abſolution, which ſhall be pronounced by Chriſt, who will place them in the manſion of glory, is moſt certain: As may be gathered from the caſe of Lazarus, Luke xvi. 22. compared with the firſt verſe of this chapter.

And I humbly conceive, (with ſubmiſſion) which is not unwarrantable by Scripture, (as is intimated in the caſe of Dives, Luke xvi. 23.) that Chriſt Jeſus, the judge of the world, by virtue of his regal office (which he doth now execute) as he ſends out his Angels, which are miniſtring ſpirits, to carry holy ſouls into Heaven, ſo he commiſſions his Angels too, to take the ſouls of wicked men, immediately after their ſeparation, and deliver them to the Devil, that cruel jaylor, the keeper of the infernal priſon, who inſtantly drags them away to Hell, there to be bound (as 'tis ſaid of the evil angels) in everlaſting chains under darkneſs to the judgment of the great day, Jude 6. and in the mean time to be tormented, and puniſhed according to their capacity; and that in purſuance of the ancient ſentence, pronounced long ago; He that believeth not is condemned already, and the wrath of God abideth on him, John iii. 18.—36.

CHAP. VI.

That he hath approved himſelf a faithful miniſter of Chriſt, both by his exhortations, 3 And by integrity of life, 4 And by patient enduring all kinds of affliction and diſgraces for the Goſpel. 10 Of which he ſpeaketh the more boldly amongſt them, becauſe his heart is open to them. 13 And he expecteth the like affection from them again, 14 Exhorting to flee the ſociety and pollution of idolaters, as being themſelves temples of the living God.

WE then as workers together with him, beſeech you alſo, that ye receive not the grace of God in vain.

2 (For he ſaith, I have heard thee in a time accepted, and in the day of ſalvation have I ſuccoured thee: behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of ſalvation.)

3 Giving no offence in any thing, that the miniſtry be not blamed:

4 But in all things approving our ſelves as the miniſters of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in neceſſities, in diſtreſſes,

5 In ſtripes, in impriſonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in faſtings,

6 By pureneſs, by knowledge, by long-ſuffering, by kindneſs, by the Holy Ghoſt, by love unfeigned,

7 By the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armour of righteouſneſs on the right hand and on the left,

8 By honour and diſhonour, by evil report and good report: as deceivers, and yet true;

9 As unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and behold, we live; as chaſtned, and not killed;

10 As ſorrowful, yet alway rejoycing; as poor, yet making many rich, as having nothing, and yet poſſeſſing all things.

11 O ye Corinthians, our mouth is open unto you, our heart is enlarged.

12 Ye are not ſtraitned in us, but ye are ſtraitned in your own bowels.

13 Now for a recompenſe in the ſame (I ſpeak as unto my children) be ye alſo enlarged.

14 Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowſhip hath righteouſneſs with unrighteouſneſs; and what communion hath light with darkneſs?

15 And what concord hath Chriſt with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth, with an infidel?

16 And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath ſaid, I will dwell in them, and walk in them, and I will be their God, and they ſhall be my people.

17 Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye ſeparate, ſaith the Lord; and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you,

18 And will be a Father unto you, and ye ſhall be my ſons and daughters, ſaith the Lord Almighty.

In this chapter the Apoſtle treats

I. About their going to law before Heathens; wherein he utterly condemns that practice. Then he directs them to make uſe of Chriſtian Arbitrators in caſe of differences, ver. 1. upon this weighty conſideration; becauſe they ſhall judge great matters; ver. 2, 3. Moreover, he exhorts them to the uſe of this courſe, ver. 4. ſhames them out of the other, ver. 5, 6. blames them for their litigiouſneſs upon trifling occaſions; amplified by an exhortation to the contrary duty, i. e. to take wrong, ver. 7. charges them with injuſtice herein, ver. 8. which he diſſwades them from, by reaſon of the danger; it will deprive them of the kingdom of Heaven, ver. 9.———Proved by parallel caſes of other ſins, ver.—9, 10. And ſo concludes this point with a declaration of his good opinion of their preſent condition, ver. 11.

II. About fornication; wherein he confutes their opinion about it, or plea for it, that it was indifferent. (1.) By ſhewing, that though it were indifferent, yet it may not be practiſed, becauſe it is not expedient; in that it enſlaves a man under its own power, ver. 12. (2.) By denying it to be indifferent, as meats are; whereupon he ſhews the diſparity between them, ver. 13, 14. And then he argues directly againſt it; becauſe (1) it is a ſin againſt the relation of their bodies to Chriſt, as his members. (2.) Becauſe thereby they make their bodies the members of an harlot, ver. 15. proved by the nature of the act, and teſtimony of Scripture, ver. 16. (3.) Becauſe every true believer is ſpiritually one with the Lord, ver. 17. (4.) Becauſe it is a ſin againſt the dignity of the body, more than other ſins, ver. 18. (5.) Becauſe it is againſt the inhabitation of the ſpirit, ver. 19. And, (6.) It is a ſin againſt the redemption of the body by Chriſt, ver. 20.

Ver. 1.——The grace of God.] i. e. The Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt by which we are made the children of grace and admitted by God's free gift to be his children and inheritors of the kingdom of Heaven.

Ver. 2. Now is the accepted time, now is the day of ſalvation.] Now, i. e. ſince Chriſt has redeemed mankind by the price of his blood.

Ver. 3. Giving no offence in any thing, that the miniſtry be not blamed.] This verſe relates to the perſons in whoſe name the Apoſtle ſpeaks at the firſt verſe, when he ſaid we, i. e. I Paul, and my coadjutors or fellow-labourers, in the Goſpel-miniſtry, and here, as elſewhere, in the premiſes of this Epiſtle, and in other places, having ſignified very plainly, that our Bleſſed Saviour having offered himſelf a ſacrifice for the expiation of the ſins of mankind, and having overcome death by his reſurrection from the grave, was conſtituted, and declared, Univerſal Lord and King: Lord both of the dead, and the living: Of things in Heaven, things in the earth, and things under the earth, i. e. All creatures, Angels, men, and devils, which were put in ſubjection under him, and obliged to own, and ſubmit to that ſovereign authority, and power, which was committed to him, before his departure from this world, began to exerciſe his royal power, and ſoon ordained, and conſtituted the miniſters of this kingdom. He ſent his Apoſtles, in like manner, as his Father had ſent him, and gave them a commiſſion to preach the Goſpel, in his name, to every creature, to Jew and Gentile, i. e. to all mankind, and aſſured them, and their lawful ſucceſſors, of his protection and aſſiſtance continually, even to the end of the world, Matt. xxviii. 20. But,

When he aſcended into Heaven, and ſat down at the right hand of the Majeſty on high, he entered upon the more compleat execution, and full poſſeſſion of that high authority, he had received from his Father: And in purſuance of thoſe great, and glorious ends, for which he had received it, He gave gifts to men, Eph. iv. 11, 12, 13. He gave ſome Apoſtles, and ſome Prophets, and ſome Evangeliſts, and ſome Paſtors and Teachers: He gave theſe gifts to the wiſeſt, and beſt ends and purpoſes; For the perfecting of the Saints, for the work of the miniſtry, for the edifying of the body of Chriſt; till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the meaſure of the ſtature of the fulneſs of Chriſt: And according to his own gracious promiſe, he hath hitherto, in ſpite of all oppoſition, continued a ſucceſſion of men to inſtruct, guide, and govern his people, and by their means, hath in a marvellous manner propagated his Goſpel, confounded its oppoſers, and made the kings and princes of the earth, bow before him, and worſhip him: And though his kingdom be not yet enlarged to its utmoſt extent, yet what he hath already done, is an earneſt, and a pledge to us, that he will go on conquering, and to conquer, till he hath made all his enemies his footſtool.

Now, whether we conſider the author of the miniſterial office, or the end of its inſtitution, or the favourable providence, which hath in all ages attended it. One would think, that not only the office, but the miniſters themſelves alſo, ſhould be out of the reach of reproach and contempt.

But it may be obſerved from this Scripture, that the Corinthians began to ſlight their miniſters in the Apoſtolick age; and yet the office itſelf is traduced by ſome, as a mere politick device and engine to ſupport fraud and impoſture, and to over-awe the ignorant and unthinking multitude, into tame, ſervile, and unworthy compliances: And the miniſters are defamed, as the great inſtruments of deluding and deceiving mankind, in the moſt groſs and palpable manner, in order to ſerve their own intereſt, and gratify their ambition, by lording it over mens conſciences, and thereby making them become an eaſy prey to them.

They who miniſter in holy things, very well know the falſhood and malice of the accuſation: They know religion itſelf is ſtruck at, and wounded through their ſides. They know, that the enemies of religion in general, and of the Chriſtian Religion in particular, are ſenſible, they cannot undermine it, while its miniſters are held in eſteem and honour, and therefore it is they rail, and rage ſo much againſt them; as the lewd Corinthians did at Paul.

So that the greateſt innocence, the moſt ſublime piety, fervent zeal, incomparable meekneſs, humility, patience, contempt of the world, and unwearied diligence to promote the glory of God, and the happineſs of mankind, are no abſolute and defence and ſecurity, againſt the arrows and venom, of a prophane, ſerpentine, malicious tongue. Our Bleſſed Lord, and his Holy Apoſtles, did not eſcape the moſt unworthy, and bitter reflections and cenſures. The diſciple, therefore, muſt not be above his maſter, nor the ſucceſſors of the Apoſtles, may not take it ill, and murmur, if they ſometimes fare, as the Apoſtles did; but muſt rather do as they did, commit their cauſe to God, and poſſeſs their ſouls in patience, till in his own appointed time, he bring forth their righteouſneſs as the light, and their judgment as the noon-day. Thus

They will learn to imitate, ſo far, as they are able, the great God, whom they ſerve, by extracting good out of evil, and making even the defamation of their enemies, redound the more to their praiſe and glory. They learn wiſdom of their adverſaries, ſince they muſt expect blame, they walk with the greater care and circumſpection: They, after the example of our Apoſtle, ſtrive ſo much the more earneſtly to give no offence in any thing, that the miniſtry be not blamed. But,

It may be aſked, what it is to give offence. Now, (at leaſt ſo far as I know) there are but two notions in the Holy Scripture, of giving offence, and ſcandalizing another. The one is, the unneceſſary and cauſeleſs, grieving, moleſting, or troubling of him. The other is, the leading, or tempting of him, to any ſin, or error in faith or practice. I ſay,

1. There are ſome who tell us, that one notion of ſcandal, or giving offence, is a needleſs grieving, troubling, or vexing another man, either by doing or forbearing any thing, which we were under no obligation, either to do, or forbear, at leaſt in that juncture, and at that particular ſeaſon, when we either did, or forbore to do it. But whether this be the ſtrict and proper notion of giving offence, or ſcandal, is not, at preſent, very material to diſpute. For whether it be or no, I believe it is certain, that where I am at perfect liberty being under the obligation of no law, Divine or human, to do or forbear any thing, the doing or forbearing of which, creates grief and trouble to another, and makes his life leſs eaſy and comfortable, than otherwiſe it would be, I ſay, in ſuch caſe, it is very certain, I may abridge my ſelf of my liberty, nay, it is fit, requiſite and neceſſary that I ſhould deny my ſelf. I muſt uſe my liberty with prudence and charity. The law of humanity and courteſy muſt take place. It is not only unchriſtian, but it is ſelfiſh, unkind, inhuman, and argues much narrowneſs and ſowreneſs of ſpirit, to create grief, ſorrow and trouble to another, when I may as well, without any real or apparent detriment to myſelf, or others, for whom I am concerned, forbear the occaſion of it. If, indeed, I am under the reſtraint of any Divine Precept, or any juſt command of my lawful ſuperior, this as I may ſhew afterwards, alters the caſe: Here I muſt do my duty, and if offence come upon my ſo doing, it is an offence taken and not given, and he who takes it muſt anſwer for it. And it may be very fit for him, to examine himſelf, and ſee whether ignorance, or forwardneſs, or ſelf-conceit, or a deſire to preſcribe to me, do not influence him too much. But as I ſaid, where I am at perfect liberty, here it becomes me to deny my ſelf, rather than grieve and trouble my brother. Here the rule is, we that are ſtrong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not pleaſe our ſelves. Here we ſhould be flexible, yielding and complaiſant, and imitate the Apoſtle, who became all things to all men, 1 Cor. ix. 22. and pleaſed all men in all things, i. e. in all lawful things, not ſeeking his own profit but the profit of many, that they might be ſaved, 1 Cor. x. 33. But then,

2. There are others who tell us, (and they ſay it is the only true notion of it) that the giving offence or ſcandal, is the doing, or forbearing any thing, which is a real temptation or inducement to error, or wickedneſs. Whatſoever directly, and in its own nature, or in general opinion, tends to lead a man into any ſin, that is to ſay, either to do any thing which God hath forbidden, or to omit any thing which he hath commanded, this is an offence, and is uſually expreſſed in Holy Scripture, by laying a ſnare, a trap, a ſtumbling-block in ones way; Rom. xiv. 13. whereby he is deceived, and bruiſes, and hurts himſelf; 1 John ii. 10. Any thing a man does, which tends to diſcourage men from receiving the faith of Chriſt, or adhering to it, or walking worthy of it, is an offence. For example, to repreſent the great myſteries of the Goſpel, as unreaſonable and abſurd; the precepts of it, as over-rigorous and ſevere; or to enervate the force of its promiſes and threatnings, or to deride, moleſt, and perſecute men for the ſincere belief, and practiſe of it, is a great and grievous offence, and Wo be to them by whom ſuch offences come; Matt. xviii. 7. Now that this is the true, and moſt common, if not the only notion of giving offence, is very fairly inferred from many paſſages of the New Teſtament. But I ſhall mention but a few: Our Bleſſed Lord ſays, Bleſſed is he whoſoever ſhall not be offended in me; Matt. xi. i. e. Who ſhall not be tempted through the meanneſs of the circumſtances in which I appear, or the troubles and afflictions which befal me, to reject my perſon and doctrine, or to fall from the belief and profeſſion of it. So it is ſaid of thoſe, who received the ſeed in ſtony ground, that when tribulation or perſecution did ariſe, they were by and by offended; Matt. xiii. 21. i. e. Were preſently diſcouraged from cheriſhing the good ſeed of the word in their hearts, and bringing forth the fruits of it, in their lives and converſation. So again it is ſaid of Chriſt crucified; 1 Cor. i. 23. that to the Jews he was a ſcandal, or an offence, i. e. the accurſed and ſhameful death which he ſuffered, was a temptation to them, to reject him, and hindered them from confeſſing him to be the Saviour of the world. Yet once more, Upon our Lord's myſterious diſcourſe, concerning eating his fleſh, and drinking his blood, many of his followers were offended, John vi. 60. i. e. thinking with themſelves, (though very ignorantly and unreaſonably) that what he ſaid was againſt the rules of humanity, took offence, and preſently forſook him, and in ſo doing, forſook him who had the words of eternal life. This is a ſhort account of the enquiry, viz. What it is to give an offence: And

The ſum of it all is, That giving offence conſiſts either in the obſtructing the peace, quiet, and tranquility of our neighbour, by any needleſs, imprudent uſe of our liberty: Or elſe leading him into ſin or error, by any ſiniſter, dubious and unlawful practices. And great reaſon there is why we ſhould be cautious, how we give any ſuch offence: Becauſe,

1. The honour of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the dignity of the calling to which he hath called his Miniſters, to excite the utmoſt care and caution, to prevent and remove all juſt occaſion of offence. They who are conſecrated and ordained to Holy Offices, ſtand in a near relation to Jeſus Chriſt, the great Shepherd, and Biſhop of our ſouls, 1 Pet. ii. 25. They are his ſervants, i. e. peculiarly and eminently ſo, 1 Cor. iv. 1, &c. They are his agents, by whom he carries on the great affairs of his Church. They are the miniſters of his Spiritual Kingdom. His ambaſſadors to men entruſted with the word or doctrine of reconciliation, beſeeching them, in Chriſt's ſtead, to be reconciled to God; than which a more high, honourable, and beneficial truſt, cannot be committed to men. They are the builders of his houſe, the ſtewards of his family, appointed to give every one their meat in due ſeaſon. They are the Angels of his Church, and ſtars in his right hand. In fine, they are co-workers together with him, continually watching for the ſalvation of thoſe for whom Chriſt died; thereby purſuing the ſame great work, for which he came from Heaven, and began upon earth, and ſtill carries on by the labours of his ſervants, and the powerful miniſtration of his Spirit, who accompanies their faithful diligence and endeavours. How great and glorious a Maſter do they ſerve! How ſacred and honourable is their office! What care is requiſite to fulfil it! How inexcuſable is it to walk unworthy either of it, or their great Maſter, who hath called them to it! It is no unuſual thing to judge of men, from the quality of the perſons they employ in their ſervice: Now, ſhould the miniſters of Chriſt (which God forbid) miſtake, ſlip, and fall, and give great and juſt occaſion of offence, might not this ſeem to reflect ſome kind of diſhonour upon him, by tempting the ignorant and profane to impeach his wiſdom in calling ſuch to ſo weighty a charge, as he knew they were either unable or unwilling to fulfil?

Beſides, eminence of ſtation attracts the eyes of beholders. The miniſters of Chriſt, are ſtars, the light of the world, a city ſet upon a hill, which cannot be hid, Rev. i. 16. Matt. v. 14. They are expoſed to publick view, their perſons and conduct cannot be concealed, what they ſay and do will be obſerved and known in the world. Now, the more eyes are upon them, eſpecially if the quick and piercing eye of malice, the eyes of thoſe who watch for, and would rejoice in, the fall of the miniſtry, the more care and caution is requiſite, to give no occaſion to the adverſary to ſpeak reproachfully, but to cut off occaſion from them who deſire occaſion, 1 Tim. v. 14 2 Cor. xi. 12. to ſee them offend, and thereby to blame the miniſtry.

2. The end and deſign of the miniſtry, obliges to take heed of giving any juſt occaſion of offence in any thing, whereby any blame or reproach may be caſt upon it. For, the great end of the work of the miniſtry, is to reclaim men from ignorance and error, and ſin, and wickedneſs, and to lead them into the way of truth, peace, and holineſs, and life everlaſting. Now, ſhould any, who miniſter in holy things, for want of due care or diligence, lead into error, or offer any great temptation to ſin and wickedneſs, or by any indiſcreet uſe of their liberty, needleſly moleſt, grieve, or trouble other men, I doubt very much whether the ſacredneſs and dignity of their office, would ſcreen or exempt them from that quick and ſevere expoſtulation we have, Rom. i. 21. Thou who teacheſt another, teacheſt thou not thy ſelf? And thus through their fault the miniſtry will be blaſphemed in the world.

3. The many and great difficulties which attend the work of the miniſtry, call for great care and watchfulneſs, that they who miniſter in holy things be inoffenſive and blameleſs in their whole behaviour and conduct. Some ancient writers have repreſented its difficulties ſo great, as it is next to impoſſible to overcome them. But though allowance muſt here be made for flights of rhetoric; yet it muſt be confeſſed, that it is a very laborious and difficult work. It is the buſineſs of thoſe who are conſecrated and ordained to holy offices, to know, to declare, and defend the truth, and to diſcover and confute error. It is their work to remove and cure the prejudices, and reprove and reform the vices of the age in which they live. It lies upon them to encounter irreligion and profaneneſs on the one hand, and to detect formality and hypocriſy on the other. They muſt condeſcend and ſuit themſelves to the mean capacity and dulneſs of ſome, and oppoſe themſelves with reſolution and courage to the perverſe obſtinacy and malice of others; muſt inſtruct with meekneſs of wiſdom, rebuke with authority, 2 Tim. ii. 25. 2 Tit. xv. ſuffer no man to deſpiſe them, cenſure the incorrigible, yet with a mixture of pity and tender compaſſion comfort the afflicted, bind up the broken-hearted, ſeek thoſe that are loſt, reduce thoſe that go aſtray, prevent, and heal diviſions, bear with the weak, encourage the ſtrong, go through evil report and good, neither fearing nor flattering any, but in all things approving themſelves the miniſters of God. How great a work is here! And that which ſtill adds to its weight is, that the miniſters of Chriſt are ſubject to the ſame infirmities that other men are; nay, they are expoſed to ſome temptations from which others are exempted. For they are, in the very nature and deſign of their function, to deal with all orders and degrees of men. High and low, rich and poor, wiſe and unwiſe, good and bad, are the object of their care. The various paſſions, appetites, affections, converſations, and actions of men, come under their inſpection and guidance. And who is ſufficient for all theſe things! Who, in that vaſt variety of caſes, which muſt neceſſarily ariſe, can ſo order himſelf, as to give no offence in any thing?

It is true, it is a hard work, the difficulties attending it are not to be foreſeen, and ſcarce to be numbered. But difficulties muſt not diſmay and deject; they ſhould rather excite care, and quicken induſtry, and invigorate reſolution. If the work be ſuch, as it is difficult not to offend in the doing of it, and yet is ſuch a work, as muſt of neceſſity be done, this is a good reaſon to proceed in all caſes with ſo much the greater care, that ſo we, as the Apoſtle ſays, may give no juſt occaſion of offence in any thing, that the miniſtry be not blamed: And it ſhould alſo be of great force with the people, to check that propenſity and forwardneſs they are guilty of in taking offence, and cenſuring the conduct of their ſpiritual guides and governors. For I am perſwaded, had they either ſkill, or temper enough to conſider, examine and weigh every thing in an equal ballance, (eſpecially if they would but reflect, that they themſelves are too, too often the cauſes of thoſe difficulties, which make it ſo very hard not to offend) they would find that inſtead of obloquy, reproach and contempt, they deſerve love and honour. But,

4. Laſtly, The Apoſtle here ſignifies, that the ſucceſs of the work of the miniſtry depends very much upon walking inoffenſively; ſo as to give no occaſion to the adverſary to blaſpheme. Should the ſervants of the Lord, by any weakneſs or miſtake, or indiſcreet and ill conduct, raiſe any great prejudices in the minds of the people committed to their care, it will very much obſtruct the good effects of their doctrine, and all other endeavours for the good of their ſouls. Men will not abſtract from the calling and the perſon; they will not diſtinguiſh between the man and his office; or if ſome few have their ſenſes ſo well exerciſed, as to diſcern between them, yet the doctrine is ſcarce received with that reliſh and pleaſure, nor the endeavour to do good, ſo acceptable, becauſe offered by a diſagreeable hand. Now

If it be ſo, that giving any ſuch occaſion of offence to men, be the ready way to render the miniſters contemptible, and to hinder the deſired effects of all their care and labour, this is a very forcible reaſon why they ſhould follow the Apoſtle's example, viz. ſo to perſuade, as at the ſame time to give no offence in any thing, that the miniſtry be not blamed. Which they may do if they omit no neceſſary duty, for fear of giving offence to any, who are otherwiſe minded: For in ſuch a ſervile compliance they would really do the very thing, which they ſhould avoid: They in truth would give very juſt occaſion of offence, by violating their duty, which they were bound to perform, notwithſtanding others would take offence at it. For example:

We teach that in the unity of the Godhead there are three perſons, of one ſubſtance, power, and eternity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt; and that the everlaſting Word, the Eternal Son of God, who is conſubſtantial with his Father, in the fulneſs of time, was made fleſh, and offered himſelf a full, perfect and ſufficient ſacrifice, oblation and ſatisfaction, for the ſins of the whole world. Now ſome pretend to take offence at this, and blame the miniſters of religion, for obtruding contradictions, and nonſenſe, upon the people, as the great myſteries of the faith. But if this be an offence, they cannot help it, it is an offence taken, and not given. They know theſe doctrines are agreeable to Scripture; they know they are neceſſary and fundamental articles of our religion; and muſt earneſtly contend for them, how much ſoever they diſpleaſe thoſe who are contrary-minded, leſt otherwiſe they ſhould be found in the number of thoſe, who deny both the Father and the Son.

There are others, of the ſame temper with thoſe the Prophet Iſaiah ſpeaks of, who ſay to the Seers, ſee not, and and to the Prophets, propheſy not unto us right things, ſpeak unto us ſmooth things, propheſy deceits, Iſa. xxx. 10. My meaning is, there are ſome who are very deſirous to be taught a way, how to reconcile the enjoyment of their luſts, and the hopes of Heaven together, and repreſent our ſhewing the neceſſity of good works in order to pardon, and peace with God, and eternal life, as returning to mount Sinai, or the legal diſpenſation, and a kind of diſclaiming the great grace and liberty, to which the Goſpel calls us. Now ſhould they who miniſter in holy things, to uſe the words of another Prophet, thus ſmooth their tongues, Jerem. xxiii. 31. they would be guilty of the moſt pernicious and fatal offence, and lead men headlong into the pit of deſtruction. No, we have not thus learned Chriſt, Gal. v. 13. We dare not uſe our liberty for an occaſion to the fleſh, we cannot turn the grace of God into laſciviouſneſs, thereby practically denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, Jude v. 4.

So again, if we teach and maintain that the civil power is not the creature of the people, but the ordinance of God, and put men in mind to be ſubject to principalities and powers, and to take heed of reſiſting them, not only for wrath, but conſcience-ſake, and affirm with the Apoſtle, that they who reſiſt, ſhall receive to themſelves damnation, Tit. iii. 1. Rom. xiii. 1, &c. Some are mightily diſpleaſed, and charge the miniſters of religion as pragmatical, and buſy-bodies, and meddlers, with what does not belong to them, and as carrying on a deſign, to oppreſs and enſlave mankind: Nay, do they but magnify their own office, aſſert the ſacredneſs and dignity of it, and ſhew what reverence and ſubmiſſion is due to it, they cannot eſcape: Men preſently are offended, and cry out, as thoſe of old, Ye take too much upon you, ye ſons of Levi, all the Lord's people are holy, Numb. xvi. 3. Now if men be offended at this, I know no help, unleſs they themſelves would pleaſe to rectify their own opinions; for ſo long as theſe things are taught, and enjoined in the Scripture, they muſt not be overlooked or neglected. Upon all fit and proper ſeaſons and occaſions, theſe truths muſt be taught, confirmed, and inculcated upon the conſciences of the people.

Here I might proceed to an induction of ſeveral particulars, which either in their own nature, or in common eſtimation, are juſt ground and occaſions and offence, and for that reaſon are carefully to be avoided. Such as, dealing the word of God deceitfully, mixing errors with truth, uſing ſubtle artifices to recommend them, crafty interpretations to miniſter to pride, avarice, and ambition, or to ſerve any ſecular intereſt, unſeemly affectation of ſuperiority and power, remiſneſs or rigour in the exerciſe of it, doing things by partiality, mutual animoſities, fierce oppoſition and jangling among ourſelves, want of gravity, ſeriouſneſs, and attention, in the performance of Holy Offices; moroſeneſs, fickleneſs, irreſolution, or feebleneſs of mind, covered with a pretence of caution and warineſs, 2 Cor. ii. 17.—4—2. 1 Tim. iii. 3—6. 1 Pet. v. 2, 3. 1 Tim. v. 21. 2 Tim. ii. 24. Theſe, I ſay, and many other things of the like nature, are ſummed up in the forecited Scriptures, deſerve conſideration. But I ſhall only note ſome of thoſe particulars in the chapter before us, which may ſerve to remove all offence in the perſons wherein they are found.

1. The firſt thing the Apoſtle recommends, is patience, reſolution, and magnanimity, ſuitable to all events, which in the courſe of their miniſtry might befal them. This the Apoſtle mentions in the verſe following, and ſays, Giving no offence in any thing, that the miniſtry be not blamed; But in all things approving ourſelves as the miniſters of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in neceſſities, in diſtreſſes, in ſtripes, in impriſonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in faſtings. It was the hard lot of the Apoſtles, and the immediate diſciples of our Bleſſed Lord, to be eſteemed the refuſe and off-ſcouring of all things, to meet with the moſt unworthy and barbarous uſage, from a ſtubborn and faithleſs generation, and at laſt to reſiſt, even unto blood, ſtriving againſt ſin. But through the great mercy and good providence of God, and the pious care of our Governors, the Biſhops and Paſtors of the Church, have for a long time been exempt from theſe difficulties and tryals: Nevertheleſs it concerns them (and all Chriſtians) in the diſpoſition and preparation of their mind, to quit their deareſt intereſts and part with their lives, rather than renounce their religion, and ſin againſt God. And where this diſpoſition and temper of ſoul is viſible, it will procure reſpect and honour. Such reſolution and conſtancy, is a clear and full proof of ſincerity, and the ſincerity of ſuch perſons being unqueſtionable, it is a mighty advantage to the reputation and ſucceſs of their miniſtry. But,

Though, as I ſaid, the miniſters of Chriſt are excuſed from extreme hardſhips and tryals, yet there are other tryals which they are, and may be expoſed to, which will ſufficiently exerciſe their patience, magnanimity, and in reſolution. It is no eaſy thing to contend with the obloquy and contradiction of unreaſonable men, and ſuch are almoſt every where to be met with. To overlook the ignorant cenſures of ſome, and contemn the malicious ſlanders of others, to overcome evil with good, to pity and pray for thoſe who deſpitefully uſe them, is a great trial. But then to do thus, is a ſure ſign of a great and generous ſoul, and an excellent mean to gain reſpect and reverence, and to win upon the fierceneſs of thoſe, who hate them. But this is not all, even that which may ſeem to be (and which really is) a great advantage to the Clergy, the due honour I mean, which is ſometimes conferred upon them, requires a firmneſs of mind to prevent its becoming a ſnare, and a temptation, and an occaſion of offence. For the Apoſtle ſays, they muſt know how to bear honour, as well as diſhonour, and good report as well as evil report: And it may be a queſtion, whether it be not as difficult to bear proſperous, as adverſe events. How hard a thing is it to receive honour, and to uſe it aright, without diſcovering any mixture of oſtentation and vanity, without ſhewing partiality, remiſneſs, or rigour, without any neglect, or contempt of inferiors, or any ſeeming affectation of exerciſing authority over them! The temptation is ſtrong, and inſinuating, and requires much prudence, and great firmneſs of mind, to diſcover, reſiſt, and overcome it. But he that can effectually do it, will in this point remove much occaſion of offence, and ſupport the honour and veneration, which is juſtly due to his miniſtry.

2. A ſecond thing which the Apoſtle mentions, ver. 6. is pureneſs. By which ſome of great learning and judgment, underſtand the particular virtue or grace of chaſtity. A virtue no leſs amiable, than neceſſary, and its contrary vice, every where odious and deteſtable. But tho' this ſenſe of the word muſt by no means be excluded, yet, I rather think, the Apoſtle uſed in this a greater latitude, ſo as to comprehend innocence and holineſs, or a conformity of heart and life, to the will of God, walking in all his commandments blameleſs. An even, regular, conſtant tenor and courſe of goodneſs, will prevent blame, and command veneration and honour; but if this be wanting, nothing elſe will do it. For (to uſe the words of an excellent perſon) power may be dreaded, riches may be courted, wit and knowledge may be admired, but only goodneſs is truly eſteemed and honoured.

3. A third thing the Apoſtle mentions is knowledge. A thing pleaſant to the mind, as light is to the eye, earneſtly deſired, and highly eſteemed among men, and its contrary defect as deſpicable and vile. We are far from taking away the key of knowledge from the people; to allude to the words of Moſes, we could wiſh that all the Lord's people were Prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them. But then we cannot but wiſh, at leaſt, a double portion of it, upon his miniſters, that all who attend upon Holy Offices, might in this reſpect, be as much ſuperior to others, as their ſtation is above them in the Church. But what knowledge is it which the Apoſtle recommends? Is it ſkill in languages, hiſtory, philoſophy, and other arts and ſciences? I cannot ſay that this was the Apoſtle's meaning. But yet, with ſubmiſſion, neither do I think they muſt be wholly excluded, becauſe they are of excellent uſe, and very neceſſary to attain to that which certainly was his meaning.

The Apoſtle means knowledge in matters of religion, the nature and attributes of God, his will, his word, his providence, his works, or, in other words, a clear, diſtinct, and comprehenſive view of the whole Goſpel-revelation in all things neceſſary to ſalvation; together with a dextrous, prudent, perſuaſive, powerful way, of inſtructing others in the ſame truths, and enforcing them upon their hearts and conſciences: To attain to theſe is the peculiar ſtudy, and moſt proper buſineſs of, and any conſpicuous defect herein, will be attended with blame, and reflect upon, the miniſtry. But whoſoever hath attained hereto, is approved of God, a Workman that needeth not to be aſhamed, being able rightly to divide the word of truth.

4. The Apoſtle further directs to long-ſufferings, and kindneſs. By theſe I underſtand bearing with the weakneſs and infirmities of men, pitying their failings, waiting for their amendment, overlooking their injuries, treating them with decency and reſpect, performing real acts of civility and kind offices, doing them in an obliging way, and with a willing mind, and in a graceful and becoming manner. And who ſees not how neceſſary theſe things are, to recommend our perſons, and our beſt endeavours for the good of ſouls? Theſe are things acceptable to God, and approv'd of men, and do not only prevent blame, and offence, but conciliate love and honour to the miniſtry. Such facility, gentleneſs and goodneſs, give freedom of acceſs, and inſinuate like oil, into the affections, and are attended with proportionable ſucceſs: Whereas on the contrary, moroſeneſs and auſterity of carriage (eſpecially where affected) in men otherwiſe very good, raiſes prejudices againſt their perſons, and obſtructs the good effects of their beſt deſigns and endeavours. But I ſhall only mention one particular more, namely,

5. Love unfeigned, ver. 6. Now ſhould I ſay, that by this we are to underſtand that ſincere, fervent affection wherewith the miniſters of Chriſt ſhould mutually embrace each other, I might perhaps, not come up to the Apoſtle's full deſign. For, ſhould the ſervants of the Lord, who above all others, are obliged to be united, in the firmeſt bonds of brotherly love, be defective herein, much more ſhould they indulge to mutual animoſities and fierce oppoſition, this would be a great offence, and their miniſtry would be blamed.

And as for the love the Apoſtle mentions, it is an hearty good will to all mankind, eſpecially to thoſe who are committed to their care and conduct, that ſo they may ſee, they ſeek not theirs, but them. Love demonſtrating itſelf in a general concern for the ſouls of men, labouring after the ſalvation of the meaneſt creature for whom Chriſt died, and condeſcending to inferior offices, for their ſpiritual good: Love diſcovering itſelf in a ſollicitude, to inſtruct the ignorant, recover the erroneous, reform the wicked, encourage the good, comfort the broken-hearted, and imparting all ſpiritual bleſſings to them in Chriſt Jeſus, praying for, and bleſſing them, in his name: Love manifeſting it ſelf, in viſiting the ſick, relieving the needy, comforting the fatherleſs and the widow, forgiving the injurious, cenſuring the obſtinate, with pity and tender compaſſion; I ſay ſo diffuſive, ſincere, fervent a love to the ſouls of men, would not fail of correſpondent returns of love; and where there is mutual love, there will be no great diſpoſition either to give or to take offence.

CHAP. VII.

1 He proceedeth in exhorting them to purity of life, 2 and to bear him like affection as he doth to them. 3 Whereof leſt he might ſeem to doubt, he declareth what comfort he took in his afflictions, by the report which Titus gave of their godly ſorrow, which his former Epiſtle had wrought in them, 13 and of their loving-kindneſs and obedience towards Titus, anſwerable to his former boaſtings of them.

HAVING therefore theſe promiſes (dearly beloved) let us cleanſe our ſelves from all filthineſs of the fleſh and ſpirit, perfecting holineſs in the fear of God.

2 Receive us: we have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded no man.

3 I ſpeak not this to condemn you: for I have ſaid before, that you are in our hearts to die and live with you.

4 Great is my boldneſs of ſpeech toward you, great is my glorying of you: I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation.

5 For when we were come into Macedonia, our fleſh had no reſt, but we were troubled on every ſide; without were fightings, within were fears.

6 Nevertheleſs, God that comforteth thoſe that are caſt down, comforted us by the coming of Titus:

7 And not by his coming only, but by the conſolation wherewith he was comforted in you, when he told us your earneſt deſire, your mourning, your fervent mind toward me; ſo that I rejoyced the more.

8 For though I made you ſorry with a letter, I do not repent, though I did repent; for I perceive that the ſame epiſtle made you ſorry, though it were but for a ſeaſon.

9 Now I rejoice, not that ye were made ſorry, but that ye ſorrowed to repentance: for ye were made ſorry after a godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing.

10 For godly ſorrow worketh repentance to ſalvation not to be repented of: but the ſorrow of the world worketh death.

11 For behold, this ſelf-ſame thing that ye ſorrowed after a godly ſort, what carefulneſs it wrought in you, yea, what clearing of your ſelves, yea, what indignation, yea, what fear, yea, what vehement deſire, yea, what zeal, yea, what revenge! in all things ye have approved your ſelves to be clear in this matter.

12 Wherefore though I wrote unto you, I did it not for his cauſe that had done the wrong, nor for his cauſe that ſuffered wrong, but that our care for you in the ſight of God might appear unto you.

13 Therefore we were comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the joy of Titus, becauſe his ſpirit was refreſhed by you all.

14 For if I have boaſted any thing to him of you, I am not aſhamed; but as we ſpake all things to you in truth, even ſo our boaſting which I made before Titus is found a truth.

15 And his inward affection is more abundant toward you, whilſt he remembreth the obedience of you all, how with fear and trembling you received him.

16 I rejoyce therefore that I have confidence in you in all things.

This chapter contains,

I. An exhortation, by way of inference from the former promiſes, to purity and holineſs, ver. 1.

II. An exhortation to bear the like affection to his perſon and doctrine, as he doth to them, (1.) becauſe he hath given them no occaſion by any miſcarriage to do otherwiſe, ver. 2. amplified by a removal of any ill end in ſpeaking this, ver. 3.—(2.) Becauſe he has teſtified that he bears a great affection to them, ver. — 3. which he endeavours to prove, (1.) By his freedom to them, glorying of them, and comfort by them, ver. 4. (2.) By the comfort he received in his troubles, upon the report that Titus made to him of their affairs, ver. 5--7. (3) By his rejoycing for the happy iſſue and effect of their ſorrow, viz. repentance to ſalvation; wherein the occaſion of their ſorrow, his letter, the continuance of their ſorrow, but for a ſeaſon, ver. 8. and the occaſion of his rejoycing is expreſſed by negatively, and affirmatively, ver. 9. and amplified by ſhewing,

(1.) The nature of godly ſorrow, and worldly ſorrow, ver. 10. (2.) The excellent fruits and effects of their ſorrow, which ſhewed it to be godly, ver. 11. (3.) The reaſon of his writing to them, expreſſed negatively and poſitively, to ſhew his care of them, which he affirms, ver. 12. and proves by his comfort. (1.) In the ſucceſs thereof, which was their reformation. (2.) For their kindneſs to Titus, ver. 13. amplified by Titus's experience of the truth of what he ſaid to him concerning them, ver. 14. and alſo by Titus's affection to them for their obedience and kindneſs to him, ver. 15. And ſo,

III. Concludes the whole ſubject by ſhewing his own rejoycing concerning them, ver. 16.

Ver. 1. Having therefore theſe promiſes.] That God will receive you, and will be a father unto you, &c. See ch. vi. ver. 17, 18.

Ver. 4. — I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation.] Becauſe I am informed that you mourn, and repent of your tranſgreſſion and ſin; ſee ver. 8—13.

CHAP. VIII.

1 He ſtirreth them up to a liberal contribution for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, by the example of the Macedonians, 7 by commendation of their former forwardneſs, 9 by the example of Chriſt, 14 and by the ſpiritual profit that ſhall redound to themſelves thereby: 16 Commending to them the integrity and willingneſs of Titus, and thoſe other brethren, who upon his requeſt, exhortation, and commendation, were purpoſely come to them for this buſineſs.

MOreover, brethren, we do you to wit of the grace of God beſtowed on the churches of Macedonia.

2 How that in a great trial of affliction, the abundance of their joy, and their deep poverty, abounded unto the riches of their liberality.

3 For to their power (I bear record) yea, and beyond their power, they were willing of themſelves.

4 Praying us with much entreaty, that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowſhip of the miniſtring to the ſaints.

5 And this they did, not as we hoped, but firſt gave their own ſelves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God.

6 Inſomuch that we deſired Titus, that as he had begun, ſo he would alſo finiſh in you the ſame grace alſo.

7 Therefore as ye abound in every thing in faith, in utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us; ſee that ye abound in this grace alſo.

8 I ſpeak not by commandment, but by occaſion of the forwardneſs of others, and to prove the ſincerity of your love.

9 For ye know the grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that though he was rich, yet for your ſakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich.

10 And herein I give my advice: for this is expedient for you, who have begun before, not only to do, but alſo to be forward a year ago.

11 Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readineſs to will, ſo there may be a performance alſo out of that which you have.

12 For if there be firſt a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not.

13 For I mean not that other men be eaſed, and you burdened:

14 But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a ſupply for their want, that their abundance alſo may be a ſupply for your want, that there may be equality.

15 As it is written, He that had gathered much, had nothing over; and he that had gathered little, had no lack.

16 But thanks be to God, which put the ſame earneſt care into the heart of Titus for you.

17 For indeed he accepted the exhortation, but being more forward of his own accord, he went unto you.

18 And we have ſent with him the brother, whoſe praiſe is in the Goſpel, throughout all the Churches.

19 (And not that only, but who was alſo choſen of the churches to travel with us with this grace, which is adminiſtred by us to the glory of the ſame Lord, and declaration of your ready mind)

20 Avoiding this, that no man ſhould blame us in this abundance which is adminiſtred by us:

21 Providing for honeſt things, not only in the ſight of the Lord, but alſo in the ſight of men.

22 And we have ſent with them our brother, whom we have often times proved diligent in many things, but now much more diligent, upon the great confidence which I have in you.

23 Whether any do enquire of Titus, he is my partner and fellow helper concerning you: or our brethren be enquired of, they are the meſſengers of the churches, and the glory of Chriſt.

24 Wherefore ſhew ye to them, and before the churches, the proof of your love, and of our boaſting on your behalf.

In this chapter the Apoſtle,

I. Exhorts the Corinthians to a liberal and cheerful contribution to the poor Saints at Jeruſalem, and in Judea, and eſpecially by the example of the Churches of Macedonia, ver. 1. who, though under great affliction, and very poor, yet had cheerfully made a bountiful contribution, ver. 2. even beyond their ability, ver. 3. and had not only entreated Paul to accept of it, ver. 4. but had devoted themſelves, as well as their eſtates, to God's ſervice, ver. 5.

He deſires Titus to finiſh this work, ver. 6. and uſes many arguments to excite them to ſo good a work; as for example, that they may make it appear that they abound in this grace as well as in others, ver. 7. Amplified, (1.) By a removal of the ſuſpicion of impoſing upon them. (2.) A declaration of his true ends herein. (1.) Their imitation of the forwardneſs of others. (2.) As a proof of their ſincerity, ver. 8.

He urges to them the example of Chriſt himſelf, who became poor, that he might make us rich, ver. 9. Then

He puts them in mind of their former readineſs and good beginning, ver. 10. which he amplifies by an exhortation to perfect what they had ſo well begun, according to their ability, be it never ſo ſmall, ver. 11. enforced by a conſideration of God's acceptance of ſuch a gift; ver. 12. Beſides,

He more fully explains his meaning concerning the proportion of their giving, That it ſhould not be unequal; ver. 13. but by an equality; ver. 14. confirmed by the equity of that rule, which God ſet about manna; ver. 15.

II. He commends the perſons employed in this affair. And (1) as for Titus, he commends him for his care; ver. 16; and for his readineſs, ver. 17. (2) He commends another brother, for his excellent miniſterial abilities, ver. 18. and becauſe he was the perſon choſen by the Churches to be Paul's companion in carrying this relief; ver. 19. That all ſuſpicion of fraudulent, partial dealing, might be removed; ver. 20. and that their integrity to men as well as to God, might be approved; ver. 21. (3) The third brother alſo he commends for his forwardneſs and diligence herein; ver. 22.

To which particular, he adds a general commendation of them all together; ver. 23. And then

III. Concludes with an exhortation to improve themſelves to theſe worthy brethren according to his boaſting and commendation of them; ver. 24.

Ver. 1.—We do you to wit.] i. e. We hereby acquaint you.

Ver. 7.——As ye abound in every thing.] See 1 Cor. i. 5.

— In this grace.] Of adminiſtring out of your riches to the neceſſities of the poor brethren.

Ver. 8. I ſpeak not by commandment] See 1 Cor. vii. 6.

Ver. 9.——Though he was rich, yet for your ſakes became poor.] See Luke ix. 58. Philip. ii. 7.

Ver. 10.———I give my advice.] See 1 Cor. vii. 25.

— Forward.] Willing. Gr.

Ver. 12.——It is accepted according to that a man hath, &c.] See Mark xii. 43. Luke xxi. 3.

Ver. 15. As it is written.] In Exod. xvi. 16, &c.

Ver. 18.——The brother, whoſe praiſe is in the Goſpel.] Some following the opinion of Theodoret, ſuppoſe this brother's name was Barnabas; and Baronius and other ſome underſtand it of Silas: But all antiquity, and our beſt modern commentators, generally underſtand it of the Evangeliſt Luke.

Ver. 19.—Choſen of the Churches.] See Acts vi. 3, &c. xiv. 23. and 1 Cor. xvi. 3. and our general preface to the Epiſtles.

— With this grace.] Or gift, or alms.

Ver. 22.—Our brother.] Apollos is commonly underſtood in this place.

— Which I have in you.] Or rather, which he (Apollos being ſatisfied of your repentance and willingneſs to obey his doctrine and inſtruction) hath in you.

Ver. 23.—Our brethren.] See ver. 18. and 22. in the notes.

CHAP. IX.

1 He yieldeth the reaſon why, though he knew their forwardneſs, yet he ſent Titus and his brethren before hand, 6 And he proceedeth in ſtirring them up to a bountiful alms, as being but a kind of ſowing of ſeed, 10 which ſhall return a great increaſe to them, 13 and occaſion a great ſacrifice of thankſgivings unto God.

FOR as touching the miniſtring to the ſaints, it is ſuperfluous for me to write to you.

2 For I know the forwardneſs of your mind, for which I boaſt of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago; and your zeal hath provoked very many.

3 Yet have I ſent the brethren, leſt our boaſting of you ſhould be in vain in this behalf; that, as I ſaid, ye may be ready.

4 Leſt haply if they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we ſay not, you,) ſhould be aſhamed in this ſame confident boaſting.

5 Therefore I thought it neceſſary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, and make up beforehand your bounty, whereof ye had notice before, that the ſame might be ready as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetouſneſs.

6 But this I ſay, He which ſoweth ſparingly, ſhall reap alſo ſparingly: and he which ſoweth bountifully, ſhall reap alſo bountifully.

7 Every man according as he purpoſeth in his heart, ſo let him give; not grudgingly, or of neceſſity: for God loveth a cheerful giver.

8 And God is able to make all grace abound towards you; that ye always having all ſufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work:

9 (As it written, He hath diſperſed abroad; he hath given to the poor: his righteouſneſs remaineth for ever.

10 Now he that miniſtreth ſeed to the ſower, both miniſter bread for your food, and multiply your ſeed ſown, and increaſe the fruits of your righteouſneſs!)

11 Being enriched in every thing to all bountifulneſs, which cauſeth through us thankſgiving to God.

12 For the adminiſtration of this ſervice, not only ſupplieth the want of the ſaints, but is abundant alſo by many thankſgivings unto God;

13 (Whiles by the experiment of this miniſtration, they glorify God for your profeſſed ſubjection unto the goſpel of Chriſt, and for your liberal diſtribution unto them, and unto all men)

14 And by their prayer for you, which long after you, for the exceeding grace of God in you.

15 Thanks be unto God for his unſpeakable gift.

In this chapter the Apoſtle,

I. Shews the needleſsneſs of his preſſing them any further about the collection; (1.) aſſerted, ver. 1. and (2.) proved by their forwardneſs long ago, ver. 2.

II. Excuſes his earneſtneſs with them for it, and ſending the brethren to gather it. (1) That they may be fully ready; ver. 3. (2) To prevent occaſion of ſhame; ver. 4. (3) That it may be a bountiful contribution; ver. 5. Hereupon

III. He exhorts them to a bountiful contribution, becauſe their reward ſhall be anſwerable; ver. 6.

IV. He directs them concerning the manner, That they do it cheerfully; becauſe ſuch a manner is loved of God; ver. 7. and will be rewarded by him, who will reward the bounteous giver with greater abundance for all ſuch like occaſions; ver. 8. (1) confirmed by a teſtimony of Scripture; ver. 9. (2) amplified by a prayer for a large return of their liberality; ver. 10. Beſides, ſays he, it cauſes others to thank God for us; ver. 11. amplified by a recital of two good effects of charity; (1) The ſupply of the wants of others; and (2) praiſe to God; ver. 12. proved, becauſe hereby they plainly diſcover your obedience to the commands of the Goſpel; ver. 13. Moreover, it engages the neceſſitous to pray for their benefactors, and to ſollicit God for their proſperity; ver. 14. And thus,

V. He cloſes all with a thankſgiving to God for giving them both hearts and ability for this work; ver. 15.

Ver. 1.—The miniſtring to the Saints.] See 1 Cor. xvi 1.

Ver. 6.———He which ſoweth bountifully, ſhall reap bountifully.] Where obſerve, that the deſign and ſcope of this and the former chapter is the ſame, as I have ſhewn by the analyſis, to exhort and ſtir up the Corinthians to contribute freely to the relief of the poor Saints at Jeruſalem, who were at that time in great want, by reaſon of a general dearth. Upon which occaſion the Apoſtle uſeth a great deal of honeſt art and inſinnuation, and ſome powerful arguments, as the example of the Macedonians, ch. viii. 1, 2. who in a great trial of afflictions, and the depth of poverty, contribute liberally to the neceſſities of theſe Chriſtians; but eſpecially the example of Chriſt, who, though he was rich, yet for our ſakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich, ch. viii. 9.

This he doth, not merely to perſwade the Corinthians to a contribution; for he knew their forwardneſs in this charity, and had boaſted of it to them of Macedonia; ch. ix. 2. but to provoke them to a holy and generous emulation, in contributing freely to their poor brethren, upon ſo preſſing and extraordinary an occaſion.

The exact proportion of their charity, or how much one ſhould give, he doth not determine; becauſe that muſt be meaſured according to the ability of him that giveth: But he tells them for their encouragement, that the more they give, the more they ſhall receive from God; that charity reached out to ſuch objects, is like unto ſeed ſown by a wiſe husbandman in a good ſoil: If their works of charity be ſown with a free and cheerful heart, and an open hand, they may expect a rich and plentiful harveſt; they that ſow bountifully, ſhall reap bountifully. Therefore, This Scripture naturally leads us to conſider charity as preſcribed by the Apoſtle by

A Diſſertation on Liberality.

In the management of this Diſſertation, I ſhall follow the directions of the Apoſtle in the context, and conſider, firſt, as he has done the meaſures of charity, implied in theſe words, He that ſoweth bountifully; and ſecondly, the great encouragement given to ſuch a degree and proportion of charity, thus plainly expreſſed, ſhall reap bountifully. And,

1. As to what concerns the proper meaſures of charity.

It is a duty of a common, but unequal obligation; all men are obliged to it, that have ſo much as a natural poſſibility or power to perform it; yet ſome are more ſo than others, becauſe they have a greater power. And therefore the ſpirit of God in Scripture hath preſcribed no ſet bounds and meaſures to charity; but left it to the diſcretion of the prudent Chriſtian, how to proportion his own free-will offering; Every man according as he purpoſeth in his heart, ſo let him give, not grudgingly, or of neceſſity, for God loveth a cheerful giver, ver. 7. and Deut. xv. 7. So that the nature of charity is ſuch, that it muſt be free and unconſtrained; I do not mean, that it is a thing indifferent, and of choice, whether we will be charitable or no; but that the proportions muſt be free, ſo as not to be enforced by any other obligations, than what our own conſciences, and the love of God and our neighbour, lay upon us: Otherwiſe it is not, ſtrictly ſpeaking, private charity; but a publick rate or aſſeſment, exacted under a penalty, and paid in obedience to a poſitive humane law.

But tho' no ſpecial meaſures and proportions can be aſſigned to charity; yet this general rule, preſcribed by the Apoſtle, at ver. 7. ought always to be obſerved, and not to give ſparingly, but liberally. This (as was hinted before) is implied in the metaphor of ſowing, here uſed by the Apoſtle, and by Solomon, Eccleſ. xi. 6. In the morning ſow thy ſeed, and in the evening with-hold not thine hand. Of the ſame ſignificancy are thoſe other phraſes of ſcattering, and diſperſing, and caſting our bread upon the waters; of opening the hand wide, ſtretching, and reaching it out to the poor and needy. All which expreſſions plainly denote a free and liberal charity. Tho' this ought to be more or leſs in proportion to our ability or eſtate; ſo the ſon of Sirach adviſeth, according to thine ability ſtretch out thine hand and give, Eccluſ. xiv. 13. and, give unto the moſt High according as he hath enriched thee. To the ſame purpoſe is the counſel of good old Tobit to his ſon, Give alms ἐκ τῶν ὑπαρχόντων, according to thy ſubſtance;———If thou haſt abundance, give alms accordingly; if thou haſt but a little, be not afraid to give of that little; Tobit vii. 8.

This is the true ſtandard of charity; we are to give alms of ſuch things as we have, and according to what we have: And herein we have the practice of the firſt Chriſtians for our example and imitation, who determined every one according to his ability to ſend relief unto the brethren, Acts xi. 29.

This rule, notwithſtanding, is not to be obſerved ſo ſtrictly, but that in caſes of great extremity and urgent neceſſity, we are to exceed in this proportion, and, with the Macedonians, give even above our ability; as conſidering on ſuch occaſions, not ſo much our own convenience, as the preſent diſtreſs, and the preſſing wants of our Chriſtian brethren. And

This may be reaſonably expected from us. For, whereever God gives a man an eſtate, he charges it with certain penſions and proviſions, as conditions of his tenure, which, during the ſpace of his poſſeſſion, he is bound to diſpenſe. We are not ſo far maſters and proprietors of any thing we poſſeſs, as not to be accountable to our great Donor, whether we have diſpoſed of, and employed it faithfully to thoſe ends for which it was given us. The poor have a title and claim to a ſhare with us; a title which they derive from the Sovereign Lord of the univerſe, who, in the original donation of things, hath ſo provided, that, after allowance made for our own real occaſions and neceſſities, we ſhould relieve and ſupport our poor neighbours. For,

What other reaſon can be aſſigned for that viſible difference and unevenneſs in the outward condition and circumſtances of men? It had been eaſy for God to have made a more equal diſtribution of things, to have levelled mens eſtates, and given every man a competency; but ſince he hath thought fit to contrive things ſo, that ſome ſhould be rich and others poor, we cannot reaſonably doubt, but that he intended, that the exigencies of the one ſhould be ſupplied out of the abundance of the other. And,

Seeing he hath not preſcribed any fixt meaſures of our charity, but left them to every man's own diſcretion, it is a plain argument that he repoſeth a firmer confidence in us, and lays a greater obligation upon us to act in this matter, as far as we are able: And how far that is, God knows better than we do ourſelves, nor can we think to deceive him. He ſees what other obligations we have upon us beſides charity; knows what allowances are to be made for our own comfortable ſubſiſtence, what proviſion for our families, and for the diſcharge of all other duties and offices according to our ſtation and character in the world; which are uſually thought reaſonable to ſet bounds to our liberality. God conſiders the true extents of theſe ſeveral demands upon us, what they do require, and what we may ſpare from them, together with the thoughts of our hearts, and the truth and ſincerity of our intentions, and will judge us accordingly.

When our Saviour commanded the young man in the Goſpel, to ſell all that he had, and give to the poor; it was done to convince him of ſome ſecret defect that lurked in his heart; and to let him ſee that he was not ſo ready, as he pretended, to do any thing to obtain eternal life. Our Lord knew that he was tainted with covetouſneſs, and the inordinate love of riches, which was a breach of one of thoſe precepts of the law, which he profeſſed to have kept; and therefore, to give him a ſight of this ſin, and of the imperfection of his obedience to the law, he brings him to this touch-ſtone, ſell that thou haſt, and give to the poor; and thou ſhalt have treaſure in Heaven. A precept of particular obligation upon this young man, and not a ſtanding rule to all Chriſtians, nor to be drawn into example at all adventures; and yet every one is ſo far concerned in, and obliged by it, that he muſt be always prepared in the purpoſe of his mind, moſt willingly to exchange the treaſures of this life for thoſe of a better; and to part even with his all, if Chriſt, by an expreſs command, as here, or by his providence, ſhould ſo require.

But now upon this pretence, that our Saviour in his Goſpel, hath not defined what proportion he ordinarily expects for works of mercy and charity, there are too many who from thence take occaſion to ſhrink up their charity to little or nothing, finding out ſeveral excuſes, which will not be admitted, nor will they have the face to plead them at the day of judgment. For they cannot but know, however they diſpute what that is, that charity to the poor, in proportion to the eſtate which God hath beſtowed upon them, is a neceſſary duty, and agreeable to that of the Apoſtle, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Let every man, as God hath proſpered him, lay by him in ſtore, for the uſes of piety and charity. They muſt likewiſe know, that a little, or what is next to nothing, where God hath given much, all circumſtances conſidered, is not properly charity. Certain it is, that it would not have been ſo accounted under the Moſaick diſpenſation.

The Jews, to whom God for the hardneſs of their hearts, thought it beſt to preſcribe particulars, and give poſitive laws for the relief of the poor, were bound to ſet apart the tenth of all their increaſe, every third year for that uſe, Deut. xiv. 28, 29. which with the tythe which was paid every year to the Levites, and the ſecond tythe, ſeparated after the other was paid, to be eaten in a feſtival manner at Jeruſalem, amounted to a thirtieth part yearly; beſides other extraordinary charities, ſuch as the reſtoring of the pledge, the borrowing without intereſt, the releaſe of debts in the ſabbatical year; and the large quantity of corn, which they were bound to leave in the corners of their fields, with the ears that fell, and the ſheaf that was left, &c.

This was the ſettled proportion of charity among the ancient people of God, the indiſpenſable duty of a Jew, without the doing of which he could not be accounted a juſt and righteous perſon. But,

A higher degree of charity was required to denominate him a good man, which was more than a legally righteous man, as may be gathered from the diſtinction Paul makes between theſe two, Rom. v. 7. But ſcarcely for a righteous man will one die, yet peradventure for a good man one would even dare to die. The ſcribes and Phariſees were the moſt accurate and punctual of all the Jews, in obſerving what the law required, even to the paying tythe of mint, aniſe, and cumin; but neglecting the practice of moral duties, and thoſe extraordinary and occaſional acts of piety, which were called mercy and goodneſs, their righteouſneſs was defective, as we learn from that place of our Saviour, Matt. v. 7. Except your righteouſneſs ſhall exceed the righteouſneſs of the ſcribes and Phariſees, ye ſhall in no caſe enter into the kingdom of Heaven.

And it is highly reaſonable, that Chriſt ſhould expect a higher righteouſneſs, and particularly a larger meaſure and degree of charity from the Chriſtian, than he did from the Jew, in proportion to the greater grace, and the more light he hath received under the Goſpel. However, this quota of a ſettled maintenance, which the Jews were obliged to, is ſo far a rule to us, that we ought not to fall ſhort of it; and the rather becauſe it is left to every one to determine himſelf in the proportion of this duty, by his own prudence, and the love of God; only with the Apoſtles caution and encouragement, that he that ſoweth ſparingly, ſhall reap ſparingly; and he that ſoweth bountifully, ſhall reap bountifully. And where there is a free and willing mind, there needs no other obligation nor direction.

Charity, which is nothing elſe but ſuch a habit or temper of mind, as diſpoſeth a man to wiſh well, and do well, to all his fellow-creatures, according to their ſeveral needs, and his own opportunities, will be a rule and meaſure to itſelf, and oblige him to imploy a proportional part of his ſubſtance in works of mercy. It will make him ready to diſtribute, willing to communicate, as often as an opportunity is offered, and the occaſions of doing good preſent themſelves; whilſt men of a contrary temper and diſpoſition are induſtrious to decline theſe opportunities, and to get out of the way of them; or when they cannot avoid them, to find out tricks and evaſions to ſhift off their charity.

A rich covetous miſer is never at a loſs to find a pretence to ſave his money: When a buſineſs of charity is propoſed to him, he is always prepared with an anſwer to excuſe his not contributing to it; and will ſuffer a good deſign to fall and die, and a poor family to periſh under his eye, rather than break a round ſum, or take never ſo little from a large heap. Whereas a man of a ſoft and tender mind is ready to every good work, moved with every pitiable object, and gladly lays hold on every occaſion of being helpful to thoſe, who are in hard circumſtances, not only by ſatisfying a preſent want, but by putting them into a condition of not wanting. The liberal ſoul deviſeth liberal things; contrives ways, and ſeeks out opportunities of doing good; and wherever he finds a proper object for his charity, there he is very bountiful and open-handed, either by giving him a ſufficient ſupply, or by lending him a ſum without intereſt, to put him into a method of living, or by ſome other way, which a willing mind doth eaſily ſuggeſt.

A well-diſpoſed heart is always ready to help the head to deviſe the moſt prudent and effectual ways of doing good, and to manage our charity to the beſt advantage: As it gives us a true ſenſe and feeling of the miſeries of our ſuffering brethren, ſo it teacheth us to fit and proportion our alms to their ſeveral needs, as God hath enabled us. And that we may be always in a condition to do this,

True charity will be careful to preſerve and encreaſe wealth, by cutting off all idle and ſuperfluous expences in our clothes, our houſes, our tables, our equipage, and ſuch other needleſs pomp and ceremony, as is more than our degree and condition in the world requires; by ſetting bounds to our appetites, and not ſpending that upon our ſelves and attendants, our vanity and vices, which ought to have been appropriated to pious uſes, and employed in refreſhing of thoſe poor and needy ſouls that want it.

In the uſe of theſe means, and the bleſſing of God upon them, the rich would be enabled to raiſe and maintain a conſtant fund for publick and private charities; and thoſe of an inferior fortune and condition would have a competent ſtock for the like pious purpoſes, upon any ſudden and emergent occaſion. We ſhould then have always by us in ſtore, (as God hath proſpered us, and we have opportunity wherewith to contribute our ſhare to a good work) a ſeparate purſe for the poor, a private bank for acts of piety and mercy. We might then charge our ſelves every year with ſome publick or private good to be done by us, for the promoting of the honour and glory of God, and the benefit of mankind; and when the year is ended, give God and our own conſciences an account of it. We ſhould not put off our charity, as too many do, 'till we come to die, and make our will; and then think to compound for all our uncharitableneſs, by leaving ſome trifling legacy, and giving God a ſmall pittance of his own, becauſe we can keep it no longer: But we ſhould diſtribute our wealth in our life-time, while we have power otherwiſe to employ it; and that in proportion to what God hath given us; who will not fail in his own time and way, to recompenſe us accordingly, either before, or at the great day of account. Which leads me

2. To conſider the encouragement promiſed to the liberal and cheerful giver, a reward proportionable to his liberality; he ſhall reap bountifully. Becauſe,

1. He ſhall reap a rich and plentiful encreaſe of temporal bleſſings; Bleſſed ſhall he be in the city, and bleſſed ſhall he be in the field. Bleſſed ſhall be the fruit of his body, and the fruit of his ground, the fruit of his cattle, the encreaſe of his kine, and the flocks of his ſheep. The Lord ſhall command a bleſſing upon his ſtore-houſes, make him plenteous in goods, and bleſs him in all that he ſetteth his hand unto.

It was upon this view, that the Iſraelites were encouraged to relieve their poor brethren; Thou ſhalt ſurely give unto thy poor brother; and thine heart ſhall not be grieved, when thou giveſt unto him; becauſe that for this thing, the Lord thy God ſhall bleſs thee in all thy works; Deut. xv. 10. The more diffuſed a man's charity is for the refreſhment of others, the greater abundance ſhall be poured upon him; The liberal ſoul ſhall be made fat; and he that watereth, ſhall be watered himſelf; Prov. xi. 25. He that hath pity upon the poor, fœneratur Deo, lendeth unto the Lord upon intereſt, and that which he hath given, will he pay him again; Prov. xix. 17. Our Saviour, to encourage us to abound in this grace, aſſures us, that a full and ample compenſation ſhall be made us for our alms and charity; Give, and it ſhall be given unto you: good meaſure preſſed down, and ſhaken together, and running over, ſhall men give into your boſom; for with the ſame meaſure that you meet withal, it ſhall be meaſured to you again; Luke vi. 38. To the ſame purpoſe ſpeaks our Apoſtle in this chapter; God that adminiſtreth ſeed to the ſower thereof, will miniſter bread to your food, and multiply the ſeed which you have ſown, and encreaſe the fruits of your bounty, which cauſeth through us thankſgiving unto God.

I might multiply texts upon this head without end; for there is not any ſingle grace or virtue whatſoever, to which ſo many liberal promiſes of temporal bleſſings are made, in the Scripture, as to this. But let me ſhew, 2dly. The vaſt and unſpeakable reward it will meet with in the other world, whither our works of piety and mercy will accompany us, and make way for our reception there. This is what our Lord means, where he bids us make our ſelves friends of the mammom of unrighteouſneſs, that when we fail, they may receive us, or we may be received, into everlaſting habitations; Luke xvi. 9. The mammon of unrighteouſneſs, is what the Scripture elſewhere calls deceitful riches; the diſpoſing whereof in ways of charity to the poor, will, when we leave this world and the enjoyments of it, make us friends in Heaven, and through the merits of Chriſt, procure for us, at the hands of a merciful God, an entrance there, and a moſt ample and eternal reward. The bleſſing of eternal life is in the Goſpel, in an expreſs manner entailed upon this grace, and, in terms equivalent, ſtiled bags that wax not old, a treaſure in Heaven, that faileth not; where no thief approacheth, nor moth corrupteth.

And what an encouragement is this to the charitable man, to be aſſured, that for, and in conſideration of his works of mercy, for feeding, cloathing, and viſiting Chriſt's poor members, he ſhall be rewarded with eternal life and happineſs; For parting with his periſhing wealth on earth, he ſhall receive incorruptible treaſure in Heaven? And the motive is ſtill the greater, when he conſiders, that proportonably to the degrees of his charity, will be the degrees of his reward; and that they ſhall not only continue, but be daily encreaſed, in proportion to the good his charity doth, and he ſhall do, to the world's end. Such muſt be the happy condition, ſo great the reward in Heaven, of the founders and benefactors of colleges, hoſpitals, and other houſes of charity; as the good done by theſe publick and ſtanding benefactions ſhall be always encreaſing, ſo will the degrees of their glory, 'till they ſhall ſhine as the ſun in the kingdom of their Father.

Ver. 8. And God is able to make all grace abound towards you; that ye always having all-ſufficiency in all things may abound to every good work.] This Scripture is the Apoſtle's encouragement to the Corinthians to prompt them to be ready and willing to contribute towards the ſupport of their neceſſitous brethren in Chriſt, the poor Chriſtians in Judea and Jeruſalem. And they are almoſt parallel to that advice or command of the ſame Apoſtle to Titus, where he ſays, this is a faithful ſaying, and theſe things I will that thou affirm conſtantly, that they which have believed in God, might be careful to maintain good works: Theſe things are good and profitable unto men, Tit. 3. ver. 8. From whence we may gather in what the true happineſs of man conſiſts, and by what means it is to be obtained. Now,

The happineſs of man in general, may be ſaid briefly thus, "to conſiſt in the having and doing thoſe things which are in their own nature good, and in their tendency profitable unto men." This is plainly the obvious ſenſe of the Apoſtle in this Scripture, and is ſupported by the cleareſt reaſon; for, whatſoever things are in their own nature good, if they are rightly uſed, muſt needs be in their tendency profitable to man; and whatſoever things are ſo profitable in their tendency, will undoubtedly make men truly happy. And this requires us to conſider what the happineſs of the preſent life is. Now,

The happineſs of man in this life is to be conſidered both negatively and poſitively: For, by the firſt conſideration, the falſe notions of men concerning happineſs will be confuted; and by the latter, a right opinion and juſt conception of it will be eſtabliſhed. Therefore,

Firſt, as to the negative part of the queſtion; the true happineſs of man in this life does not conſiſt in thoſe temporal enjoyments and endowments, in which ſo many ſeveral ſorts of men place their happineſs: e. g. It does not conſiſt in wealth, or the abundance of riches, which moſt men covet and purſue to make them happy here; which they take delight in as the chief, if not the only good they can enjoy, and that alone, of all the enjoyments of this world, in which their real happineſs conſiſts. But theſe men are very much miſtaken in their notion of true happineſs, as I could make it appear from many other weighty conſiderations, but eſpecially from the following reaſons.

1. Such men are very rarely, if ever, ſatiſfied with all that they poſſeſs; but how numerous or large ſoever their poſſeſſions are, they ſtill deſire more and larger, and lay out all their time, and care, and pains, to make additions to the ſtock of wealth they have already, and find it one of the greateſt difficulties, a moſt inſuperable task, ever to bring themſelves to think they have enough. And yet,

2. Though ſuch men are hardly ever ſatiſfied with riches, they are, however, often glutted with them; and that's another mighty hindrance of their happineſs. They may be daily wiſhing for yet more abundance, and always labouring to increaſe their ſtore, the love and deſire of wealth increaſing ſtill, as wealth it ſelf increaſes; and yet they may be, and often are, very anxiouſly concerned to know how, or where, on whom, or in what manner to beſtow what they already have and do enjoy. Like an inſatiable glutton, who is ſtill willing and deſirous to take in more, when his ſtomach is already over-charged, and the vaſt quantities of meat and drink he has let down does make him moſt uneaſy, and earneſtly deſirous to be diſburthened of it. Juſt ſo, I ſay, it is with many men, whoſe preſent wealth, though they cannot think they have enough, is yet a burden almoſt inſupportable, a load they would be eaſed of, if they knew but how or which way, without parting with it. On which account, it is ſo far from making its poſſeſſors truly happy, that it is indeed a great addition to their miſery; in that, though they cannot bring themſelves to think they have enough, yet neither do they know which way, nor in what manner to diſpoſe of what they have, at leaſt, not to their ſatisfaction. Neither is this the utmoſt of ſuch mens unhappineſs; for,

3. We may add to theſe, the care and trouble ſuch men have, not only to increaſe, but likewiſe to preſerve the ſtock of wealth they now poſſeſs, and the innumerable daily fears of accidents that may deprive them of ſome part of it at leaſt, if not the whole. It is a common obſervation, and it may be no leſs true than common, that it is not near ſo difficult to acquire an eſtate, as it is to keep it when acquired. And this puts rich men on the rack, to find out all imaginable ways and means, as to increaſe their wealth, ſo likewiſe to ſecure it; and after all their care and nice precaution, the ways they take, and means they uſe, prove often ineffectual to thoſe ends: Which ſtill augments their trouble and anxiety, and renders them daily more and more uneaſy and unhappy.

In ſhort, the wiſe man tells us, That riches certainly make themſelves wings, and flee away as an eagle towards Heaven, Prov. xxiii. 5. And experience does convince us, that as there are many ways whereby they are acquired; ſo there are many more whereby they may be loſt after they are acquired. So that what has been brought together by many years labour, care and induſtry, may be taken from us all at once, or by degrees, in very little time; and then the man is much more miſerable in the loſs, than before he was, or could be happy in the enjoyment of it.

4. And laſtly, Suppoſing wealth were as permanent, as it is inconſtant, and the man were ſure of enjoying all he has as long as he lives; yet, alas! How ſhort and uncertain is life it ſelf? No man can be certain of a year, a month, a week, a day, an hour, nor of a minute's longer ſtay on earth than he has lived already: So many diſeaſes and other caſualties do continually attend us, that the youngeſt and the healthieſt among us cannot be aſſured of any ſingle moments reſpite from the arreſt of death. Or, how long ſoever life may laſt, yet it is but ſhort at longeſt, at leaſt we think it ſo, and we muſt die at laſt; and then we muſt leave all behind us, we neither know to whom, nor how to be employed. And this one thought is of itſelf ſufficient to baffle all the fancied happineſs of wealth; which is the moſt and beſt that can be ſaid concerning it. For that which is not, cannot be compleatly ſatisfying, and yet may over-charge and cloy us with the nauſeous and inſupportable abundance of it; that which is accompanied with ſo much care, anxiety and trouble, both in the getting and the keeping of it; and that which one time or other we muſt quit, whenever our time is come to leave this world, if we do not loſe it long before: That thing, I ſay, which yields ſo little ſatisfaction, and in the enjoyment of it is attended with ſo much trouble and vexation, and is at beſt of ſo very ſhort continuance, can never make men truly happy. And this is the naked character of wealth; which therefore does not, and cannot conſtitute man's happineſs.

Secondly, Neither can the real happineſs of man conſiſt in worldly honours, and great, but temporal advancements, though theſe are commonly acquired by wealth, and on that account may be eſteemed a complicated good. For,

1. Theſe worldly honours and advancements are as far from yielding ſatisfaction to the minds of men as wealth. The greateſt favours of the greateſt earthly Prince can no way equal ſome mens wild and extravagant ambition; which even the higheſt pitch of greatneſs will not ſatisfy, ſo long as any other perſon ſits one ſtep above them. Nay, the more humble of mankind are apt to be deſirous, at ſome times, of climbing ſomewhat higher than they are already; and it is hard to find one man among a thouſand, who would not willingly aſcend to the top-round, if the poſt were offered to him. So reſtleſs is the ſpirit of ambition, with which the generality of men are more or leſs inſpired, that there are very few but would be willingly advanced above their neighbours, if they could fairly merit, or by any other lawful means accompliſh it. All which put together, ſhews that worldly honours do not, cannot ſatisfy the minds of men, and therefore cannot conſtitute their happineſs. But beſides this,

2. The ſatisfaction worldly honours yield, is not ſo little, but the dangers they expoſe men to are every whit, on the other hand, as great. Of all great men it may be truly ſaid, they tread in ſlippery places, and every ſtep they take they are in danger of a fall. The envy of inferiors, the jealouſy of equals, the power of ſuperiors, the fawnings of court-paraſites, the unſteady humour and mutable affections of the Prince; beſides the many frailties and failings to which the moſt wary politicians are ſometimes times ſubject, do all conſpire againſt a riſing favourite, to bring him down again, or at leaſt to hinder him from mounting higher. So that it is very rarely known that any man dies ſitting on the pinnacle of honour; but many more are thence thrown headlong to the ground, and often meet a death as ſudden as their fall. But,

3. To ſuppoſe the beſt, the man himſelf is mortal, and though the greateſt among many brethren is yet no more exempted from the ſtroke of death, than the meaneſt of the ſons of men. So the Pſalmiſt tells us, and our own experience does abundantly confirm it, That man being in honour abideth not, but is like the beaſts that periſh, Pſal. xlix. 12. That is, he muſt one time or other die, and turn to duſt, and be the food of worms, as well as the meaneſt of the creatures. And then he, that it may be while he lived was the firſt miniſter of ſtate, and greateſt next his Prince, is no way differenced from the meaneſt peaſant. He that while living held the plough is in as good a condition in the grave, as he that ruled a kingdom. Sceptres, by death, are levelled with chains and fetters; kings and beggars lie down together in the ſame earth, from whence they both were taken.

4. And laſtly, Be ſure there will be no diſtinction of the noble and the vulgar in another world, unleſs it be upon the ſcore of virtue; in which reſpect the meaneſt ſubject, who has been careful to perform his duty as he ought to God, his neighbour, and himſelf, will be exalted to God's right hand, far above all the principalities and powers of the earth; when, for neglect of holineſs and virtue, the greateſt monarch ſhall be bound in chains of darkneſs, and ſentenced to eternal miſery and wo, and thruſt down to the loweſt Hell.

Beſides, it is very likely that the richer and greater any perſon is on earth, greater degrees of piety and virtue are expected from him, in proportion, than from other men; and it is reaſonable it ſhould be ſo on ſome accounts, becauſe as his opportunities are more, ſo his abilities are proportionably greater; and therefore, it may be reaſonably ſuppoſed he will have more to anſwer for, if he neglects thoſe opportunities, and does not make good uſe of thoſe abilities to the glory of God, and the benefit of his neighbour. Beſides that, his good or ill example has a greater influence to the encouragement of virtue or of vice, by how much more illuſtrious his ſtation is than other mens. So that, in all reſpects, the great man's circumſtances are much more dangerous than others of a lower rank, not only as to this world, but chiefly as to that which is to come.

In ſhort, it is goodneſs only that can make men truly great and honourable in this, and procure them immortal grandeur in the other world. And ſurely, it is much more eligible to labour under the hardeſt circumſtances here, having a quiet conſcience, from a ſenſe of having done our duty to the utmoſt of our ſkill and power, and to be aſſured, on that account, of a future everlaſting ſtate of bliſs and glory; than to enjoy the utmoſt affluence of wealth and greatneſs, and all the while have cauſe to fear, and eſpecially at the hour of death, a future never-ending ſtate of ſhame and miſery.

We may believe the words of dying men, who have acknowledged this at laſt, how light ſoever they might make of it before. And we are told of one, (Sir John Maſon) in the reign of Edward VI. who ſeeing he muſt die, upon his death-bed called for his clerk and ſteward, and delivered himſelf to them to this purpoſe: I have ſeen, ſaid he, five princes, and have been privy-counſellor to four; I have ſeen the moſt remarkable obſervables in foreign parts, and been preſent at moſt ſtate-tranſactions for thirty years together, and I have learned this after ſo many years experience; that ſeriouſneſs is the greateſt wiſdom, temperance the beſt phyſick, a good conſcience the beſt eſtate; and were I to live again, I would change the court for a cloyſter, my privy-counſellor's buſtles for an hermit's retirement, and the whole life I lived in the palace, for one hour's enjoyment of God in the Chappel. And he concluded with ſaying, All things elſe do now forſake me, beſides my God, my duty, and my prayers.

And much to the ſame purpoſe, we are told of another, (Sir Henry Wotton,) in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who had great honours conferred upon him, on the account of his near relation to the great favourite Robert Earl of Eſſex, was very intimate with the Duke of Tuſcany, and with James then King of Scotland, and afterwards of England too, had been ſent on ſeveral embaſſies to Holland, Germany and Venice; and after all, deſired to retire, with this motto, Tandem didicit animas ſapientiores fieri quieſcendo, That he had learned at length, that the ſoul grew wiſer, and conſequently, that a man was more happy in a private retirement, than it was poſſible for him to be with thoſe worldly honours, which were accompanied with ſo many troubles. In ſhort, the utmoſt of his aim in this life, for the future, was to be Provoſt of Eaton, that there he might enjoy his beloved ſtudy and devotion. And he was afterwards heard to ſay, That the day on which he put on his ſurplice, was the happieſt day of his whole life: It being the utmoſt happineſs a man can attain to here, to be at leiſure to be, and to do good. And my author tells me, that this great man never reflected on his former years, but he would weep, and ſay, How much time have I to repent of, and how little to do it in?

I ſhall only add one inſtance more, and ſo conclude this point; and that is of that famous miniſter of ſtate, Sir Francis Walſingham, in the ſame reign. A man, who by his merit, roſe to almoſt the higheſt pitch of worldly honour, next to ſovereignty itſelf; and yet a man, who growing very melancholy, as my author ſpeaks, but he ſhould ſay rather, very ſerious, towards the latter end of his life, wrote a letter to the then Lord Chancellor Burleigh, in which he expreſſed himſelf to this effect: “We have lived long enough, ſays he, to our country, to our fortunes, and to our ſovereign: It is high time now, that we begin to live to ourſelves, and to our God. For in the multitude of affairs that paſſed through our hands, there muſt be ſome miſcarriages, for which a whole kingdom cannot make our peace.”

And ſo much may ſuffice for the two prime enjoyments and allurements of this world, wealth and honour; to ſhew that either of them may procure a man much trouble and vexation, but neither of them, no nor both of them together, can make him really, that is, to his ſatisfaction, happy, even in this preſent life; and then much leſs can they procure his happineſs in that other life which is to come.

Thirdly, I think it may not be amiſs, to offer ſomething here, concerning publick fame; a moſt officious attendant on the rich and great, and therefore what may not improperly to be added in this place.

Now this is a thing, which from a principle of ſelf-love men generally court, and cheriſh with complacency, delight and ſatisfaction; and yet a thing, which can on no account be ſaid to conſtitute man's happineſs in this life, becauſe thoſe very perſons who are moſt deſirous of it, as they are moſt uneaſy if they have it not, ſo they are ſeldom, if ever eaſy when they have it. For,

1. When mens opinion of their own deſervings is ſo extravagant, as in many men it is found to be, that they can hardly ever think the publick fame does equal them, it is an almoſt perpetual and inſeparable torment and vexation to them, to think, as ſuch men are too apt to do, how far the praiſe of other men falls ſhort of their deſerts. Nothing is, nor can be a greater mortification to ſome men, than the thoughts of their not being praiſed enough. Which makes it an unhappineſs ſo very great to ſuch, to know themſelves too well; and a much greater ſtill, to have too great an opinion of their own worth and merits. For this laſt eſpecially makes them envious of other mens good fortune, as they eſteem it, when they find, or do but fancy that others are more applauded than themſelves: And he that is envious, is very ſeldom, if ever eaſy unto others, and never to himſelf.

And this uneaſineſs in thoſe that covet publick fame, is generally cauſed by a too immoderate ſelf-love, and an overweening opinion of their own parts and merits; of which they will, contrary to all equity and right, be their own judges, and ſo are led to think their own performances the beſt, and moſt deſerving of applauſe, and conſequently, that all the praiſe and fame that others meet with in the world, is ſo much taken from themſelves: Which makes them look awry upon all other men, though never ſo deſerving. And ſurely, for a man to labour under ſuch circumſtances, is to be far enough from happineſs in this world, if it does not tend to make him miſerable, both in this, and that to come. For, as the wiſe man tells us on the one hand, That before honour is humility, Prov. xv. 33.

ſo he has obſerved on the other hand, That pride goeth before deſtruction; and an haughty ſpirit before a fall, ch. xvi. 18. But,

2. Neither is exceſs of publick fame leſs irkſome to ſome men, than the deficiency of it is to others. Eſpecially to men of humble ſpirits, who are apt to look upon all commendations of their worth, how deſervedly ſoever they are beſtowed, as downright flattery; a thing they moſt abhor, at leaſt are very far from coveting themſelves, how prone ſoever they may be to be guilty of it to their neighbours. So that, whatever pleaſure men may fancy in ſuch publick fame, it is plain, that ſome are no more happy when it chances to exceed, than others are when it falls ſhort of their deſervings. And whether this exceſs, or that defect, be real, or but only fancied, is no matter; ſince both do tend apparently to make each ſort of men uneaſy and unhappy; the one, from a too low, and the other, from an as much too high opinion of themſelves. Beſides, we may conſider,

3. That publick fame, as it conſiſts in the applauſe of men, may be, and very often is, a publick error; mens judgments being very fallible, and their opinions often taken up on truſt. The original of ſuch publick fame, perhaps, is falſe; and then the propagation of it is no better than the ſpreading of a lye. And this may prove of no good conſequence to him who is the ſubject of it; but may rather be injurious to his reputation, whenever the falſhood happens to be diſcovered. At leaſt, ſuppoſing ſome things true, that may be ſaid in any perſon's commendation; yet the addition of any one, or more particulars, that are not true, will in all likelihood have a more powerful influence to depreſs, than all the particulars that are true can have to advance his reputation. For when many of the good things that are ſaid of any perſon, or but a few of them, appear to be falſe, there will not be wanting ſome, who will induſtriouſly inſinuate that not one of them is true. On which account, it is very plain, that publick fame, which at beſt is but the applauſe of a giddy and unſtable multitude, whoſe breath is as inconſtant as the wind, which ſometimes blows one way, ſometimes another, as the humour takes, cannot conſtitute man's happineſs, becauſe it is inſufficient to ſecure one part of it, his reputation.

4. To all this I might add, the dangers men are liable unto from publick fame, with relation to their future ſtate; as it is apt to make them proud and ſelf-conceited, haughty and high-minded towards other men, who are at leaſt as much, it may be more deſerving than themſelves, and ſo may put them upon ſuch courſes as will infallibly undo them to all eternity in another world, however they may fare in this. Whereas it is a Goſpel rule, which all men muſt obſerve in this life, if they will be happy in the next, That a man ſhould not think more highly of himſelf, than he ought to think; but that he ſhould think ſoberly, according to God's dealings to him; Rom. xii. 3. The Apoſtle there ſpeaks of ſpiritual gifts, of which ſome men, it ſeems, were apt to boaſt, and on the account of which they would exalt themſelves, at leaſt in their own conceits, above their fellow Chriſtians; and he mentions faith for all, which is the mother of all graces. And therefore we may very reaſonably conclude from hence, That if men muſt not think more highly of themſelves than they ought to think, on the account of ſpirituals, much leſs ought they ſo to do on the account of temporals; becauſe theſe are of much leſs moment than the other, as concerning only a preſent, ſhort, and momentary happineſs; whereas thoſe others do concern a happineſs, which is future and eternal.

In ſhort, and to conclude this point; the love of human praiſe and commendation makes many men neglect to do thoſe things, which would make them be approved of God in this life, and rewarded by him in a better. Of which we have a famous inſtance in the Goſpel of John; who tells us in the 12th chapter, That among the chief rulers, many believed on our Saviour, but becauſe of the Phariſees they did not confeſs him, leſt they ſhould be put out of the ſynagogue, For they loved the praiſe of men, more than the praiſe God; ver. 42, 43. And ſurely, that is a miſerable kind of happineſs, if I may ſo expreſs it, which tempts men to run counter to their duty; and their higheſt intereſt, as publick fame and the applauſe of men, have often done. The up-ſhot is, That it is not he whom men alone commend or praiſe, but he whom God commends, that is approved and truly happy in this preſent life, and will be for ever ſo approved and happy in the life to come. Now,

Fourthly, Another thing in which a great many place their happineſs, at leaſt in this life, is pleaſure; which I ſhall conſider, as it may intend,

Firſt, Thoſe actions, which, how grateful ſoever they may ſeem to ſenſe, are yet both evil in their nature, and hurtful in their conſequences. Or,

Secondly, Thoſe recreations, which are as innocent, as they ſeem to be pleaſant and delightful. And I ſhall ſhew, that neither of theſe can truly be ſaid to conſtitute man's happineſs in this preſent life; beſides that the firſt do naturally, and the latter may accidentally tend to his prejudice in that life which is to come.

Firſt then, Let us conſider pleaſure, as ſome men take it to conſiſt in thoſe actions, which however grateful they may ſeem to ſenſe, are yet both evil in their nature, and hurtful in their conſequences. And it is impoſſible that theſe ſhould conſtitute man's happineſs in this life, for the following reaſons.

1. Becatſe the happineſs of man cannot conſiſt in any thing, but what is in its own nature good. By evil actions here, I mean all ſuch as either by the light of nature do appear to be inconſiſtent with a vitruous life, or are forbidden by the law of God; and on theſe accounts are ſtiled in Scripture, The pleaſures of ſin, and are ſaid to be but for a ſeaſon; Heb. xi. 25. that is, of ſhort continuance. Therefore,

2. Suppoſing them grateful to our ſenſes at the preſent; yet, as their being in their own nature evil is one reaſon, ſo their ſhort continuance is another, why ſuch actions cannot conſtitute our happineſs. For none but thoſe pleaſures that are moſt durable, can make us truly happy; whereas all ſinful pleaſures, if they are not, as many times they are, ungrateful in the very act; yet all the fancied gratefulneſs and ſweetneſs of them is gone as ſoon as that is over; and men are often more uneaſy, and conſequently more unhappy, after the ſhort enjoyment of them, than they were before, or perhaps ever would have been if they never had enjoyed them. And therefore, ſuppoſing theſe pleaſures of ſin to be as pleaſant and delightful to our ſenſes, as human fondneſs can imagine, while we are acting or enjoying of them; yet, ſince they ſatisfy and pleaſe no longer than they are enjoyed, but all the pleaſure of them vaniſhes with each ſingle act, or repeition of them; if nothing worſe ſhould follow the enjoyment, this reaſon is of it ſelf ſufficient to ſhew how far they are from giving man that real and ſubſtantial happineſs, of which he is by nature capable, and for which he ſeems to have been made. But,

3. Another reaſon, and one of greaterer force, to prove that ſinful pleaſures cannot conſtitute man's happineſs, is this; That they are not only evil in themſelves, and of ſo ſhort duration, but likewiſe extremely hurtful and pernicious in their conſequences.

There are ſome ſinful actions, to which men give the name and character of pleaſure, which have a manifeſt, and even natural tendency to bring all kinds of miſery, in this world and another, upon ſuch perſons as purſue and practiſe them. Such, in particular, are thoſe two great and crying ſins, whoredom and drunkenneſs; which are of dreadful conſequence ſingle and apart, and much more ſo, when both together, as they too often are. How many are the miſchiefs, and how great, that either of them ſingly, and how many more and greater, that both of them, when met together in one perſon, may, and have often plunged men into, to their preſent and eternal ruin? What diſeaſes of the body? What anxieties, vexations and horrors of ſoul? What ruin and deſolation to eſtates and families? What perils often to the lives of men? And what miſerable ends of men at laſt, have theſe debauches cauſed? And, to be ſure, what an eternity of miſery and wo do theſe extravagancies expoſe men to in another world, however they may fare in this? And yet, theſe are by many look'd upon as pleaſures of the preſent life, and thought to conſtitute its happineſs, than which there cannot be a more abſurd and falſe conceit. For were there nothing worſe to follow, than the ſtings and twinges of the conſciences of ſuch perſons, theſe are ſufficient to evince, that happineſs cannot conſiſt in theſe, or any other ſinful pleaſures. For while a man paſſes all, or the greateſt part of his life in fear of what will certainly, or but in doubt of what may follow in that other life which is to come; how can ſuch a man be truly happy here, who has ſuch fears or doubts upon him of what is like to be his lot to all eternity hereafter? But,

Secondly, If ſinful pleaſures cannot conſtitute man's happineſs in this life, as it is plain they cannot, the next enquiry I propoſed to make, is this; Whether this happineſs can be effected by thoſe recreations, which are as innocent as they ſeem delightful? And to this again, I muſt anſwer in the negative, for theſe reaſons.

1. Becauſe all kinds of recreations, how lawful and innocent ſoever, are of that general nature, that tho' they may weary, yet they cannot ſatisfy us. And ſurely, that thing, whatever it be, which a man may be weary of, but not ſatisfied with, can on no account be ſaid to make him truly happy.

There are ſome ſorts of pleaſures and recreations, which are not only innocent and lawful, but ſometimes neceſſary too, to give a little looſe and eaſe, a relaxation and diverſion to our weary minds, after they had been tied for ſome conſiderable time to the buſineſs of our lawful callings; and for the preſervation of our health, when that for want of exerciſe or moderate refreſhment may be in danger. On which account ſuch lawful recreations may be uſeful to us, as tending, in ſome meaſure, to promote our preſent happineſs; but they cannot conſtitute, or make up our happineſs, becauſe we may be, and generally are, ſoon weary of them, and they can never give us perfect ſatisfaction. Nay,

2. The conſequence of even lawful pleaſures is often found to be far otherwiſe; eſpecially to good and virtuous men, who are uſed to make reflections on their paſt behaviour, and who by making ſuch reflections, are not only very apt to fear, but do often find that ſomething has been done amiſs, as not agreeing to their duty, if not quite contrary to it, in ſome reſpect or other. If it be only, that they have laid out on pleaſure, otherwiſe lawful and innocent enough, ſome part of their ſhort and precious time, which they are afterward convinc'd might have been ſpent ſome other way to a much better purpoſe, either in God's ſervice, or for the benefit of their neighbour, or to improve themſelves in holineſs and virtue; theſe conſiderations are enough to turn all the fancied ſweets of the moſt innocent and uſeful recreations into bitterneſs, to make the mind uneaſy, and the man by conſequence unhappy, for the time that theſe reflections laſt. And if they may, in any one reſpect, prove the cauſe of after-trouble to the minds and conſciences of men, then, it is plain, they can on no account be ſaid to conſtitute their happineſs.

3. Another reaſon why worldly pleaſures, how lawful and innocent ſoever, cannot conſtitute our happineſs, is this; becauſe the delight men ſeem to take therein is not durable, but very ſhort and momentary; like an ignis fatuus, a ſudden flaſh or vapour in the night, which vaniſhes almoſt as ſoon as it appears, and leaves bewilder'd travellers at a loſs, to know from whence it came, or whither it is gone, and wholly at a ſtand, to think which way to ſteer their courſe, after ſo ſtrange a diſappointment. And this was the reaſon why our Right Reverend Biſhop Hall would not afford a place for pleaſure in his catalogue of Worldly Goods; becauſe, as he obſerves, in his Treatiſe of Contentation, it dies in the bud, and therefore is not worthy to be mention'd as any part of earthly happineſs, or what by men is ſo accounted.

4. And laſtly, Theſe earthly pleaſures, how ſweet as well as innocent ſoever they may ſeem to men in time of health, can yield no eaſe nor ſatisfaction, nor the leaſt delight to perſons in the time of ſickneſs, and much leſs at the hour of death; becauſe the man is then unable to purſue, as well as not at leiſure to enjoy them. The time, he then conſiders, is approaching, when he muſt give an account of all the time he to that day has lived; and therefore he muſt, in order thereunto, ſo ſtate and ballance his accounts, if poſſible, before he goes from hence, that he may meet his Lord and Maſter coming in the clouds to judge the world with joy, and not with fear and trembling, and make his title ſure, if he has ſo behaved himſelf as to deſerve admittance, to the eternal happy ſtate of juſt and righteous ſtewards of God's gifts and graces, in another world, at his departure out of this.

At ſuch a time, to reflect on all the pleaſures men have taken in this life, will be ſo far from yielding any eaſe or ſatisfaction to their minds, that it will rather much increaſe their trouble in their ſickneſs, and be an additional reaſon for repentance. For then, perhaps, they will be forced to own the time has been too much that they have taken from their duty to ſpend upon their pleaſures, how innocent ſoever they have been; and ſo it will be much more difficult, than elſe it would be, to ballance their accounts, without acknowledging themſelves too much in debt to hope for mercy at the great tribunal of that righteous and impartial Judge, who will be ſtrictly juſt to give to every man his due, whether it be eternal happineſs, or everlaſting miſery, according as he ſhall then be found to have behaved himſelf.

The greateſt pleaſure, therefore, to a dying man is, a good conſcience, and the inward ſatisfaction of his mind at ſuch a time, from a comfortable ſenſe of having well performed his duty in all reſpects, to the utmoſt of his ſkill and power. Without which, the remembrance of all the earthly pleaſures he has taken and enjoyed, will prove an unſpeakable torment and vexation to him all the ſhort remainder of his preſent time, if they are not urged againſt him in another world, to make him miſerable to all eternity. So that, on ſome account or other, it will be found at laſt, when men muſt leave this world, if not long before, that no one earthly pleaſure, nor all that bear that name, can conſtitute their happineſs; becauſe they cannot always be delighted with them here, and they may be highly prejudicial, at leaſt can be no furtherance to their happineſs hereafter.

Fifthly, Neither can our happineſs in this life conſiſt in any external bodily endowments: Of which I ſhall mention only two; and they are, ſtrength and beauty. And, Firſt, For ſtrength of body, that is an endowment very often full of danger; and at beſt is always very uncertain.

1. It is an endowment full of danger, in that it ſo frequently puts the poſſeſſors of it upon hazardous enterprizes, in ſome of which their health and limbs, and in others their lives too, are in peril of being loſt. In all attempts, wherein much ſtrength as well as ſkill is needful, and the danger great, the ſtrongeſt man is apt to be moſt forward, or he is eſteemed a coward, or a ſluggard, if he is not: While the weaker ſort are for that reaſon oftentimes excuſed from hazarding themſelves, without incurring the leaſt reproach or ſtain to their reputation. Beſides, the ſtrong are often proud upon their ſtrength, and forward to attempt things wholly needleſs, as well as dangerous, only to ſhew to others what feats they can perform; which does not ſeldom prove of woful conſequence, not only to the loſs of health or limbs, but of their lives too boot. Whereas others, who are ſenſible of their want of ſtrength for ſuch performances, are wiſely careful not to put themſelves in danger by any ſuch attempts as they know to be ſo dangerous, and do with credit keep themſelves in peace and ſafety. On which accounts, ſhould ſtrength and weakneſs ſtand in competition, the latter would appear to be the greater happineſs, and more deſirable than the former; at leaſt, a medium betwixt both would with reaſon be accounted beſt. But,

2. Neither is ſtrength of body more full of danger, than it is uncertain: For, every fit of ſickneſs brings it down; and there are ſome that, without much ado, gain an entire and abſolute conqueſt over it. There are ſome diſeaſes, I might inſtance in the gout for one, that in a very little time enfeeble all the limbs, and make the ſtrongeſt ſhoulders ſtoop; and it is now no wonder, becauſe ſo very common, to obſerve the ſelf-ſame man, who yeſterday made all men flee before him, to day is glad to be beholden to other mens aſſiſtance; nay, is thankful for a woman's weaker help to hold him up, and lead him to and fro. And farther,

3. Suppoſing none of theſe diſeaſes happen, to deprive a man of ſtrength betimes; yet if his lifes continues long enough to make him old, then will his ſtrength decay, as his grey hairs appear, and as theſe latter multiply, the former will be leſs and leſs; till at length he cannot ſtir abroad, nor ſo much as move himſelf from off his bed, without the kind aſſiſtance of thoſe he has about him.

In ſhort, all human ſtrength, at beſt, is weakneſs, if compared with that of many other creatures; and therefore cannot make him happier, nor yet ſo happy as ſome of the inferior creatures are in that reſpect. If a man's happineſs in this life conſiſted of his ſtrength of body, Who was there ever of the ſons of men that could pretend to vie with ſeveral beaſts on earth, and fiſhes in the ſea? Eſpecially Behemoth and Leviathan, mentioned in the book of Job, chap. xl. and xli. one taken for the Elephant, and the other for the Whale, two creatures not to be overcome and taken by human ſtrength, though they may be, and ſo often are by human arts and wiles; and both, for their prodigious ſize and ſtrength, by far ſurpaſs the mightieſt of human race, and are much happier too on thoſe accounts, if happineſs conſiſts in bulk and ſtrength; which, I am verily perſuaded, none will ſay, after the mention of theſe two inſtances.

I might add, to all that I have offered on this head, to ſhew how far the utmoſt ſtrength of man is from conſtituting of his happineſs in this preſent life, the frequent temptations he is under, to make uſe of ſuch his ſtrength to wicked purpoſes, to the eternal prejudice of his future welfare in that other life which is to come. But what I have already urged may be ſufficient to put it paſt all doubt, that this external bodily endowment cannot on any ſcore be ſaid to conſtitute man's happineſs. And then,

Secondly, For beauty; this is an endowment, which, as it is generally deſired, ſo it may make its poſſeſſors proud or vicious, but cannot make them truly happy. Nay, I think, I may ſafely venture to affirm, that it often very much contributes to both the preſent and eternal miſery of many, both admirers and poſſeſſors of it.

It cannot make any perſon completely happy, even in this preſent life, for theſe two reaſons.

1. They that have moſt of it do very rarely think themſelves beautiful enough. Witneſs the many vain and fooliſh, not to ſay ſinful arts, whereby they ſo frequently endeavour to mend and rectify, or at leaſt to add more beauty, if by any means they can, to the moſt perfect human frame. For, by their own confeſſion, all the arts that are found out, and by ſo many beauteous perſons of both ſexes uſed, are deſigned to add, if poſſible, a greater luſtre to their beauty, and make it, if they can, more amiable and charming than it is by nature; and to this ſelf-ſame end it is, that every new invention, how vain and uſeleſs, and how chargeable ſoever, is yet made tryal of, to add, as they ſuppoſe, ſome new perfection to their natural ſhape or fairneſs. Which is ſufficient to ſhew, that the moſt exquiſite and perfect workmanſhip of God, even after all amendments that human wit and fancy can deviſe, does not give ſatisfaction to the minds of its poſſeſſors, and therefore cannot make them truly happy. But,

2. Suppoſe it could give ſatisfaction, after all that is or can be done; yet it is periſhing, and of no durable continuance. Some envious diſeaſe, or ſome unlucky accident, or at leaſt the wrinkles of old age, will certainly deface and ruin it. Nay, what a mighty change does the leaſt fit of ſickneſs often make? For beauty is ſo very thin, at beſt, the ſurface of the skin, which is but one remove from an inviſible breeze of air, being all the ſubſtance it can boaſt of; that a very ſmall diſorder breaks, if it does not utterly diſſolve it. And when it is gone, it is very difficult at leaſt, if not impoſſible, by all the arts that can be uſed, to bring it back again, or reſtore it in its firſt perfection.

Nor is this all that may be ſaid concerning beauty, that it is ſo unſatisfactory, ſo fading and unconſtant; but it does often prove a temptation and a ſnare, both to its poſſeſſors and admirers, and draws both the one and the other into ſuch vicious practices, as naturally tend to preſent miſchief, and to eternal miſery, if they leave this world, as it may be feared too many do, without repentance.

At leaſt, it expoſes its poſſeſſors to ſuch dangers and temptations, that it has been very often found a moſt difficult atchievement, either to eſcape the former, or to reſiſt, ſo as to overcome the latter. So that we may truly ſay, as Lemuel did; Favour is deceitful, and beauty is vain: but a woman that feareth the Lord, ſhe ſhall be praiſed, Prov. xxxi. 30. That is, not ſhe that is moſt beautiful and charming outwardly, but ſhe who makes virtue her chief ornament, and is moſt pious and moſt chaſte, whether ſhe be finely made to outward ſhew or not; ſhe is by far the more worthy of the two to be had in admiration.

And thus, I think, it does ſufficiently appear, that preſent happineſs does not conſiſt either in human ſtrength or beauty; becauſe they may not only prove dangerous and hurtful to us on ſome accounts, but they are likewiſe, at the beſt, uncertain, fading, and periſhing endowments, and therefore cannot make us truly happy.

Sixthly, Another temporal good to be conſidered, and the only one more that I ſhall mention, is, the internal endowments of the mind; which, as they are much more valuable, and much more laſting too, than any external bodily endowment, or enjoyment, ſo they may be thought, with a much fairer ſhew of reaſon, to conſtitute man's happineſs in this life, as well as to promote his happineſs in a better. Though I fear, upon enquiry, they will be found as ineffectual to make men truly happy, except they be improved to the ends of holineſs and virtue, as any of the other temporals that I have mentioned.

I ſhall inſtance but in one at preſent, and that is knowledge, the moſt excellent, and moſt deſirable of all endowments of the mind, and that which coſt mankind ſo very dear to purchaſe it; and after all, ſo ſhort of true ſubſtantial happineſs, if not accompanied with grace and goodneſs, that the moſt ignorant mechanick may often vie, in that reſpect, with the moſt profound philoſopher. For knowledge without virtue, is a certain mark, whereby we may diſtinguiſh men, and know one to be, not more happy, but more miſerable than another.

Let us take the word of (Sir Chriſtopher Hatton) a very knowing man for this; who a little before his death adviſed his relations to be Serious in the ſearch after the will of God in the Holy Word: For, ſaid he, it is deſervedly accounted a piece of excellent knowledge, to underſtand the laws of the land, and the cuſtoms of a man's country; how much more, to know the ſtatutes of Heaven, and the laws of eternity, thoſe immutable and eternal laws of juſtice and righteouſneſs? To know the will and pleaſure of the Great Monarch and Univerſal King of the World?

To which he added this juſt cenſure of all other knowledge; That could a man by a vaſt and imperious mind, and a heart as large as the ſand upon the ſea-ſhore, command all the knowledge of art and nature, of words and things; could he attain to a maſtery in all languages, and ſound the depth of all arts and ſciences; could he diſcourſe the intereſt of all ſtates, the intrigues of all courts, the reaſon of all civil laws and conſtitutions, and give an account of all hiſtories; could he do all this, and yet not know the Author of his Being, and the Preſerver of his life, his Sovereign and his Judge, his ſureſt and beſt friend, or his greateſt and worſt enemy, the ſupport of his life, and the hope of his death, his future happineſs, and his portion for ever; he would, for all his other knowledge, ſapienter deſcendere in infernum, with a great deal of wiſdom go down to hell.

We ſee then, that the happineſs of man in this life, does not conſiſt in any, nor in all the temporal enjoyments and endowments I have mentioned; and theſe that I have mentioned being by far the moſt material, and moſt worthy of our notice, if our happineſs on earth does not conſiſt in any, nor in all of theſe, I may ſafely venture to affirm, that it is impoſſible it ſhould conſiſt in any created good, of whatſoever kind, duration, or degree.

And yet, I muſt confeſs, that all theſe worldly goods, how inſufficient ſoever to conſtitute our happineſs, may be, and I ſhall now ſhew, briefly, how they may be, ſerviceable to it. And I ſhall briefly run them over once again, in the ſame order as we have left them.

And firſt, for wealth; this may be ſerviceable, and fairly contribute to our happineſs, if we are content with what we have, and look upon it as the gift of God, with which he has entruſted us, not only for our own, but alſo for our neighbour's benefit; and if we are careful to make uſe of it, as he deſigned we ſhould, when he at firſt beſtowed it on us.

That all the enjoyments of this world are the gifts of God, I ſuppoſe, I need not go about to prove at preſent; nor that he gives them to us for the benefit of others, as well as of ourſelves; ſince the rules and precepts of the Goſpel are ſo plain, and the encouragements it gives us to behave ourſelves according to thoſe rules and precepts are ſo many; ſee the notes on ver. 6. And from both theſe, nothing can be plainer, than to uſe theſe worldly goods, as God in his word requires we ſhould, has a natural tendency to our happineſs, in this life and a better. In this life, as it brings, if not an increaſe of all externals, yet, at leaſt, an inward peace of conſcience with it, from a ſenſe of having done our duty; which peace of conſcience is that alone, which ſweetens all God's bleſſings to us, and makes us happy in the enjoyment of them. And then, in that other life which is to come, the happineſs that waits on ſuch as, in compliance with their duty, thus wiſely manage and improve theſe earthly goods, to God's glory, and their neighbour's benefit, is inconceiveable, and will be eternal.

If then, for inſtance, we are charitable, in proportion to our ſtock of wealth, and ſet apart ſome portion of it, not to ſuperſtitious, but to truly pious uſes, we herein act as God would have us, and in purſuance of thoſe ends, for which he gives into our hands ſuch an abundance, and ſo make riches ſerviceable to, and inſtruments of, our preſent and eternal welfare.

Secondly, for temporal honours and advancements; theſe too are ſerviceable, and may be inſtrumental to our happineſs, if we exert our intereſt, and our power, to do all the good we can to our inferiors; if we are humble and compaſſionate, affable and courteous, merciful and helpful, and ready, as well as willing, on all occaſions, faithfully to ſerve, in our reſpective ſtations, and to promote, as much as poſſibly we can, the welfare of the commonwealth in general, and of every needy and deſerving member of it in particular. If we make uſe of our advancements in the world, to vindicate thoſe that are oppreſſed, and to right thoſe that are wronged; to adminiſter juſtice impartially to all that are under our power; to be ſo far from doing violence to any, as to do and procure all the right we can to all men; and, in a word, to ſee vice in all ſorts of perſons diſcountenanced and puniſhed, and virtue as univerſally encouraged and rewarded: If we thus make uſe of our greatneſs to all the ends of goodneſs, our advancement to high place and dignity in the world will be indeed a main part of our happineſs in this life, and will very much conduce to our eternal welfare in that which is to come.

Thirdly, For publick fame, or the applauſe of men; this likewiſe may fairly be ſuppoſed to contribute ſomething to our preſent, tho' not to our future happineſs, provided we take care always, and on all occaſions, ſo to demean our ſelves in our reſpective ſtations, callings and employments in the world, as to deſerve it; and are not puffed up with pride and ſelf-conceit, nor do behave our ſelves unſeemly towards other men on that acaount. And,

Fourthly, For pleaſures that are innocent and lawful, and made uſe of only to the ends for which they were at firſt ordained; they are ſo far from being, in and of themſelves, hindrances and obſtacles to our happineſs, that they may, on ſome accounts, very much further and promote it: As they may be ſerviceable to the preſervation of our health and ſtrength, which renders us more truly ſenſible of the benefit of all our other temporal enjoyments, than we can be without it. Provided only, that we take the proper ſeaſons for them, when ſo much time may lawfully be ſpared from the ſervice of God, or of our neighbour, or from our neceſſary lawful callings and employments; all which muſt be preferred, and firſt conſidered and attended by us. So likewiſe,

Fifthly, For ſtrength and beauty, and all other bodily endowments; theſe can be no diminutions of our happineſs in this life, if they are no additions to it; provided they are put to no ill uſe, nor made the inſtruments of any vice, but cheriſhed and improved to his glory, from whom we have received all theſe perfections, together with our life and being. And,

Laſtly, Above all, the internal endowments of the mind do mainly tend to the encreaſe of our happineſs in this life, and likewiſe to promote our future and eternal welfare, when we make uſe of all our faculties and powers to the advancement and encreaſe of holineſs and virtue. In a word, all the gifts of God are good, and tend, and are deſigned to make us happy, provided we are careful, as we ought to be, to employ and uſe them to the giver's praiſe. But otherwiſe, as I have ſhewn, all that we do, or can enjoy on earth, will be ſo far from conſtituting of our happineſs, that they will rather prove ſo many aggravations of our guilt and inſtruments of our preſent and eternal miſery.

And now, for confirmation of all that I have thus far noted, let me remember the example of the great and wiſe Solomon; who after many years expenſive ſearch for whatever was in learning, pleaſure, plenty, magnificent entertainments, variety and abundance of ſumptuous proviſions, and delicate diet, ſtately edifices, rich vineyards, numerous attendants, and vaſt treaſures; of all which he had the moſt free and undiſturbed and unabated enjoyment: For, as he ſays himſelf, He with-held not his heart from any joy; Eccl. ii. 10. I ſay, after ſeveral years, not only ſenſual, but critical fruition; and after all his endeavours to find out, as he tells us, all that good which God has given men under the ſun; after he had tortured nature, to extract the ſpirit and quinteſſence of all the enjoyments of this world, at laſt he prounces all to be vanity and vexation of ſpirit; and in the cloſe of his Eccleſiaſtes, he leaves this leſſon behind him, for the inſtruction of all ſucceeding generations; Let us hear the concluſion of the whole matter: Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man; chap. xii. 13. And he gives this reaſon, why we ſhould follow his advice, in the following words: For God ſhall bring every work into judgment, with every ſecret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil; ver. 14. I proceed now

II. To ſpeak to the poſitive part of the queſtion, and to ſhew wherein the happineſs of man in this life does conſiſt. And I ſhall inſtance in four particulars, in which all others are included.

1. Firſt, I ſay, one part of a man's happineſs in this life, conſiſts in a competent ſhare of the things of this world, and his being contented with his portion. And here, there are theſe three things to be conſidered.

Firſt, What may be fairly deemed a competent ſhare of the things of this world.

Secondly, What contentment ſignifies, and wherein it does conſiſt. And,

Thirdly, In what reſpects ſuch a competency, and ſuch contentment may be ſaid to contribute to our preſent happineſs.

That a competent portion of worldly goods, is at leaſt very uſeful, if not abſolutely neceſſary to our happineſs in this life, I can ſee no reaſon to deny; nor that we may endeavour by lawful means, to acquire ſuch a competency, in order to our happineſs. For, to inſtance only in theſe two preſervatives of life and health, food and raiment; how can thoſe perſons be accounted happy here, to whom either, or both of theſe are wanting? If preſent happineſs can be without theſe things, then no man can be ſaid to need them; and conſequently, charity is not a virtue ſo abſolutely neceſſary, as it has always been accounted. Nay, it would be no charity at all, to feed the hungry, or to cloath the naked, if the want of food and raiment were conſiſtent with mens preſent welfare, or happineſs could be where either of theſe are not. If therefore there be any ſuch thing as charity, and if that conſiſts in our relieving thoſe that are in want, or if this, at leaſt, be one kind of it; and if it be a truth, that want may make men miſerable, and ſuch relief may make them happy; then ſuch a competency of worldly goods, as we are now ſpeaking of, is not only very uſeful and convenient, but may be neceſſary too, to make our ſelves and others happy.

But then, the queſtion is, What may be fairly deemed a competency of worldly goods? To which I anſwer,

Firſt, That a competency does not ſignify ſo great an affluence and abundance of theſe things, as the exorbitant appetites of men may wiſh for, or aſpire after; nor is it an argument, that any man has not a competency, becauſe he thinks he has not. An unlimited deſire of more and more, cannot by any means be taken for a rule, whereby to judge of what is, or what is not ſufficient to make men happy. For if this ſhould be admitted for a rule, we ſhould find but very few that could attain to happineſs in this life, whatever fate they may expect or meet with in that which is to come. In ſhort, men may perſuade themſelves, or at leaſt they may, and do too often fancy they have not yet enough; when at that time they have much more than they know what to do with, how to manage, or which way to beſtow. And that is the reaſon, why ſuch vaſt abundance does often help to make men miſerable;

when, if they knew what was ſufficient, and would be brought to think it was, a much leſs ſhare of wealth, or other temporal enjoyments, would be enough to make them truly happy. Therefore,

Secondly, I ſhall define a competency to be ſuch a ſhare of worldly goods, as is ſufficient for us, enough to make a man as happy as he need to be in this life; ſuch a mediocrity as that which Agur wiſhed for; Give me, ſays he, neither poverty, nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me, or, as the margin reads it, with the food of my allowance; Prov. xxx. 8. The meaning of which requeſt, is briefly this: That he might neither abound to luxuriouſneſs; nor want, to diſtreſs: In either of which extremes, he knew he might be miſerable; but could in neither be ſo happy as he would be, or as he might in that middle ſtate which he deſired.

Now, to determine the juſt bounds of ſuch a competency, as this that I am ſpeaking of, with reſpect to each man's ſeveral ſtation and condition in the world, is a matter far above the reach of human wiſdom, and muſt be left to God alone, from whom we have our being, and who knows much better than we do our ſelves, what is convenient and ſufficient for us. And therefore, ſince we know that he has always ſome moſt wiſe and gracious ends in all his various diſpenſations; all that is required of us, and all that we can do in this affair, is to conclude, that all the ſeeming diſproportionate adjuſtment of his righteous Providence are wiſely ſuited to thoſe ends; and whatſoever ſtation or condition any man is in, whatever his portion of theſe worldly goods may be, it is ſufficient to make him happy, as having what is neceſſary to make him ſo, in ſuch, or ſuch a ſtate.

And this will yet appear more plain and obvious, by conſidering wherein contentment does conſiſt. And,

Firſt, It conſiſts in a cheerful ſubmiſſion to God's will and pleaſure, whatever it be concerning us; that we do not murmur nor repine at the diſpenſations of his providence, who knows much better than we do ourſelves what is convenient and ſufficient for us, to make us happy, agreeably to our preſent ſtate. And to this end,

Secondly, It ſignifies our making a right and good uſe of what we have; to wit, that if our portion of theſe worldly goods be ſmall, we ſhould live according to it, and not exceed our bounds by living higher than our ſtock will reach; which is the certain way to miſery and want, and all our hopes of new and large ſupplies will not excuſe nor juſtify us, nor in the leaſt mitigate the crime of ſuch extravagance. Beſides that, thus to ſpend beyond our preſent mean abilities, is a ſhrewd indication of our being not well ſatisfied with our condition, and that we are very far from that contentment, which is abſolutely neceſſary to make us happy under any circumſtances. And if our portion of theſe worldly goods be great, we ought to be content with ſuch a ſhare of our abundance, as is ſufficient to our preſent happineſs, according to our ſtation in the world; and, as the Apoſtle in this Scripture to the Corinthians teacheth, to look upon the overplus, as only lent us by a good and gracious God for the benefit of our needy neighbours, for whom we are truſtees and ſtewards, to diſpenſe a due proportion of thoſe bleſſings we enjoy in ſuch abundance, to ſuch as need, and have them not, and have not any other way, but by our juſt and kind benevolence, whereby they can come at them and be happy. And therefore,

Thirdly, Contentment ſignifies our not envying any perſon, on the account of the vaſt ſtock of worldly goods he has, in compariſon of what we do ourſelves poſſeſs: Which will appear unreaſonable, if we but conſider, that the more abundant wealth any man has, the more he has to do therewith, and ſo much more is ſtill required of him; that he can have no more than we, who are ſo much inferior to him on that account; that neceſſary food and raiment is all he can enjoy out of his vaſt eſtate, and we have theſe as well as he, though not ſo delicate and coſtly, yet as decent and as wholeſome; though not in ſuch abundance, yet enough to ſatisfy our hunger, and allay our thirſt, and to ſhield us from the injuries of heat and cold, and that is as much as we have need of, and more we cannot uſe.

In ſhort; a competency of theſe worldly goods, is that which is ſufficient to anſwer the demands of nature, and our preſent circumſtances; and with this we ought to be content, and not deſire more, becauſe no more is neceſſary to make us happy.

And that ſuch a competency, with ſuch contentment, do contribute to our preſent happineſs, is very plain; in that the firſt is all we can have need of, and all we can enjoy in order thereunto; and the latter is that which ſweetens what we ſo enjoy, and renders every condition, how mean ſoever, ſmooth and eaſy, pleaſant and comfortable to us. Whereas experience will convince us, that how great ſoever our ſtock of wealth may be, the greateſt part is overplus, and of no uſe to us, but to make others happy with it: And if we do not uſe it ſo, it is our miſery, and not our happineſs, as it ſerves to aggravate our guilt, and to increaſe our future condemnation. And if we have not learnt, as the Apoſtle ſays he had, in whatſoever ſtate we are, therewith to be content, Phil. iv. 11. our narrow circumſtances may make us truly miſerable, but the greateſt affluence of worldly goods, can never make us truly happy.

2. Our preſent happineſs is very much promoted likewiſe, by a moderate uſe of all worldly goods.

Now that I call a moderate uſe of worldly goods, when they are made uſe of only to the ends for which they were deſigned; when we are neither too extravagant on one hand, nor too niggardly on the other; when he that is rich does not live as if he were poor, nor he that is poor as if he were rich; nor either of them run into exceſs, but both maintain that due mediocrity which is decent, and ſuitable to their condition and circumſtances in the world.

For a moderate uſe of worldly goods does not ſignify, that all men ought to uſe them in the ſame proportion, or degree, or meaſure; that the rich ſhould not appear, either in their apparel, or in the furniture of their houſes and tables, more ſplendid and magnificent than the poor; nor that every man's neceſſities ſhould be meaſured by the ſame rule, or have the ſame proportion, neither more nor leſs, aſſigned them: But the meaning of it is, that all men ſhould ſhew much moderation and temperance in the uſe of theſe things, as that a due regard to their ſeveral qualities and eſtates may be preſerved, at the ſame time that the demands of nature are anſwered and ſatisfied.

It is true, the Apoſtle ſets before us all this general rule, that having food and raiment, we ſhould be therewith content, 1 Tim. vi. 8. But yet I cannot think he thereby meant, that men of all degrees ſhould be reſtrained and limited to one and the ſame meaſure; but only that every man ſhould be content with ſuch proportion of theſe worldly goods, as is agreeable to his quality and condition, and not exceed or go beyond the bounds that God has ſet him, nor be profuſe beyond the limits of his fortune, nor covet, nor make uſe of more, for his own part, than nature does require.

The Apoſtle cannot be ſuppoſed to mean, that rich and poor ſhould fare ſo much alike, as that the one ſhould wear no better cloaths, nor make more plentiful proviſion of meats and drinks for himſelf and family than the other: But all his meaning is, that as the poor ſhould be content with ſuch proviſion as their mean eſtate will furniſh; ſo the rich might make a better ſhew, but muſt be careful not to indulge themſelves to intemperance and exceſs.

And in this ſenſe only we muſt underſtand what the inſpired Preacher tells us in Eccleſ. v. 18, 19. It is good, ſays he, and comely for one to eat and to drink, and to enjoy the good of all his labour that he taketh under the ſun, all the days of his life, which God giveth him: for it is his portion. Every man alſo to whom God hath given riches, and wealth, and hath given him power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labour; this is the gift of God. This, I ſay, if underſtood as it ought to be, in a qualified ſenſe, does plainly ſhew, that rich men may, and ought to uſe their riches to diſtinguiſh them from other men, by making ſome more plentiful proviſions both of food and rayment than the poor can furniſh; provided only, that they uſe ſuch large proviſions temperately, and adapt them to the ends of charity and hoſpitality.

And now, that ſuch a moderate uſe of worldly goods conduces to our preſent happineſs, is very plain; in that,

Firſt, It does effectually anſwer and ſatisfy all the neceſſities and demands of nature, which is as much, in theſe reſpects, as any man can wiſh for, or enjoy; to be apparelled decently, and in ſome meaſure anſwerably to our quality and condition in the world, according as the ſeveral ſeaſons of the year require, and conformably to the modeſt cuſtoms and faſhions of the country in which we live; and not to want ſuch ſeaſonable and wholſome meats and drinks, as the waters, air, and earth afford, and are neceſſary to our health and ſuſtenance; and to be bleſſed with a competent ſhare of that, wherewith all theſe are purchaſed, is all the happineſs theſe worldly goods can yield us: And what is more than theſe, is more than we have need of for our ſelves, and therefore muſt be looked upon as given, or rather lent unto us, for the benefit of others who want thoſe neceſſaries which we enjoy, to make them happy too.

Secondly, Such a moderate uſe of worldly goods conduces very much to the preſervation of our health, and in that the continuance of our preſent happineſs: For, it is our being in a ſtate of health, that gives a grateful reliſh to all our other comforts and enjoyments of this life. Without this, all other earthly bleſſings will not make us happy; and therefore poverty, with health, is generally eſteemed more valuable, and by conſequence more eligible than all the riches in the world without it. And this we can no other way ſo effectually ſecure, as by a moderate uſe of worldly goods; but to uſe them without meaſure, is the ready way to diminiſh and deſtroy it.

Laſtly, Such a moderate uſe of worldly goods conduces very much to the improvement of all the powers of the body, and all the faculties of the ſoul; and renders men much more fit, and better qualified than otherwiſe they can be, both for buſineſs and converſation, which are two main ingredients of our preſent happineſs.

3. As a third ingredient of our happineſs in this life, is peace of conſcience, and tranquility of mind, reſulting from a ſenſe of having done our duty, according to the beſt of our knowledge, ſkill, and power.

It is a truth, which I believe every man, one time or other, does experience, that all the external goods this world can yield, are not ſufficient to make men happy, even in this preſent life, if they are not eaſy and at peace within. And no man can be eaſy in himſelf, whatever outward ſhew of ſatisfaction he may ſometimes make, ſo long as the guilt, or inward ſenſe of his neglects, or of any ſin that is not repented of, does ſtick upon, and prick and gall his conſcience.

An aching head, how violent ſoever for the time the pain may be, is much more tolerable than an aching heart; and all diſeaſes of the body are both much leſs afflicting, and more eaſy to be cured, than the diſtempers of the ſoul. The racking pains of cholick, ſtone, and gout, and all external and internal maladies, except a guilty conſcience, may find a remedy, or eaſe at leaſt, by phyſical applications; and for that reaſon may be better born: But the ſickneſs of the mind is not, without much more pain and trouble to be cured, and therefore is more grievous and afflicting, and leſs tolerable. And it is the wiſe man's obſervation, The ſpirit of a man will ſuſtain his infirmity; but a wounded ſpirit, who can bear? Prov. xviii. 14.

Now it is the ſenſe of our neglects and ſins, that cauſes all this inward trouble and uneaſineſs; for which we have no other remedy, but ſincere repentance, and a thorough reformation; but we muſt elſe for ever be in pain and torment, and cannot have a moment's eaſe, nor find the leaſt ſubſtantial pleaſure in whatever elſe we do, or can enjoy.

Whereas, the meaneſt and moſt wretched circumſtances, with a quiet conſcience, is a greater happineſs, by far, than the moſt perfect ſtate of health, the greateſt wealth, the higheſt honours, the moſt refined of earthly pleaſures, or all of them together, can adminiſter without it.

And this is no where to be found, but in his mind, who has been always careful, to the utmoſt of his ſkill and power, to perform his duty, and whoſe life and converſation has been anſwerable, in all reſpects, to the ends for which he had his being. For ſuch a man, and he alone, whatever outward troubles and afflictions may befal him, has that within him which will bear him up, and give him eaſe and comfort under all; and the inward peace of conſcience he enjoys, does fully recompenſe him for all that he can ſuffer, and is as much, and more to him, and renders his condition much more bleſt and happy, than any thing, or all that this world can afford without it.

In ſhort; a quiet mind is all the happineſs, and a troubled mind is all the miſery of this world; and as the former does, in a ſenſe, anticipate our future bliſs, ſo the latter gives us an afflicting foretaſte of our future torment and vexation. The beſt means therefore that we can make uſe of, in order to our happineſs, in this life and a better, are an unfeigned piety and devotion towards God, an incorrupt righteouſneſs and charity towards our neighbour, and an untainted ſobriety and chaſtity in reference to our ſelves; by which we ſhall effectually promote the glory of God, and the benefit and welfare of all other men with whom we are any way concerned; and ſecure the peace and quiet of our own conſciences, which as it is our greateſt happineſs in this world, ſo it gives us an earneſt of eternal bliſs and glory in that which is to come.

4. The fourth and laſt ingredient of our preſent happineſs, is a poſſible aſſurance of the favour of God, and of a title to a future never ending ſtate of happineſs in another world.

I ſay, a poſſible aſſurance of theſe things; by which I mean ſuch an aſſurance as we can have on this ſide Heaven it ſelf; ſuch an aſſurance as the Goſpel gives to all that believe and obey it, and which we can no other way attain unto, but by true faith and ſincere obedience. So that, this aſſurance of the favour of God, and of a title to future happineſs, is nothing elſe but the teſtimony of our conſciences that we have, to the utmoſt of our ſkill and power, perform'd our duty in all reſpects; and on the account of ſuch performance have an undoubted right to all the privileges and promiſes of the Goſpel.

And what can that man need to make him happy in this life, who is thus aſſur'd? What are riches, honours, any, or all the enjoyments of this world, in compariſon of ſuch a bleſſed and comfortable aſſurance of an eternal happy ſtate in the world to come? For not only his own conſcience bears witneſs for him, but the ſpirit of God too aſſents to the teſtimony of his ſpirit, that he is a Son of God, and, as ſuch, has a right to his grace and favour in this preſent life, and a title to an everlaſting glorious inheritance in a better life to come, Rom. viii. 16. And therefore he goes on with courage, and conſtancy, and perſeverance, to perform all that he knows to be his duty, and whatever outward troubles and afflictions he may meet with in his pilgrimage through this vale of tears, yet, being careful, all along the way, to keep a conſcience void of offence towards God and men, he has always inward peace and ſatisfaction, and at laſt finiſhes his courſe with joy, and dies, not only in hope, but with an unſpeakably comfortable aſſurance of entring immediately on a ſtate of unexpreſſible and never ending happineſs and glory.

To conclude; as Paul tells Titus, ch. iii. 8. This is a faithful ſaying, that is, a true and ſaving doctrine, That they who believe in God, ſhould be careful to maintain good works; becauſe theſe things are good and profitable unto men. They are good, as they are preſcribed by him who is goodneſs itſelf, and requires nothing of us, but what, if we comply with it as we ought, ſhall be for our good one way or other. And they are profitable likewiſe, as they plainly tend to our happineſs in this life and a better. For ſo the ſame Apoſtle tells us in another place, Godlineſs is profitable unto all things, having promiſe of the life that now is, and of that which is to come, 1 Tim. iv. 8. And this alſo is the ſenſe of the context: He hath diſperſed abroad; he hath given to the poor: His righteouſneſs remaineth for ever, being enriched in every thing to all bountifulneſs; which cauſeth through us thankſgiving to God. For the adminiſtration of this ſervice, not only ſupplieth the want of the Saints, but is abundant alſo by many thankſgivings unto God, &c. ver. 9, &c.

CHAP. X.

Againſt the falſe Apoſtles, who diſgraced the weakneſs of his perſon and bodily preſence, he ſetteth out the ſpiritual might and authority, with which he is armed againſt all adverſary powers, 7 aſſuring them that at his coming he will be found as mighty in word, as he is now in writing being abſent : 12 And withal taxing them for reaching out themſelves beyond their compaſs, and vaunting themſelves into other mens labours.

NOW I Paul my ſelf beſeech you, by the meekneſs and gentleneſs of Chriſt, who in preſence am baſe among you, but being abſent am bold toward you.

2 But I beſeech you, that I may not be bold when I am preſent, with that confidence wherewith I think to be bold againſt ſome which think of us, as if we walked according to the fleſh.

3 For though we walk in the fleſh, we do not war after the fleſh :

4 (For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of ſtrong holds)

5 Caſting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth it ſelf againſt the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Chriſt :

6 And having in a readineſs to revenge all diſobedience, when your obedience is fulfilled.

7 Do ye look on things after the outward appearance? if any man truſt to himſelf, that he is Chriſts, let him of himſelf think this again, that as he is Chriſts, even ſo are we Chriſts.

8 For though I ſhould boaſt ſomewhat more of our authority (which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your deſtruction) I ſhould not be aſhamed :

9 That I may not ſeem as if I would terrify you by letters.

10 For his letters (ſay they) are weighty and powerful, but his bodily preſence is weak, and his ſpeech contemptible.

11 Let ſuch an one think this, that ſuch as we are in word by letters, when we are abſent, ſuch will we be alſo in deed, when we are preſent.

12 For we dare not make our ſelves of the number, or compare our ſelves with ſome that commend themſelves: but they meaſuring themſelves by themſelves, and comparing themſelves amongſt themſelves, are not wiſe.

13 But we will not boaſt of things without our meaſure, but according to the meaſure of the rule, which God hath diſtributed to us, a meaſure to reach even unto you.

14 For we ſtretch not our ſelves beyond our meaſure, as though we reached not unto you; for we are come as far as to you alſo in preaching the goſpel of Chriſt :

15 Not boaſting of things without our meaſure, that is, of other mens labours; but having hope, when your faith is increaſed, that we ſhall be enlarged by you according to our rule abundantly,

16 To preach the goſpel in the regions beyond you, and not to boaſt in another mans line of things made ready to our hand.

17 But he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

18 For not he that commendeth himſelf, is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth.

In this chapter Paul beſeeches them to behave themſelves with ſuch obedience to, and due eſtimation of his doctrine and miniſtry, that he may have cauſe to uſe gentleneſs towards them, and not be forced to exerciſe the ſeverity which he intended againſt ſome.

I. He begins with an earneſt entreaty, amplified by the arguments he uſes to move them, i. e. by the meekneſs and gentleneſs of Chriſt; and then he deſcribes himſelf, according to that picture drawn of him by the falſe Apoſtles, ver. 1. praying them that they would not at length oblige him to uſe that ſeverity towards them, which he reſolved to uſe towards thoſe falſe Apoſtles; amplified by a propoſal of their ſurmiſes of him, as if he walked according to the fleſh. This is propounded at ver. 2. and confuted by the manner of his managing of his office not in a weak and contemptible manner, ver. 3. which he proves by the kind and powerfulneſs of his weapons, ver. 4. By the efficacy of his miniſtry, ver. 5. and by his authority, to revenge all diſobedience, ver. 6. Then,

II. He aſſerts the authority, and the dignity of his perſon, againſt the falſe Apoſtles; wherein he compares himſelf with them in his relation to Chriſt, ver. 7. prefers himſelf above them, in reſpect of his authority; amplified by the end for which it is given him, ver. 8. and by his forbearance to ſpeak more of it, ver. 9. After this, he propounds the adverſaries ſuggeſtions, ver. 10. and anſwers them, that he will be the ſame preſent as abſent; ver. 11.

III. He taxes the falſe Apoſtles for their ſelf-applauſe; where he refuſes to put himſelf among their number. Shews the folly of meaſuring themſelves by themſelves; ver. 12. fixes the rule for his practice in his miniſterial labours; ver. 13. amplified by ſhewing that they came within the compaſs of this rule; ver. 14. and that by their means he hoped to ſpread the Goſpel beyond them; ver. 15, 16. And finally, he aſcribes the glory of all he had done to God only; ver. 17. amplified by the reaſon, expreſſed both negatively and poſitively; ver. 18.

Ver. 2.——According to the fleſh.] i. e. The works of the fleſh.

Ver. 3.—We do not war after the fleſh.] i. e. We do not teach you according to the rudiments of this word, but by the ſpirit and power of God.

Ver. 4.——Carnal.] Or, the inventions of men, the wiſdom of this world.

Ver. 5.——Imaginations.] Or, falſe ideas, and ſophiſtical reaſonings.

Ver. 7.——That he is Chriſt's.] i. e. The miniſter of Chriſt; ſee 1 Cor. xiv. 37. and 1 John iv. 6.

— Even ſo are we Chriſt's.] The miniſters of Chriſt; ſee 1 Cor. iii. 27. and chap. xi. 23.

Ver. 10.——Say they.] Or, in the Greek, ſaith he, and thus it agreeth with the context at ver. 11.

Ver. 12.—Are not wiſe.] Underſtand it not.

Ver. 13.——Our meaſure.] See ver. 15.

CHAP. XI.

1 Out of his jealouſy over the Corinthians, who ſeemed to make more account of the falſe apoſtles than of him, he entreth into a forced commendation of himſelf, 5 of his equality with the chief Apoſtles, 7 of his preaching the Goſpel to them freely, and without any their charge, 13 ſhewing that he was not inferior to thoſe deceitful workers in any legal prerogative, 23 and in the ſervice of Chriſt, and in all kind of ſufferings for his miniſtry, far ſuperior.

WOULD to God you could bear with me a little in my folly; and indeed bear with me.

2 For I am jealous over you with godly jealouſy; for I have eſpouſed you to one husband, that I may preſent you as a chaſte virgin to Chriſt.

3 But I fear, leſt by any means, as the ſerpent beguiled Eve through his ſubtilty, ſo your minds ſhould be corrupted from the ſimplicity that is in Chriſt.

4 For if he that cometh, preacheth another Jeſus whom we have not preached, or if ye receive another ſpirit, which ye have not received, or another goſpel, which ye have not accepted, ye might well bear with him.

5 For I ſuppoſe I was not a whit behind the very chiefeſt apoſtles.

6 But though I be rude in ſpeech, yet not in knowledge; but we have been throughly made manifeſt among you in all things.

7 Have I committed an offence in abaſing my ſelf that you might be exalted, becauſe I have preached to you the goſpel of God freely?

8 I robbed other churches, taking wages of them to do you ſervice.

9 And when I was preſent with you and wanted, I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me, the brethren which came from Macedonia ſupplied: and in all things I have kept my ſelf from being burdenſom unto you, and ſo will I keep my ſelf.

10 As the truth of Chriſt is in me, no man ſhall ſtop me of this boaſting in the regions of Achaia.

11 Wherefore? becauſe I love you not? God knoweth.

12 But what I do, that I will do, that I may cut off occaſion from them which deſire occaſion, that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we.

13 For ſuch are falſe apoſtles, deceitful workers, transforming themſelves into the apoſtles of Chriſt.

14 And no marvel; for Satan himſelf is transformed into an angel of light.

15 Therefore it is no great thing if his miniſters alſo be transformed as the miniſters of righteouſneſs; whoſe end ſhall be according to their works.

16 I ſay again, Let no man think me a fool; if otherwiſe, yet as a fool receive me, that I may boaſt my ſelf a little.

17 That which I ſpeak, I ſpeak it not after the Lord, but as it were fooliſhly in this confidence of boaſting.

18 Seeing that many glory after the fleſh I will glory alſo.

19 For ye ſuffer fools gladly, ſeeing ye your ſelves are wiſe.

20 For ye ſuffer if a man bring you into bondage, if a man devour you, if a man take of you, if a man exalt himſelf, if a man ſmite you on the face.

21 I ſpeak as concerning reproach, as though we had been weak: howbeit, whereinſoever any is bold, (I ſpeak fooliſhly) I am bold alſo.

22 Are they Hebrews? ſo am I: are they Iſraelites? ſo am I: are they the ſeed of Abraham? ſo am I:

23 Are they the miniſters of Chriſt? (I ſpeak as a fool) I am more: in labours more abundant, in ſtripes above meaſure, in priſons more frequent, in deaths oft.

24 Of the Jews five times received I forty ſtripes ſave one.

25 Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I ſtoned, thrice I ſuffered ſhipwrack: a night and a day I have been in the deep;

26 In journeying often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderneſs, in perils in the ſea, in perils among falſe brethren;

27 In wearineſs and painfulneſs, in watchings often, in hunger and thirſt, in faſtings often, in cold and nakedneſs.

28 Beſides thoſe things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches.

29 Who is weak, and I am not weak? who is offended, and I burn not?

30 If I muſt needs glory, I will glory of the things which concern mine infirmities.

31 The God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, which is bleſſed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not.

32 In Damaſcus the governor under Aretas the king, kept the city of the Damaſcenes with a garriſon, deſirous to apprehend me :

33 And through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall, and eſcaped his hands.

In this chapter the Apoſtle vindicates himſelf and his Apoſtleſhip from the contempt in their eyes, who preferred the falſe apoſtles before him; entring upon a neceſſary and forced commendation of himſelf and his Apoſtleſhip: Which he introduceth with

I. A Preface, deſiring them to bear with him in his juſt and neceſſary ſelf-commendation; ver. 1. amplified by the reaſons.

(1.) His godly jealouſy, leaſt they ſhould be miſled. With the reaſon of his jealouſy; becauſe he was the perſon that had eſpouſed them to Chriſt, and therefore would fain keep them pure; ver. 2.

(2.) His fear of their being corrupted; ver. 3.

(3.) Becauſe none could preach a better Chriſt or Goſpel than he preached; ver. 4.

II. He enumerates ſome particulars of his ſelf-commendation. As

(1.) His equality with the chiefeſt Apoſtles, ver. 5. amplified by a conceſſion of his rudeneſs in ſpeech: A denial of his rudeneſs in knowledge: And by an appeal to their own experience, ver. 6.

(2.) His equality with the falſe apoſtles in preaching the Goſpel freely without wages; wherein he grants the matter of fact that he did ſo; ver. 7.——9. then he profeſſes that he would not be hindred from ſo doing; ver. 10. and gives the reaſons thereof (1) negatively, not for want of love to them; ver. 11. And (2) poſitively, to prevent occaſion of reproach; as if he ſought his own advantage; and that the falſe apoſtles may have no advantage of him in that reſpect, ver. 12. amplified by

(1.) A deſcription of the falſe apoſtles, by their deceitfulneſs and hypocriſy, propounded, ver. 13. illuſtrated by comparing them herein with the Devil, ver. 14, 15.—

(2.) A denunciation of judgment againſt them, ver.—15.

III. A more full propoſal of the matter of his ſelf-commendation. Wherein,

(1.) Another Preface, in which he depriciates the cenſure of folly; begs a patient hearing, ver. 16. owns his folly herein; if it muſt needs be ſo accounted, ver. 17. and gives the reaſon thereof, viz. the example of others, ver. 18. their own practice in bearing with the like, yea, worſe in others, ver. 19, 20. amplified by an interpretation of his meaning, ver. 21.—

(2.) The compariſon between himſelf and them; ſhewing his parity with them in outward privileges, ver.——21, 22. and his ſuperiority over them, both in his office, ver. 23.——and in his ſufferings, as well external and bodily, ver.——23.——27. as inward, viz. his care, ver. 28. and his ſympathy with others in their ſufferings, ver. 29. amplified by his glorying of theſe things, ver. 30. By his calling God to witneſs of the truth of them, ver. 31. and by a particular inſtance of his danger and deliverance, ver. 32, 33.

Ver. 1.——In my folly.] For, ſo the Apoſtle accounted the oſtentation of human qualifications, &c. ſee ver. 16. and ch. v. 13.

——And indeed bear with me.] Or, I doubt not when you know the reaſon thereof, you will bear with me; ſee the reaſon in the next verſe.

Ver. 2.——To one husband.] i. e. To Chriſt. See 1 Cor. iv. 15.

——As a chaſte virgin to Chriſt.] Alluding to that of Leviticus xxi. 13. or Ezekiel xliv. 22.

Ver. 3.——As the ſerpent beguiled Eve.] See Gen. iii. 4. John viii. 44.

——Simplicity.] Or rather, ſincerity. See Eph. vi. 24.

Ver. 4.——Another Jeſus.] i. e. Saviour, Deliverer. See the notes on Matt. i.

——Another ſpirit.] Than the ſpirit of God. See 1 Cor. xi. throughout.

——Another Goſpel.] i. e. Doctrine, or good tidings and means of ſalvation; ſee Gal. i. 7, 8.

——With him.] Or, with me.

Ver. 5.—— I was not a whit behind the very chiefeſt Apoſtles.] See 1 Cor. xv. 10. and hereafter he repeats the ſame thing in ch. xii. ver. 11.

Ver. 6.—— In all things.] Relating to the Goſpel and miniſtration of Chriſt; ſee ch. iv. 2. and v. 11. and xii. 12.

Ver. 7.—— In abaſing my ſelf.] By working for mine own living, and ſuffering all diſtreſs rather than be burthenſome to you; ſee 1 Cor. ix. 6, &c. and below, at ver. 8, 9.

——That you might be exalted.] Or, eaſed from ſuch an incumbrance, but yet I preached the Goſpel to you freely, without any other hopes of gain, than to teach you the way of ſalvation, which in due time will exalt you to the kingdom of Heaven.

Ver. 16.—— Receive me.] Or, ſuffer or permit me.

Ver. 18.—— After the fleſh.] In things pertaining to the fleſh, or to this world.

Ver. 22.—— So am I.] See Acts xxii. 3. Rom. xi. 2. Philip. iii. 5.

Ver. 23.—— I ſpeak as a fool.] In that fooliſh way of boaſting, by which falſe apoſtles and teachers, endeavour to publiſh themſelves and deceive their hearers.

—— I am more.] See 1 Cor. xv. 10. Not that the Apoſtle ſays he is a greater fool than they, who boaſt fooliſhly of what they are not; but he here declares, that they have boaſted fooliſhly, and that he himſelf is really what he pretends to be, more an Apoſtle than they, who have endeavoured to deceive them.

—— In labours more abundant, &c.] See Acts ix. 16. xxi. 11. and ch. vi. 4. and the general Preface to the Epiſtles.

—— In deaths oft.] See the notes on 1 Cor. xv. 31. and ch. i. 10. iv. 11.

Ver. 24. Of the Jews five times received I forty ſtripes ſave one.] Here it muſt be noted, that the Apoſtle means the Jews had whipped him to the extent of their law, which, though Moſes limited the number of ſtripes to forty, Deut. xxv. 3. the Jews in the Apoſtolick age underſtood themſelves to be limited or confined to thirty-nine. And therefore, Joſephus having given us the law of Moſes, writes by way of comment, he that acts contrary hereto, let him receive forty ſtripes ſave one from the publick officer; Joſ. Antiq. 4 c. 8. ſect. 21.

Ver. 25. Thrice was I beaten with rods.] By order of the Roman magiſtrates; ſee Acts xvi. 22.

—— Once was I ſtoned.] See Acts xiv. 19.

—— Thrice I ſuffered ſhipwreck.] Biſhop Fell obſerves on this place, that none of theſe ſhipwrecks are mentioned in the Acts; for, ſays he, that ſhipwreck of Paul mentioned in Acts xxvii. happened not till ſome years after the writing this Epiſtle.

—— A night and a day I have been in the deep.] ἐν τῷ ϐυθῷ. What is here meant by the deep, we cannot give any poſitive interpretation from other parts of Scripture, which take notice of the life and actions of the Apoſtle Paul. There is no paſſage of his life written by Luke that mentions it. But it may ſignify as Bede obſerves, (lib. queſt qu. 3. tit. 8.) the priſon of Cyzicum, (a famous city of Propontis) whoſe depth under ground obtained the name of Βύθος, the bottom of the ſea; into which it is probable, that Paul was caſt, when he went through that city to Troas, and the reaſon Luke makes no mention thereof, is, becauſe he was not an eye-witneſs of it; for it is obſervable, that the Evangeliſt always writes with that precaution, as to write nothing particularly, but what he was an eye-witneſs to. Again, Theophylact records, that ſome took it for a well, called Βύθος, or depth, or profundity, becauſe of its great depth, wherein Paul at Lyſtra, after his great danger, hid himſelf.

Ver. 26. In journeying often.] To convert and eſtabliſh and confirm the Churches, he had reduced to the faith; in which journeyings he fell into the following dangers, mentioned in this verſe, and underwent thoſe afflictions in the following verſe.

Ver. 28. —— The care of all the Churches.] Of the Gentiles; ſee Acts xx. 18, &c. Rom. i. 14.

Ver. 32. In Damaſcus, &c.] See Acts ix. 24.

CHAP. XII.

1 For commending of his Apoſtleſhip, though he might glory of his wonderful revelations. 9 Yet he rather chuſeth to glory of his infirmities, 11 blaming them for forcing him to this vain boaſting. 14 He promiſeth to come to them again: but yet altogether in the affection of a father, 20 although he feareth he ſhall to his grief find many offenders, and publick diſorders there.

IT is not expedient for me doubtleſs to glory: I will come to viſions and revelations of the Lord.

2 I knew a man in Chriſt, above fourteen years ago (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth) ſuch an one caught up to the third heaven.

3 And I knew ſuch a man (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth)

4 How that he was caught up into paradiſe, and heard unſpeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter.

5 Of ſuch an one will I glory: yet of my ſelf I will not glory, but in mine infirmities.

6 For though I would deſire to glory, I ſhall not be a fool; for I will ſay the truth: but now I forbear, leſt any man ſhould think of me above that which he ſeeth me to be, or that he heareth of me.

7 And leſt I ſhould be exalted above meaſure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the fleſh, the meſſenger of Satan to buffet me, leſt I ſhould be exalted above meaſure.

8 For this thing I beſought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me.

9 And he ſaid unto me, my grace is ſufficient for thee: for my ſtrength is made perfect in weakneſs. Moſt gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Chriſt may reſt upon me.

10 Therefore I take pleaſure in infirmities, in reproaches, in neceſſities, in perſecutions, in diſtreſſes for Chriſts ſake: for when I am weak, then am I ſtrong.

11 I am become a fool in glorying, ye have compelled me: for I ought to have been commended of you: for in nothing am I behind the very chiefeſt apoſtles, though I be nothing.

12 Truly the ſigns of an apoſtle were wrought among you in all patience, in ſigns, and wonders, and mighty deeds.

13 For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, except it be that I my ſelf was not burdenſom to you? forgive me this wrong.

14 Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdenſom to you; for I ſeek not yours, but you: for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children.

15 And I will very gladly ſpend and be ſpent for you, though the more abundantly I love you, the leſs I be loved.

16 But be it ſo, I did not burden you: nevertheleſs being crafty, I caught you with guile.

17 Did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I ſent unto you?

18 I deſired Titus, and with him I ſent a brother: did Titus make a gain of you? walked we not in the ſame ſpirit? walked we not in the ſame ſteps?

19 Again, think you that we excuſe our ſelves unto you? we ſpeak before God in Chriſt: but we do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying.

20 For I fear, leſt when I come I ſhall not find you ſuch as I would, and that I ſhall be found unto you ſuch as ye would not: leſt there be debates, envyings, wraths, ſtrifes, back-bitings, whiſperings, ſwellings, tumults:

21 And leſt when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and that I ſhall bewail many which have ſinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanneſs, and fornication, and laſciviouſneſs which they have committed.

In this chapter the Apoſtle,

I. Proceeds in glorying; wherein (1) He grants, by way of preface, the inexpediency thereof in ordinary caſes, implying the neceſſity thereof now. (2) The matter of his glorying, viſions, and revelations, ver. 1. (3) A narrative of his viſion, in reſpect of the time, place, and matter, viz. unſpeakable words, ver. 2.—4. amplified by ſhewing how much he will glory in this, ver. 5, 6. (4) The conſequent thereof; buffeting, with the reaſon; to keep him humble, ver. 7. amplified by his prayer againſt it, ver. 8. God's anſwer, and his own acquieſcence therein; with the reaſon, ver. 9. (5) The reaſon of his taking pleaſure in infirmities, ver. 10. (6) The reaſons of his glorying; becauſe they compelled him, and wanted that due eſteem they ought to have had for him, with the reaſon of that eſteem; his equality with the chiefeſt Apoſtles, ver. 11. proved (1) by the miracles he wrought among them, ver. 12. and (2) by the ſucceſs of his miniſtry among them, whereby they were equal to any other Churches; amplified by an ironical expreſſion, ver. 13.

II. Declares his reſolution of coming to them; amplified by the manner of it, That it ſhould be without charge; with the reaſon, ver. 14. ſpending himſelf for them; illuſtrated by its oppoſite, ver. 15. and ſo vindicates himſelf from the imputation of making a gain of them; wherein (1) the charge, ver. 16. and (2) his denial thereof, in reference to himſelf, ver. 17. and in reference to thoſe he ſent to them, ver. 18. amplified by his removal of a falſe end herein, not merely to excuſe himſelf, and his propoſal of the true cauſe, viz. their edifying, ver. 19. Then

He intimates his fear of them, leſt he ſhould find ſuch miſcarriages as ſhould oblige him to uſe ſeverity; many of which he mentions, ver. 20. and cenſures them for their impenitence, ver. 21.

Ver. 1.—To glory.] As I have now done in the fleſh. That is folly; ſee chap. xi. 16, &c.

Ver. 2. I knew a man.] He ſpeaks here of himſelf in the third perſon.

— Whether in the body, &c.] When he was caught up into the third heaven; ſee Acts xxii. 17.

Ver. 2. The third heaven.] i. e. Paradiſe; ſee ver. 4.

Ver. 4.—Lawful.] The original and the ſenſe alſo of the context requires us to underſtand this word lawful to be poſſible, i. e. which is not poſſible for man to utter.

Ver. 5. Of ſuch a one.] Of a man ſo highly favoured and rapt out of his body, as it were, into paradiſe.

—Of my ſelf.] Or, own ſufficiency.

Ver. 7.———A thorn in the fleſh.] Some underſtand this of ſome violent temptation; others I think more probably of ſome corporal diſeaſe, which ſtopped him in his zeal in propagating the Goſpel of Chriſt; compare this with ver. 9. and 10.

Ver. 12.——The ſigns of an Apoſtle, &c.] See Rom. xv. 18, 19. 1 Cor. ix. 2.

Ver. 15.———For you.] i. e. Your ſouls.

Ver. 16.——Nevertheleſs being crafty, I caught you with guile.] This was the inſinuation of the falſe apoſtles, who not being able to alledge any crime againſt Paul, pretended to the Corinthians, that he forbore to be burthenſome to them, in order to do them ſome greater damage; Paul repeats it ironically, and laughs at it. See how he clears himſelf in the following verſes.

CHAP. XIII.

1 He threatneth ſeverity, and the power of his apoſtleſhip againſt obſtinate ſinners. 5 And adviſing them to a trial of their faith, 7 and to a reformation of their ſins before his coming. 11 He concludeth his epiſtle with a general exhortation and a prayer.

THIS is the third time I am coming to you: In the mouth of two or three witneſſes ſhall every word be eſtabliſhed.

2 I told you before, and foretel you as if I were preſent the ſecond time, and being abſent, now I write to them which heretofore have ſinned, and to all other, that if I come again, I will not ſpare.

3 Since ye ſeek a proof of Chriſt ſpeaking in me, which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty in you.

4 For though he was crucified through weakneſs, yet he liveth by the power of God: for we alſo are weak in him, but we ſhall live with him by the power of God toward you.

5 Examine your ſelves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own ſelves; know ye not your own ſelves, how that Jeſus Chriſt is in you, except ye be reprobates?

6 But I truſt that ye ſhall know that we are not reprobates.

7 Now I pray to God, that ye do no evil; not that we ſhould appear approved, but that ye ſhould do that which is honeſt, though we be as reprobates.

8 For we can do nothing againſt the truth, but for the truth.

9 For we are glad when we are weak, and ye are ſtrong: and this alſo we wiſh, even your perfection.

10 Therefore I write theſe things being abſent, leſt being preſent I ſhould uſe ſharpneſs, according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification, and not to deſtruction.

11 Finally, brethren, farewel: Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace ſhall be with you.

12 Greet one another with an holy kiſs.

13 All the ſaints ſalute you.

14 The grace of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghoſt, be with you all. Amen.

¶ The ſecond epiſtle to the Corinthians was written from Philippi, a city of Macedonia, by Titus and Lucas.

This chapter contains a threatning againſt offenders, wherein,

(1.) He acquaints them with his proceedings in ſuch a way, ver. 1.

(2.) Aſſures them of it, ver. 2.

(3.) Gives the reaſon; thereby to give them a proof or experiment of his authority from Chriſt; amplified by declaring the diſcovery of Chriſt's power among them. Affirmed, ver. 3. and applied to the aſſerting of his own authority, ver. 4.

(4.) Proves his authority, and his power of Chriſt in him, by his converting them to the faith; wherein he appeals to their own experimental ſelf-examination, ver. 15. amplified by his aſſurance that they, the Apoſtles, ſhould prove themſelves not to be reprobates, ver. 6. But,

(5.) He lenifies his threatning: (1.) By his prayer for them, that they may do no evil; amplified by his end therein, ver. 7. and by the reaſon of his prayer, becauſe he has no authority againſt ſuch, ver. 8. (2.) By his rejoicing that he has not occaſion to ſhew his power. (3.) By his wiſh of a thorow reformation among them, ver. 9. (4.) By warning them aforehand, by way of prevention, ver. 10. And from hence he proceeds to

The concluſion of the whole Epiſtle: (1.) By way of exhortation, ver. 11, 12. (2.) By way of ſalutation, ver. 13. And finally, by his Apoſtolical benediction, ver. 14.

Ver. 1. ——In the mouth of two or three witneſſes ſhall every word be eſtabliſhed.] According to that Law of Moſes in Deut. xvii. 6. and xix. 15.

Ver. 2. I told you before.] In chap. x. 2.

Ver. 4.——Crucified through weakneſs.] i. e. By thoſe who had no power but what God permitted for the ſake of all mankind; for the ſtrength of this world is weakneſs with God, when God oppoſes his power.

——— He liveth by the power of God.] i. e. He was raiſed from the dead by the Supreme Power of God, which yet appears in his miniſters, working ſigns and wonders and mighty deeds in confirmation thereof. See chap. xii. ver. 12.

——— We.] The Apoſtles

——— Are weak in him.] Or rather in compariſon of him, though he has given us power to do ſuch mighty deeds. See chap. xii. ver. 12.

——— By the power of God.] i. e. The Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, which we have preached to you.

Ver. 5.—— Reprobates.] Apoſtates, denying, by your practice, the faith which you profeſs.

Ver. 7.——Though we be as reprobates.] See chap. vi. ver. 9.

Ver. 9.——When we are weak, and ye are ſtrong.] See 1 Cor. iv. 10.

——— Perfection.] In the faith and doctrine of Chriſt. See 1 Theſſ. iii. 10.

Ver. 11. Finally, brethren, farewel: be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind.] Theſe words are the concluſion of this ſecond Epiſtle to the Corinthians, and do, in effect, contain the ſum of all that the Apoſtle has been before exhorting them unto in it. His rules are ſhort, but comprehenſive, and by obſerving whereof, they would not only prevent thoſe miſcarriages they had before been guilty of, but would render themſelves a happy people, beloved of God, and highly eſteemed by all wiſe and good men. For,

This Scripture naturally preſents three things to our conſideration:

I. Paul's concluding ſalutation of the Corinthians.

II. His ſhort, but comprehenſive exhortation of them.

III. His Euchariſtical wiſh for, and promiſe to them, upon their complying with this exhortation.

I. The concluding ſalutation of Paul to the Corinthians, Finally, brethren, farewel.

Among the many Churches not only taught, but founded by Paul, this of Corinth was one of the moſt eminent. He ſpent no leſs than a year and a half in that city upon this work, Acts xviii. 11. And when he heard of the diſorders which they fell into ſoon after his departure from them, he wrote that firſt admirable Epiſtle which is ſtill read in the Church, both to correct thoſe diſorders, and to ſettle them in that right faith which he had delivered to them.

This firſt Epiſtle had a very happy effect upon them: It brought them, in good meaſure, both to a juſt ſenſe of their former miſcarriages, and to an entire conformity to the Goſpel of Chriſt. But ſtill there remained ſome vain-glorious men, who not only oppoſed the endeavours of Paul in this behalf, but did what in them lay to render his miniſtry utterly ineffectual to reclaim upon them. Upon this he wrote this ſecond Epiſtle to them, to vindicate his authory; to ſilence thoſe falſe teachers, to juſtify his conduct towards them, to exhort them to a better behaviour of themſelves, and to let them freely know, that if they did not hearken to what he wrote, he would come to them, and proceed by proper cenſures againſt the obſtinate and incorrigible. And having done this, he concludes all in the words before us, finally, (or as the original imports) for what remains, farewel. He had ſaid all that he could, and even more than was needful, both to direct, and to exhort, them to walk as became the diſciples of Chriſt, and had nothing now remaining but to take his leave of them, finally, brethren, farewel; rejoyce ye; for that is the proper ſignification of the word, and includes in it not only a friendly ſalutation, but an affectionate wiſh too; a wiſh of all the happineſs which an Apoſtle could deſire for his Church; or, in Paul's own more tender alluſion, 1 Cor. iv. 15. a father for his children. Therefore,

II. He exhorts them to be perfect, to be of good comfort, to be of one mind, to live in peace; becauſe theſe diſorders were chiefly occaſioned by their want of that full knowledge of, and proficiency in, the faith and piety of the Goſpel, which they ought to have attained unto.

If we conſider their knowledge of the Goſpel, that one inſtance of the reſurrection of the dead may alone ſuffice to ſhew how ſhort, how defective it was, even in the moſt fundamental articles of our faith. That after all the Apoſtle had done to inſtruct them in it, yet ſome among them ſhould ſtill continue to doubt of it; and as himſelf expreſſes it, 1 Cor. xv. 12. to ſay in plain terms, that there is no reſurrection of the dead.

So ſtrange was their ignorance in the faith of Chriſt; nor was their practice at all better than their knowledge. Let me for this appeal to their imprudent, as well as unjuſtifiable conduct of themſelves in the uſe of their ſpiritual gifts, 1 Cor. xii, xiv. In their feaſting not only with their Gentile acquaintance, but in the very temples of their idols, and upon their idolatrous feſtivals, ch. viii. x. But above all, to their inexcuſable behaviour with relation to the Lord's Supper, 1 Cor. xi. 17, &c. which they neither ſo duly prepared themſelves for, nor ſo reverently behaved themſelves at, as they ought to have done.

In both theſe reſpects, as they greatly needed to become wiſer, and better, ſo we cannot doubt but that the Apoſtle earneſtly deſired their improvement in both: And that we muſt therefore from hence derive the deſign and import of this firſt part of his exhortation, that they ſhould be perfect; that is, ſhould endeavour to attain to a more full and perfect knowledge of the truths of the Goſpel, and to riſe up to a higher degree of perfection in the practice of the duties of it.

But there was yet another fault in that Church, which as Paul chiefly deſigned by theſe Epiſtles to correct; ſo I do conceive that this expreſſion does, in a particular manner, refer to it. They were not only ſo defective, as I have obſerved, in many other inſtances of their duty; but were more eſpecially wanting in that excellent grace which ſhould have perfected all their other performances, I mean, in their love and charity towards one another.

They not only lived in ſtrife and contention with one another about their own private concerns, 1 Cor. vi. but were openly divided in point of Church-Communion too, 1 Cor. iii. Set up paſtors againſt paſtors, gifts againſt gifts, Paul againſt Apollos, and both againſt Cephas; and by means thereof at once both hindered their own ſpiritual proficiency, and deſtroyed the peace of the Church of Chriſt.

To put an end to theſe diſorders, the Apoſtle here exhorts them to be perfect; that is, to be firmly knit together, either as the members in the natural body, or as the ſeveral parts are in a building, for to both theſe the word does allude; and ſo his meaning will be the ſame with what he had more fully before expreſſed in the very ſame phraſe, 1 Cor. i. 10. Now I beſeech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that ye all ſpeak the ſame thing; and that there be no diviſions among you, but that ye be perfectly joined together in the ſame mind, and in the ſame judgment. Namely, That they ſhould be perfect in charity, in unity, in communion. That laying aſide all partiality for one teacher above another, they ſhould all join together in the ſame ſociety, and in the ſame worſhip. Should reſtore thoſe who had unhappily broken themſelves off from them: Should ſtrengthen thoſe who ſtill held communion with them: In a word, ſhould all become one ſpiritual body, one building, one temple of God; endeavouring above all things to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

I muſt alſo obſerve, that the Apoſtle in his former Epiſtle, had ſharply reproved them for their miſcarriages; he had lively repreſented their faults to them, and given them not only his directions, but his commands too, for the reforming of them. Now this, as we find by this ſecond Epiſtle, ch. ii, vii, 7, &c. had made a deep impreſſion upon the minds of all the better and more ſober part of that Church; and even upon ſome who had before walked diſorderly, but were now brought to conſider, and repent of, their evil doings. They were greatly concerned for what they had done amiſs, and they readily obeyed the Apoſtle's admonition for the correction of it.

This therefore is that which I take him now again to refer to, as he had ſeveral times done in the foregoing parts of this Epiſtle. He intimates to them the ſatisfaction that he took in their love towards him, but eſpecially in their ready obedience to his commands; and their concern to give him ſatisfaction in all that he required of them: And he bids them to be of good comfort; i. e. not to be any longer troubled at his reproof of them; but to rejoice with him that he had confidence of them in all things, 2 Cor. vii. 16. And had approved themſelves to be clear in thoſe matters for which he had written to them, ver. 11.

But there is, beſides this, another ſenſe in which this expreſſion very well may, and I think, ought alſo to be underſtood: And that is, that they ſhould encourage and exhort one another in the diſcharge of their duty; but eſpecially as to what concerned the cloſing of thoſe diviſions that had been unhappily raiſed among them. And if we thus put the two ſignifications of the word together, the full meaning of this ſecond part of Paul's advice will be this; that they ſhould not be diſcouraged at the conſideration of thoſe diſorders that had unhappily fallen out amongſt them; but ſhould exhort one another to endeavour all they could to correct what was amiſs; and then be of good comfort, and not doubt but that God would bleſs their endeavours; and remove thoſe ſcandals, and make up thoſe diviſions, which had cauſed ſo much grief and trouble to them.

Whether the Holy Spirit which directed our Apoſtle in what he now wrote, might not have had a yet farther regard in this expreſſion to the trials and dangers which the Church of Chriſt was, not long after, to fall under from the perſecutions of its enemies, I cannot tell. But ſure I am that nothing in the world can better fortify any one againſt whatever trials may come upon him, than ſuch a perfection of Chriſtian Faith and piety; ſuch a unity and charity, as he had juſt before recommended to the Corinthians. See 2 Cor. iv. 16. For indeed, how can any thing without hinder that perſon from being of good comfort within, who by a lively and ſtrong faith, and a holy converſation, has not only ſecured the peace of his own ſoul, but has made God his friend. And is by both enabled to look through all the clouds and darkneſs of his preſent ſtate, into the glory which Chriſt has promiſed to all his followers: but to none more expreſly than to thoſe who ſuffer for his ſake,——17. whoſe light afflictions, which are but for a moment, ſhall work out for them a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

There remains yet one part more of the Apoſtle's advice to the Corinthians to be conſider'd, viz. (3*dly*,) Be of one mind; live in peace; and which I the rather chuſe to join together becauſe they both belong to the ſame duty, and tend to the ſame end, of working in us a perfect love and kindneſs to each other.

He had before exhorted them to be perfect in their union, or rather communion, in the publick concerns of religion: That laying aſide all prejudices and partialities, they ſhould be firmly compacted, and joined together, in the offices thereof. And now, to complete their unity, he adviſes them to endeavour, as much as they could, to be of the ſame mind in every thing. For difference in opinion, eſpecially if it be in matters of any great moment, will be apt more or leſs to create a difference in affection; at leaſt it will keep men from a thorough love of, and intimacy with thoſe from whom they differ: And ſo the Corinthians by ſad experience found, when Paul wrote this Epiſtle to them.

But becauſe ſuch is the vanity of mens tempers and capacities, of their prejudices and intereſts, that 'tis impoſſible for all perſons to think alike, and have the ſame notions in all things; therefore the Apoſtle adds a yet farther direction, which all Chriſtians may, and therefore ſhould all, obſerve; namely, that whatever their opinions be, yet ſtill they ſhould live in peace; not cenſuring of, much leſs quarrelling with, one another: A fault which the Corinthians had been ſcandalouſly guilty of; inſomuch, that as Paul himſelf complains, 1 Cor. vi. 6. Brother went to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers.

This has been often the misfortune of the Church, as it was that of the Corinthians. To have mens perſons in admiration; and depending too ſervilely upon their judgment and integrity, to have blindly given themſelves up to their conduct; and by means thereof have fallen into thoſe parties and diviſions, which are truly the greateſt danger, as well as the higheſt reproach, in the ſight of all the nations round about.

If therefore any would free themſelves from falling under this imputation, they muſt reſolve no longer to be governed by the authority of men; but to reſume the privilege all pretend to be ſo juſtly jealous of, of judging for themſelves: And they muſt do it with freedom and impartiality. Let Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas ſay what they will: We have no Maſter but Chriſt, nor any ſure director but our own reaſon, well informed in the things we are to judge of, and religiouſly following the evidence of truth, on what ſide ſoever it lies.

And together with our prejudices, let us lay aſide our pride, and animoſities too. Let us reſolve never to think the worſe of any one, becauſe he differs in his opinion from us. 'Tis no new thing for the wiſeſt men to be miſtaken; nor if there be nothing more than pure error in it, is it any great fault ſo to be. The beſt men are ſtill but men; They may, they will be ſometimes in the wrong. And who can tell whether we who think others to be deceived, may not after all be our ſelves miſtaken. But let us love one another, though we do not agree in the ſame notions in all things; and then we ſhall live in peace, though we ſhould continue, after all our deliberation, not to be of one mind.

How much this would conduce to our preſent comfort and happineſs; what ſtrength it would give us againſt our common enemies, I ſhall not need to ſay. The Apoſtle gives us a much better, and more forcible motive to engage all men to this excellent temper, namely, That if we thus live in peace, then,

III. The God of Love and Peace ſhall be with us.

How great a happineſs is comprehended under that expreſſion, 'tis hard to conceive, impoſſible for me ever fully to declare. God is himſelf an inexhauſtible fountain of Good; and where he is, there nothing can be wanting. It is the great perfection of the happineſs of Heaven itſelf, that there we ſhall be with God, and ſee him as he is. And ſure it cannot be much leſs for God to be with us. Thus much at leaſt we muſt conclude, that in this promiſe we have implied the ſpecial favour and protection of him who can do whatever he pleaſes for us; and who being himſelf the God of Love and Peace, will not fail to do very much for thoſe who make it their endeavour to imitate him in thoſe moſt uſeful and excellent perfections.

But to be more particular.

1. If we truly deſire, and heartily labour to become thus like unto God, he will be with us by his holy ſpirit, to aſſiſt us in the attainment of all theſe admirable graces, and to bring us to a great degree of perfection in them. He will illuminate our underſtandings, and ſanctify our wills. He will fill us with a clear and comprehenſive knowledge of the revelations of the Goſpel, and endue us with ability not only to believe, but to do, whatever he requires of us. Whilſt the wicked and diſobedient are ſo blinded with their luſts and prejudices, that they can diſcover nothing great, nothing excellent, in thoſe myſteries which our Bleſſed Lord hath brought to light by his Goſpel; whilſt they meet with ſo many ſeeming difficulties and contradictions in them, that they can no more be perſuaded in them to aſſent to the truths which he has delivered, than to obey the commands which he has given us; we ſhall have our eyes opened to ſee the wondrous things of his law: We ſhall behold, and admire, as well as believe, thoſe great and noble diſcoveries which we every where meet with in the Holy Scriptures; and ſhall delight to do that will of God now, by which we know we ſhall be ſaved hereafter.

Thus ſhall we be perfect in what concerns our ſelves: How far it may pleaſe God to bleſs our endeavours to become perfect in love, and unity, as members of his Church, too, I cannot pretend to affirm: But as it is certain, that if we would all of us be perſuaded to join together in this good work, we ſhould not fail to attain to the utmoſt perfection of it; but ſhould be as united in our communion, as we are in thoſe great inſtances from which our Apoſtle exhorts us to labour after it, Epheſ. iv. 5, 6. ſo it is no leſs certain, that whatever be the reſult of our labours, we ſhall find our own preſent account in it; as well as do ſome good to the Church of Chriſt by it. For,

2. If thus we endeavour not only to be perfect in our duty, but to promote the peace of the Church, and of all the members of it, the God of love and peace will be with us, and fill us with an inexpreſſible joy and comfort, as the preſent reward of our labours after this peace.

Such a Chriſtian as this may be diſappointed in his aim, and after all his charitable endeavours, be ſo far from attaining the unity he deſires in the Church, that he may not be able ſo much as to live himſelf in peace with many of his brethren. When factions run high, and men are hurried on with the fury of their violent and corrupt affections, to throw all things into diſorder; when pride and malice, ſelf-love and revenge, are their governing principles; and they care not how they rend the Church in pieces, ſo they do but gratify their own unruly paſſions, and carry on their own wicked deſigns; as it is impoſſible for the ſons of peace to do any great good for the Church, ſo is it almoſt as impoſſible to live in peace with ſuch perverſe men. And this Paul was well aware of, when for this very reaſon he qualified his precept with reſpect to ſuch perſons, and ſuch times, Rom. xii. 18. If it be poſſible, as much as in you lieth, live peaceably with all men. But yet, as even under ſuch uncomfortable circumſtances, it is the duty, and even praiſe, of a good Chriſtian, to follow after peace, and to ſeek the unity of the Church, though he ſhould meet with never ſo many difficulties and diſcouragements in it; ſo this he may be ſure of, that what he miſſes without, he ſhall find within: God will give him that peace, that comfort in himſelf, which the wickedneſs of men will not ſuffer him to enjoy in the world.

It is, I think, one of the chiefeſt bleſſings a good man would wiſh for, to be the happy inſtrument of reſtoring unity to a divided Church; and peace and love to a factious and contentious people. And next to this, there is ſcarce any comfort greater (except the inward teſtimony of a good conſcience towards God) than to have this ſatisfaction, that we have done our parts towards it; and that it is none of our fault that we continue ſtill at variance with one another. And where both theſe are joined together, where a man has not only peace towards God, but is in perfect love and charity with his neighbour; where no malice, nor envy, nor revenge, not ſo much as an ill wiſh, finds admittance to diſturb the tranquillity of the ſoul; but on the contrary, there is a conſcience void of offence, both towards God, and towards man; there muſt needs be a continual plenitude of peace and ſatisfaction. Such a Chriſtian may be hated, but he cannot be diſturbed; he may be injured, but he cannot be made miſerable. The world may oppoſe him, but God will be with him, and enable him, in the midſt of all his ſufferings, to be more than conqueror through him who loveth him.

But, 3dly, If we thus labour after that perfection, that unity and peace, to which we are here exhorted, we ſhall not only be of good comfort in all eſtates of life, and ſo find the promiſe of the text verified in the preſent reward of our piety, but we ſhall alſo be more exceedingly bleſſed by the God of love and peace to all eternity.

It was the peculiar privilege promiſed by our Saviour to ſuch perſons, Matt. v. 9. That they ſhould be called the children of God. And if children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Chriſt, as Paul himſelf warrants us to argue, Rom. viii. 17.

But John goes yet farther; he repreſents this excellent temper not only as a certain proof to us of our future happineſs, but even an earneſt of it. He tells us, that by this we are already united to God, and in that reſpect alſo (the higheſt and moſt intimate that can be) have the promiſe of my text fulfilled, That the God of love and peace ſhall be with us. Let us hear how he reaſons to this purpoſe, 1 John iv. 12. No man hath ſeen God at any time: If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us. Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, becauſe he hath given us of his Spirit.—God is love, and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him. And what the conſequence of this ſhall be with relation to our future ſtate, he declares in the next verſe, viz. that this will entitle us not only to forgiveneſs, but even to confidence and aſſurance at our great audit, ver. 17. For, Herein, ſays he, is our love made perfect, that we may have boldneſs in the Day of Judgment.

And now what can any one deſire to engage him to the practice of any duty, that is not here promiſed to encourage him to the diſcharge of this.

If the hope of ſucceſs in accompliſhing of what we aim at, may be allowed to carry a ſtrong enforcement along with it to excite us to labour after it; we are aſſured that, as to the main of what the Apoſtle here recommends to us, we ſhall be enabled by God to become not only good, but eminent; that we ſhall be perfect in knowledge, in faith, in piety, in charity; in all that may render us dear to God, and ſecure of ſalvation.

If our own preſent peace and comfort be of any concern to us, (and we know nothing is wont to be of greater concern to every one) here is a way that will not fail to bring us to it. Let us be perfect, and of one mind; if we cannot live in peace, let us at leaſt endeavour ſo to do, and the God of peace will be with us; and give us that peace, that comfort within, which the iniquity of men may chance to deny us without.

If, laſtly, to be ſecure of Heaven, and the glories of it; if to anticipate our final ſentence, and to know while we live, that we ſhall be juſtified and ſaved when we come to die, be a felicity greater than which no Chriſtian can deſire now, or hope for hereafter; this we ſhall not fail of, if we follow the Apoſtle's direction. If we be perfect, be of one mind, live in peace, and the God of love and peace ſhall be with us, to this bleſſed aſſurance alſo; The Spirit of God ſhall bear witneſs with our Spirits, that we are the ſons of God.

Ver. 14. The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghoſt, be with you all.] It is very obſervable, that the doctrine of the Trinity is frequently, if not always, propoſed unto us in Scripture, as a practical doctrine relating to ourſelves, and influential and operative upon our ſouls, with reſpect to the diſtinct works and effects which are produced in them by the diſtinct operation, eminently aſcribed to each perſon.

Thus Matt. xxviii. 19. the three perſons are mentioned with relation to our being baptized in their name, i. e. dedicated to the whole Bleſſed Trinity, according to their diſtinct perſonal relations to us: We are dedicated to the Father, as our Creator, to the Son as our Redeemer, to the Holy Ghoſt, as our Sanctifier.

Thus, 1 Cor. xii. 4. the three perſons are mentioned with relation to their diſtinct offices towards us, and their diſtinct works and gifts on us, in order to the good advantage and edification of others. And 1 John v. the Father, Word and Holy Ghoſt, the three which are one, are propoſed practically to our belief, viz. by faith in them we overcome the world, we are ſanctified by the water in baptiſm, juſtified by Chriſt's blood, have the witneſs of the Spirit in our ſouls, the Divine Birth, true underſtanding and eternal life. And,

In this text they are propoſed to our belief, as relating to us and working on us, in order to the ſalvation of our ſouls, by the grace of the ſecond perſon, the love of the firſt, and the communion of the Holy Ghoſt, the third perſon.

The doctrine of the eternal exiſtence of the three perſons in the Godhead is attained by few, by ſome indeed more diſtinctly and clearly and ſatisfactorily than by other ſome, by none perfectly and adequately; but none can poſſibly know God but by himſelf.

This practical and experimental knowledge of the Trinity concerns us all, we ought all to endeavour after, and may in ſome meaſure attain it, without which, the greateſt ſpeculative knowledge in it, will not avail to our ſalvation. Quid juvat alta de Trinitate deſputare cum careas humilitate, unde Trinitati diſpliceas, (ſays devout Tho. a Kempis, de imit. i. 1.) what will it profit thee to ſoar aloft in the contemplation of this myſtery, if thou art under the guilt and dominion of ſin; in which ſtate it is impoſſible, while we continue therein, to partake of the love of God, the grace of Chriſt, and the communications of the Holy Spirit.

Let us then pity the apoſtates and revolters of our days, who make a miſerable ſhipwreck of faith and conſcience, by too curiouſly prying into, and audaciouſly diſputing and determining concerning this great myſtery, and let us learn to be wiſe unto ſobriety, and endeavour in the true uſe of all the means of grace, to know experimentally, to taſte and ſee how gracious God is in his ordinances towards us, and to receive and enjoy with peace and comfort the effects of the diſtinct operations and influences of each of the three Divine Perſons upon our ſouls; the love of God the Father ſhed abroad upon our hearts, the grace of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, God the Son, redeeming us; and the communicating of the Holy Spirit beſtowing upon us all thoſe gracious privileges and ineſtimable benefits, which the Father out of his infinite love hath ordained, and the Son out of his free grace and undeſerved favour and mercy hath purchaſed for us.

Here then we may ſay of a mere ſpeculative Chriſtian, as we might ſay, of a man deſiring earneſtly to know the exact nature of the glorious body of the ſun, if he did not participate of his enlivening heat, and invigorating influences; ſuch a ſcrutiny could no ways be advantageous to him, ſo it would be of no ſaving uſe to a poor dark dead ſoul, if it could perfectly know the whole myſtery of the Trinity, if nothing of its grace and love, and of its illuminating and enlivening communications were imparted to it.

I have ſet the Lord always before me, ſays the Pſalmiſt, xvi. 8. becauſe he is at my right hand, I ſhall not be moved; therefore, mine heart is glad and my glory rejoiceth, my fleſh alſo ſhall reſt in hope; here he profeſſes, that it was the belief of God as relating unto himſelf, as near him, and ſupporting him, which was the ground of his peace, comfort, joy and hope. And,

Thus it is we are to believe, that God the everlaſting Trine, the three, which are one, is not far from us; for, in God we live, and move, and have our being; as the mountains are round about Jeruſalem, ſo the Lord is round about his people from henceforth, even for evermore, Pſalm cxxv. 2. Zach. ii. 5.

If our eyes were opened (as the Prophets ſervants were) we ſhould ſee the glorious manifeſtations of the preſence and power of God towards us; we ſhould ſee him a wall of fire about us, and the glory in the midſt of us; and if the eyes of our underſtandings were opened and enlightned, and our hearts were opened to receive the grace of Chriſt, the love of God, and the communications of the Holy Spirit, our hearts would burn within us with holy love, and I ſhould be more able to declare and write theſe great and glorious truths to you, and you would be more capable of receiving and entertaining them in your hearts. So,

It is through the blindneſs of our underſtanding, and the hardneſs of our hearts, and the thick darkneſs of ſin and iniquity, overſpreading all our faculties, which hinders us from receiving the bright influences of the ſun of righteouſneſs; for, he is the light of men, and ſhineth in our darkneſs, and it is our darkneſs, that hinders us from comprehending him; he ſtandeth at the door of all our ſouls, continually knocking and demanding entrance, but we wilfully turn away our ears, and are deaf to his calls, and ſhut our hearts againſt him.

This doctrine alſo appears, more properly to be practical from theſe particulars, viz.

Firſt, By the belief of this doctrine our ſouls are ſuſtained, upheld, recreated and comforted, which would otherwiſe ſink and be overwhelmed with the fear, dread, and majeſty of God, as conſidered abſolutely, without reſpect to the perſons of the Trinity.

God, I ſay, as abſolutely conſidered, is a being of infinite perfections, with whom is terrible majeſty, Job xxxvii. 22. He is glorious in holineſs, and fearful in praiſes, and a conſuming fire, conſidered as Lord and Judge, and not reconciled in his Son Chriſt Jeſus; thou canſt not ſee me and live, ſaith God to Moſes, and ye cannot ſerve the Lord, ſaith Joſhua to the people of Iſrael, xxiv. 19. For, he is a jealous God, he will not forgive your tranſgreſſions, nor your ſins, and is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, Job xxiii. 15. and even the moſt holy perſons, when they conſider him as ſuch in his glorious majeſty and ſovereign, and irreſiſtible power, are afraid of him, and are troubled at his preſence.

But when the Scripture propoſes God to our belief, as, in three perſons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, our hearts and drooping conſciences are raiſed and comforted, and we lift up our head with joy; becauſe, hereby God offers himſelf unto us, as a Father, and ſhews us how we are to approach his preſence, and come unto him, viz. by his Son, in whom he is reconciled unto us, and by the Holy Ghoſt, powerfully ſhed abroad in our hearts.

Secondly, God thus conſidered, offers himſelf to our faith in ſuch reſpects, and under ſuch appellations, as carry with them the moſt endearing tenderneſs, even that of a father, eternally communicating his nature to his well-beloved Son, and of a bleſſed ſpirit proceeding from them both, by the breathing of their mutual love.

Thus it is by the manifeſtation of Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God, and the viſible deſcent of the Holy Spirit, to authorize the Chriſtian Inſtitution, that we excel the Jewiſh law, and have a more perfect knowledge of God.

The operations of the moſt Bleſſed Trinity are promiſed by Chriſt, and its graces in ſome meaſure are conferred on the baptized upon their profeſſion, ſtipulation, and ſelf-dedication made in that ſacrament.

They are more particularly promiſed in the converſion of a ſoul to God. And they are more or leſs to be experienced in the whole conduct of a ſoul to Heaven.

Thus the Chriſtian is firſt ſanctified in ſpirit, ſoul and body, in the baptiſmal ſanctification and dedication to God in, and by the name and authority of the Father and Son, and Holy Ghoſt. Then we are peculiarly drawn by the Father to Chriſt the Son, through the Spirit, in the work of converſion, or turning from ſin to God.

Laſtly, The ſoul, in the whole courſe of its progreſs to Heaven, experiences the love of God the Father, the grace of the Son, its Redeemer, and the communion of the Holy Ghoſt, its ſanctifier. And,

Though there be ſome peculiar vouchſafements to ſome peculiar friends of God, it becomes us to be humble and circumſpect, and to go on with fear and trembling in the uſe of the ordinary means of grace, in belief and expectation of the ordinary fruits and effects of them. And,

He, that perceives the love of God in his ſoul, by its effects, may be aſſured, that God the Father hath wrought his diſtinct work in him, and that he hath ſhed abroad his love upon his heart.

He, that finds the effects of inward redemption or deliverance from the power of ſin and Satan wrought in his ſoul, may be aſſured that the Lord Jeſus, the Son of God, the ſecond perſon in the Trinity, hath wrought his work of grace in his ſoul.

He, that finds that his luſts are ſubdued and mortified, and that the work of ſanctification improves, that he grows in grace, and makes a conſiderable progreſs in the paths of righteouſneſs. He, that experienceth a holy temper and diſpoſition of mind rooted, grounded and perfected, may be aſſured, that he hath had a communion with the Holy Ghoſt, to whom the Scripture you read, aſcribes the perfection of this great work.

When we have perſiſted without being tired in the ſearch of God, when we have earneſtly made our addreſſes unto him, and called upon him often for the mortification of ſin, and the renewal and ſanctification of our corrupt nature, and ſince theſe prayers anſwered, and that which we have ſo inceſſantly breathed after in ſome meaſure accompliſhed, he may be confident, that we are partakers, through the communications of the ſpirit, of thoſe glorious privileges and ineſtimable benefits, which the Father out of his infinite love did ordain, and the Son out of his free grace and favour did purchaſe for us; that is, pardon of ſins, and peace of conſcience here, and eternal happineſs hereafter. For,

All the bleſſed and gracious works of the Trinity naturally tend to produce practices correſpondent to their reſpective obligations, which they indelibly fix upon us, and as we have given ourſelves up to each perſon in the ſtipulation of baptiſm.

Critical and Explanatory ANNOTATIONS,

ON THE

Epiſtle of PAUL the APOSTLE,

TO THE GALATIANS.

The INTRODUCTION.

Galatia was not a particular city, but a country or province of the leſſer Aſia, where Paul had preached the Goſpel, as appears from Acts xviii. 23. And this epiſtle to the Galatians was wrote on this occaſion, as follows. Paul having heard that certain falſe brethren, or Judaizers had, ſince his departure, crept in amongſt them, and, as in other places, had taught the neceſſity of obſerving circumciſion, and the other ordinances of the law of Moſes: To which purpoſe they vilified the perſon of Paul, as if he (who was the greateſt ſtickler againſt the legal ordinances) had only received his doctrine from others, and therefore was not ſo much to be hearkned to as the other Apoſtles, who had been converſant with Chriſt upon earth, particularly Peter, James and John, (who preaching chiefly to the Jews, might not be ſo earneſt at firſt againſt circumciſion, and retaining the other rites and ceremonies of the law of Moſes, the better to gain upon that people) wherefore Paul declares in ch. i. to ver. 16. of ch. ii. that although he was not converted till after Chriſt's aſcenſion, yet he learned not his doctrine from any of the Apoſtles, but received it by immediate revelation from Heaven; (ſee Acts xxvi. 15, 16.) and that he was an Apoſtle of Chriſt, having received a particular commiſſion from the Lord Jeſus for the converſion of the Gentiles; whoſe converſation Peter withdrawing from at Antioch, upon the coming of ſome Jewiſh converts thither, was to be blamed, in that he diſcouraged the Gentile converts, and complied too much with the Judaizing Chriſtians. And,

Becauſe the falſe teachers would perſwade the Galatians, that circumciſion and the other Moſaic rites were neceſſary, and which they were to be juſtified by, the Apoſtle endeavours to confute that falſe doctrine at large in chap. ii. 16, &c. and chap. iii. 4. where he begins with a demand, whether they had not received the miraculous gifts of the Spirit when they had firſt embraced the faith in Chriſt, and not before, whilſt under the law? And then ſhews, that Abraham was juſtified by faith, and that believers in Chriſt are the ſpiritual children of Abraham, in whom all nations were to be bleſſed, according to the promiſe made to the fathers, Chriſt the Meſſiah being deſcended from him. Now the covenant was made with Abraham long before the law was given, ſo that now there is no diſtinction between Jew and Gentile, but they are equally heirs of God through Chriſt; and there is no occaſion for the converted Gentiles, who are freed from the Heathen rites, to turn again to the like beggarly elements, or rites of the law, as to obſerve the Jewiſh ſabbaths, and new moons, and yearly feaſts.

Which argument he illuſtrates in chap. iv. ver. 21, &c. by an induction of Abraham's two ſons, viz. Iſhmael by Hagar, a bond-maid, Gen. xviii. 16. and Iſaac by Sarah, a free-woman, Gen. xxi. 1, 2, 3. Now,

Iſhmael was born after the fleſh, that is, by natural generation, or in the courſe of nature, before Abraham was too old for children: but Iſaac was by virtue of God's promiſe, when, by reaſon of age, his parents were uncapable of children after the uſual natural courſe. So,

The Apoſtle ſays theſe two, Iſhmael and Iſaac, were an allegory or ſimilitude, repreſenting the two covenants; the one of the law, delivered from Mount Sinai, ſignified by the bond-woman Hagar, which tendeth to bondage, and anſwers to the earthly Jeruſalem, or the Jewiſh Church; the other is the covenant eſtabliſhed by Chriſt, repreſented by the free-woman Sarah, and anſwers to the heavenly Jeruſalem, or the Chriſtian Church, and tendeth to freedom. See Heb. xii. 25. Now, we who believe in Chriſt, are the children of the promiſe, and, as it were, of the free-woman, as was Iſaac, and ſo are free from the yoke of the law: We are therefore to ſtand faſt in that liberty wherewith Chriſt hath made us free, ch. v. 1. for that faith in Chriſt will ſave, provided it be after the goſpel-diſpenſation, i. e. joined with an holy and ſpiritual life, or which worketh by love, ver. 6. For although the Goſpel be a ſtate of liberty from the bondage of the ceremonial law, yet not for an occaſion to the fleſh, ver. 13. to ſatisfy the luſts thereof, and to neglect the holy duties of Chriſtianity.

To which purpoſe in the latter part of the Epiſtle, from ch. v. 13, &c. he exhorts them to prove their faith in that reſpect, as ſhewing the proper fruits of the Spirit, by avoiding the ſins of the fleſh therein mentioned, and diſcharging the duties of an holy and Chriſtian converſation. And,

Before he concludes, he takes notice of the reaſon why ſome judaizing chriſtians were ſo deſirous to have them circumciſed, according to the law of Moſes, ch. vi. 12. that they might glory in their fleſh, in procuring them to be circumciſed; whereby for their pretended zeal in promoting the legal obſervances among the Gentiles, thoſe falſe teachers might avoid perſecutions from the Jews, who were in all places the violent perſecutors of the Chriſtian Profeſſors, whereas he himſelf only gloried in the knowledge and profeſſion of the croſs of Chriſt, although it was ſo great a ſcandal to the Jews. Now,

From hence we obſerve,

I. That the days and months and times and years, ch. iv. 9, 10. which the Apoſtle reproves the Galatians for obſerving, were the Jewiſh Sabbath-days, (and the ſtrict ceremonial reſt thereon; ſee our Diſſertation in 1 Cor. chap. xvi.) their new moons, and ſolemn feaſts of the paſſover, and the like, enjoined by the law of Moſes, (compare Coloſſ. ii. 16, 17.) which were only ſhadows of Chriſt and the Goſpel, and could not be effectual to their juſtification by Chriſt, but rather an hindrance thereto, ch. v. 4, &c. beſides ſuch obſervances might carry off the Chriſtian converts to the Jewiſh religion, and cauſe them to fall from Chriſtianity. Yet

This does not at all forbid the Chriſtian holy-days, as the memory of Chriſt's birth, death, reſurrection, &c. and of the holy Apoſtles and Saints, who have ſuffered for the ſake of Chriſt and the cauſe of his Goſpel, becauſe the obſervance of ſuch holy-days, renew in our minds the benefits of our Holy Religion, and ſo keep us the more ſtedfaſt to it. But, in all ſuch obſervances, let us remember that it is not the day, nor the ſaint, that we ſerve, but the Lord, by ſtirring up holy deſires to follow the bleſſed examples of his departed ſaints, for we are not to celebrate them as the Jews did their holy-days, only in idleneſs and outward ceremony, but in ſingleneſs of heart, meditating how we ſhall imitate thoſe who have been followers of Chriſt as dear children. And thus,

II. That the liberty, which the Apoſtle here inſtructs the Church to ſtand faſt in, is a freedom from the yoke of the old Levitical law, as circumciſion, &c. ch. v. 1, 2. and not as many fancy, a liberty of chooſing what religion they pleaſe, and renouncing ſubjection to the governors which Chriſt and his Apoſtles conſtituted over the Church.

III. That to indulge ourſelves in the ſinful luſts of the fleſh, is to live an Heatheniſh life, and is utterly inconſiſtent with the ſpirit of Chriſtianity, and the hopes of Heaven, ch. v. 16, &c.

IV. That idolatry, which is the giving to a creature, Saint or Angel, or to a picture or image, religious and Divine Worſhip, is reckoned by the Apoſtle amongſt the moſt crying ſins of adultery, drunkenneſs, witchcraft, &c. ch. v. 19, 20, 21. So that

V. It naturally occurs here what we read in the Prophecy of Daniel, ch. xi. 38, 39. of the Mahuzzims honoured by the king, who doth according to his will, againſt which worſhip the Apoſtle writes in this Epiſtle.

In Scripture we are told of ſome truſting in God, and of others truſting in idols, and that God is our refuge, our ſtrength, our defence. In this ſenſe God is the rock of his people, and falſe gods are called the rock of thoſe that truſt in them, Deut. xxxii. 4, 15, 18, 30, 31, 37. In the ſame ſenſe the gods of the king, who ſhall do according to his will, are called Mahuzzims, fortreſſes, protectors, guardians, or defenders, or as we tranſlate it, the God of forces. In his eſtate, ſaith Daniel, chap. xi. 38, 39. ſhall he honour the God of forces; "even with a God whom his fathers knew not, ſhall he honour them with gold and ſilver, and with precious ſtones, and things of value. Thus ſhall he do in the moſt ſtrong holds or temples; ---- and he ſhall cauſe them to rule over many, and divide the land among them for a poſſeſſion." Now, though the Apoſtle has taken much pains to prevent ſuch a worſhip or idolatry, this came to paſs by degrees in the following manner, in the Chriſtian Church.

Gregory Nyſſen tells us, (Orat. de vita Greg. Thaumaturg. T. 3. p. 574.) that after the perſecution of the emperor Decius, Gregory biſhop of Neocæſarea in Pontus, inſtituted among all people, as an addition or corollary of devotion towards God, that feſtival days and aſſemblies ſhould be celebrated to them who had contended for the faith, that is, to the martyrs. And he adds this reaſon for the inſtitution: When he obſerved, ſaith Nyſſen, that the ſimple and unſkilful multitude, by reaſon of corporeal delights, remained in the error of idols; that the principal thing might be corrected among them, namely, that inſtead of their vain worſhip they might turn their eyes upon God; he permitted that at the memories of the holy martyrs they might make merry and delight themſelves, and be diſſolved into joy. The Heathens were delighted with the feſtivals of their gods, and unwilling to part with thoſe delights; and therefore Gregory, to facilitate their converſion, inſtituted annual feſtivals to the Saints and martyrs. Hence

It came to paſs, that for exploding the feſtivals of the Heathens, the principal feſtivals of the Chriſtians ſucceeded in their room; as the keeping of Chriſtmas with ivy and feaſting, and playing and ſports, in the room of the Bacchanalia and Saturnalia; the celebrating of May-day with flowers, in the room of the Floralia; and the keeping of feſtivals to the Virgin Mary, John the Baptiſt, and divers of the Apoſtles, in the room of the ſolemnities at the entrance of the ſun into the ſigns of Zodiac in the old Julian Calendar. In the ſame perſecution of Decius, Cyprian ordered the paſſions of the martyrs in Africa to be regiſtred, in order to celebrate their memories annually with oblations and ſacrifices; and Felix biſhop of Rome, a little after, as Platina relates, Martyrum gloriæ conſulens, conſtituit ut quotanis ſacrificia eorum nomine celebrarentur; "conſulting the glory of the martyrs, ordained that ſacrifices ſhould be celebrated annually in their name." By the pleaſures of theſe feſtivals the Chriſtians increaſed much in number, and decreaſed as much in virtue, until they were purged and made white by the perſecution of Dioclesian.

This was the firſt ſtep made in the Chriſtian religion towards the veneration of the martyrs; and tho' it did not yet amount to an unlawful worſhip, yet it diſpoſed the Chriſtians toward ſuch a further veneration of the dead, as in a ſhort time ended in the invocation of ſaints.

The next ſtep was the affecting to pray at the ſepulchres of the martyrs; which practice began in Diocleſian's perſecution. The council of Eliberis in Spain, celebrated in the third or fourth year of Diocleſian's perſecution, A. C. 305, hath theſe canons. Can. 34. "Cereos per diem placuit in cœmeterio non incendi; inquietandi enim ſpiritus ſanctorum non ſunt. Qui hæc non obſervarint, arceantur ab Eccleſiæ communione." Can. 35.

“ Placuit prohiberi ne fæminæ in cœmeterio pervigilent, eo quod ſæpe ſub obtentu orationis latenter ſcelera committant.” Preſently after that perſecution, about the year 314, the council of Laodicea in Phrygia, which then met for reſtoring the lapſed diſcipline of the Church, has the following canons. Can. 9. “ Thoſe of the Church are not allowed to go into the cœmetries or martyries, as they are called, of hereticks, for the ſake of prayer or recovery of health; but ſuch as go, if they be of the faithful, ſhall be excommunicated for a time.” Can. 34. “ A Chriſtian muſt not leave the martyrs of Chriſt, and go to falſe martyrs, that is, to the martyrs of the hereticks, for theſe are alien from God; and therefore, let thoſe be anathema who go to them.” Can. 51. “ The birth-days of the martyrs ſhall not be celebrated in Lent, but their commemoration ſhall be made on the Sabbath-days and Lord's-days.” The council of Paphlagonia, celebrated in the year 324, made this canon: “ If any man being arrogant, abominates the congregations of the martyrs, or the liturgies performed therein, or the memories of the martyrs, let him be anathema.” By all which it is manifeſt, that the Chriſtians in the time of Diocleſian's perſecution uſed to pray in the cœmeteries or burying-places of the dead, for avoiding the danger of the perſecution, and for want of Churches, which were all thrown down; and after the perſecution was over, that practice continued in honour of the martyrs, till new Churches could be built; and by uſe affected it as advantageous to devotion, and for recovering the health of thoſe that were ſick. It alſo appears that in theſe burying-places they commemorated the martyrs yearly upon days dedicated to them, and accounted all theſe practices pious and religious, and anathematized thoſe men as arrogant who oppoſed them, or prayed in the martyries of the hereticks. They alſo lighted torches to the martyrs in the day-time, as the Heathens did to their gods; which cuſtom, before the end of the fourth century, prevailed much in the weſt. They ſprinkled the worſhippers of the martyrs with holy water, as the Heathens did the worſhippers of their gods; and went in pilgrimage to ſee Jeruſalem and other holy places, as if thoſe places conferred ſanctity on the viſiters. From the cuſtom of praying in the cœmeteries and martyries, came the cuſtom of tranſlating the bodies of the ſaints and martyrs into ſuch Churches as were new built; the emperor Conſtantius began this practice about the year 359, cauſing the bodies of Andrew the Apoſtle, Luke and Timothy, to be tranſlated into a new Church at Conſtantinople; and before this act of Conſtantius, the Egyptians kept the bodies of their martyrs and ſaints unburied upon beds in their private houſes, and told ſtories of their ſouls appearing after death and aſcending up to Heaven, as Athanaſius relates in the life of Antony. All which gave occaſion to the emperor Julian, as Cyril relates, to accuſe the Chriſtians in this manner: “ Your adding to that ancient dead man, Jeſus, many new dead men, who can ſufficiently abominate? You have filled all places with ſepulchres and monuments, altho' you are no where bidden to proſtrate your ſelves to ſepulchres, and to reſpect them officiouſly. And a little after: Since Jeſus ſaid that ſepulchres are full of filthineſs, how do you invoke God upon them? And in another place he ſaith, that if Chriſtians had adhered to the precepts of the Hebrews, they would have worſhipped one God inſtead of many, and not a man, or rather not many unhappy men: And that they adored the wood of the croſs, making it images on their foreheads, and before their houſes.”

After the ſepulchres of ſaints and martyrs were thus converted into places of worſhip like the Heathen temples, and the Churches into ſepulchres, and a certain ſort of ſanctity attributed to the dead bodies of the ſaints and martyrs buried in them, and annual feſtivals were kept to them, with ſacrifices offered to God in their name; the next ſtep towards the invocation of ſaints, was the attributing to their dead bodies, bones and other reliques, a power of working miracles, by means of the ſeparate ſouls, who were ſuppoſed to know what we do or ſay, and to be able to do us good or hurt, and to work thoſe miracles. This was the very notion the Heathens had of the ſeparate ſouls of their ancient kings and heroes, whom they worſhipped under the names of Saturn, Rhea, Jupiter, Juno, Mars, Venus, Bacchus, Ceres, Oſiris, Iſis, Apollo, Diana, and the reſt of their gods. For theſe gods being male and female, husband and wife, ſon and daughter, brother and ſiſter, are thereby diſcovered to be ancient men and women. Now, As the firſt ſtep towards the invocation of ſaints was ſet on foot by the perſecution of Decius, and the ſecond by the perſecution of Diocleſian; ſo this third ſeems to have been owing to the proceedings of Conſtantius and Julian the apoſtate.

When Julian began to reſtore the worſhip of the Heathen gods, and to vilify the ſaints and martyrs; the Chriſtians of Syria and Egypt ſeem to have made a great noiſe about the miracles done by the reliques of the Chriſtian Saints and Martyrs, in oppoſition to the powers attributed by Julian and the Heathens to their idols. For Sozomen and Ruffinus tell us, that when he opened the Heathen temples, and conſult the oracle of Apollo Daphnæus in the ſuburbs of Antioch, and preſſed by many ſacrifices for an anſwer; the oracle at length told him that the bones of the martyr Babylas which were buried there hindered him from ſpeaking. By which anſwer we may underſtand, that ſome Chriſtian was got into the place where the Heathen prieſts uſed to ſpeak through a pipe in delivering their oracles; and before this, Hilary in his book againſt Conſtantius, written in the laſt year of that emperor, makes the following mention of what was then doing in the eaſt where he was. Sine martyrio perſequeris. Plus crudelitati veſtræ Nero, Deci, Maximiane, debemus. Diabolum enim per vos vicimus. Sanctus ubique beatorum martyrum ſanguis exceptus eſt, dum in his Dæmones mugiunt, dum ægritudines depelluntur, dum miraculorum opera cernuntur, elevari ſine laqueis corpora, & diſpenſis pede fæminis veſtes non defluere in faciem, uri ſine ignibus ſpiritus, confiteri ſine interrogantis incremento fidei. And Gregory Nazianzen, in his firſt oration againſt the emperor Julian then reigning, writes thus: Martyres non extimuiſti quibus præclari honores & feſta conſtituta, a quibus Dæmones propelluntur & morbi curantur; quorum ſunt apparitiones & prædictiones; quorum vel ſola corpora idem poſſunt quod animæ ſanctæ, ſive manibus contrectentur, ſive honorentur: quorum vel ſolæ ſanguinis guttæ atque exigua paſſionis ſigna idem poſſunt quod corpora. Hæc non colis ſed contemnis & aſpernaris. Theſe things made the Heathens in the reign of the ſame emperor demoliſh the ſepulchre of John the Baptiſt in Phœnicia, and burn his bones, when ſeveral Chriſtians mixing themſelves with the Heathens, gathered up ſome of his remains, which were ſent to Athanaſius, who hid them in the wall of a Church; foreſeeing by a prophetick ſpirit, as Ruffinus tells us, that they might be profitable to future generations.

The cry of theſe miracles being once ſet on foot, continued for many years, and increaſed and grew more general. Chryſoſtom, in his ſecond oration on St. Babylas, twenty years after the ſilencing of the oracle of Apollo of Delphas, as above, viz. A. C. 382, ſaith of the miracles done by the Saints and their reliques: Nulla eſt noſtri hujus orbis ſeu regio, ſeu gens, ſeu urbs, ubi nova & inopinata miracula hæc non decantentur; quæ quidem ſi figmenta fuiſſent, prorſus in tantam hominum admirationem non veniſſent, Vide Hom. 47. in S. Julian.

Egypt abounded moſt with the reliques of ſaints and martyrs, the Egyptians keeping them embalmed upon beds even in their private houſes; and Alexandria was eminent above all other cities for diſperſing them, ſo as on that account to acquire glory with all men, and manifeſt herſelf to be the metropolis of the world. Antioch followed the example of Egypt, in diſperſing the reliques of the forty martyrs; and the examples of Egypt and Syria were ſoon followed by the reſt of the world.

This practice began ſome years before the death of Athanaſius, when the miracle-working bones of John the Baptiſt were carried into Egypt, and hid in the wall of a Church, that they might be profitable to future generations. It was reſtrained in the reign of Julian the apoſtate; and then it ſpread from Egypt into all the empire, Alexandria being the metropolis, according to Chryſoſtom, for propagating this ſort of devotion, and Antioch and other cities ſoon following her example.

In propagating theſe ſuperſtitions, the ring-leaders were the monks, and Antony was at the head of them; for in the end of the life of Antony, Athanaſius relates that theſe were his dying words to his diſciples who then attended him. "Do you take care, ſaid Antony, to adhere to Chriſt in the firſt place, and then to the ſaints, that after death they may receive you as friends and acquaintance into the everlaſting tabernacles. Think upon theſe things, perceive theſe things; and if you have any regard to me, remember me as a father." This being delivered in charge to the monks by Antony at his death, A. C. 356, could not but inflame their whole body with devotion towards the ſaints, as the ready way to be received by them into the eternal tabernacles after death. Hence came that noiſe about the miracles done by the reliques of the ſaints in the time of Conſtantius: Hence came the diſperſion of the miracle-working reliques into all the empire; Alexandria ſetting the example, and being renowned for it above all other cities. Hence it came to paſs in the days of Julian, A. C. 362, that Athanaſius, by a prophetic ſpirit, as Ruffinus tells us, hid the bones of John the Baptiſt from the Heathens, not in the ground to be forgotten, but in the hollow wall of a Church before proper witneſſes. Hence alſo came the invocation of the ſaints for doing ſuch miracles, and for aſſiſting men in their devotions, and meditating with God. For Athanaſius, even from his youth, looked upon the dead ſaints and martyrs as mediators of our prayers: In his epiſtle to Marcellinus, written in the days of Conſtantine the Great, he ſaith that the words of the Pſalms are not to be tranſpoſed or any wiſe changed, but to be recited and ſung without any artifice, as they are written, "that the holy men who delivered them, knowing them to be their own words, may pray with us; or rather, that the Holy Ghoſt, who ſpake in the holy men, ſeeing his own words with which he inſpired them, may join with them in aſſiſting us.

Whilſt Egypt abounded with monks above any other country, the veneration of the ſaints began ſooner, and ſpread faſter there than in other places.

Thus Baſil, a monk, who was made Biſhop of Ceſarea in the year 369, and died in the year 378, in his oration on the martyr Mamas, ſaith: "Be ye mindful of the martyr; as many of you as have enjoyed him in your dreams, as many as in this place have been aſſiſted by him in prayer, as many of you as upon invoking him by name have had him preſent in your works, as many as he has reduced into the way from wandering, as many as he has reſtored to health, as many as have had their dead children reſtored by him to life, as many as have had their lives prolonged by him:" And a little after, he thus expreſſes the univerſality of this ſuperſtition in the regions of Cappadocia and Bithynia: "At the memory of the martyr, ſaith he, the whole region is moved; at his feſtival the whole city is tranſported with joy. Nor do the kindred of the rich turn aſide to the ſepulchres of their anceſtors, but all go to the place of devotion." Again, in the end of the Homily he prays, that God would preſerve the Church, thus fortified with the great towers of the martyrs: And in his oration on the forty martyrs; "Theſe are they, ſaith he, who obtaining our country, like certain towers afford us ſafety againſt our enemies. Neither are they ſhut up in one place only, but being diſtributed, are ſent into many regions, and adorn many countries.--- You have often endeavoured, you have often laboured to find one who might pray for you: Here are forty, emiting one voice of prayer.--- He that is in affliction flies to theſe, he that rejoices has recourſe to theſe; the firſt, that he may be freed from evil; the laſt, that he may continue in happineſs. Here a woman praying for her children is heard; ſhe obtains a ſafe return for her huſband from abroad, and health for him in his ſickneſs.--- O ye common keepers of mankind, the beſt companions of our cares, ſuffragans and co-adjutors of our prayers, moſt powerful ambaſſadors to God, &c. By all which it is manifeſt, that before the year 378, the orations and ſermons upon the ſaints went much beyond the bounds of mere oratorical flouriſhes, and that the common people in the eaſt were already generally corrupted by the monks with ſaint-worſhip.

Gregory Nazianzen, a monk, in his ſixth oration, written A. C. 373, when he was newly made biſhop of Saſima, ſaith: "Let us purify ourſelves to the martyrs, or rather to the God of the martyrs:" and a little after he calls the martyrs mediators of obtaining an aſcenſion or divinity. The ſame year, in the end of his oration upon Athanaſius, then newly dead, he thus invokes him: "Do thou look down upon us propitiouſly, and govern this people, as perfect adorers of the perfect Trinity, which in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, is contemplated and worſhipped: If there ſhall be peace, preſerve me, and feed my flock with me; but if war bring me home, place me by thy ſelf, and by thoſe that are like thee; however great my requeſt." And in the end of the funeral oration upon Baſil, written A. C. 378, he thus addreſſes him: "But thou, O divine and ſacred Head, look down upon us from Heaven; and by thy prayers either take away that thorn of the fleſh which is given us by God for exerciſe, or obtain that we may bear it with courage, and direct all our life to that which is moſt fitting for us. When we depart this life, receive us there in your tabernacles, that living together and beholding the Holy and Bleſſed Trinity more purely and perfectly, whereof we have now but an imperfect view, we may there come to the end of our deſires, and receive this reward of the wars which we have waged or ſuffered : And in his oration upon Cyprian, not the biſhop of Carthage, but a Greek, he invokes him after the ſame manner ; and tells us alſo, how a pious virgin named Juſtina, was protected by invoking the virgin Mary, and how miracles were done by the aſhes of Cyprian.

Gregory Nyſſen, another eminent monk and biſhop, in the life of Ephræm Syrus, tells how a certain man returning from a far country, was in great danger, by reaſon all the ways were intercepted by the armies of barbarous nations ; but upon invoking Ephræm by name, and ſaying, holy Ephræm aſſiſt me, he eſcaped the danger, neglected the fear of death, and beyond his hope got ſafe home. In the end of his oration Gregory calls upon Ephræm after the following manner : “ But thou, O Ephræm, aſſiſting now at the Divine Altar, and ſacrificing to the Prince of Life, and to the moſt Holy Trinity, together with the Angels ; remember us all, and obtain for us pardon of our ſins, that we may enjoy the eternal happineſs of the kingdom of Heaven.” The ſame Gregory, in his oration on the martyr Theodorus, written A. C. 381, thus deſcribes the power of that martyr, and the practice of the people. “ This martyr, ſaith he, the laſt year quieted the barbarous tempeſt, and put a ſtop to the horrid war of the fierce and cruel Scythians.--- If any one is permitted to carry away the duſt with which the tomb is covered, wherein the body of the martyr reſts ; the duſt is accepted as a gift, and gathered to be laid up as a thing of great price. For to touch the reliques themſelves, if any ſuch proſperous fortune ſhall at any time happen ; how great a favour that is, and not to be obtained without the moſt earneſt prayers, they know well who have obtained it. For as a living and florid body, they who behold it embrace it, applying to it the eyes, mouth, ears, and all the organs of ſenſe ; and then with affection pouring tears upon the martyr, as if he was whole and appeared to them ; they offer prayers with ſupplication, that he would intercede for them as an advocate, praying to him as an officer attending upon God, and invoking him as receiving gifts whenever he will.” At length Gregory concludes the oration with this prayer ; “ O Theodorus, we want many bleſſings ; intercede and beſeech for thy country before the common King and Lord ; for the country of the martyr is the place of his paſſion, and they are his citizens, brethren and kindred, who have him, defend, adorn and honour him. We fear afflictions, we expect dangers ; the wicked Scythians are not far off, ready to make war againſt us. As a ſoldier fight for us, as a martyr uſe liberty of ſpeech for thy fellow-ſervants. Pray for peace, that theſe publick meetings may not ceaſe, that the furious and wicked barbarian may not rage againſt the temples and altars, that the profane and impious may not trample upon the holy things. We acknowledge it a benefit received from thee, that we are preſerved ſafe and entire, we pray for freedom from danger in time to come ; and if there ſhall be need of greater interceſſion and deprecation, call together the choir of thy brethren the martyrs, and in conjunction with them all intercede for us. Let the prayers of many juſt ones attone for the ſins of the multitudes and the people ; exhort Peter, excite Paul, and alſo John the divine and beloved diſciple, that they may be ſollicitous for the Churches which they have erected, for which they have been in chains, for which they have undergone dangers and deaths, that the worſhip of idols may not lift up its head againſt us, that hereſies may not ſpring up like thorns in the vineyard, that tares grown up may not choak the wheat, that no rock void of the fatneſs of true dew may be againſt us, and render the fruitful power of the word void of a root ; but by the power of the prayers of thyſelf and thy companions, O admirable man and eminent among the martyrs, the commonwealth of Chriſtians may become a field of corn.” The ſame Gregory Nyſſen, in his ſermon upon the death of Meletius biſhop of Antioch, preached at Conſtantinople the ſame year, A. C. 381, before the biſhops of all the eaſt aſſembled in the ſecond general council, ſpake thus of Meletius. “ The bridegroom, ſaith he, is not taken from us ; he ſtands in the midſt of us, tho' we do not ſee him ; he is a prieſt in the moſt inward places, and face to face intercedes before God for us and the ſins of the people.”

This was no oratorical flouriſh, but Gregory's real opinion, as may be underſtood by what we have cited out of him concerning Ephræm and Theodorus; and as Gregory preached this before the council of Conſtantinople, you may thence know, ſaith Baronius, Ad. an. 381. Sect. 41. that he profeſſed what the whole council, and therewith the whole Church of thoſe parts believed, namely, that the ſaints in Heaven offer prayers for us before God.

Ephræm Syrus, another eminent monk, who was contemporary with Baſil, and died the ſame year; in the end of his encomium or oration upon Baſil then newly dead, invokes him after this manner: "Intercede for me, a very miſerable man; and recal me by thy interceſſions, O father; thou who art ſtrong, pray for me who am weak; thou who art diligent, for me who am negligent; thou who art chearful for me who am heavy; thou who art wiſe, for me who am fooliſh. Thou who haſt treaſured up a treaſure of all virtues, be a guide to me who am empty of every good work." In the beginning of his encomium upon the forty martyrs, written at the ſame time, he thus invokes them: Help me therefore, O ye ſaints, with your interceſſion; and O ye beloved, with your holy prayers; that Chriſt by his grace may direct my tongue to ſpeak, &c. and afterwards mentioning the mother of one of theſe forty martyrs, he concludes the oration with this prayer: I entreat thee, O holy, faithful, and bleſſed woman, pray for me to the ſaints, ſaying; Intercede ye that triumph in Chriſt, for the moſt little and miſerable Ephræm, that he may find mercy, and by the grace of Chriſt may be ſaved. Again, in his ſecond ſermon or oration on the praiſes of the holy martyrs of Chriſt, he thus addreſſes them: "We entreat you moſt holy martyrs, to intercede with the Lord for us miſerable ſinners, beſet with the filthineſs of negligence, that he would infuſe his Divine Grace into us; and afterwards, near the end of the ſame diſcourſe, Now ye moſt holy men and glorious martyrs of God, help me a miſerable ſinner with your prayers, that in that dreadful hour I may obtain mercy, when the ſecrets of all hearts ſhall be made manifeſt. I am to day become to you, moſt holy martyrs of Chriſt, as it were an unprofitable and unſkilful cup-bearer; for I have delivered to the ſons and brothers of your faith, a cup of the excellent wine of your warfare, with the excellent table of your victory, repleniſhed with all ſorts of dainties. I have endeavoured, with the whole affection and deſire of my mind, to recreate your fathers and brothers, kindred and relations, who daily frequent the table. For behold they ſing, and with exultation and jubilee glorify God, who has crowned your virtues, by ſetting on your moſt ſacred heads incorruptible and celeſtial crowns; they with exceſſive joy ſtand about the ſacred reliques of your martyrdoms, wiſhing for a bleſſing, and deſiring to bear away holy medicines both for the body and the mind. As good diſciples and faithful miniſters of our benign Lord and Saviour, beſtow therefore a bleſſing on them all; and on me alſo, tho' weak and feeble, who having received ſtrength by your merits, and interceſſions, have with the whole devotion of my mind, ſung a hymn to your praiſe and glory before your holy reliques. Wherefore, I beſeech you ſtand before the throne of the Divine Majeſty for me Ephræm, a vile and miſerable ſinner, that by your prayers I may deſerve to obtain ſalvation, and with you enjoy eternal felicity by the grace and benignity and mercy of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, to whom with the Father and Holy Ghoſt be praiſe, honour and glory for ever and ever." Amen.

By what has been cited out of Baſil, the two Gregories and Ephrem, we may underſtand that ſaint-worſhip was eſtabliſhed among the monks and their admirers in Egypt, Phœnicia, Syria and Cappadocia, before the year 378, this being the year in which Baſil died.--- Chryſoſtom was not much later; he preached at Antioch almoſt all the time of Theodoſius the Great, and in his ſermons are many exhortations to this ſort of ſuperſtition, as may be ſeen in the end of his orations on Julia, on Pelagia, on the martyr Ignatius, on the Egyptian martyrs, on Fate and Providence, on the martyrs in general, on Berenice and Proſdoce, on Juventinus and Maximus, on the name of Cœmetery, &c. Thus in his ſermon on Berenice and Proſdoce: "Perhaps, ſaith he, you are inflamed with no ſmall love towards theſe martyrs; therefore with this ardour let us fall down before their reliques, let us embrace their coffins. For the coffins of the martyrs have great virtue, even as the bones of the martyrs have great power. Nor let us only on the day of this feſtival, but alſo on other days apply to them, invoke them, and beſeech them to be our patrons: For they have great power and efficacy, not only whilſt alive, but alſo after death; and much more after death than before. For now they bear the marks or brands of Chriſt; and when they ſhew theſe marks, they can obtain all things of the King. Seeing therefore they abound with ſuch efficacy, and have ſo much friendſhip with him; we alſo, when by continual attendance and perpetual viſitation of them we have inſinuated ourſelves into their familiarity, may, by their aſſiſtance, obtain the mercy of God.

Conſtantinople was free from theſe ſuperſtitions till Gregory Nazianzen came thither, A.C. 379; but in a few years it was alſo inflamed with it. Ruffinus, Hiſt. Eccl. l. 2. c. 23. tells us, that when the Emperor Theodoſius was ſetting out againſt the tyrant Eugenius, which was in the year 394, he went about with the prieſts and people to all the places of prayer; lay proſtrate in haircloth before the ſhrines of the martyrs and apoſtles, and prayed for aſſiſtance by the interceſſion of the ſaints. Sozomen, l. 4. c. 24. adds, that when the emperor was marched ſeven miles from Conſtantinople againſt Eugenius, he went into a Church which he had built to John the Baptiſt, and invoked the Baptiſt for his aſſiſtance. Chryſoſtom, Hom. 66. ad populum, circa finem. & Hom. 8. 27. in Matt. Hom. 42, 43. in Gen. Hom. 1. in 1 Theſſ. ſays: "He that is clothed in purple, approaches to embrace theſe ſepulchres; and laying aſide his dignity, ſtands ſupplicating the ſaints to intercede for him with God; and he who goes crowned with a diadem, offers his prayers to the tent-maker and the fiſherman, as his protectors. And in another place, Expoſit. in Pſal. cxiv. ſub finem. The cities run together to the ſepulchres of the martyrs, and the people are inflamed with the love of them.

This practice of ſending reliques from place to place for working miracles, and thereby inflaming the devotion of the nations towards the dead ſaints and their reliques, and ſetting up the religion of invoking their ſouls, laſted only till the middle of the reign of the emperor Theodoſius the Great; for he then prohibited it by a publick edict. After this they filled the fields and high-ways with altars erected to martyrs, which they pretended to diſcover by dreams and revelations; and this occaſioned the making the 14th canon of the 5th council of Carthage. Theſe altars were for invoking the ſaints or martyrs buried or pretended to be buried under them. Firſt they filled the Churches in all places with the reliques or pretended reliques of the martyrs, for invoking them in the Churches; and then they filled the fields and high-ways with altars, for invoking them every where; and this new religion was ſet up by the monks in all the Greek empire before the expedition of the emperor Theodoſius againſt Eugenius, and I think before his above-mentioned edict, A.C. 386.

The ſame religion of worſhipping Mahuzzims quickly ſpread into the weſtern empire alſo; but though Daniel in his Prophecy deſcribes chiefly the things done among the nations comprehended in the body of his third beaſt. Yet it is plain, that the Apoſtle in his Epiſtle is cautioning his new converts from Judaiſm, to beware of falling into the like abominations, by too tenacious an obſervance of days and times and years, &c. But you ſee that for all this, how ſoon this idolatry crept into the Chriſtian Church, when there was no longer a Paul to oppoſe it.

I have been the more particular in this obſervation, becauſe it may ſerve to confute the ſame condemned worſhip now practiſed in the Church of Rome, in oppoſition both to Scripture and reaſon.

CHAP. I.

6 He wondereth that they have ſo ſoon left him and the Goſpel; 8 And accurſeth thoſe that preach any other Goſpel than he did. 11 He learned the Goſpel, not of men, but of God : 13 And ſheweth what he was before his calling, 17 and what he did preſently after it.

PAUL an apoſtle (not of men, neither by man, but by Jeſus Chriſt, and God the Father, who raiſed him from the dead)

2 And all the brethren which are with me, unto the churches of Galatia :

3 Grace be to you, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jeſus Chriſt,

4 Who gave himſelf for our ſins, that he might deliver us from this preſent evil world, according to the will of God, and our Father :

5 To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

6 I marvel that ye are ſo ſoon removed from him that called you into the grace of Chriſt, unto another goſpel :

7 Which is not another ; but there be ſome that trouble you, and would pervert the goſpel of Chriſt.

8 But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other goſpel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accurſed.

9 As we ſaid before, ſo ſay I now again, if any man preach any other goſpel unto you, than that ye have received, let him be accurſed.

10 For do I now perſwade men, or God? or do I ſeek to pleaſe men? for if I yet pleaſed men, I ſhould not be the ſervant of Chriſt.

11 But I certify you, brethren, that the goſpel which was preached of me, is not after man.

12 For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jeſus Chriſt.

13 For ye have heard of my converſation in time paſt, in the Jews religion, how that beyond meaſure I perſecuted the church of God, and waſted it :

14 And profited in the Jews religion, above many my equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers.

15 But when it pleaſed God, who ſeparated me from my mothers womb, and called me by his grace

16 To reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the heathen ; immediately I conferred not with fleſh and blood :

17 Neither went I up to Jeruſalem, to them which were apoſtles before me ; but I went into Arabia, and returned again unto Damaſcus.

18 Then after three years I went up to Jeruſalem, to ſee Peter, and abode with him fifteen days.

19 But other of the apoſtles ſaw I none, ſave James the Lords brother.

20 Now the things which I write unto you, behold, before God I lie not.

21 Afterwards I came into the regions of Syria and Cylicia ;

22 And was unknown by face unto the churches of Judea, which were in Chriſt :

23 But they had heard only, That he which perſecuted us in times paſt, now preacheth the faith which once he deſtroyed.

24 And they glorified God in me.

In this chapter the Apoſtle introduceth the ſubject of the following Epiſtle with

I. A Preface, in which he (1.) ſhews himſelf to be the author by deſcribing himſelf by his office, and by his call thereto, declared negatively, not to be human; and poſitively to be divine, ver. 1. In the 2d verſe he ſhews to whom he writes ; and then adds a ſalutation, at ver. 3. A deſcription of Chriſt by the work of redemption, ver. 4. And a doxology or thankſgiving to God for this work of redemption, ver. 5. Then,

II. He reproves the Galatians for revolting from the Goſpel Doctrine of juſtification, ver. 6. amplified by the ground of this detection, the craft and error of ſeducers, ver. 7.

III. He aſſerts the Divine Authority of the Goſpel he had preached to them in the name of Chriſt ; (1.) By denouncing a double curſe upon any that ſhould preach any other Goſpel, ver. 8, 9. (2.) From the ſcope of his doctrine ; which was not to feed them with human inventions, but to bring them to a dependance on God's Authority alone in matters of faith, with the reaſon of his ſo doing, ver. 10. (3.) By the original or way of diſcovery of it to him, which ſays he was not from man, but by revelation from Jeſus Chriſt, ver. 11, 12. And

He proves this extraordinary miſſion to preach the Goſpel. (1.) By his oppoſition to the Goſpel formerly, ver. 13. (2.) By his knowledge in, and zeal for the Jewiſh Religion, ver. 14. (3.) By the manner of his converſion and call to the Apoſtolic Office ; whereof he gives a large account in ſeveral particulars ; as his deſignment for that office, his actual call to it, ver. 15. his illumination with ſaving knowledge ; his laying aſide all carnal reſpects, ver. 16. his declining any converſe with the Apoſtles ; and his removing to remote parts, ver. 17. (4) By his ſhort viſit of Peter and James, ver. 18, 19. The truth whereof he confirms with an oath, ver. 20. (5.) By the diſcharge of his office with approbation ; wherein his removal into his own country, ver. 21. his unacquaintedneſs with the Chriſtians of Judea, ver. 22. The report they heard of his converſion and change, ver. 23. And their approbation of all, is ſpecified at ver. 24.

Ver. 1. Paul.] See his life in the general preface to the Epiſtles.

——An Apoſtle (not of men, &c.] See ver. 11, 12. i. e. not ſent to preach the inventions or doctrine of men.

——But by Jeſus Chriſt.] Called to be an Apoſtle by Jeſus Chriſt, whoſe doctrine I preach. See Rom. i. 1, &c. and Tit. i. 3.

——God the Father.] Of Jeſus Chriſt, and alſo of all the world by right of creation.

——Who raiſed him from the dead.] See Acts ii. 24.

Ver. 2.——All the brethren which are with me.] At Rome, from whence this Epiſtle was written. Here by brethren we underſtand only his fellow-labourers in the Goſpel. See Philip. ii. 22. and iv. 21.

——Churches of Galatia.] Or, the ſeveral aſſemblies of Chriſtian People within the confines of the province of Galatia.

Ver. 3. Grace.] Which is conferred to man thro' the merits of Chriſt.

Ver. 4.——From this preſent evil world.] See Iſa. lxv. 17.

——According to the will of God.] As God had of his great mercy promiſed of his free grace to redeem mankind by his Son Jeſus Chriſt.

Ver. 5. To whom.] i. e. God the Father.

——Be glory.] Of all my labours, and of all good deeds for ever.

Ver. 6.——Removed.] i. e. Perſuaded to embrace another Goſpel, or a revelation contrary to what you believed when I preached unto you the whole covenant and counſel of God.

——From him.] i. e. From me Paul.

Ver. 7 Which is not another.] Revelation, but the curſed invention of falſe teachers, who would interrupt the peace which you enjoy in Chriſt, and endeavour to pervert you from that faith which you profeſſed before me in his name.

Ver. 8 But though we.] The Apoſtles, or our fellow-labourers in Chriſt's vineyard.

——Or an Angel from Heaven.] Or any other perſon, that ſhould pretend to be ſent from Heaven to preach a new revelation contrary to the Goſpel of Chriſt, which we have received from him, and ye have received from us, let him be accurſed.

——Accurſed.] Delivered up by a juſt judgment unto the power of Satan.

Ver. 9. As we ſaid before.] i. e. I and all the brethren which are with me (ſee ver. 1.) write this Epiſtle to you with one conſent, and as we have juſt now told you in ver. 8. ſo I now again repeat it.

——If any man preach any other Goſpel unto you, &c.] See the notes on ver. 8. Moreover, we ought here to obſerve that this Goſpel which Paul preached, and which the Chriſtian world now embraces, or that the preſent ſtanding revelation of God's Will, contained in the books of the Old and New Teſtament is abundantly ſufficient to perſuade men to repentance, if they be not unreaſonably blind and obſtinate: That there can be no other ſure guide to ſalvation: And therefore they are accurſed, who teach or embrace any other doctrine than what is contained in thoſe books.

It is plain from this Apoſtolick Reproof to the Galatians, That they were like to be carried away from this Goſpel; and it is as true, that the age in which we live is not a whit better than thoſe Galatians, many denying all revelation, as unneceſſary; and multitudes wavering from that firmneſs which they ought to corroborate in the cauſe of Chriſtianity. For, ſome query, whether the Goſpel, and the law confirmed thereby, be ſufficient to perſuade men to repentance, and fully to direct them in the way of happineſs? And others queſtion, whether there be not ſome particular defects in this revelation, which render it not ſo ſufficient for this purpoſe, as it is poſſible a ſtanding revelation might be? Theſe are the doctrines of thoſe falſe teachers, who endeavoured to ſeduce the new-converted Galatians, and which the Apoſtle in this Epiſtle confutes; proving, as I ſhall after his example endeavour to do, by way of Diſſertation, that this Goſpel we preach is the ſame with his, and that it is ſo perfect, as to need no other revelation.

A Diſſertation on the ſufficiency of the Scripture-Revelation.

Firſt, I ſhall ſhew that the Holy Scripture gives us ſufficient directions what to do.

And of this there can be little doubt among thoſe that believe the Divine Inſpiration and Authority of the Holy Scripture; becauſe to them its own teſtimony of its own ſufficiency is a proof thereof beyond all exception. For, if, as the Apoſtle ſays, 2 Tim. iii. 16. it be profitable for doctrine and for reproof, and for correction, and for inſtruction in righteouſneſs; it is plainly profitable for all the purpoſes for which we can deſire a Divine Revelation. And if, as he ſays in the next verſe, it was given to make perfect the Man of God, (that is, the Man whoſe buſineſs it is to teach and inſtruct others,) and throughly to furniſh him unto all good works, it cannot be deficient in delivering all ſuch rules and directions as are neceſſary to be given by a paſtor of the people committed to his care. And if, as the ſame Apoſtle had ſaid at the 15th verſe of that chapter, it be able to make us wiſe unto ſalvation, we have no reaſon to deſire to be wiſer than this excellent book can make us. And if all this could truly be ſaid by the Apoſtle, before the canon of the New Teſtament was compleated; if it could be ſaid by him of thoſe Holy Scriptures which Timothy had known from a child, that is, of the books of the Old Teſtament only, much more may it be now ſaid of the books of both Teſtaments together. And

Between us and Infidels who reject the Scripture, the ſufficiency of the Scripture as a rule of faith and manners, is hardly matter of controverſy: For theſe do not reject the Scripture becauſe it teaches too little, but rather becauſe it teaches too much; becauſe it teaches doctrines above their reaſon, and commands ſuch duties as they do not like to practice; and if it taught leſs than it does, they would be more ready to own its Divine Authority.

But nevertheleſs, even theſe men (that they may leave no ſtone unturned) will be ſometimes diſcourſing upon this point; and although thoſe books of Holy Scripture which are now extant, and which are now generally received, to teach much more than they themſelves are willing to believe and practiſe, yet, that they may, as much as they can, unſettle the belief of others, do not ſtick to argue againſt the Chriſtian Religion from this topick, and to affirm that the books of Holy Scripture which are now received do not contain the whole will of God. For,

There were, ſay they, in former times, ſeveral other Goſpels and Epiſtles, and other tracts, deſigned to inſtruct men in the Chriſtian Religion, which were written by the Apoſtles or other inſpired men, and which were conſequently of the ſame authority, in themſelves, with thoſe which are now received into the canon of which nevertheleſs we have nothing now left, but the names and titles, or ſome imperfect and uncertain fragments; ſo that it may well be doubted, whether thoſe few books which are now remaining, are ſufficient to inſtruct us in all neceſſary points of knowledge and practice. And of this matter of fact, there is, they ſay, ſome evidence even from the Scripture itſelf: For Luke, in the beginning of his Goſpel, takes notice, that many before him had taken in hand to ſet forth a declaration of thoſe things which were ſurely believed among Chriſtians; that is, had written and publiſhed narratives of the life, actions, miracles, preaching, death and reſurrection of our Saviour. But there are no hiſtories of this kind, no Goſpels now extant, that were written before Luke's, except only Matthew's and Mark's; and if there had been no more extant at that time, it would have been very improper, they ſay, for the Evangeliſt to have ſaid, that many had written upon this ſubject, when he ſpake only of thoſe two. And that there was matter enough for ſeveral ſuch narratives (ſo that though they were very different Goſpels, they might nevertheleſs be all true) we are told by John, who wrote his Goſpel the laſt of the four Evangeliſts, John xx. 30. many other ſigns truly did Jeſus in the preſence of his diſciples, which are not written in this book: And again, ch. xxi. 25, There are alſo many other things which Jeſus did, the which, if they ſhould be written every one, I ſuppoſe that even the world itſelf could not contain the books that ſhould be written. Now, If it be true, that there were ſeveral other books formerly extant, but which are now loſt, that were written by the Apoſtles and other Inſpired Men, and conſequently by Divine Inſpiration; either theſe were needleſs when written, (and it is unreaſonable to ſuppoſe that any book written by Divine Inſpiration were needleſs) or elſe the loſs of theſe books is a loſs to religion; and we cannot be well aſſured, that thoſe which we have now remaining do ſufficiently inſtruct us in all points of Chriſtian Faith and practice. But,

Admit the truth of this matter of fact, viz. that more books were written by the Apoſtles, or Inſpired Men, than are now extant, which I will not now diſpute, becauſe I think it needleſs; becauſe I think it may be granted without any prejudice to the Chriſtian Cauſe; although there be none, or at moſt but very ſlender evidence of it; nay, admit more than is upon any good grounds alledged, viz. not only that ſeveral, but that every one of the Apoſtles and immediate diſciples of Chriſt, every one that had heard him preach, and had been a witneſs of his life and miracles and reſurrection, and had received the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, and write a diſtinct Goſpel giving an account of ſome of the moſt remarkable paſſages of our Saviour's life which he had been a witneſs of; and did likewiſe as he had occaſion write epiſtles or other tracts for the uſe and inſtruction of the Chriſtian Church; every one of all which books, if they were now extant, and as well atteſted as the books of the New Teſtament are, would be of equal authority with them, becauſe dictated by the ſame ſpirit, by which all the Apoſtles were led into all truth, and had all things that Jeſus had ſpoken brought to their remembrance; yet I ſay, it would by no means follow from hence, either that thoſe books which are now loſt (if indeed there are any loſt that were written by the Apoſtles) were needleſs when they were written; or that thoſe which do now remain are not ſufficient. And a very little conſideration of the ſtate of things as it was then, and as it is now, will make this which I have ſaid very plain.

For, the caſe then was thus: The Goſpel of Chriſt was to be preached to the whole world by a few perſons, who had been eye-witneſſes of his miracles, and were enabled by the power of the Holy Ghoſt to confirm their teſtimony of him by doing the like miracles themſelves; and that this great work might be accompliſhed within the term of their life, it was neceſſary that they ſhould quickly diſperſe themſelves into all parts of the world, one going this way and another that, according as they had agreed among themſelves, or were directed by the Spirit; and in this diviſion of countries, every one had a large province aſſigned to him, ſo that having much work to do in a little time, he could not well ſtay long in one place; and upon this account it might be very proper for him after he had preached the Goſpel in one city, and made a good number of converts, and ordained elders and eſtabliſhed a Chriſtian Church there, when he went thence to leave behind him in writing the ſum of what he had before preached among them, for the help of their memories, for the direction of their paſtors, and to prevent any miſrepreſentation that might afterwards be made of his doctrine by ignorant or deſigning men; and after he was gone from thence, he might have frequent occaſion to ſend them letters, either to confirm them in their faith, or to caution them againſt ſome errors which he had heard were ſpringing up among them, or to correct ſome fault in their diſcipline or manners, as the caſe was here with the Galatians.

By this means, I ſay, it might well enough be (though there be no evidence that it was ſo) that in the firſt age of Chriſtianity, there might be, beſides occaſional letters, as many diſtinct Goſpels as there were Apoſtles; every one writing a Goſpel for the proper uſe of thoſe Churches which he himſelf had planted, and in the language that was beſt known to them. And this, if it was done, might be no more than might then be neceſſary, when it was not ſo eaſy as it is now, (ſince the increaſe of commerce and navigation and the invention of Printing) to communicate the books that are publiſhed in one country, to other countries that are far diſtant. Beſides, if this could have been done then, it cannot well be ſuppoſed that a Goſpel written by any other of the Apoſtles, who had never been in that province or diviſion, and of whom they had never heard perhaps more than only his name, ſhould be at firſt of ſo great authority to them, as a Goſpel written by that very Apoſtle, by whoſe miniſtry they had been converted, and of whoſe miracles they themſelves had been witneſſes.

Thus it might be; (and if it was ſo, it might be agreeable to the Divine Wiſdom and Goodneſs ſo to order it) that before thoſe books of the New Teſtament which we now have could be well diſperſed, and upon good atteſtation received in all Chriſtian Countries, ſome particular Churches, and eſpecially thoſe moſt remote from Judea, ſhould have for their preſent uſe, other books written by ſome other of the Apoſtles, containing the ſame form of ſound words; and relating the ſame things concerning the life and doctrine of our Saviour that theſe do.

And that ſome of thoſe many books which might be written by the Apoſtles or other Inſpired Men upon this ſubject, ſhould be loſt, is no marvel at all: 'Tis rather a wonder (conſidering the poverty of the firſt Chriſtians, and the conſtant perſecutions they were then under, and the many revolutions of government that have been in Chriſtendom ſince that time,) that ſo many as we have now left could be preſerved for ſo many ages before Printing was found out. And thoſe were of all the moſt like to be loſt, which were publiſhed in rude and barbarous countries, and which were written in ſome language peculiar to one nation only: And thoſe the moſt eaſy, and conſequently the moſt probable to be preſerved, which were publiſhed in the learned part of the world, and written in the moſt learned language then in uſe.

But although a greater number of inſpired books than are now extant, might be neceſſary in the firſt age of Chriſtianity; before the Chriſtian Churches, then newly planted in all countries of the then known world, could have communication with one another; and it cannot be argued from hence, that thoſe books which we have now remaining, are not ſufficient for the preſent time, and for all the time that has paſſed ſince the other books were loſt; but rather, it may very reaſonably be preſumed, that there was nothing more, for ſubſtance, in thoſe books, which are ſuppoſed to be loſt, than there is in theſe which are now remaining; ſo that the loſs of them may be no real loſs or detriment to religion, and thoſe which remain and are now received in all Chriſtian Churches, may be abundantly ſufficient to inſtruct us in all points of Chriſtian Faith and practice.

And there is indeed no reaſon to think they are not, ſeeing ſome of thoſe ſingle books which we have now, were written for this very purpoſe, were deſigned as compendiums of the whole Chriſtian Inſtitution: For Luke wrote his Goſpel, that Theophilus might know the certainty of thoſe things wherein he had been inſtructed, Luke i. 4. And if this was the Evangeliſt's deſign, it cannot be ſuppoſed but that he thought he had put into his Goſpel whatever was neceſſary or very material: And John in the ſame place where he acknowledges that he had omitted the relation of many things which Jeſus did, ſays John xx. 30, 31. that he had written the things contained in his Goſpel, that men may believe that Jeſus is the Chriſt, the Son of God, and that believing they might have life through his name: By which it appears that he thought he himſelf had written enough in his Goſpel to perſuade men to believe in Chriſt, and to direct them in the way to eternal life. There being therefore in thoſe books of the New Teſtament which we now have, ſeveral abridgments of the whole Chriſtian Doctrine, it cannot with any reaſon be pretended, that all theſe books together are not ſufficient fully to inſtruct us therein.

Beſides, the Goſpel of Chriſt that was preached ſuppoſe, by Thomas in India, or by Simon in Africa, or by any other of the Apoſtles in countries remote from Judea, or without the bounds of the Roman empire, was undoubtedly the very ſame Goſpel that was preached by Peter, and Paul, or thoſe other of the Apoſtles whoſe books are now extant, and received by the Chriſtian Church; for they were all taught by the ſame Maſter, Chriſt; and were all enlightned by the ſame Holy Ghoſt: So that if any of them did, (as 'tis reported they did) write any Goſpels for the preſent uſe of thoſe particular Churches which they had planted; though they might be ſomewhat different from any of the four Goſpels which we now have, in the expreſſion, or perhaps in the relation of ſome particular paſſages of our Saviour's life, which our Evangeliſts have omitted: (juſt as the four Goſpels which we now have, do differ from one another) yet for ſubſtance they muſt needs have been the ſame with theſe, and with one another, if indeed they were all true relations of the matters of which the authors thereof had been witneſſes; ſo that if we had them all now, they could altogether teach us no other doctrines than are taught in the books of the New Teſtament.

Nevertheleſs, I do not deny but that if we had more books of this kind than we have; that if we had all the books that were written by the Apoſtles and their immediate ſucceſſors who had been taught by them, they might be of very good uſe to us, to help us to underſtand more readily and eaſily thoſe books which we have: (as now we receive from ſome portions of Holy Scripture, great light, to help us to underſtand, and to put a right interpretation upon others) But perhaps it was for this very reaſon that the Providence of God did order no more to be written, than were written, or has ſuffered thoſe to be loſt, that are ſuppoſed to be loſt, that it might coſt us ſome pains and ſtudy to underſtand our religion; ſo that our knowledge as well as our practice being in ſome meaſure the fruit of our own induſtry, might be a proper ſubject of reward.

In ſhort, that there were more books in the firſt age of Chriſtianity, written by Apoſtles, or other inſpired men, than are now exant; or than if extant, can be well proved to be of their writing, is a point which I believe cannot be now upon any certain evidence either affirmed or denied: But if it be ganted, I ſay however, there is no reaſon to infer from thence, that thoſe which we now have are not ſufficient. For if there be a God and a Providence, and if there be any truth in the Scripture declarations of the love of God to mankind, and that he would have all men to be ſaved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth, moſt certainly the neceſſary means of mens ſalvation is a proper ſubject of the Divine Care: And if ſo, it cannot be thought but that the ſame good Providence which (as is now ſuppoſed) took care for the writing of more books when more might be neceſſary, has likewiſe taken care for the preſervation of ſo many of theſe books as are now ſufficient.

Or if the men we are now arguing with, will not grant that there is ſuch a particular Providence of God; yet if they will but allow that God is juſt; that he is not a hard Maſter, expecting to reap where he has not ſown, I think they muſt allow that all things neceſſary to our ſalvation not knowable by reaſon, are taught in the books of Holy Scripture which we now have, becauſe there are no other books extant which we have reaſon to receive and accept as Divine Revelation.

Or if they deny this, it will lie upon them to produce thoſe other books which we ought to receive beſides theſe, and to give good evidence to the world of their Divine Authority. Which when they have done; or if they ſhall but only ſhew that there is as good reaſon to receive them as theſe; we muſt own our ſelves to blame, if we ſhall not then take them alſo into the canon of Scripture.

But 'till that ſhall be done, what hath been already ſaid is enough to ſhew that the Holy Scripture is a compleat rule both of faith and manners. Eſpecially conſidering (as was noted before) that when-ever the inſufficiency of Scripture in this reſpect is urged by thoſe who do not believe the Scripture, it can be only for cavilling ſake: The true reaſon of their backwardneſs to receive it as a Divine Revelation, being not becauſe it teaches not enough, but becauſe it teaches more than they are willing to believe, and commands more than they are diſpoſed to practice. For I cannot imagine that theſe men do truly deſire more duty than is laid upon them in the books of Scripture, now received by the Chriſtian Church: But what they may moſt reaſonably be thought to deſire, is, either ſome better encouragment to undertake that difficult taſk which the Scripture lays upon them, or ſome better evidence that the Scripture is a Divine Revelation. There I proceed,

II. To ſhew that the motives which the Scripture propoſes are ſufficient to perſuade men to do what it requires.

Now hopes and fears are the great ſprings of action; and the greater the good is we hope for, or the evil we fear, the ſtronglier do they move and incline us to action; and therefore how difficult ſoever the undertaking be, (ſo it be but poſſible) if the motives are proportioned to the difficulty, they muſt be granted to be ſufficient inducements to undertake it.

But that the taſk or buſineſs required of us, is poſſible to be done, needs not to be proved now, becauſe it muſt be granted by thoſe who ſay they believe they ſhould be perſuaded to do what is required, if they had better encouragement; for no arguments or motives whatſoever can reaſonably perſuade a man to undertake a thing that he believes impoſſible.

Suppoſing it, therefore, poſſible; I ſay that whatſoever difficulty there really is, or we may apprehend there is, in a Chriſtian life; if any motives that could poſſibly be propoſed to us, can be thought ſufficient to induce us to undertake it; moſt evidently, thoſe motives which the Goſpel propoſes, are ſo; becauſe better or greater cannot be ſo much as conceived or imagined; ſeeing both the good things which it promiſes to perſuade us to virtue, and the evil things which it threatens to deter us from ſin, are, as to the matter of them, the greateſt that we are capable of enjoying or ſuffering; and conſequently the moſt probable to raiſe our hopes, and to exite our fears to the higheſt pitch.

For the arguments that do moſt ſtrongly perſuade us to any thing, are from intereſt; from the profit and advantage we ſhall reap by doing it; from the tendency it has to make us happy; and happineſs conſiſts in being perfectly free from all pain and trouble and vexation; and in the full and free enjoyment of whatſoever is pleaſing and delightful to us.

But now both theſe the Goſpel gives aſſurance of to all thoſe that believe and obey it; that is, that they ſhall thereby be freed from that intolerable pain and miſery, which the wicked and unbelievers ſhall be condemned to, and alſo that they ſhall thereby be inſtated in the perfecteſt and compleateſt happineſs both of body and ſoul; in a happineſs far greater than they do or can enjoy now; nay, in a happineſs much greater than any they can now have ſo much as a conception or idea of in their minds. For eye hath not ſeen, nor ear heard, neither have entred into the heart of man the things that God hath prepared for them that love him; 1 Cor. ii. 9.

But there is, beſides, a remarkable circumſtance which does much enhance the value of any good, and likewiſe much aggravate the evil of any pain or miſery; viz. its duration: For how great ſoever the good or evil propoſed to perſuade us to any thing, are in themſelves; yet if they be but of ſhort continuance, if they will ſoon expire and be at an end, we reckon it not worth while to be at much pains to obtain ſuch a ſhort-lifed good, or to avoid ſuch a tranſient evil: But in this reſpect alſo, the motives both of hope and of fear which the Goſpel propoſes to us, do far ſurpaſs all thoſe perſuaſives or inducements which ſin can offer: For the moſt we can hope to eſcape by the commiſſion of any ſin, is the pain and ſuffering of a few weeks or years, or a temporal death; which laſt, yet we cannot be ſo vain as to hope to eſcape clearly, for we can at moſt but delay it for a ſhort ſeaſon; and on the other ſide, the greateſt good we can propoſe to our ſelves, or ſo much as hope to obtain by any ſin, is the pleaſure of a ſhort life: In which hope, men are likewiſe very often moſt ſadly diſappointed; their ſinful gratifications commonly bringing with them, or drawing after them, much more trouble and vexation even in this world, than the little pleaſure they can reap from them is ſufficient to compenſate for. But if it were not ſo; if the pleaſures of ſin were certain and ſincere; yet they are but for a moment: They can be but ſhort, becauſe our life it ſelf is but ſhort; being (as James ſays) a vapour, which appeareth for a little time, and then vaniſheth away; Jam. iv. 14.

But the motives of both kinds, which the Goſpel propoſes, have in this reſpect alſo, (that is, in reſpect of the duration of the good or evil propoſed) all the advantage that is poſſible. For the miſery we ſhall eſcape, and the bleſſedneſs we ſhall attain, by yielding belief and obedience to the Goſpel, are, both of them, of eternal and endleſs duration. A worm that never dieth, a fire that never ſhall be quenched; everlaſting puniſhment, eternal damnation, everlaſting fire, everlaſting deſtruction, the blackneſs of darkneſs for ever: A lake of fire and brimſtone, where they ſhall be tormented day and night for ever and ever; Mark ix, 46--48.

46--48. Matt. xxv. 46. Mark iii. 29. Matt. xviii. 8. 2 Theſſ. i. 9. Jude 13. Rev. xx. 10--14--11.

Theſe are the evils which the Goſpel threatens to ſin: And if theſe be not ſufficient to deter men from it, What can be ſufficient? What evil can that man be ſuppoſed to be afraid of, who is not afraid of everlaſting burning? A greater evil cannot be threatned; and he who is not ſcared by this, would certainly be leſs ſcared by the threatning of a leſs evil. And

On the other ſide, everlaſting life, a crown that fadeth not away, a kingdom that cannot be moved, an eternal weight of glory, fulneſs of joy in the preſence of God, and pleaſures for evermore at his right hand: Theſe are the good things promiſed to obedience; and could greater things be promiſed than theſe? could we our ſelves, if we were put to deſire what we would, deſire more? and if the promiſe of unſpeakable and everlaſting bleſſedneſs, be not ſufficient to prevail with us to undertake a Godly and Chriſtian life, certainly nothing can be ſufficient.

If God ſhould make never ſo many revelations of his will to mankind, if he could not propoſe greater encouragement to obedience, than he has done already in the Goſpel: And if thoſe good things which he has promiſed, do not move us, it is not becauſe they are not great enough to move a wiſe and conſidering man, but becauſe we are ſo bent upon ſin, that we will not give way to any conſiderations that might ſerve to reſtrain us from it.

In a word, the Goſpel motives to repentance and obedience comprehend all that we can fear or hope for; ſo far therefore as fears or hopes can work upon us, there is plainly nothing wanting in that ſtanding revelation that God has made of his will, by Moſes and the Prophets, and eſpecially by Chriſt and his Apoſtles, to make it ſucceſsful, that is, to perſwade men to repentance, if they will but hear what they ſay, and give credit to it.

But it is not, perhaps, the Infidels will ſay, a better rule that they want than the Scripture is, or better motives to perſwade them to lead their lives according to it, than the Scripture propoſes; but what they chiefly want is ſome better evidence, ſome greater certainty of the truth of the Scripture. Therefore,

I ſhall ſhew that we have ſufficient reaſon given us to convince us of the truth and authority of the Holy Scripture, and conſequently of all the doctrines which are taught by it. And, that I ſhall preſume to be ſufficient reaſon in this caſe, which we readily accept and allow of as ſufficient in all other caſes of the like nature. And,

I ſuppoſe, it will be granted, that we have ſufficient proof given us of the truth of the things contained in Holy Scripture, and of the authority of it, if it can be ſhewn: 1. That we have ſufficient reaſon to believe that the books of Holy Scripture were written by thoſe perſons who are ſaid to be the authors thereof. 2. That there is ſufficient reaſon to give full credit to them in their relation of thoſe matters of fact which they have recorded.

Theſe things therefore I ſhall now endeavour to make good.

But as the Apoſtle writes to the Galatians concerning the Goſpel, or the New Teſtament only, I ſhall confine my remarks only to the books of the New Teſtament, becauſe theſe are the books wherein our Chriſtian religion is chiefly taught; and, indeed, I think there are none, who receive the New Teſtament as of Divine Authority, that do (or indeed can, with any reaſon) reject the Old.

1. Then, I am to ſhew that we have ſufficient reaſon to believe that the books of Holy Scripture, (of the New Teſtament in particular) were written by thoſe perſons that are ſaid to be the authors thereof.

This, indeed, is a point that it does not properly lie upon us to make any proof of; for as a man's poſſeſſion of an eſtate, is alone a good and a ſufficient title to it, till a better is ſhewn by the perſon that endeavours to eject him; ſo it is here; theſe books are generally received as written by ſuch and ſuch perſons; theſe authors have the name, their name, as it were, the poſſeſſion of them; and that is title enough, if no other could be produced, ſo long as no evidence is offered to ſhew that any other perſons have a better title to them.

It lies on them therefore, who deny that the Books are theirs, to give a reaſon of what they ſay, either by alledging ſome ſpecial matter out of the Books themſelves, whereby it may be proved that they could not be of their writing; or by producing ſome credible and authentick hiſtory teſtifying that they were written by ſome other perſons, and not by them. And till they can, and ſhall do this, which I am perſwaded can never be done, we may very well refuſe to produce any poſitive evidence to affirm or prove their title, their poſſeſſion being a good title enough, till a better appears. And a tenant might with as good reaſon refuſe to pay rent to the perſon, of whom he took the eſtate, and to whom he hath ever hitherto paid rent, and whoſe right to it is not at all controverted, until he ſhall ſuffer his writings to be peruſed and examined, and by them make it plainly appear that he is the lawful landlord; as any man can now refuſe to give that credit to theſe Books, as written by the Apoſtles, which has been given hitherto, and is ſtill given by all Chriſtians, unleſs he may have now as good poſitive evidence of their being written by the Apoſtles, as might have been given thereof at firſt, and as it may be preſumed, was given before their title to them was ſo univerſally acknowledged.

But nevertheleſs, what a man is not under any obligation to do for the aſſerting of his right, he may do wiſely enough for his own ſatisfaction. And it muſt needs be a ſatisfaction and pleaſure to a man, altho' his title to his eſtate be not at preſent controverted, if in looking over the writings and evidences of it, he ſees plainly how it deſcended to him by a lineal ſucceſſion from father to ſon for many generations paſt, and how it came at firſt to his anceſtors, by a clear and fair purchaſe from the former poſſeſſors, or by donation from the prince, in the diviſion of a waſte or conquered country; and if he alſo finds ancient terriers agreeing in the ſame meaſure and boundings, and exactly deſcribing the ſame eſtate which he now poſſeſſes; and if moreover, looking far back, he ſees, that upon ſome diſputes or law-ſuits that have formerly been concerning it, judgment has been always given on his ſide. It cannot but pleaſe him, I ſay, that upon ſuch a ſearch into antiquity, he finds that he is ſo very well provided to make out his title, if there ſhould ever be any occaſion for it; altho' by reaſon of the long and quiet poſſeſſion, that he, and his anceſtors before him, time out of mind, have had of it, he has no juſt cauſe to fear he ſhall ever meet with any diſturbance.

And ſo it is here: Theſe writings, the Books of the New Teſtament, are generally acknowledged to be written by the Apoſtles of Chriſt, and their authority is at preſent unconteſted; it may therefore reaſonably be preſumed, (eſpecially by thoſe who have not parts or learning or leiſure to examine into the reaſon of ſuch things,) that they would not have been ſo univerſally acknowledged and reverenced as they are upon this account, but upon very good grounds; though what the grounds thereof are, they have not yet enquired, their being in poſſeſſion is alone reaſon enough to acknowledge and aſſert their title. It lies upon them that deny theſe books to be theirs, to produce ſatisfactory evidence of their being forged or counterfeit; and till they ſhall produce ſome evidence thereof that has a ſhew and appearance of truth, we have no reaſon to be ſtaggered in our belief by their bare, however bold and confident, denial of their authority; and much leſs ſhall we need to give our reaſons for our receiving them as written by the Apoſtles, till our adverſaries ſhall offer ſome reaſons why we ought not to receive them as ſuch.

But nevertheleſs, becauſe we ſee there are ſome, in this incredulous age, that ſhew a good will to deny the authority of theſe Sacred Books, and whoſe intereſt it would be to prove them ſpurious; and becauſe we cannot tell what unwarrantable practices their inclination and intereſt may put them upon; nor what writings or evidences, plauſibly forged and counterfeited, they may hereafter produce; it cannot be amiſs for us to enquire and ſee; and it cannot but be a pleaſure and ſatisfaction to us (who hold our hope of eternal life chiefly by theſe writings) to find and conſider how well provided we are to detect and diſprove any ſuch forgeries, if they ſhould be offered, by being able to produce, in oppoſition thereto, as good poſitive proof that theſe Books are genuine, as ſuch a matter is capable of, much better than I believe can be produced for the authority of any other books of the like antiquity.

And it gives us ſome ſatisfaction in the belief we have been bred up in, that theſe are the genuine Books of the authors to whom they are aſcribed, to find that they are received as ſuch, not by a ſmall party of men, not by that Church and nation only to which we belong, but by all Chriſtians diſperſed in all parts of the world; and likewiſe, that they all agree with us in the ſame teſtimony, viz. that they received then, as ſuch, from their fathers. For that theſe Books ſhould be thus generally received and acknowledged, by ſo many different and far diſtant nations, without ſome good grounds, is not conceivable; becauſe, it can neither be imagined that the Chriſtians of the preſent age, diſperſed in all countries ſhould combine together to ſay that they received theſe books from their fathers, as the genuine writings of the Apoſtles, if they had not ſo received them; nor that their foreſathers, in any of the ages paſt, ſhould have all agreed together, to put a cheat upon their poſterity, by delivering down to them theſe Books as written by the Apoſtles, when they themſelves had no good reaſon to believe them ſo, or when they knew the contrary.

It is a further ſatisfaction to us, to obſerve and conſider, that the authority of theſe Books is as well proved as it can be, not only by oral, but alſo by the beſt written tradition; the Chriſtian writers of all ages, citing them (as they had occaſion) as the genuine writings of the Apoſtles, and that, as well before the canon of the New Teſtament was defined and declared by councils, as ſince.

And laſtly, It gives us very good ſatisfaction that theſe Books are the genuine writings of the perſons to whom they are aſcribed, that we do not find they were ever excepted againſt, as ſpurious and counterfeit, in thoſe times when it would have been moſt proper to have made the exception; and by thoſe perſons whoſe cauſe and intereſt it would have ſerved very much to have proved them ſpurious, if it could have been done.

For the proper time to have made this exception to theſe writings, was when, or ſoon after, they were firſt publiſhed; when it would have been eaſy to have proved them ſpurious if they had been ſo; and no leſs eaſy to have brought poſitive evidence of their being genuine, if indeed they were genuine; either by the living teſtimony of the authors themſelves, or of others that knew their writing; or by producing the original copies under their own hands; and therefore their being then received as the writings of the Apoſtles, by thoſe who were beſt able to know whoſe writings they were; and their being not (for ought appears) excepted againſt, upon this account, at that time, is a very good argument that there was no juſt ground for any ſuch exception.

And the moſt likely perſons, they whoſe cauſe and intereſt it would have ſerved moſt, to deny that theſe books were written by the reputed authors thereof, were the enemies of our religion, the Jews, or the Heathens; who neither of them wanted either malice or wit, to alledge any fact that they could have juſtified the truth of, in diſproof of the Chriſtian Religion. It is therefore, no ſmall ſatisfaction to us to obſerve, that they never argued againſt the Chriſtian Religion from this topick; that they never denied that the Books which the Chriſtians received as written by the Apoſtles were genuine: Nay, that Julian himſelf, one of the ſubtleſt, as well as of the bittereſt and moſt powerful adverſaries of the Chriſtian Faith, did yet expreſly own that the books read by the Chriſtians, as the books of Peter, Paul, Matthew, Mark and Luke, were indeed theirs.

After all indeed it muſt be owned that we have not ſuch demonſtration that the books of the New Teſtament were written by the Apoſtles, as is ſelf-evident, and cannot poſſibly be contradicted; for the matter it ſelf is not capable of ſuch demonſtration. But we have ſuch demonſtration of it as cannot be contracted with any reaſon; we have as good aſſurance of it as we have, or can have, of any matter of that kind; we have as good evidence of the truth of it, as, ſuppoſing it to be true, we could have of it; and more than this cannot be deſired. We are as morally certain that theſe books were written by the authors to whom they are aſcribed, as we are that any other ancient book was written by the perſon who is ſaid to be the author of it: There being no argument, by which it is, or can be proved, that any ancient book was written by the perſon who is ſaid to be the author of it, which does not prove the authority of theſe books, rather more ſtrongly, than it does the authority of any other book: And there being no argument, that is, or can be urged, againſt the authority of theſe books, which may not, with as good reaſon be urged, to diſprove the authority of any other book of the like antiquity; nay indeed, of all the books in the world ancient or modern, the authors of which are not now living, or of whoſe writing the books aſcribed to them no living evidence can be produced.

For what is there that can be ſaid to diſprove, or to render ſuſpected the authority of theſe books, but only that there is a poſſibility that things may not be as we believe them to be? It may be, (the Atheiſt, or Infidel will ſay) that theſe books were not written by the perſons under whoſe names we receive them, but by ſome others; it may be, (he will ſay, for inſtance;) that there never was ſuch a man as Matthew the Publican, afterwards an Apoſtle of Chriſt: Or if there was, yet, it may be, that the Goſpel that goes under his name was not of his writing, but is a book of a much later date; it may be, that it was written by ſome crafty prieſt, no longer ago than the laſt age: And that he, and ſome others in confederacy with him at the ſame time, that they forged this Goſpel in the Greek Tongue, did likewiſe make and contrive all thoſe tranſlations of it into ſeveral languages that are now extant, ſome of which pretend to very great antiquity, and which are all made with ſuch an appearance of truth, and with ſuch congruity to the ſeveral times in which they are ſaid to be made, that none of the learned men of the preſent age have been able to diſcover the fraud: And, it may be alſo, that when they forged the Goſpel it ſelf, they forged likewiſe all the other books, that are pretended to be written by ſeveral hiſtorians and divines, in divers languages, and in ſeveral ages of the world for ſixteen hundred years paſt, in which this Goſpel is either teſtified to be written by Matthew, or is cited or commented upon as his: And it may be likewiſe that at the ſame time, that they trumped up all theſe books in one country, they had their confederates and correſpondents that did the ſame in all the other countries where they are now found; not only expoſing them to publick ſale as books of ancient date and venerable antiquity, but likewiſe ſlily conveying an infinite number of written and printed copies of the ſame into all libraries both publick and private, unknown to the keepers and owners thereof. And, it may be, that all theſe things were done ſo ſecretly, that none of the confederacy did ever confeſs, nor any beſides ever diſcover the cheat. And, it may be, that all the reſt of the world was ſo much aſleep at that time, as to have no ſuſpicion of what was done, nor any ſenſe of that great alteration that had been made in the world by theſe books; nor any remembrance afterwards, when they awoke and found themſelves Chriſtians, that they had been of ſome other religion before, when they were firſt taken with that lethargick fit.

But if theſe things may be, what is there of this kind that may not be? If the world be ſo much miſtaken in this matter, it may be as much miſtaken in any other matter of the like nature. And then, it may be, that there never was ſuch a man as Homer, or Virgil, or Cæſar, or Cicero, or Plutarch, or any other of thoſe perſons, as whoſe writings we now receive the books that go under their names; but that all the books pretended to be written by thoſe authors, and likewiſe all the books of later date, whereby the authority of thoſe former books is atteſted, were in like manner contrived, and made and diſperſed, by ſuch another gang of crafty and deſigning knaves who took a pleaſure in abuſing the reſt of the world, or hoped to make a gain to themſelves thereby.

Nay then (for why ſhould we ſtop here?) It may be, that not only the laws of our religion, but the laws of our civil ſtate too, are all forged and counterfeit. It may be, that once upon a time, the keeper of the publick records, having by much and long obſervation attained to good ſkill in the ancient ways of writing for many ages backward, and being a compleat maſter of his pen, and having alſo gotten an art to make a freſh writing ſeem juſt as old as he had a mind it ſhould be thought to be, did compoſe, and depoſite in their proper places, thoſe original acts of parliament which are now taken to be the laws of ſome of our former kings; and that to confirm and eſtabliſh his fraud, he procured ſome other perſons at the ſame time to write or print, and to convey into all ſhops and libraries, ſeveral books of reports and pleadings, wherein theſe counterfeit acts were cited and referred to; and, it may be, that while as this was doing, none elſe had their eyes open to ſee it, nor had ever after the leaſt ſuſpicion of what was done: Or if they had, yet that they were ſo well pleaſed with the cheat, (which they thought would be a good means of preſerving peace and juſtice in the nation) as to be willing it ſhould paſs to poſterity undiſcovered. Theſe may be's are, I am ſure, every whit as poſſible and as likely as the other.

Either therefore let thoſe men who upon this account doubt of the authority of the books of the New Teſtament; or who would make others doubt of it, only by ſuggeſting that it is a thing poſſible in nature, that they may be all forged and counterfeit, (let them, I ſay, either) entertain and ſuggeſt the ſame doubt concerning all other ancient books, of the antiquity and authority of which there is not greater evidence than there is of theſe: And then they will render themſelves ſo juſtly ridiculous to the world that there will be no need to expoſe their folly; for then they muſt call in queſtion the authority of all books, and the truth of all hiſtory; or elſe let them fairly own that the true reaſon of their making a doubt concerning theſe books rather than concerning others, is, becauſe they do not reliſh the matter of them; becauſe they find it eaſier to reſiſt that ſtrong evidence that is given of the authority of theſe books than they do to govern their lives according to thoſe ſtrict rules of holineſs and purity that are therein preſcribed, and to bring their wills to the obedience of faith. And if they will but own this, (which I believe is the truth) their prejudice and partiality will be ſo evident to all, that it may be reaſonably hoped their impious ſuggeſtions will do but little harm in the world; and that few men of any ſenſe or reaſon will be ſo foolhardy as to venture their ſouls and run the hazard of a miſerable eternity, upon ſo many, and ſuch very improbable, I had almoſt ſaid, ſuch impoſſible may be's as muſt be ſuppoſed to have been, if indeed theſe books are forged and counterfeit, if indeed they were not written by thoſe perſons whom they are commonly aſcribed to.

But yielding this point, may the Atheiſt or Infidel farther ſay, viz. that the Goſpel called St. Matthew's was written by Matthew, and that of St. Mark by Mark, and the reſt of the books which are aſcribed to any other certain authors, by thoſe perſons to whom they are ſeverally aſcribed; yet the authority of the whole New Teſtament, will not, by this conceſſion, be ſufficiently eſtabliſhed. For of ſome books of the New Teſtament the authors are not known, of others they are doubted; ſome parts of this book that are now received have been rejected in ancient times, and others not univerſally received. And beſides, it is certain, that in the early times of Chriſtianity there were ſeveral counterfeit Goſpels and Epiſtles, ſome of which may poſſibly have ſlipped into the canon unawares. And laſtly, if it be granted that all the books of the New Teſtament were originally written by the Apoſtles or other inſpired men, yet however the books that we now have are but copies, in which many alterations may have been made by deſigning men, or careleſs tranſcribers.

Theſe objections (or cavils rather, for ſuch I am ſure they would be accounted in any other caſe) againſt the authority of theſe Sacred Books have been urged by ſome men both anciently and lately; but though they have been well and fully anſwered by learned perſons who have written in defence of the canon of Scripture, ſo as to need no further anſwer; yet conſidering, that when an old objection that has been anſwered an hundred times is urged afreſh, a great many may take it for a new one, and if it be not quickly anſwered, may be apt to think it unanſwerable; ſo in this caſe, it may be better to repeat the ſame anſwer, if it be a good one, that he has been often formerly made to it, than to ſay nothing. And beſides, in this degenerate age, in which any wild or atheiſtical diſcourſe paſſes for wit, it may be the hap of ſome perſons, who have not much mind or leiſure or opportunity to read books, to hear theſe things in converſation, and not knowing readily what anſwers to make to them, to be ſomewhat ſtaggered in their belief thereby; eſpecially if they be ſuch whoſe looſe and licentious way of living makes them eaſy to receive, without examination, any notions that may give them eaſe or encouragement in ſin.

For theſe reaſons therefore I ſhall mention, as briefly as may be, the anſwers that have been uſually given to theſe objections.

And, 1. Whereas it is ſaid, that of ſome of the books of the New Teſtament, the authors names are not certainly known (as namely of the Epiſtles to the Hebrews) and that of others, the authors have been doubted, (particularly, of the ſecond and third Epiſtles of John.) To this it hath been anſwered,

1. That the credit and authority of a book depends many times much more upon the good aſſurance that we have of the time when it was written, and of the character of the perſon that wrote it, than upon the certain knowledge of his name. It is therefore a matter of no great conſequence whether the Epiſtle to the Hebrews was written by Paul himſelf, (as is commonly, and upon very probable grounds, believed,) or (as ſome have conjectured) by Luke, his conſtant companion; or (as others) by Clemens, his fellow-labourer, whoſe name was in the book of life; Phil. iv. 3. or (as others) by Barnabas, his aſſiſtant in preaching the Goſpel, and who is dignified by Luke with the title of an Apoſtle; Acts xiv. 14. And ſo, neither is it very material whether the Epiſtles called the ſecond and third Epiſtles of John, and commonly believed to be written by John the Apoſtle and the Evangeliſt, (or as ſome have thought) by another John, who was made Biſhop of the Jewiſh Ghriſtians at Epheſus, by him; for it is ſufficient that the writers of theſe books (which ſoever they were of the perſons before-mentioned) were of good ability and integrity, and well inſtructed in that doctrine and religion which they wrote about; and of this, beſides the teſtimony of the ancients, there is good evidence enough in the writings themſelves.

2. In anſwer to this, and to all other objections of this ſort, againſt theſe, or any other books, or chapters, or paragraphs of the New Teſtament, it hath been farther truly ſaid, that there is nothing ſingular in theſe books, that there is no doctrine of Chriſtianity taught in any part of the New Teſtament of the author or authority, of which there hath ever been any doubt in the Church, which is not taught in ſome other undoubted and uncontroverted part in the ſame book. So that if it were granted that thoſe parts of the New Teſtament, of which there has been formerly any doubt were ſtill of uncertain authority, our Chriſtianity would ſuffer no real loſs thereby; only giving up theſe uncontroverted places, we ſhould ſometimes want a good help to enable us to underſtand readily thoſe uncontroverted places of the New Teſtament, wherein the ſame doctrines are (but perhaps more brieflly or obſcurely) delivered.

2. Whereas it is ſaid ſome parts of the New Teſtament have been rejected in ancient times; this is granted. But then it hath been ſhewn, that, conſidering by whom they have been rejected, and under what notion and for what reaſons they were rejected, this objection is of no force to invalidate the authority even of thoſe parts of the New Teſtament which have been ſo rejected, and much leſs of the reſt of the book which has been allowed by all.

Thus, ſome portions of the New Teſtament have been rejected by hereticks, becauſe they contradicted their private and ſingular notions; ſome by Judaizing Chriſtians, as the two firſt chapters of Matthew, becauſe they were not found in that Hebrew copy of that Goſpel which they uſed; and all the Epiſtles of Paul were likewiſe rejected by the ſame perſons; but not, as not written by Paul, but only becauſe they were written by him, whom they looked upon as an enemy to their nation, becauſe he levelled them with other nations, and as too averſe to that religion which had been introduced by Moſes, which they continued ſo wedded to, even after their embracing Chriſtianity, that they could not but ſuſpect him to be a falſe apoſtle, who had ſo plainly taught the abrogation thereof. And for the like reaſons ſome other parts of the New Teſtament have been likewiſe rejected by ſome few men; that is, not becauſe they wanted the ſame atteſtation which the other parts of it had, or becauſe it appeared by credible hiſtory that they were ſpurious, but only becauſe they contradicted too plainly ſome notions which their former prejudices or education had made them fond of. So that

This argument againſt the authority of the New Teſtament, taken for the rejection of ſome parts of it, by ſome particular men or ſects, is manifeſtly of no ſtrength, unleſs there was ſome good reaſon for their rejecting them; and that there was good reaſon for it, has not yet been ſhewn; but the contrary has been ſhewn very plainly by the ancient writers of the Church, in ſeveral books, (written by them in confutation of thoſe ſects and hereſies) which are ſtill extant. And,

3. Whereas it is further ſaid, that ſome books which are now received as parts of the new Teſtament were not univerſally received in the moſt early times, when their authority (if they were authentick) might have been aſſerted upon more certain grounds than it can be now, viz. the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, the Epiſtle of James, the ſecond of Peter, the ſecond and third of John, the Epiſtle of Jude, and the book of the Revelation: This is likewiſe granted. But in anſwer to it, it is ſaid,

1. That there is good evidence from antiquity, that theſe controverted books were received in the moſt early times, by thoſe who had the beſt opportunity of ſatisfying themſelves of the authors and authority thereof, viz. by thoſe to whom they were ſent, and in general, by the whole Greek Church.

2. That it is no wonder, that theſe books (being written either to Chriſtians diſperſed, and conſequently only publiſhed by giving out copies thereof to ſome, to be communicated, as there was opportunity, to others; or elſe to private perſons, living perhaps at great diſtance from the places from which they were ſent) were not ſo eaſy to be atteſted, and upon that account were not at firſt ſo generally received as the others were, which were either written to particular Churches, to which the authors hands, and the meſſengers that brought them were well known, or which were firſt publiſhed and received in the ſame places where they were written. And,

3. That even thoſe Churches which did for ſome time doubt of the authority of theſe books, were perſuaded at laſt to receive them as the authentick writings of the Apoſtles, or other inſpired men. If therefore it be ſuppoſed, that while they doubted of theſe books, they had reaſon for their doubt; that is, that they did it, becauſe they were not as yet fully ſatisfied that they were Apoſtolical writings, (which, I believe, will readily be granted) it may be very reaſonably preſumed, that they had afterwards greater reaſon to lay aſide their doubt; and that when they did receive them, it was, becauſe there had been then lately ſuch evidence and atteſtation given of their being written by the Apoſtles, or other inſpired men as they had not heard of before, ſuch as they could not then, with any reaſon, contradict or gainſay; for ordinarily a leſs reaſon will perſuade a man to take up an opinion at firſt, than will perſuade him to go back from an opinion (how weakly ſoever grounded) which he has before embraced and defended. So that

This objection is ſo far from leſſening, that it rather ſtrengthens the proof we have of the authority even of theſe once controverted books; and it is, beſides a very good corroborating evidence of the authority of all the other books of the New Teſtament. For the backwardneſs of ſome Churches to receive theſe controverted books at firſt, (when they had nothing to object to the matter of them) makes it evident, that the Chriſtians of the firſt ages were not ſo very eaſy and credulous as ſome have repreſented them; that they did not ſo greedily ſwallow any book for Divine Revelation that contained a great many miracles, mixed with a few good morals, without making due enquiry concerning the author and authority thereof. But on the contrary, their being ſo hard to be perſuaded to receive theſe controverted books for ſome time, while they wanted, as they thought, ſufficient atteſtation, (although the doctrine of them was in all points agreeable to the doctrine of the other books which they had before received, their being ſo hard, I ſay, to receive theſe books) of the authority of which there nevertheleſs really was ſuch evidence, as they themſelves, after having well weighed and conſidered it, declared themſelves ſatisfied with, gives very good ground to believe, that they had from the beginning ſuch evidence, as was, without exception, of the authority of all thoſe other books (that is, of much the greateſt part) of the New Teſtament, which were never controverted, which were from the firſt, and with univerſal conſent received by all Chriſtian Churches; for if there had not been very undeniable evidence of their being the genuine writings of the Apoſtles, or other inſpired men, there would certainly have been the ſame doubt and controverſy concerning them, that there once was concerning theſe. But,

4. It hath been further objected, that in the early times of Chriſtianity, there were ſeveral counterfeit Goſpels and Epiſtles, which paſſed among ſome for the writings of the Apoſtles; and that it is poſſible ſome of them may have ſlipped into the canon, unawares to the firſt Chriſtians, who, by all the accounts of thoſe times, are more remarkable for their honeſty, and ſimplicity, and zeal, than for their extraordinary parts and learning.

But this objection, (granting the matter of fact alledged in it to be true) is ſo far from leſſening, that it rather adds to that reaſonable aſſurance that we have, that all the books of the canon are true and genuine: For there is nothing ſo apt to put men upon uſing caution, as a great probability of being cheated if they be not cautious. Thus, when the coin is generally good, and there is very little baſe or counterfeit money ſtirring, men commonly take it by tale, without examining the weight and purity of every piece; and ſo may more eaſily have a ſingle piece of lighter weight or baſer metal put upon them without diſcerning it: But if the coin be much corrupted, they look more narrowly upon every ſingle piece of money that they take, and if there be the leaſt cauſe to ſuſpect it, make trial of it by the ſcale or touchſtone, before they accept it as good. If therefore there were in the early times of Chriſtianity, many counterfeit pieces given out, and perhaps received by ſome, as written by the Apoſtles, and which were, ſome of them, diſcovered to be ſpurious; (and there is not greater evidence from antiquity, that there were any ſuch ſpurious writings, than there is that the ſpuriouſneſs of ſome of them was ſoon diſcerned) this could not but put the Chriſtians of thoſe times upon examining more ſtrictly, what evidence and atteſtation there was that thoſe other books were true and genuine which had been generally received as ſuch. So that the more there were of theſe ſpurious and counterfeit books, ſo much the more aſſured and confident we may reaſonably be, that none but ſuch as were undoubtedly true and authentick, and very well atteſted, were admitted into the canon; and, of the two, it is much more probable, that they did for want of clear atteſtation, refuſe to admit ſome that had been written by the Apoſtles, than they that did, without ſufficient atteſtation, admit any that were not.

And that the Chriſtians of thoſe early times (who had the beſt means and opportunities of ſatisfying themſelves whether any book, given out as written by an Apoſtle, was ſo or not) wanted not ſkill to diſcern between a true and a ſpurious writing; (as is maliciouſly ſuggeſted by ſome men) is abundantly evident, from thoſe monuments of the excellent parts and learning of ſome of the firſt converts to Chriſtianity, which are ſtill extant in their books; and from the teſtimony that is therein given to the like good ability of ſeveral others, who were famous in their generation for their preaching and writings, and for their ſtoutly maintaining the truths of Chriſtianity both againſt Infidels and Hereticks, but whoſe books are now unhappily loſt. But,

5. and laſtly, it was further ſaid, that though it be granted that all the books of the New Teſtament that are now received, were originally written by the Apoſtles, or other inſpired men, yet thoſe which we now have are but copies; in which, by ſo many tranſcriptions thereof as muſt have been in about 1400 years, many alterations may have happened, through the ignorance or overſight, or evil deſign of the tranſcribers; and that ſeveral changes have been made, is undeniably plain, by the various readings that have been obſerved in comparing the beſt manuſcript copies that are now, or have been extant ſince printing began; ſo that we cannot be ſure whether any particular paſſages once found in thoſe books, are the very words of an Apoſtle, or of ſome ignorant or careleſs ſcribe. But to this it hath been anſwered;

1. That ſo far as this objection is of any force, it invalidates the credit of all hiſtory, and of all other books of ancient date, as well as of the New Teſtament; nay, indeed, of all other books, much more than of this; for the faithfully tranſcribing whereof, it may reaſonably be preſumed, there was formerly greater care taken, (as there is now for the correctly printing it) than there ordinarily was of other books that were of leſs conſequence.

If there had been but one Manuſcript of the Greek Teſtament, at the reſtoration of learning about two centuries ago; then we had had no various readings at all. And would the text be in a better condition then, than now we have 30000? So far from that, that in the beſt ſingle copy extant, we ſhould have hundred of faults, and ſome omiſſions irreparable. Beſides that the ſuſpicions of fraud and foul play would have been increaſed immenſly.

It is good therefore, you will allow, to have more authors than one; and another MS. to join with the firſt would give more authority, as well as ſecurity. Now chuſe that ſecond where you will, there ſhall be a thouſand variations from the firſt; and yet half or more of the faults ſhall ſtill remain in them both.

A third therefore, and ſo a fourth and ſtill on, are deſirable; that by a joint and mutual help, all the faults may be mended: Some copy preſerving the true reading in one place and ſome in another. And yet the more copies you call to aſſiſtance, the more do the various readings multiply upon you, Every copy having its particular ſlips, though in a principal paſſage or two it doth ſingular ſervice. And this is fact, not only in the New Teſtament, but in all ancient book whatever.

It is a good Providence, and a great bleſſing, that ſo many manuſcripts of the New Teſtament are ſtill amongſt us; ſome procured from Egypt, others from Aſia, others found in the Weſtern Churches; for the very diſtances of places, as well numbers of the books, demonſtrate, that there could be no colluſion, nor altering, nor interpolating one copy by another, nor all by any of them. In profane authors, whereof one manuſcript only had the luck to be preſerved, as Velleus Paterculus among the Latins, and Heſychius among the Greeks; the faults of the Scribes are found ſo numerous, and defects beyond all redreſs, that notwithſtanding the pains of the learnedeſt and acuteſt critics for two whole centuries, their books are ſtill, and are like to continue a mere heap of errors. On the contrary, where the copies of any author are numerous, tho' the various readings always encreaſe in proportion; there the text, by an accurate collation of them made by ſkilful and judicious hands, is ever the more correct, and comes nearer to the true words of the author.

Terence is now in one of the beſt conditions of any of the claſſick writers; the oldeſt and beſt copy of him is now in the Vatican library, which comes neareſt to the poet's own hands; but even that has hundreds of errors, moſt of which may be mended out of others exemplars, that are otherwiſe more recent, and of inferior value. I my ſelf have collated ſeveral, and do affirm, that I have ſeen 20,000 various lections in that little author, not near ſo big as the whole New Teſtament; and am morally ſure, that if half the number of manuſcripts were collated for Terence with the niceneſs and minuteneſs which has been uſed in twice as many for the New Teſtament, the number of variations would amount to above 50,000.

In the MSS. of the New Teſtament, the variations have been noted with a religious, not to ſay with a ſuperſtitious exactneſs. Every difference in ſpelling, in the ſmalleſt particle or article of ſpeech, in the very order or collation of words, without real change, has been ſtudiouſly regiſtred. Nor has the text only been ranſacked, but all the antient verſions, the Latin Vulgate, Italick, Æthiopick, Arabic, Captic, Armenian, Gothic, and Saxon; not theſe only, but all the diſperſed citations of the Greek and Latin Fathers in a courſe of 500 years. What wonder then if with all this ſcrupulous ſearch in every hole and corner, the varieties riſe to 30,000; when in all antient books of the ſame bulk, whereof the MSS. are numerous, the variations are as many, or more, and yet no verſions to ſwell the reckoning. The editors of profane authors do not uſe to trouble their readers, to risk their own reputation, by an uſeleſs liſt of every ſmall ſlip committed by a lazy or ignorant ſcribe. What is thought commendable in an edition of Scripture. And as the name of fairneſs and fidelity, would in them be deemed impertinence and trifling. Hence the reader not verſed in antient MSS. is deceived into an opinion, that there were more variations in the copies, than what the editor has communicated: Whereas, if the like ſcrupulouſneſs was obſerved in regiſtring the ſmalleſt changes in profane authors, as it is allowed, nay, required in ſacred, the now formidable number of 30,000 would appear a very trifle. 'Tis manifeſt, that books in verſe are not near ſo obnoxious to variations, as proſe: The tranſcriber, if he is not wholly ignorant and ſtupid, being guided by the meaſures; and hindred from ſuch alterations, as do not fall in with the laws of numbers. And yet even in poets, the variations are ſo very many, as can hardly be conceived without uſe and experience. In the late edition of Tibullus, by the learned Mr. Broukbuiſe, you have a regiſter of various lections in the cloſe of that book, where you may ſee, at the firſt view, that there are as many as the lines: The ſame is viſible in Plautus, ſet out by Paræus. I my ſelf, during my travels, have had the opportunity to examine ſeveral manuſcripts of the poet Manelius; and can aſſure you, that the variations I have met with, are twice as many as all the lines of the book.— And likewiſe that the manuſcripts here uſed were few in compariſon; and then do you imagine, what the collection would amount to, if ten times as many were accurately examined. And Yet in theſe and all other books, the text is not made more precarious on that account, but more certain and authentick.——If a corrupt line or dubious reading chances to intervene, it does not darken the whole context, nor make an author's opinion, or his purpoſe precarious. Terence, for inſtance, has as many variations as any book whatever, in proportion to its bulk, and with all its interpolations, omiſſions, additions, or gloſſes, (chuſe the worſt of them on purpoſe) you cannot deface the contrivance and plot of one play, no, not of one ſingle ſcene; but its ſenſe, deſign, and ſubſerviency to the laſt iſſue and concluſion, ſhall be viſible and plain through all the midſt of various lections. And ſo it is with the Sacred Text; make your 30,000 as many more; all the better to a knowing and ſerious reader, who is thereby more richly furniſhed to ſelect what he ſees genuine: But even put them into the hands of a knave, or a fool, and yet with the moſt cenſorious or abſurd choice, he ſhall not extinguiſh the light of any one chapter, nor diſguiſe Chriſtianity, but that every feature of them will be the ſame. Remarks on a Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking, by Phileleutherus Lipſienſis, p. 64--68. and p. 76. edit. 5.

2. That though it be certain that ſome Hereticks have attempted to corrupt the text of the New Teſtament in ſome places, and have made changes in ſome few copies thereof; it is almoſt as certain that their attempts of this kind neither have, nor ever could, amount to a corruption of all the copies thereof that were generally in mens hands; in which there is even to this day an admirable agreement in all matters of moment. And from that general agreement that always was in all the copies of this book, (except thoſe few that were ſometimes corrupted by Hereticks, to ſerve a turn) their attempts of this kind have been always rendered ſucceſsleſs; and thoſe falſe doctrines, that were juſtified only by their own falſe copies of this book, ſolidly confuted.

3. It is further anſwered, that not only there is no evidence that there has been, but that it is morally impoſſible, that there ſhould be a general depravation of the copies of this book, either deſignedly, or by chance, in any place of great conſequence either in point of hiſtory or doctrine. For when was it poſſible that this corruption ſhould be? Was it in the copies that were given out in the days of the Apoſtles, and while they were living? This cannot well be ſuppoſed; or if it had been done then, it cannot be thought but that the authors of theſe books, being living, would have taken care to have had ſuch falſe copies of their books ſuppreſſed, or well corrected; or at leaſt have given publick notice, in order to their correction, of thoſe faults that had been committed in the tranſcribing, which did either obſcure or ſpoil their ſenſe.

Was it then in the times immediately after the Apoſtles were dead? But neither could this be; for by this time an infinite number of true copies had been made and diſperſed in all parts of the Chriſtian Church; and beſides the autographs of the books themſelves were then probably, all in being; for Tertullian, who lived in the third century, witneſſes that ſome of them were extant, and to be ſeen even in his time; ſo that by comparing of the new falſe copies with the ancient true ones, or with the originals themſelves then extant, the fraud would have been quickly diſcovered, or the miſtake eaſily rectified.

Was it then in the times after this, when the originals were loſt or worn out? This was ſtill leſs poſſible; for by this time not only a greater number of true copies thereof, in the original Greek were diſperſed, and in the hands of all Chriſtians; but ſeveral tranſlations thereof had been likewiſe made into other languages, ſeveral commentaries had been written thereupon, and the moſt material paſſages thereof had been occaſionally cited by the Chriſtian writers of thoſe or the foregoing times.

And the further we go on downwards, it was ſtill (for ſuch reaſons as have been given already) more impoſſible that the copies of this book ſhould be generally corrupted in any place or matter of moment; as well as more likely that there ſhould be every day an increaſe of ſuch ſmall and literal miſtakes, as could hardly be avoided by the greateſt care and faithfulneſs. And theſe are the various readings before ſpoken of; concerning which, and in anſwer to the before-mentioned objection, ſo far as it is grounded upon them, it is farther ſaid ———

4. In the fourth place; that they are no other than ſuch as are to be met with in comparing the manuſcripts of all other books; that theſe various readings (if they be compared together with judgment) are more like to lead us to underſtand the true meaning of the writers, than to endanger our miſtaking their ſenſe; it being very probable, that when there are ſeveral readings, one of them is the right, and eaſier by their help, to rectify the miſtakes that may have been made in ſome copies, than it would have been, if all copies had agreed in the ſame miſtake. And laſtly, that it is, hardly in any place of which where there are ſuch various readings, very material which is the true reading; there being no point that is of the ſubſtance either of the hiſtory or doctrine of Chriſtianity, that is grounded upon any text, of which there are, in different copies, various readings, but which may be proved by ſome other texts, in the readings whereof all copies do agree.

5. And laſtly, In anſwer to this objection, that the text of the New Teſtament is depraved and corrupted, and conſequently of uncertain authority, it is further ſaid; that ſuppoſing theſe books to be written by the Apoſtles, and by Divine Direction and inſpiration, (which muſt be ſuppoſed, or at leaſt, for argument ſake, be allowed by thoſe that make this objection; or elſe the objection is trifling) it is by no means credible that the ſame goodneſs of God which took care for the writing, has not likewiſe taken care for the preſerving of theſe books, ſo free, at leaſt, from corruption, that they may be ſufficient to anſwer the ends for which they were written; that is, fully to inſtruct men in all points of Chriſtian Faith and practice, to make them wiſe unto ſalvation, and throughly to furniſh them unto all good works.

And now I hope it appears from the premiſes, that we have ſufficient reaſon to believe that the Books of the New Teſtament were written by thoſe perſons whoſe names they bear, or to whom they are aſcribed, viz. by the Apoſtles of Chriſt, or other inſpired men; ſo that now I proceed to enquire,

Whether there be ſufficient reaſon to give them credit in the matters of fact which they have related;

Firſt, The Apoſtles cannot be preſumed to be ignorant of what they atteſted, becauſe they had ſeen and heard for a long time togetherthe marvellous works of their maſter; and of all his ſtupendous actions wrought by him, they were eſpecially ſatisfied of his glorious reſurrection, the moſt ſtupendous of them all, and is as a ſeal to certify the veracity of all the former; which tho' they had ſeen, yet they were as ſlow in believing the womens report of the reſurrection, as were the arranteſt Jew and Infidel, jealous of being impoſed upon, which diſtruſt made them require a ſenſible demonſtration, not giving their aſſent thereto till they had viewed him, touched him, and handled him. Theſe were precautions, I think, capable of removing all miſtakes.

Secondly, Their honeſty is ſufficiently protected by their ſimplicity and ſincerity, which could not, and would not impoſe on the world in ſo notorious a manner.

Their ſimplicity is apparent, as being no others than poor ignorant illiterate fiſhermen, and their ſincerity appears the beſt from their own writings, a ſyſtem of the nobleſt precepts of morality, ſo full of wiſdom and purity, ſo free in the confeſſion of their own infirmities, ſo pregnant in doctrines of ſelf-denial, humility and all goodneſs, that they can no ways be out-ſtripped or ſcarce imitated in their lives and actions.

Beſides, No man can be ſuppoſed wicked to no purpoſe; but if their maſter had been an impoſtor, they were labouring not only to no purpoſe, but were running to their own deſtruction and perdition, both in this and the world to come.

They had ſeen their maſter crucified for the very doctrine they ſtill perſiſted in, and aggravated from the miracle of the reſurrection, and could they expect any better? This hope was far from the expectation of worldly gain; it was their only way to loſe every poſſeſſion in this world, and their lives with goods. They could not deſire wealth, for poverty was their beatitude. They could not expect to ſwim in pleaſure, for nothing but chains and impriſonments threatned their undertakings: And, in fine, if ſuch had been their aim, their practice being ſo very contradictory to their doctrine, would ſoon have blaſted their attempt in this world; and they muſt have expected hereafter nothing but vengeance from that God they had ſo wickedly belied, engaging both his power and veracity to atteſt a falſhood.

Such muſt have been the conſequences of their doctrine, if it had been falſe; but how manfully did they look all kind of torments and even death itſelf in the face, rather than forſake their doctrine and maſter's inſtitution? Certainly, ſuch perſecutions as they met with, would have made them at laſt, if falſe teachers, renounce and recant their principles, rather than die; being ſure of paſſing through a temporal torment into a never-quenchable fire, for ſuch an obſtinacy. And a reaſonable man may ſuppoſe this is a ſufficient argument to convince us of the authority of their teſtimony. So that as the Apoſtle declares, if any man preach any other Goſpel unto you, than that ye have received, let him be accurſed.

Ver. 10. — Do I perſwade men, or God?] The word perſwade in Scripture, commonly ſignifies appeaſe or pacify; ſee 1 Sam. xxiv. 7. Matt. xxviii. 14. Therefore, here we are to underſtand the Apoſtle to ſay, "Do I ſay or teach thoſe doctrines which will avert the diſpleaſure, and. ſet me in the favour of the perſecuting Jews, as ſome men do, that make all this diſſenſion among us, and draw you to a corrupt faith. But I perſwade God, or I endeavour to ſay and preach nothing, but what I think may avert God's wrath, due to your diſobedience and apoſtacy in turning away from the Goſpel of Chriſt, and what ſhall be acceptable to him, and obtain and ſecure his favour. And this is evidently the interpretation, as the next words, Or do I ſeek to pleaſe men? will teſtify. So then the import of theſe words may be this. Do I, in preaching the Goſpel act in obedience to men, who every where perſecute and oppoſe me for it; or in obedience to that God, who called me to be an Apoſtle of the Gentiles, ver. 15, 16.

Ver. 11. —— After man.] i. e. Of human invention; neither did I receive my commiſſion from man.

Ver. 13. —— I perſecuted the Church of God.] See Acts ix. 1. and xxii. 4.

——— And waſted it.] See Acts viii. 3.

Ver. 14. —— Equals.] i. e. Thoſe of the ſame age.

Ver. 15. —— God who ſeparated me, &c.] See Jer. i. 5. and Acts xiii. 2.

Ver. 19. James the Lord's brother.] See Mark vi. 3.

N. B. The latter part of this chapter is well explained in the life of Paul, prefixed to the Epiſtles in the general Preface, to which I refer you.

CHAP. II.

1 He ſheweth when he went up again to Jeruſalem, and for what purpoſe: And that Titus was not circumciſed: 11 And that he reſiſted Peter, and told him the reaſon, 14 why he and other being Jews, do believe in Chriſt to be juſtified by faith, and not by works: 20 and that they live not in ſin, who are ſo juſtified.

THEN fourteen years after I went up again to Jeruſalem, with Barnabas, and took Titus with me alſo.

2 And I went up by revelation, and communicated unto them that goſpel which I preach among the Gentiles, but privately to them which were of reputation, leſt by any means I ſhould run, or had run in vain.

3 But neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumciſed:

4 And that becauſe of falſe brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to ſpy out our liberty which we have in Chriſt Jeſus, that they might bring us into bondage:

5 To whom we gave place by ſubjection, no not for an hour; that the truth of the goſpel might continue with you.

6 But of theſe, who ſeemed to be ſomewhat, (whatſoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: God accepteth no mans perſon) for they who ſeemed to be ſomewhat, in conference added nothing to me.

7 But contrariwiſe, when they ſaw that the goſpel of the uncircumciſion was committed unto me, as the goſpel of the circumciſion was unto Peter;

8 (For he that wrought effectually in Peter to the apoſtleſhip of the circumciſion, the ſame was mighty in me towards the Gentiles)

9 And when James, Cephas, and John, who ſeemed to be pillars, perceived the grace that was given unto me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowſhip; that we ſhould go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumciſion.

10 Only they would that we ſhould remember the poor; the ſame which I alſo was forward to do.

11 But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withſtood him to the face, becauſe he was to be blamed.

12 For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew, and ſeparated himſelf, fearing them which were of the circumciſion.

13 And the other Jews diſſembled likewiſe with him; inſomuch that Barnabas alſo was carried away with their diſſimulation.

14 But when I ſaw that they walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the goſpel, I ſaid unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, liveſt after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compelleſt thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?

15 We who are Jews by nature, and not ſinners of the Gentiles,

16 Knowing that a man is not juſtified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jeſus Chriſt, even we have believed in Jeſus Chriſt; that we might be juſtified by the faith of Chriſt, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law ſhall no fleſh be juſtified.

17 But if while we ſeek to be juſtified by Chriſt, we our ſelves alſo are found ſinners, is therefore Chriſt the miniſter of ſin? God forbid.

18 For if I build again the things which I deſtroyed, I make my ſelf a tranſgreſſor.

19 For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God.

20 I am crucified with Chriſt: Nevertheleſs I live; yet not I, but Chriſt liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the fleſh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himſelf for me.

21 I do not fruſtrate the grace of God: for if righteouſneſs come by the law, then Chriſt is dead in vain.

In this chapter Paul,

I. Produces other proofs and evidences of the Divine Authority of his doctrine and office. (1.) From the approbation and conſent of the chiefeſt Apoſtles at Jeruſalem, where we read of his journey and companions, ver. 1. the impulſive cauſe, revelation, and of his buſineſs there, to acquaint them with his doctrine, ver. 2. (2.) From their admitting Titus into fellowſhip, without being circumciſed, which ſhews that they did not judge it to be neceſſary, ver. 3. amplified by the reaſon thereof, that the falſe brethren might have no advantage over them, ver. 4, 5. (3.) From the iſſue of that meeting with the Apoſtles at Jeruſalem, viz. their owning him for an Apoſtle, where he ſhews, that any perſonal prerogatives they might lay claim to, were of no conſideration in this caſe; that thoſe Apoſtles added nothing to him, ver. 6. That they were convinced he was the Apoſtle of the uncircumciſion, ver. 7. They were ſatisfied of the great ſucceſs of his miniſtry, ver. 8. And thereupon owned him and Barnabas as their Fellow-Apoſtles, and maintainers of the ſame truths with themſelves, and agreed to divide their charge with them, ver. 9. And beſpake his aſſiſtance in a collection for the poor Chriſtian Jews, ver. 10.

(4) From his authoritative publick rebuke of Peter, one of the chief Apoſtles, for his ſinful compliance with the Jews, when in his practice he declined from the doctrine taught by Paul concerning the abrogation of the ceremonial law. This is (1.) ſummarily propounded, ver. 11. and (2.) more particularly related in reſpect of the occaſion of this reproof, which was Peter's withdrawing himſelf from the Gentiles, for fear of diſpleaſing the Jews, and ſo rejecting the Gentiles from communion, unleſs they would quit their Chriſtian liberty, and come under the yoke of the law, ver. 12. aggravated by the ill effect of this practice of his drawing others by his example to act contrary to their judgments, ver. 13. and by the nature of it, prevaricating and not walking uprightly, ver. 14.—— And again in reſpect of the reproof itſelf, wherein he blames him for his unequal carriage, himſelf living as a Gentile, and yet drawing others to Judaiſm, ver.— 14.

II. Eſtabliſheth the doctrine of juſtification by faith in Chriſt, and not by the works of the law. This he proves by ſeveral arguments.

(1.) Becauſe the believing Jews, though they enjoyed many privileges beyond the Gentiles, and ſo might have expected juſtification by works, if there had been any ſuch thing; yet expected juſtification only by faith in Chriſt, and not by works. This is propounded, ver. 15, 16. —— proved (as to the negative part) by a teſtimony of Scripture, ver. — 16. and amplified by an anſwer to an exception againſt this poſition, as if this were to make Chriſt an encourager of ſin, and that men need not regard holineſs. This alſo is propounded, at ver. 17. and confuted (1.) by a caſe put in his own perſon, that though he had maintained juſtification by faith without works, yet he had alſo preached down ſin, and thereby that doctrine, did not encourage it, ver. 18.

(2.) Though this doctrine did free them from the law in point of juſtification, yet not as a rule of life, becauſe the end of their freedom is that they may live holily, ver. 19.

(3.) Becauſe it obliges all men, who are juſtified to mortify ſin, and to live unto Chriſt, ver. 20.

(2.) Becauſe if we are juſtified by works only, then free grace and the death of Chriſt, are rendred uſeleſs, ver. 21.

Ver. 1. Then fourteen years after I went up again, &c.] See the hiſtorical part of this chapter in the life of Paul, in the general Preface to the Epiſtles.

Ver. 2. — Privately.] i. e. Severally, or in their own houſes.

Ver. 3. —— Being a Greek.] See the life of Titus before the Epiſtle to Titus.

Ver. 4. —— Falſe brethren.] See 2 Cor. ii. 26.

Ver. 9. —— The Heathen.] Who in other places are called Gentiles.

Ver. 12. —— He did eat with the Gentiles.] See Acts x. 28. and xi. 3.

Ver. 16. —— But by the faith of Jeſus Chriſt.] See Rom. i. 17. and iii. 22, 28. and viii. 3.

CHAP. III.

1 He asketh what moveth them to leave the faith, and hang upon the law? 6 They that believe are juſtified, 9 and bleſſed with Abraham. 10 And this he ſheweth by many reaſons.

O Fooliſh Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that you ſhould not obey the truth, before whoſe eyes Jeſus Chriſt hath been evidently ſet forth, crucified among you?

2 This only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

3 Are ye ſo fooliſh? having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the fleſh?

4 Have ye ſuffered ſo many things in vain? if it be yet in vain.

5 He therefore that miniſtreth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

6 Even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteouſneſs.

7 Know ye therefore, that they which are of faith, the ſame are the children of Abraham.

8 And the ſcripture foreſeeing that God would juſtify the heathen through faith, preached before the goſpel unto Abraham, ſaying, In thee ſhall all nations be bleſſed.

9 So then they which be of faith, are bleſſed with faithful Abraham.

10 For as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curſe: for it is written, Curſed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

11 But that no man is juſtified by the law in the ſight of God, it is evident: for, The juſt ſhall live by faith.

12 And the law is not of faith: but, The man that doth them, ſhall live in them.

13 Chriſt hath redeemed us from the curſe of the law, being made a curſe for us: for it is written, Curſed is every one that hangeth on a tree:

14 That the bleſſing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jeſus Chriſt; that we might receive the promiſe of the Spirit through faith.

15 Brethren, I ſpeak after the manner of men; though it be but a mans covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man diſannulleth or addeth thereto.

16 Now to Abraham and his ſeed were the promiſes made. He ſaith not, And to ſeeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy ſeed, which is Chriſt.

17 And this I ſay, that the covenant that was confirmed before of God in Chriſt, the law which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot diſannul, that it ſhould make the promiſe of none effect.

18 For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promiſe: but God gave it to Abraham by promiſe.

19 Wherefore then ſerveth the law? It was added becauſe of tranſgreſſions, till the ſeed ſhould come, to whom the promiſe was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator.

20 Now a mediator is not a mediator of one; but God is one.

21 Is the law then againſt the promiſes of God? God forbid: for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteouſneſs ſhould have been by the law.

22 But the ſcripture hath concluded all under ſin, that the promiſe by faith of Jeſus Chriſt might be given to them that believe.

23 But before faith came, we were kept under the law, ſhut up unto the faith which ſhould afterwards be revealed.

24 Wherefore the law was our ſchoolmaſter to bring us unto Chriſt, that we might be juſtified by faith.

25 But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a ſchool-maſter.

26 For ye are all the children of God by faith in Chriſt Jeſus.

27 For as many of you as have been baptized into Chriſt, have put on Chriſt.

28 There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Chriſt Jeſus.

29 And if ye be Chriſts, then are ye Abrahams ſeed, and heirs according to the promiſe.

This chapter contains,

I. A ſharp reproof of the Galatians for their defection from the doctrine of juſtification by faith, aggravated by the evidence and plainneſs wherein that doctrine had been preached unto them, ver. 1.

II. A propoſal of other arguments for the proof of this doctrine. (1.) From their own experience, becauſe the Spirit was beſtowed upon them in their attendance unto, and acceptance of this doctrine, and not the other, ver. 2. which he amplifies by ſhewing the folly of this change, how it will be far from making them better Chriſtians, ver. 3. and that they muſt loſe all the fruit of their former ſufferings upon this account, ver. 4. Then he repeats the argument, ver. 5.

(2.) By the example of Abraham who was juſtified by faith, as appears by Moſes's teſtimony of him, ver. 6. amplified by this inference, that therefore only thoſe that ſeek juſtification in this way are the ſpiritual ſeed of Abraham, ver. 7. and by a Scripture-teſtimony, ſhewing that this bleſſing promiſed to Abraham did belong to the Gentiles, as well as to the Jews, ver. 8. and again, by an inference or concluſion, that all believers whether Jews or Gentiles, and they only are juſtified and bleſſed as Abraham was, ver. 9.

(3.) Becauſe they that ſeek juſtification by works are under the curſe of the law, (as not being able to yield that obedience it requires) and therefore cannot be juſtified by it. For that which curſes them, cannot acquit and juſtify them, ver. 10.

(4.) Becauſe the Scripture teſtifies expreſly, that men ſhall be juſtified by faith, and therefore not by the law, ver. 11. proved, becauſe the law does not regard faith, but requires perfect obedience to juſtification and life, ver. 12.

(5.) Becauſe the benefit of Chriſt's redemption of mankind, and all bleſſings purchaſed by his death are received only by faith, wherein the Apoſtle preſcribes the way or means of our deliverance from the curſe of the law, notwithſtanding our tranſgreſſion of it, viz. Chriſt's undergoing the curſe for us, ver. 13. and then deſcribes the fruits of this ſuffering of Chriſt, that the Gentiles might partake of this bleſſing to be juſtified as Abraham was, that all might partake of a more plentiful communication of the Spirit; and that the way of our partaking of this bleſſedneſs, is only by faith, ver. 14.

III. Leſt any might think that though juſtification might be by faith before the law, yet by the giving of the law, that way ſeems to be altered, and juſtification by works eſtabliſhed; therefore, he ſhews that the way of juſtification eſtabliſhed by God's covenant with Abraham, could not be altered by the giving of the law afterwards. This he proves,

(1.) By a compariſon taken from mens covenants; which being once confirmed, cannot be altered. This is propounded at ver. 15. and applied to the caſe in hand, where he ſhews, that God made ſuch a covenant with Abraham; that all his ſeed, both thoſe which lived after the giving of the law, as well as thoſe before, and Gentiles as well as Jews, were included in this covenant, they being all expreſſed by the word ſeed in the ſingular number, to ſhew that it is under one and the ſame conſideration, that they do all partake of his promiſed bleſſing, ver. 16. That if mens covenants being confirmed cannot be altered, much leſs can this, being made by God, and confirmed by him in Chriſt, ver. 17.

(2.) Becauſe theſe two ways of juſtification and ſalvation are inconſiſtent; and therefore if works be admitted, the way is altered, ver. 18. And thus,

Having removed the falſe uſe of the law, i. e. for juſtification he proceeds to ſhew,

IV. The true uſe of it, viz. For the diſcovery of ſin, amplified by ſhewing,

(1.) Its date or continuance, viz. Till Chriſt's coming.

(2.) The way of its delivery, viz. By Angels.

(3.) The perſon entruſted with it, viz. Moſes, a typical mediator, ver. 19.

(4.) The reaſon of employing him as [illegible]iator, viz. To make peace between God and them, wh[illegible]ere at odds by reaſon of ſin, ver. 20.

V. A removal of an objection or doubt that might ariſe from hence, that if the uſe of the law be to diſcover, aggravate and condemn for ſin, then it is [illegible]ntrary to the covenant of Grace, which covers and pa[illegible]our ſins.

This is propounded, rejected and co[illegible]d.

(1.) By retorting the argument, that the other opinion makes the law contrary to, and deſtructive of the promiſes and covenant of grace, for if righteouſneſs and life could be obtained by the works of the law, then the covenant of grace is uſeleſs, ver. 21.

(2.) Directly, by ſhewing that the law is not contrary, but ſubſervient to the promiſe; inaſmuch as a ſinner being convinced by the law of his ſin and miſery, is induced thereupon to flee by faith to Chriſt for righteouſneſs, ver. 22. amplified by ſhewing the difference between the legal and Goſpel-diſpenſation. For, ſays he,

Under the law they were detained under a ſenſe of ſin, and thereby prepared as it were for the entertainment of the doctrine of faith in Chriſt, ver. 23. illuſtrated by comparing the law in this reſpect to a ſchool-maſter, ver. 24. But

Under the Goſpel they are freed from that uſe of the law, ver. 25. proved, becauſe they are now come to age, ver. 26. having been admitted into the body of Chriſt's Church by baptiſm, an ordinance of the new covenant, wherein they have taken upon them the profeſſion of Chriſt, ver. 27.

This is amplified by ſhewing the equal intereſt that perſons of all nations have in Chriſt by faith, ver. 28. and by an inference, that therefore they are Abraham's ſeed, and ſhall partake of his privileges, ver. 29.

Ver. 2. —— Received ye the Spirit.] i. e. The Holy Spirit of God, which deſcended on the firſt Chriſtians; ſee Acts viii. 15. and xv. 8. and ii. 38.

——— Hearing of faith.] When the faith in Chriſt was preached to you by me.

N. B. This chapter has in ſubſtance been explained before in Rom. iv. to which I refer the pious reader.

Ver. 15. —— After the manner.] i. e. Cuſtom or practiſe of men.

——— Covenant.] Teſtament.

Ver. 17. —— Four hundred and thirty years after.] The covenant of promiſe made to Abraham and his ſeed; ſee ver. 16.

Ver. 19. —— Till the feed.] i. e. Chriſt ſhould come; ſee ver. 16.

See Dr. Whitby on this chapter.

CHAP. IV.

1 We were under the law till Chriſt came, as the heir is under his guardian till he be of age. 5 But Chriſt freed us from the law: 7 therefore we are ſervants no longer to it. 14 He remembreth their good will to him, and his to them, 22 and ſheweth that we are the ſons of Abraham by the free woman.

NOW I ſay, that the heir as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a ſervant, though he be Lord of all;

2 But is under tutors and governors, until the time appointed of the father.

3 Even ſo we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world:

4 But when the fulneſs of the time was come, God ſent forth his Son made of a woman, made under the law,

5 To redeem them that were under the law that we might receive the adoption of ſons.

6 And becauſe ye are ſons, God hath ſent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father.

7 Wherefore thou art no more a ſervant, but [illegible] ſon; and if a ſon, then an heir of God through Chriſt.

8 Howbeit, then when ye knew not God, ye did ſervice unto them which by nature are no gods.

9 But now after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye deſire again to be in bondage?

10 Ye obſerve days, and months, and times, and years.

11 I am afraid of you, leſt I have beſtowed upon you labour in vain.

12 Brethren, I beſeech you, be as I am; for I am as ye are: ye have not injured me at all.

13 Ye know how through infirmity of the fleſh, I preached the goſpel unto you at the firſt.

14 And my temptation which was in my fleſh ye deſpiſed not, nor rejected; but received me as an angel of God, even as Chriſt Jeſus.

15 Where is then the bleſſedneſs you ſpake of? for I bear you record, that if it had been poſſible, ye would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me.

16 Am I therefore become your enemy, becauſe I tell you the truth?

17 They zealouſly affect you, but not well; yea, they would exclude you, that you might affect them.

18 But it is good to be zealouſly affected always in a good thing, and not only when I am preſent with you.

19 My little children, of whom I travail in birth again, until Chriſt be formed in you,

20 I deſire to be preſent with you now, and to change my voice, for I ſtand in doubt of you.

21 Tell me, ye that deſire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law?

22 For it is written, that Abraham had two ſons; the one by a bond-maid, the other by a free-woman.

23 But he who was of the bond-woman, was born after the fleſh: but he of the free-woman was by promiſe.

24 Which things are an allegory; for theſe are the two covenants; the one from the mount Sinai, which gendreth to bondage, which is Agar.

25 For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and anſwereth to Jeruſalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children.

26 But Jeruſalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all.

27 For it is written, Rejoyce, thou barren that beareſt not; break forth and cry, thou that travaileſt not: for the deſolate hath many more children than ſhe which hath an husband.

28 Now we, brethren, as Iſaac was, are the children of promiſe.

29 But as then he that was born after the fleſh, perſecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even ſo it is now.

30 Nevertheleſs, what ſaith the ſcripture? Caſt out the bond-woman and her ſon: for the ſon of the bond-woman ſhall not be heir with the ſon of the free-woman.

31 So then, brethren, we are not children of the bond-woman, but of the free.

In this chapter Paul continues to inſiſt upon the Churches freedom from the Moſaical diſpenſation which he illuſtrates by the ſimilitude of a pupil, or minor, and his tutors or guardians, under the Old Teſtament, ver. 1, 2, 3. which, ſays he, can no longer be ſaid of the members of the Church under the Goſpel, becauſe they are delivered from the ſlavery of the law by the incarnation of Chriſt, ver. 4, 5. to our great benefit, for thereby we are adapted to be the Sons of God, and heirs of eternal ſalvation, ver. 6, 7. Then

The Apoſtle expoſtulates with the Galatians concerning their inclinableneſs towards legal obſervances, (1.) on the conſideration that they being converted from Gentiliſm, were not acquainted with the law of Moſes formerly, and therefore, ſays he, it is the more ſurprizing, that you being brought by the preventing grace of God into this happy ſtate, even to the knowledge of the true God, ye ſhould be fond of trifles, and ſo prone to embrace thoſe things which make you ſubject to the law of ordinances, ver. 9. as the diſtinction of times, ver. 10. Whereupon,

He diſcovers his fear of the conſequence ſuch doctrines will prove to them, even the loſs of all his labour beſtowed on them, ver. 11. Wherefore, ſays he, follow my example, and remember that I preached to you in love for your ſouls, ver. 12. how many things I have ſuffered for your ſakes when I preached the Goſpel among you, ver. 13. how you ſympathized with me therein, and eſteemed me ſo much for my works ſake, ver. 14. that I always found you ready to aſſiſt me to the utmoſt, ver. 15. which, ſays he, ſhould not be now forgotten and diſregarded when I am the ſame now towards you, as always, only that now I oppoſe the errors of falſe apoſtles, who endeavour to ſeduce you from my Goſpel, ver. 16. Then

He ſhews the falſity and hypocriſy of the pretended zeal and affection of thoſe falſe apoſtles to the Galatians, ver. 17. that it is not a true zeal, which he deſcribes at ver. 18. but that his zeal was ſincere and tender, becauſe he had brought them with much pains from error, ver. 19. and always propoſed and ſtudied an union between them, ver. 20. And from hence

He proceeds to confirm and illuſtrate the whole preceding diſpute both concerning juſtification by faith, and not by works; and the aboliſhing of the legal diſpenſation, by the teſtimony of the law itſelf, prefiguring its own abolition in the hiſtory of Abraham's family. In which he appeals to their own judgment, ver. 21. ſhews the difference between Abraham's two ſons in reſpect of their mothers, ver. 22. and in reſpect of the principle of their generation and birth, ver. 23. which, ſays he, in reſpect of the mothers ſignifies the two covenants, ver. 24, 25, 26. as it is confirmed from Scripture, ver. 27. And here the Apoſtle gives the application of this typical hiſtory, and the myſtery prefigured by it, viz. That we are under the Goſpel the children of promiſe, ver. 28. and that we, as Iſaac did, muſt bear with perſecution, ver. 29. and that the perſecutors will be caſt out of the Church, ver. 30.

Ver. 3. —— Under the elements.] i. e. Rudiments.

Ver. 8. —— Ye.] Galatians, who were originally Heathens.

Ver. 10. —— Ye obſerve days and months and times, &c.] See the introduction to this Epiſtle, where this ſuperſtition or idolatry is particularly diſcourſed on.

Ver. 13. —— Through infirmity of the fleſh.] When he laboured under ſome grievous bodily diſeaſe; ſee 1 Cor. ii. 3. and 2 Cor. xi. 30.

Ver. 14. And my temptation which was in my fleſh.] See ver. 13.

—— As an Angel.] Or, meſſenger of God.

—— Even as Chriſt Jeſus.] Who hath ſaid to his Apoſtles, he that receiveth you, receiveth me, Matt. x. 40.

Ver. 18. But it is good to be zealouſly affected always in a good thing.] Here is firſt, a juſt commendation of true, religious zeal; and that in the utmoſt extent of it; It is good to be zealouſly affected always.

Secondly, The due limitation of ſuch zeal, ſo as it may deſerve that commendation; it ſhould be in a good thing.

The ſubſtance of both is, that true zeal is a moſt excellent grace; but that the truth of it is to be eſteemed, not ſo much by the height of the paſſions, of which it is compoſed, as by the goodneſs of the things, about which it is employed.

Therefore, it will be needful to examine, firſt, what is the name, and nature, and cauſes of true zeal?

Secondly, What are the bounds, and extremes, what the corruptions, and remedies of zeal?

The one will excite in us the moſt ſincere, moſt ardent affections towards God, and the things of God; the other will direct us in the right managing and applying of thoſe affections; which two are indeed the great deſign of all true religion.

This is the ſum of all the laws of Chriſt, and his Apoſtles; that as we ſhould moſt carefully endeavour to know all our duties towards God and man; ſo we ſhould perform them all with that unfeigned integrity which belongs to Chriſtian piety, with that temper and ſobriety which becomes Chriſtian prudence and charity, with that warmth and affection which agrees with Chriſtian zeal; that is, in other words, we ſhould be zealouſly affected always, but only in good things.

The word zeal, amongſt ancient Heathen writers, is uſed indifferently in a good or a bad ſenſe; but ſeldom or never in a religious ſenſe. At beſt it is taken by them to expreſs a man's earneſt deſire and eager purſuit of ſome temporal good, and a grief that others poſſeſs that good which he wants; eſpecially thoſe who are his equals in other things. Very frequently with them it ſignifies emulation, and that ſort of it which is commonly accompanied with envy and immoderate contention. And, indeed, it were much to be wiſhed, that in the Chriſtian Church, which has advanced the word xeal, and applied it to a Divine Meaning, there had not been in all ages too many Chriſtians, who have been zealous rather according to the Heathen ſignification of the word than the Chriſtian.

In the Scripture, and amongſt Chriſtian writers, when it is uſed in the beſt ſenſe, for what it ſhould be, not what it too generally is, it then paſſes for a vehement affection, a reſtleſs heat, a powerful inclination of the mind towards Heaven and heavenly things; chiefly regarding the Divine Author of them, and his glory; and next himſelf, his truths, his ways, his rewards; when with earneſt, but harmleſs paſſions, we wiſh, we contrive, we contend for the honour of God, the belief, the ſpreading of his doctrines, the practice of his laws, the flouriſhing of his religion, the enjoying of his promiſes, the peace and proſperity of his Church; and when moſt conſtantly, moſt irreconcileably we hate, and oppoſe the things that are contrary to any of theſe.

So that true zeal ſeems not to be any one ſingle affection of the ſoul, as are the other paſſions of love, deſire, hope, joy, grief, hatred, and the like; but rather it is a ſtrong mixture of many holy and ſpiritual affections, rather a gracious conſtitution of the whole mind, than any one particular grace; affecting the whole will, ſwaying all the thoughts of a devout heart, and filling it with all manner of pious intentions, all not only uncounterfeit, but moſt fervent. It is an addition of a double meaſure, and force, and activity to that religion, which was before ſincere. It is to a ſpiritual life, as health is to a natural; renders that, which elſe would only breath, and move, not only living, but moſt lively, and moſt vigorous. And as in moral virtue there is ſome more perfect degree, that the Heathen moraliſts called heroic, and even Divine Virtue, which is not itſelf a diſtinct virtue, but the higheſt pitch and eminence of all other virtues; and which, they therefore thought, did make men moſt nearly to approach the nature of God; ſo true zeal may be ſtiled the heroic and moſt divine degree of all true piety.

Such is the name, ſuch, I humbly conceive, is and ought to be the nature of true zeal; and by this we may gueſs at the uſefulneſs of it. The uſefulneſs do I ſay? Why not rather the neceſſity? In all Chriſtians ſome kind of zeal for the intereſt and practice of the true religion, is not only moſt beneficial, but moſt neceſſary, moſt inſeparable from its reality.

This will appear to be certain, if we reflect on the cauſes that are able, and are wont to raiſe zeal in mens hearts. Zeal being the top and perfection of ſo many religious affections for ſome things againſt others, the cauſes therefore of it muſt needs be moſt eminent, moſt efficacious in both kinds. Theſe are good or evil, both in the higheſt degree, both in a double reſpect, either the great and admirable goodneſs of a thing in itſelf, or its extraordinary goodneſs and agreeableneſs to us, and either the exceeding evil of a thing in its own nature, or its hurtfulneſs and miſchievouſneſs to us.

So lovely, ſo graceful is all goodneſs in itſelf, that it can ſcarce be obſerved by any man in its native beauty, without ſome emotion in his mind to love, and obtain it. Some ſecret charms it has that are wont to prevail, not only always on its friends, but often on its very enemies. There is no queſtion but many wicked men are often touched with ſome inward reverence for that goodneſs, which they cannot be perſuaded to practiſe, nay, which they outwardly ſeem to deſpiſe.

Such is the attractive force of it in its general contemplation. But more, when a thing that is infinitely good in it ſelf, infinitely better in nature, greater in power than we are, ſhall freely deſcend down to us, ſhall condeſcend to have the neareſt relation to us, ſhall appear to employ all its high perfections chiefly for our happineſs, nay ſhall, for that end only, take on it ſelf our imperfections; what goodneſs can be more amiable in general? What more obliging, more tender in particular than this; what ought to produce in us more inflamed affections and zeal for it?

The like may be ſaid on the other ſide. Whatever is evil and wicked in itſelf, it is imperfect, uncomely, deteſtable, even in the judgment of nature, of reaſon, of ſenſe itſelf; and therefore it cannot but raiſe, in the unprejudiced beholders, a general averſion from it. But more, if the ſame thing ſhall appear to be peculiarly evil, or injurious, or pernicious to us, that general averſion will be, and ought to be turned into a particular hatred and zeal againſt it.

And now is there not an entire concurrence of this double goodneſs in the ways of religion? Of this double evil in all things that are at enmity with it. Is not religion ſo perfectly good in it ſelf, its doctrines, its commands, its recompences; above all, in its author; that, without the groſſeſt ſenſuality, we cannot but admire it? Will it not be ſo good and beneficial to us, if we believe and practiſe it, that, without the moſt heinous ingratitude, we cannot but be moſt zealouſly affected towards it?

On the contrary, is not ſin, notwithſtanding all the moſt flattering colours, and moſt alluring ſhapes it can put on, when it ſtrives to beguile our weak ſenſes; notwithſtanding all the moſt ſpecious diſguiſes which the Devil, the father of all hypocriſy, can beſtow upon it; yet is not ſin, in its own nature, moſt deficient, moſt vile, moſt deformed? Is it not moſt pernicious to our nature? moſt injurious to our true intereſt? moſt deſtructive of our happineſs? Are not the moſt wicked men compelled to confeſs all this; ſometimes in their proſperity, often in their adverſity? ſometimes with their tongues, often in their fears, well nigh always in their conſciences? All this is ſo perſpicuous, ſo undeniable, that, in a congregation of Chriſtians, I need not be over induſtrious in the proof of it.

Theſe then being the perpetual cauſes of zeal, the greateſt good, or the greateſt evil; either abſolutely ſo in themſelves, or relatively ſo to us; and both kinds of the good unqueſtionably meeting in religion, both kinds of the evil in its oppoſites; it is therefore good to be zealouſly affected for the one againſt the other; to be always zealouſly affected: For the ſame motives of zeal continuing in the things themſelves unchangeable, as they do, and will for ever; for ever all goodneſs will be moſt charming, for ever all wickedneſs will be moſt odious; the affections, therefore, the flaming love which the one, the vehement hatred which the other, that is, the zeal which they both ſhould ſtir up in our minds, ought alſo to be for ever unchangeable.

Thus far we walk on firm and even ground: Thus it is good to be always zealouſly affected. But now begins to appear the difficulty and the danger. For zeal being compoſed, as you have heard, of the higheſt degrees of ſo many affections, the true zeal conſiſting of the greateſt lawful degrees, the falſe of the greateſt unlawful degrees of thoſe affections; the right tempering and moderating of all ſuch affections, and all their degrees, in themſelves ſo ſtrong, in their objects ſo different, muſt needs be a very hard, and a very hazardous work: So it is in any one of all our natural paſſions. Paſſion is the great mover and ſpring of the ſoul; when mens paſſions are ſtrongeſt, they may have great and noble effects; but they are then alſo moſt apt to fall into the greateſt miſcarriages. And are not our moſt ſpiritual affections as liable to the like corruptions? They are, in truth, more liable; ſo much the more, in that mens ſpiritual failings are harder to be repented of, or acknowledged for ſins, than their natural faults or carnal vices are.

Moſt certainly, the ſtricteſt profeſſion of piety, the ſevereſt appearance of devotion, the moſt extraordinary fervour of zeal is moſt praiſe-worthy, moſt Chriſtian, if undiſſembled, if humbly practiſed: But it is not always moſt free from diſſimulation, or ſpiritual pride. And if the greateſt outward ſhew of zeal for religion be put on by hypocriſy; if the greateſt inward heat of it be not ſweetned by meekneſs, or not tempered with humility, or not governed by prudence; can it do God any ſervice? Rather it diſhonours him: Can it bring to our own ſouls any benefit? Rather it miſchiefs them.

Wherefore it is prudence, humility, gentleneſs, things that, at firſt ſight, ſeem moſt inconſiſtent with all zeal, that are the great ſecurity, the beſt guards, the chief ornaments of all the moſt Godly zeal. It is mediocrity, decence, integrity, charity, that are the great rules, the ſtandards of goodneſs, of excellence, not only in all human converſation, not only in all moral virtue, but even in all our moſt religious duties.

Are not all, or moſt evangelical virtues and graces in danger of extremes? As there is too often a defect on the one ſide, ſo there may be an exceſs on the other. May not hope in God, or Godly ſorrow, be perverted into preſumption or deſpair? May not faith in God be depraved by infidelity or by ſuperſtition? Men may believe too little; they may believe too much. May not the worſhip of God be corrupted by profaneneſs, or by idolatry? It may be too naked for want of ceremonies; it may be too pompous by an exceſs of them. Thus the reſt: Thus religious zeal is ſubject to an exceſs, and to a defect; either when ſomething is mingled with it which it ſhould not have; or when it wants ſomething that ought to go along with it. The defect of it is lukewarmneſs, or coldneſs in religion: The exceſs is not inordinate heat, and ſpiritual fury. It is very natural for men, very eaſy for Chriſtians to offend in one of theſe; moſt natural for all ſenſual men to fall into the defect; very eaſy for many well-meaning Chriſtians to run themſelves, for ill-meaning hypocrites to thruſt others into the exceſs of it. And it is the chief employment, the beſt fruit of that wiſdom, which teacheth men to be wiſe to ſalvation, to find out, and to follow the ſober, temperate, middle way between them both. Therefore,

We proceed to examine what are the due degrees, and undue extremes? what the juſt limits? and ill excurſions of zeal?

We firſt begin with the exceſs of it.

This indeed is a ſubject of which it is hard to ſpeak without ſatyrical ſharpneſs, and particular reflections on many perſons, and ſocieties, and even Churches of Chriſtians: ſo ill have been the deſigns, ſo lamentable the effects of intemperate zeal in all Chriſtendom. Yet let us try to conſider this tender argument ſo, as not our ſelves to fall into an extravagance of zeal, whilſt we condemn ſuch exceſſes. So the meekneſs of Chriſtianity teaches all Chriſtians to deal with erroneouſly-zealous Chriſtians; to pity, not revile, the perſons, whilſt we reprove their errors; to convince their contentions, and outragious zeal, by the moſt religious, and, in truth, the moſt powerful confutation of a milder practice, and more charitable examples.

The great ſign then and character in the text, to diſtinguiſh the true zeal from the falſe, is either the goodneſs of the zeal itſelf, or the goodneſs of the things about which it is concerned; the latter being here made a proof of the former. But beſides the goodneſs of the zeal, itſelf may be diſcerned; either by the light, which directs it in the head, or by the work of it in the heart. And ſo we may ſafely conclude that to be the only true zeal.

Firſt, Which is guided by a good light in the head.

And Secondly, which conſiſts of good and innocent affections in the heart. And,

Thirdly, That which employs the head and the heart about good things, and thoſe only.

Firſt, For the beſt guide, and conductor of zeal in the head, we may conſult our Apoſtle in his Epiſtle to the Romans, Brethren, ſays he, My hearts deſire, and prayer to God for Iſrael is that they may be ſaved: For I bear them record that they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge, Rom. x. 1, 2.

In which words two things are obſervable: The Apoſtle's behaviour towards his brethren in the fleſh, the Iſraelites, who were miſtaken in their zeal for God; and his diſcovery of the ground of that miſtake. His behaviour is not to cenſure bitterly the errors of their zeal; but rather to bear witneſs to the good intentions of that zeal which they had, and to pray heartily to God, that he would direct their ill-applied affections, by a true, heavenly, and ſpiritual light.

Such was his mild and gentle behaviour, though zealous too, for the cauſe of Chriſt, towards the miſguided Iſraelites. His diſcovery of the error of their zeal, and his reproof of it follows. It is, that it was not according to knowledge.

And as his behaviour ought to be an example for our practice in the like caſes; ſo his reproof may afford us the firſt moſt certain rule to inſtruct our judgments, in the correcting of the erroneous, and directing of the true zeal.

Behold, I beſeech you. That, in Paul's opinion, that is imperfect, or falſe zeal, which is only hot and eager without knowledge. That is the right zeal, which is not only ſincere, and in earneſt, but according to knowledge?

According to knowledge; another manner of companion of zeal, than what too commonly goes along with it. Are not thoſe men too often found to be the greateſt, and do they not think themſelves to be the trueſt zealots, who are moſt notoriouſly ignorant? Who make it their buſineſs, their pride to expreſs their blind zeal, not only without all knowledge, but oftentimes againſt all? Whereas true zeal ſhould always begin with true knowledge firſt; and thence proceed to an unwearied paſſion, for what it once knows to be worthy of ſuch paſſion; falſe zeal always begins with paſſion firſt, and there uſually ends; ſeldom, or never goes farther, than ignorant, and violent paſſion.

Our zeal then ſhould be according to knowledge. And what kind of knowledge? Without all queſtion, firſt according to the true, ſaving, Evangelical knowledge.

It ſhould be according to the Goſpel, the whole Goſpel; not only according to its truths, but precepts; not only according to its free grace, but neceſſary duties; not only according to its myſteries, but alſo its commandments. It ſhould be according to the original deſign, fundamental principles, and eternal end of the Goſpel; not ſo, as to ſet any one doctrine or work of it at variance with others; which are all admirably conſiſtent amongſt themſelves, and agree in a bleſſed harmony; not ſo, as only to contend for ſome temporary opinions, or factious falſe inferences from the Goſpel; which rather ſerve to uphold the credit, and ſecular intereſt of religious ſects, than for the honour of religion it ſelf.

Thus ſhould our zeal be according to the Goſpel, that knowledge, which deſcends from above. But then beſides, it will do well, if it be alſo accompanied with ſome good, and grave degree of civil wiſdom, and underſtanding, of ſober knowledge even of this world, and worldly things. For though all that profeſs the name of Chriſt, are chiefly in his religion to be directed by a true ſpiritual Light: yet ſuch earneſt, and ſtrong motions of the mind, as commonly attend religious zeal, will receive no manner of hindrance, but rather great aſſiſtance from the ſubordinate help, and faithful ſervice, and ſteady guidance of true natural light it ſelf.

True zeal neither is, nor ought to be a ſolitary, melancholy grace; as if it were only fit to dwell in mean, dark and narrow minds; ſuch as are utterly unprovided of all other natural, or moral, or ſpiritual abilities. No. As there is ſcarce any one grace or gift of God, that ever uſes to go alone; but where any one of them enters, others will go with it, or ſoon follow after it; ſo eſpecially of all graces, zeal ought never to go alone. In whatever ſoul zeal gets the entire poſſeſſion, and keeps it ſingly, without the ſociety of many other gifts, or to the ſhutting out of any one virtue, there it is a dangerous gueſt, there it is an incendiary. But wherever it is leagued, and joined in company with many other ſpiritual endowments, and advantages of nature, with a diſcreet judgment, a clear underſtanding, a well-ordered devotion, an exemplary charity; there it is the ſureſt defence, the greateſt beauty of true piety; there it gives the brighteſt luſtre to religion.

Therefore, let me recommend a ſpecial care of rectifying zeal in the heart, which is the proper ſeat of this, as of all other practical virtues and graces, from the heart proceeds the iſſue of life, Prov. iv. 23. of a pious, as well as of a corporeal life; by the motions and pulſes of the heart, the temper of our ſpiritual, as well as a bodily ſtate may be judged.

In the heart zeal ought to be compoſed of the higheſt degrees of all pious affections, of which ſome in their own nature are milder and gentler, ſome ſharper and more vehement. It ſhould be made up, I ſay, of the largeſt meaſures of ſpiritual love, deſire, hope, hatred, grief, indignation, and the like; ſome of theſe affections earneſtly fixing our minds on God and religion; the others forcibly averting from us thoſe things which are diſpleaſing to God, and contrary to religion.

Now then, that zeal which has the greater mixture of the more gentle, more benign, more charitable affections, is moſt likely to be the beſt; that wherein the other more harſh, ſowre, and angry paſſions have the greater ſhare, and are predominant, that is in moſt danger to be immoderate, and exceſſive; that, in which this latter kind does exclude the former, that is undoubtedly unlawful, and wicked.

This ſeems to be moſt agreeable to the great primitive purpoſe of true Chriſtianity; and it may perhaps be more clearly exemplified in an inſtance. Our love of God, his truths, his honour; our unquenchable deſires to promote, our well-grounded hopes to enjoy his glory, theſe affections ſhould certainly take the firſt, and the chief place in our zeal; theſe can never be too much in earneſt; they can never carry out our hearts beyond due meaſure. Our hatred of thoſe ways which God hates, our grief for, and indignation againſt thoſe things that diſpleaſe and diſhonour him, theſe ſhould have their turn too in our minds; theſe alſo are very acceptable to God himſelf. But then there ought to be a much ſtricter guard kept on this ſort of paſſions, that they do not exceed due bounds, that they do not precipitate us into violence, or ſtrife, or malice, which are condemned by James under the title of πικρὸς ζῆλος, Jam. iii. 14. that is, bitter envying, in our tranſlation; and this kind is reckoned by Paul, as one of the moſt carnal ſins, for amongſt the works of the fleſh, which, he ſays, are manifeſt, he names murders, drunkenneſs, witchcrafts, hatred, variance, ſtrife, emulation, wrath, ſeditions, hereſies, Gal. v. 19, 20, 21. Where that word, which we tranſlate emulations, is in the original ζῆλοι.

Thus whatever all pretended zealots may think of the ſublime purity, and ſpirituality of all zeal; we find ſome zeal may be in the company of the groſſeſt, and moſt ſenſual ſins, and you ſee from Paul it deſerves the name of emulations, from James the name of envy, and ſo in Clem. Ep. ad Corinth. often. Of which although Ariſtotle, Rhet. lib. ii. c. 11. allows that ſome emulation may be good, and may be found in ſome good men, yet envy he utterly condemns as wicked in it ſelf, and only to be found in wicked minds. And ſuch was that envy, which moved the high-prieſts, and Sadducees, to raiſe the very firſt perſecution againſt the Church. When they beheld themſelves ſo much over-matched by the glorious works, and excellent abilities, and Divine Authority of the Apoſtles, it is ſaid, ἐπλήσθησαν ζήλȣ, and immediately they laid their hands on them, and caſt them into priſon, Acts v. 17, 18. They were filled with zeal, or as we read it, with indignation, or envy, the uſual cauſe and original of all ſects and ſchiſms, and hereſies.

It is then moſt true, that in their love of God and deſire to pleaſe him, men can never be too affectionate: It is as true, though it may at firſt ſeem a paradox, that in their hatred of ſin, men may be ſometimes too paſſionate. Our love of God may and ſhould provoke us to love the things of God, yea, and the perſons that eſpecially bear the image of God, to love and reverence them as much as we can, the more the better. But our hatred of ſin may carry us inſenſibly farther than againſt the ſin which we ſhould hate altogether, it may involve the perſon which we ſhould not hate at all. For all hatred of perſons, by very many Chriſtian principles, we are moſt ſolemnly, indiſpenſibly forbid. So that the more eager and ſharp acts of zeal are not permitted to all men always to practiſe, but the more tender, more Chriſtian part of it is alway commanded to all. All are not always bound to hate and puniſh the true enemies of religion, much leſs any whom they may fancy to be ſo; all are always obliged to love its true friends, and to pray for its very enemies.

That is a ſecond ſign of the true Evangelical zeal, and note for the detection of it is contrary, it ſhould abound more in the mild and good-natured affections, than in the vehement and wrathful paſſions. An obſervation that is the more ſeaſonable to be conſidered, becauſe it is every where very notorious, and indeed a deplorable thing in it ſelf, that the religion, which was intended to reconcile mankind to Almighty God, whom we had infinitely offended, ſhould not univerſally have the like effect in reconciling mankind amongſt themſelves, between whom there can be no ſuch offences; that in religion men ſhould be generally much more given to that part, which inclines them to hatred, anger, and cenſure of evil things, than to that, which prefers brotherly love, candor, good-will, and kindneſs for good things. Do not too many believe no religion to be pure, but what is intemperately rigid? No zeal to be ſpiritual but what is cenſorious or vindicative? Whereas no religion is true, that is not peaceable, as well as pure; no zeal is ſpiritual, that is not alſo charitable, nay chiefly ſo.

The true zeal ſhould be in religion, what true courage is in human nature. None but minds truly pious are capable of the one, none but minds truly great are capable of the other, and they both alike diſpoſe and qualify the hearts, which they inhabit. You well know, that to be the trueſt courage, which is not only firm, brave, undaunted, but alſo calm, inoffenſive, ſlow to anger, hard to be provoked, or ſoon reconciled. Give me leave to add, ſo ſhould the true zeal be, not only conſtant, daring, fearleſs, but meek, compaſſionate, long-ſuffering, eaſy to be entreated. All other courage, beſides that, is not true valour but brutiſhneſs; all other zeal beſides this, is not a a Chriſtian grace, but religious madneſs.

Having thus declared what is to be the compoſition of zeal in the head and the heart, of what kind of knowledge, of what ſort of affections it ought to conſiſt; let us enquire what it is the true object of. For that we need go no farther than to the words of my text. It is good to be zealous in a good thing.

——— In a good thing.] I cannot but obſerve firſt, that it is here only ſaid a good thing. No mention is made of zeal for good perſons. For though a zeal for perſons is lawful, nay commendable, as Paul here commends theſe Galatians, that they would have given him their very eyes, Gal. iv. 15. Yet in general a zeal for perſons, is far leſs religious, far more eaſy to be perverted, than a zeal for things. Indeed, ſcarce any thing can be more pernicious to religion, than when its intereſt is made a buſineſs rather of names than things. May we not impute to this one miſtake, a great part of all the moſt dangerous animoſities and ſchiſms, that have infeſted the Chriſtian Church? Have they not moſt frequently riſen from a factious admiration of ſome particular man, ſome particular Church, ſome head of a party, ſome author of a new opinion?

A corruption that began very early, even in the primitive age. Does not Paul reprehend his contemporaries, for ſaying, not only I am of Chriſt, but I am of Paul, I am of Apollos, I am of Cephas? Tho' he himſelf was named one of the parties, yet the rather, the more warmly he condemns their partiality, the more he undervalues himſelf and his excellent brethren, whoſe names were abuſed in the like manner with his, who, ſays he, is Paul? who Apollos? Who? They were ſome of the greateſt and moſt eminent miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt both in dignity and abilities. And can it then be thought zeal to contend for any other names, when it was envy and ſtrife to ſet up for Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas? And was not this danger moſt wiſely foreſeen by the Apoſtle? For although neither the ill uſe of Paul, or Apollos's name did any conſiderable hurt that we know of: Yet the pretence of Cephas's name, and abuſe of his authority, has cauſed the greateſt rents and diviſions that ever were in the Chriſtian Church; the ſeparation of the eaſtern Church from the weſtern, and of the weſtern within itſelf.

That is one fatal error, when men imprudently and uncharitably often, ſeditiouſly and mutinouſly ſometimes, employ their zeal for perſons.

There is another fault, that is contrary to this, and full as miſchievous, but leſs taken notice for a fault; nay, amongſt too many, it paſſes for a ſign of a good, and Godly, and publick ſpirit. That is, when men unduly exerciſe their zeal againſt perſons; not only againſt evil perſons, not only againſt ſome good perſons, but againſt thoſe who are the moſt venerable and ſacred. Though

The whole tenor of the Divine Law does poſitively require humility and meekneſs to all men; a love for neighbours, that is, in the Goſpel-ſenſe, for all men too; a due obſervance of all degrees of men; a hearty ſubmiſſion to teachers; a conſcientious ſubjection to governors, whether a wiſe and honeſt Heathen impartially ſurveying our religion, would preſently conclude, that the main practices of it, which concern this world, ought chiefly to conſiſt in this kind of good offices. On the contrary,

Can that be a Goſpel-zeal, which at leaſt is the worſt of ill manners; in truth, is moſt deſtructive to all human ſociety? A zeal, which is moſt levelled againſt thoſe very perſons, of whom the laws of nature, and morality, and policy, as well as the Goſpel, have commanded men to think with the greateſt affection; to ſpeak with the greateſt reverence; to act for them with moſt dutiful obedience, nay, for whom, if for any, the Goſpel has taught them to be moſt zealous.

On the whole matter, it is not at all good to be zealous againſt any perſons, as they are ſuch, but only againſt their crimes: It is better to be zealous for things, than for perſons; but then it ſhould be only for good things. A rule, that does certainly exclude all manner of zeal for ill things; all vehement zeal for little things: The one can only be the zeal of a wicked mind; the other only of a light and vain mind. Indeed thoſe things in our ſelves are the only proper objects of our zeal, which in others are the unqueſtionable ſubjects of our praiſes, Phil. iv. 8. and that neither ill things nor little things can be; the one meriting our hatred; the other a low eſteem, if not our contempt.

Of ill things there is no manner of queſtion; but to determine what are little things in religion, great warineſs is to be uſed. Many think nothing to be truly great in it, but what concerns Chriſtian faith; Chriſtian works they reſpect not ſo much; Chriſtian diſcipline or decence of worſhip they regard not at all: But we are to go by another meaſure. Undoubtedly theſe things are abſolutely little in religion, that neither in particular, nor in general, conduce to the advancement of truth, or holineſs, or peace, or order in the Chriſtian Church. Whatever things do really contribute to all theſe ends, they are abſolutely the greateſt things in religion; whatever do promote any one of theſe ends, though perhaps not equally all, even theſe are by no means to be accounted little things. See the note on Phil. iv. 5.

Ver. 29. But as then he that was born after the fleſh perſecuted him that was born after the ſpirit, even ſo it is now.] In the Analyſis of this chapter, and more particularly in the introduction of this epiſtle, it has been ſhewn, that there were ſome even in the Apoſtle's days, who laboured what they could to hinder the progreſs of the Goſpel, by preaching up the neceſſity of the Jewiſh law. Theſe having inſinuated themſelves into the Churches of Galatia, had infected many of thoſe Chriſtians with their poiſonous and falſe doctrines; for, though they did not openly declare themſelves enemies to the Goſpel, yet they did ſupplant it as to its power and efficacy, by alledging its inſufficiency alone, and the neceſſity of their being circumciſed, and embracing thoſe old rules God had anciently enforced under the former diſpenſation. They knew if they could leaven and corrupt them with theſe principles, they did at firſt ſo ſpeciouſly diſplay, it would not be long before they ſhould entirely undermine that foundation the Apoſtles had laid amongſt them. For, however innocent their pretences might ſeem at firſt, it is clear Paul perceived the conſequence would be dangerous. Chriſt will not profit you at all, Gal. v. 2.

For this cauſe it is, as we have noted in the premiſes of this epiſtle, he doth labour with them ſo earneſtly, and uſeth ſuch variety of arguments to ſecure them from giving place any further to thoſe falſe and pernicious teachers, and to convince them of their error and fault, in giving way unto them at all.

Amongſt other arguments, he urgeth the different ſtate men are in when under the Goſpel, from that they were in when under the Law; and that the Law was primarily deſigned only to prepare and fit men for the Goſpel, but not to continue in the ſame place and power after as before; no more than he that being arrived to ripe and full years, is bound to continue under their tutorage who had the care of him in his minority. See ver. 1.

He afterwards proceeds to argue with them from the nature of that law they are ſo deſirous to be under, ver. 21. and then explains himſelf by a ſimilitude of Abraham's two ſons; ſhewing there is as great a difference between thoſe who are under the Goſpel-ſtate, and them that are under the law, as between the ſon which was his natural child, and that which was conferred on him by the ſpecial promiſe and powerful interpoſition of God's particular bleſſing.

And thus he takes occaſion to reflect on the great alteration that was wrought amongſt them, ſince they did liſten to, and entertain theſe falſe and deceiving apoſtles; and does, as it were, tell them, it was no wonder they ſhould thus vary, and that they ſhould now approve ways of ſeverity towards Chriſt's Apoſtles and Followers, ſeeing they did receive and adhere to them that were directly contrary to Chriſt's miniſters and ſervants. Compare ver. 14, 15. with this 29th verſe. And this no more than what hath fallen out in all ages of the world. The ſervants of Satan, and enemies of true Godlineſs, have always been for perſecuting the faithful and obedient children of God. And it ſeems by this epiſtle, to be the eſpecial and peculiar character of them that are irreligiouſly and immoderately hot and zealous about ceremonies, to be the greateſt perſecutors of thoſe who are moſt pious and conſcientious. Look through all the Scriptures, nay, look through all the ages of the Church, you ſhall generally find that thoſe who are moſt for the perſecution of others on the account of ſome indifferences relating to religion, were very wicked ſuperſtitious men; men that were inordinately zealous for, and fond of ſome outward ceremonies. Now, if a fondneſs for any ceremonies would maintain and juſtify mens perſecution of others who cannot approve their fopperies, one would think theſe teachers who were crept in amongſt the Galatians ſhould be excuſed, becauſe they preſſed only thoſe things that had formerly been of Divine Appointment: For, He that came to take away the inſupportable yoke of Jewiſh ceremonies, certainly did never intend to gall the necks of his diſciples with another inſtead of it, Dr. Stillingf. Pref. to Irenic. But here we ſee how dangerous it is to give our ſelves too great a liberty in admiring any bare external and accidental appendage to religion. Satan doth ſuddenly ſtrike in on ſuch occaſions, and doth ſo powerfully affect mens minds with ſome ſtrange apprehenſions of the beauty, excellency, uſefulneſs, and neceſſity of theſe things, they are quite taken off from minding the inward part and ſoul of religion. And by this means they come to lay out all their zeal about theſe trifling and worthleſs parts, they even ſtarve their own ſouls, by a conſtant feaſting on theſe mere husks, and do what they can to deſtroy others ſouls, at leaſt their bodies, by perſecuting them, if they will not conceive and believe as well of theſe things as they do. It is a very ſhrewd ſign and token that a man is a wicked unregenerate man, if he be of a fierce and perſecuting temper; if he be prone to endeavour to ruin and trouble, or further the vexation and diſturbance of ſerious and pious people, only becauſe they cannot be as ceremonious as he is. All which is figuratively, yet emphatically intended to be ſhewn by the Apoſtle, ſaying,

He that was born after the fleſh, &c. Which words immediately relate to the Sons of Abram: Iſmael is he that was born after the fleſh, viz. In a mere natural ordinary way. Now, as he did perſecute, and mock, and deride, and inſult over Iſaac, who was born after the ſpirit, viz. who was the Son of the Promiſe, and in order to whoſe birth there was the exerting a Divine Power in the accompliſhing of that promiſe which was made to Abraham, when both he and Sarah were paſt hopes, and naturally uncapable of having children, ſo it is now, viz. Even ſo thoſe in theſe days, who are of the ſeed of Abraham, that pretend they have him for their father, and are outwardly Jews, or that pretend themſelves ſo out of ſervile compliance, do perſecute them that are born after the ſpirit; that is, thoſe who are the children of the promiſe, the ſeed of Abraham, truly ſo called in a religious ſenſe, who ſucceeded him in his faith.

The Jews did very much boaſt of, and lay an extraordinary ſtreſs on their being the ſeed of Abraham; they placed moſt of their religion on this, and thought it a ſufficient plea for themſelves on all occaſions, and an effectual ſecurity from thoſe judgments that were ſometimes threatned againſt them; and therefore we find the holy men in Scripture often labouring to convince them what a ſandy foundation they did build upon, Matt. iii. 9. John viii. 39. Rom. iv. 12, 13, 14. It is indeed a great mercy to be born of pious and religious parents; thoſe parents that have a great familiarity and intereſt with God, have uſually a great treaſury and portion of bleſſings laid up with God for their poſterity, Exod. xx. 6. But people may lay too great a ſtreſs on this outward privilege; and if children do not labour to walk in the ſteps of religious and gracious parents, but depend wholly on their predeceſſors holineſs, they will be fearfully miſtaken at laſt. For as children are not anſwerable for the ſins of their parents, neither if they do not live themſelves ſoberly and righteouſly, can they expect to be ſaved on the ſcore of their parents righteouſneſs.

He that is a looſe, wicked, unregenerate, carnal perſon, or is born after the fleſh, is for perſecuting and undoing him that is born after the ſpirit, him that is ſerious, holy, ſtrict, and conſcientious; thus it has been, and thus it is. I will ſum up all into this propoſition.

Wicked, unregenerate men, always have been, and ſtill are for perſecuting holy, religious, ſpiritual men. Look through all the books both of Old and New Teſtament, nay, look through all hiſtory, and you will ſtill find, wherever you meet with perſecution, that it was carried on by the Devil's agents, by wicked lewd men, againſt holy and righteous men.

Conſider theſe few inſtances of perſecutors as they now occur, and then ſee whether all others be not of the ſame complexion. What an obdurate caitiff and villain was Cain, that ſlew his own brother, becauſe more holy, and conſequently better accepted with God than he was? What a vile character is Iſmael all along repreſented under to us? Were not they drunkards that were againſt David, and made ſongs of him? What were the falſe prophets that ſet themſelves againſt Micaiah? Were they not ſuch as did propheſy lies? Who were thoſe that were for the burning the three children? And for the caſting of Daniel into the lions den? Were they not all flattering and abominable idolaters? What was Judas that betrayed Chriſt, that informed the high-prieſt and ſcribes againſt his maſter the Son of God? Was he not a covetous mercenary ſon of perdition? What were thoſe that ſwore, and gave evidence againſt Chriſt? Were they not a couple of perjured miſcreants?

Now Chriſt and religion do not allow of perſecutions, of troubling and vexing, of ruining and undoing any man, for little indifferences, much leſs for truth and holineſs. They are for advancing and propagating holineſs, and peace, and love, and condeſcention, Iſ. xlii. 2, 3. Chriſt came not to deſtroy but to ſame mens lives; and ſharply rebukes his diſciples when they would have called for fire from Heaven to deſtroy the Samaritans: It is a ſure token men are enemies to Chriſt and religion, when they are of a perſecuting ſpirit. It hath always been the great character and glory of the Chriſtian Religion, that wherever it came, it did promote and further quietneſs, and peace, and love, and brotherly kindneſs; and did baniſh wrath, and fury, and malice, and every hateful and hurtful Diſpoſition and Inclination.

Therefore the Apoſtle is here writing to the Galatians againſt the ſpirit of perſecution, whoſe context I ſhall endeavour to explain by 1ſt, ſhewing what perſecution is. 2. Naming more particularly the characters of them that are perſecutors. 3. Shewing whence it is that wicked men are ſo violently ſet againſt the godly.

Firſt, Perſecution is an endeavouring to trouble, moleſt, diſturb, kill or any way hurt and injure another perſon on ſome religious account. Every proſecution of a perſon, is not properly perſecution, but only when it is grounded on ſome religious affair. A man may be guilty of ſin in proſecuting another upon civil account, but this ſin comes under another denomination, as oppreſſion, injuſtice, unpeaceable brangling, &c. Now perſecution is much what the ſame in religion, that oppreſſion is in civils. When men will not ſuffer others to enjoy that liberty, and thoſe rights in religion, which either nature or revelation do allow them; but will be ſevere againſt them, it in every accidental matter they will not be juſt of their mind: When men do hale others to tribunals; and procure them either to be puniſhed in their bodies, or in their eſtates; or to be deprived of their lives, or civil liberties, becauſe they either perform ſome duty God has expreſly commanded, in a way they do not approve; or becauſe they will not conſent to, embrace, and comply with thoſe determinations they have juſt reaſon to believe are ſinful. Whilſt men are not openly wicked, but though not free from common infirmities, which do unavoidably accompany human nature in this frail ſtate, yet free from groſs and ſcandalous ſins; whilſt they deny not any doctrine of Chriſtianity, nor divulge any tenet to the prejudice of Chriſtianity, nor do any way endeavour to diſturb the peace of the government under which they live; they have a right to a peaceable and quiet reſidence, and ought to be free from any moleſtation, though they cannot in every accidental thing attain to the ſame latitude with others. Whoever goes about to diſturb and injure, contract and impoſe on ſuch as theſe, fines, or other puniſhments, becauſe they cannot receive and comply with thoſe ſupernumerary conceits ſome do too much pleaſe themſelves with, and preſs with too much warmth on others, are too liable to this heavy charge of perſecution. And it we only conſider what it is they are ſo concerned for, we may ſee too much reaſon to conclude, they have no great portion of commendable properties. Whence

We obſerve, 2dly, That perſecutors are commonly worſt, and moſt brutiſh, and degenerate part of mankind. Conſult others, read hiſtories, or conſider what you may learn from your own obſervation; you will find them to come generally under ſome very ſcandalous, and offenſive characters. They are uſually taken to be the very peſt of ſociety. It is almoſt as dangerous to live amongſt them, as amongſt the wild and ſavage beaſts of the deſart. They are a ſort of tygers and lions, the moſt ravenous beaſts of prey, with human viſages. Were the Pythagorean notion of the tranſmigration of ſouls received, the whole world would then conclude them nothing but human carcaſes acted with wolviſh breath. More particularly they have ſome or all of theſe characters and qualities attending them.

1. They are men of a very ſuperſtitious, blind, and ignorant zeal. And there is no one thing that makes men more formidable and troubleſom, than undue and miſtaken zeal. It is like fire when it meets with gunpowder and other combuſtible matter; it devours all before it, and its flames become unquenchable. Superſtitious bigots place religion in things that are at beſt but bare human inventions, many times pure diabolical ſuggeſtions; and then Satan to ingulf them further, doth ſo excite and irritate them, they contend and ſtrive for theſe things, as if Heaven, ſoul, and eternity were all at ſtake. Hence it is they repreſent all that are not of their way and mind, as the greateſt criminals and malefactors. No ſooner do men place religion where God placeth none, but Satan obtains a great power and influence over them, and at laſt hurries them headlong into ſtrange and wild extravagances in the defence of, and for the propagation of thoſe points. Theſe are uſually the moſt fierce and barbarous of all other people. For it is uſually obſerved, that ſuperſtitious men are very fearful, and that the greateſt cowards are moſt revengeful and cruel, it they obtain an advantage. Paul's blind zeal made him a perſecutor: He did it ignorantly. And our Saviour tells us of ſome that would kill and murder men, and flatter themſelves with a perſuaſion, that they were therein doing God and religion good ſervice. See the note on ver. 18.

2. They are men of inſufferable pride and malice: For, Who can be ſo abſurd and fooliſh, as to endeavour to ruin others, becauſe they will not believe or practice what they themſelves do acknowlede they are not ſo certain concerning, but that it is poſſible they may be in an error and miſtake? Thoſe who are perſecutors do expect all ſhould yield to them, and take them for oracles; and if they be not thus received, they think the affront is too great to be endured, and therefore muſt be revenged. Malice and revenge hath generally a very great influence on all perſecutions. Your perſecutors are uſually people of a haughty, curſed, and poiſonous nature, they love to be doing evil: Their delight is to hurt and offend them, with whom God is pleaſed. They are cankered and ill natured, and never pleaſed but when they have an opportunity to intrap, and make the innocent fall: They cannot bear contradiction. Zedekiah was ſo impatient of contradiction, he no ſooner hears Micaiah bring a different meſſage from his, and diſcover how a lying ſpirit was in the mouths of the other Prophets, but he falls upon Micaiah, and buffets him, 1 Kings xxii. 24.

3. Perſecutors generally have a view to increaſe their worldly fortunes. The hopes of getting wealth doth very powerfully irritate them to what they do. Was it not thirty pieces of ſilver that made Judas betray his Maſter? What is the reaſon ſinners do excite one another to wait for blood, and to lurk privily for the innocent without cauſe? Is it not becauſe they hope they ſhall find all precious ſubſtance, and ſhall fill their houſes with ſpoil?, Prov. i. 11—13.

4. They that are once become perſecutors of the flock of Chriſt, are noted to be extremely profligate and ſcandalous in their lives: Men that are very looſe, prophane, and every way debauched: Such as are common ſwearers, drunkards, whoremongers, and profeſſed enemies to every thing that is ſerious, holy, and good. Men that have proſtituted themſelves to every luſt and wickedneſs, that have no more of religion than an outward name, being Atheiſts in their hearts, and many times ſo in their profeſſion. Such as think there is no happineſs but what agrees with Epicurus's conceit, making their belly their god, and minding nothing but the things of this world. Therefore the Apoſtle has taken ſo much pains to repreſent the danger the Galatians would run by falling into it. But now,

Let us enquire, whence it is that wicked men are ſuch bitter and inveterate enemies againſt the Godly; conſtant experience is an undeniable proof of the truth of it; for no age hath paſſed, but the worſt men have been contriving and endeavouring to do the righteous ſome diſpleaſure. We need not conſult hiſtories, to confirm what the Apoſtle here treats of; for we may every where take notice of the deplorable truth and certainty of it amongſt our ſelves. But from amongſt the many inſtances which might be mentioned, as having ſome influence in, and concurring to this, I will only name theſe few.

1. There is a deſperate and deadly enmity againſt Godlineſs, and ſo againſt good men, rooted deeply in the nature of wicked men. Ever ſince we loſt the image of God, we are by nature the children of wrath, not only as we are ſubject and liable to the Wrath and Diſpleaſure of God, but as we are of a wrathful, furious, and unreconcileable temper. We are naturally enemies not only to God, but to one another alſo. And it is to be aſcribed principally, rather wholly, to the wiſe Conduct and Providence of God, that all men are not conſtantly up in arms, and always endeavouring the utter extirpation one of another. But this enmity is eſpecially ſet againſt all goodneſs. When man loſt holineſs, he became a moſt violent adverſary to it. As you obſerve, when a man hath taſted of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if he apoſtatize, he becomes the moſt virulent and implacable enemy to it. So it is with man naturally ſince the fall. The Devils, that were ſuch pure and holy Angels, are now the greateſt haters of holineſs.

Wicked men are of a curſt, envious, malicious temper, they are of a perſecuting nature, and have a great deal of ſavageneſs in their temper; they are againſt holineſs, as being contrary to their nature, and thus become ſo violent againſt good men. Look at any creature, you will find it hath an averſion to thoſe things which are of a contrary nature, and if there be any thing of wildneſs, and cruelty, and ſavageneſs intermixed, then it is extraordinary violent againſt thoſe which are of the contrary nature. But thoſe things which have not ſuch a ſavageneſs intermixed, they only teſtify their averſion by a peaceable withdrawing themſelves, not at all endeavouring the deſtruction or hurt of the other. This is very apparent in the wolf and the lamb: They delight not in the ſociety one of another, but the lamb, though of ſo contrary a nature to the wolf, doth not ſeek the life or hurt of the wolf; but the wolf is not ſatisfied but with the total deſtruction of the lamb. Nor is this only becauſe the wolf doth uſually prey and feed on ſuch creatures; for then, when the hunger were ſatisfied, that rapacious and fierce temper would ceaſe. That creature which is of a fierce and ravenous nature, will deſtroy and kill not only out of neceſſity, but alſo for ſport and recreation. Thus wicked men they are of a contrary nature to the Godly, and have much wildneſs and ravenouſneſs intermixed: They cannot ſleep unleſs they make ſome to fall; and therefore they are reſembled to, and ſet forth by thoſe creatures which are wholly ſet upon deſtroying the harmleſs and innocent. They lye lurking privily in their den, that they may catch the righteous.

If you aſk what the reaſon is that the righteous and holy do not perſecute the wicked, as well as the wicked do them, the nature of each being equally contrary to each other? I anſwer, the roughneſs and ſeverity of good mens natures is taken away by that ſanctifying and altering grace which is beſtowed on them, and for which they were ſo much hated by the other. The new nature conferred on them, hath the harmleſsneſs of the dove accompanying it. A ſanctified Nature, ſo far as under the power and influence of ſanctification, hath no hatred, nor envy, nor malice, nor any other quality that is hurtful. It dares not hate or hurt an enemy.

And the true reaſon why ungodly men do no more hurt to the righteous, is becauſe God reſtrains them; he puts his hook into their noſe, and his bridle into their lips, and checks them.

Contrariety cauſeth their averſion to the Godly, but it is that fierceneſs which is intermixed, which cauſeth the violence of the perſecution: As you ſee tygers, wolves, lions, and bears, do purſue, and kill, and devour ſheep, lambs, and other innocent and profitable creatures; and as hawks and kites do fly after and prey on turtle doves and pigeons; ſo do wicked, outragious, ungodly men perſecute and trouble the juſt and holy.

2. Their natural enmity is very much encreaſed and excited into act by very unjuſt prejudices, which they imbibe and entertain with delight. A wicked perſecuting perſon rejoiceth to hear of any thing which tends to the defamation and diſrepute of one that is truly religious: He labours to ſpread and divulge it abroad, and aggravates every miſtake, and almoſt unavoidable infirmity, repreſenting it as an hideous and unpardonable crime: Nay, he uſually attributes the faults of ſome particular perſons to the whole profeſſion. Thus the very name of a pious man is odious and inſupportable to him; and he talks as virulently againſt, and deſires as vehemently the utter deſtruction of every one, how harmleſs, good, and innocent ſoever, who comes under ſuch a denomination, as againſt the vileſt miſcreant and criminal in the world, though he never knew or heard of any hurt by the one, or any good by the other.

At the time the Apoſtle wrote this Epiſtle, it appears, that the Galatians had done, as ſome modern Chriſtians do, they had diſputed themſelves into ſo much wrath, ſuch an averſeneſs and enmity to one another, ſo it has been among us; that diſſenters and thoſe who pretend to the Church, would ſcarce endure the names of one another, unleſs ſome diſgraceful and reproachful term was annexed. Too many of them became ſuch fierce adverſaries one againſt another, that they not only abandoned themſelves from the eminent exerciſe of that charity and mutual forbearance common Chriſtianity doth very much enforce, but they have with too much appetite liſtned and enquired after, and inſtead of mourning for, rejoiced and almoſt triumphed in the faults which particular perſons on either ſide were charged with; and which is yet a greater fault, they too frequently applied the guilt beyond its due extent.

By this means Satan entreth into, and devours the flock of Chriſt, and thoſe, who are corrupt, carnal, and ſenſual on each ſide, labour to increaſe animoſities, and make diviſions wider and more unhealable.

3. They apprehend, that the ſtrict and holy lives of religious men do very much reproach their lewd and vicious courſes. At leaſt they find that their pure and holy doctrines do occaſion them anguiſh and unquietneſs, diſturbance and trouble in the perpetrating of their beloved wickedneſſes. Why could not Herodias ſuffer John Baptiſt to keep his head any longer? It was becauſe ſhe could not live quietly in her uncleanneſs with her husband's brother, whilſt he was ſtill preaching to Herod, that it was not lawful for him to have her; Matth. xiv. 3. Indeed there is not any thing doth more effectually diſcover the horrid loathſomeneſs of wicked mens luſts and practices, than the chaſte, holy, and ſtrict converſations of pious men. And therefore they are ſo much againſt them, even becauſe their doctrines and lives do ſo much reprove their wicked works of darkneſs.

4. Holy men are carrying on a different work from that which ungodly lewd men are deſigning and acting. They are ſervants to different maſters, and therefore it is not to be expected they ſhould accord well. The good man's work doth defeat and ruin ſinners, and therefore he is aginſt him, and doth perſecute him all he can; becauſe he belongs not to his company, but is labouring to deſtroy his maſter's kingdom, and overthrow what he eſteems his own greateſt intereſt. If ye were of the world, the world would love his own; but becauſe ye are not of the world, but I have choſen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you; John xv. 19.

5. This proceeds many times from a very ſtrong and powerful impulſe of Satan. As wicked men are his ſlaves and doing his work, ſo he doth irritate and excite in a ſpecial manner to this very inſtance of perſecuting the Godly. The Devil thinks he has moſt work done when the greateſt number of righteous men fall: And he concludes that if he could by his inſtruments abſolutely ſuppreſs the righteous, he ſhould reign and triumph in the world without any oppoſition. The Devil rules in the hearts of the children of diſobedience; Eph. ii. 2. And it is worth our obſervation, that immediately before Judas went to the High-prieſt, &c. to inform againſt and betray his maſter, it is ſaid the Devil entred into him; Luke xxii. 3. So that one main inſtance, whence it is that wicked people do perſecute the righteous, is becauſe the Devil is in them, The Devil doth as truly poſſeſs, act, and govern them that perſecute the righteous, as he did thoſe that were called demoniacks, when our Saviour was upon earth. And though he do not cauſe them now to tear and rent, and torture themſelves, as they did then, yet he has a more dreadful influence on their ſouls, and endangers them much more as to their ſpiritual and final eſtate.

CHAP. V.

1 He moveth them to ſtand in their liberty, 3 and not to obſerve circumciſion: 13 but rather love, which is the ſum of the law. 19 He reckoneth up the works of the fleſh, 22 and the fruits of the ſpirit, 25 and exhorteth to walk in the ſpirit.

STAND faſt therefore in the liberty wherewith Chriſt hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage.

2 Behold, I Paul ſay unto you, that if ye be circumciſed, Chriſt ſhall profit you nothing.

3 For I teſtify again to every man that is circumciſed, that he is a debtor to do the whole law.

4 Chriſt is become of no effect unto you, whoſoever of you are juſtified by the law; ye are fallen from grace.

5 For we through the Spirit wait for the hope of righteouſneſs by faith.

6 For in Jeſus Chriſt neither circumciſion availeth any thing, nor uncircumciſion, but faith which worketh by love.

7 Ye did run well, who did hinder you, that ye ſhould not obey the truth?

8 This perſwaſion cometh not of him that calleth you.

9 A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump.

10 I have confidence in you through the Lord, that you will be none otherwiſe minded: but he that troubleth you, ſhall bear his judgment, whoſoever he be.

11 And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumciſion, why do I yet ſuffer perſecution? then is the offence of the croſs ceaſed.

12 I would they were even cut off which trouble you.

13 For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only uſe not liberty for an occaſion to the fleſh, but by love ſerve one another.

14 For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thy ſelf.

15 But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not conſumed one of another.

16 This I ſay then, Walk in the Spirit, and ye ſhall not fulfil the luſt of the fleſh.

17 For the fleſh luſteth againſt the Spirit, and the Spirit againſt the fleſh: and theſe are contrary the one to the other; ſo that ye cannot do the things that ye would.

18 But if ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law.

19 Now the works of the fleſh are manifeſt, which are theſe, Adultery, fornication, uncleanneſs, laſciviouſneſs,

20 Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, ſtrife, ſeditions, hereſies.

21 Envyings, murders, drunkenneſs, revellings, and ſuch like: of the which I tell you before, as I have alſo told you in time paſt, that they which do ſuch things, ſhall not inherit the kingdom of God.

22 But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-ſuffering, gentleneſs, goodneſs, faith,

23 Meekneſs, temperance: againſt ſuch there is no law.

24 And they that are Chriſts, have crucified the fleſh, with the affections and luſts.

25 If we live in the Spirit, let us alſo walk in the Spirit.

26 Let us not be deſirous of vain glory, provoking one another, envying one another.

This chapter contains,

I. An exhortation (by way of inference from the foregoing diſcourſe) conſiſting of two branches.

(1.) Poſitive, to maintain their Chriſtian liberty.

(2.) Negative, not to ſubject themſelves to the obſervation of the law, as neceſſary to ſalvation, ver. 1. preſſed by divers arguments.

(1.) Becauſe this excludes from all benefit by Chriſt, confirmed by his own Apoſtolick authority, ver. 2.

(2.) Becauſe hereby they obliged themſelves to perfect obedience to the whole law, under pain of damnation, and ſo made their ſalvation impoſſible, ver. 3.

(3.) Becauſe hereby they rendred Chriſt uſeleſs, and renounced the Goſpel, ver. 4.

(4.) Becauſe all believing Jews hope for Heaven only by the righteouſneſs of faith, ver. 5.

(5.) Becauſe under the Goſpel nothing but faith avails to acceptance with God, ver. 6.

(6.) Becauſe no good reaſon can be given for their deſerting the doctrine of juſtification by faith; ver. 7.

(7.) Becauſe this perſwaſion of ſeeking juſtification by the law, comes not from God, but the Devil, ver. 8.

(8.) Becauſe a little falſe doctrine in one point, may ſoon lead them into other errors, ver. 9.

(9.) Becauſe he was confident they would, through God's grace, be reclaimed from this error.

(10.) Becauſe their ſeducers and ring-leaders therein, would be puniſhed by God for it, ver. 10.

(11.) Becauſe whatſoever ſome alledged, he did not urge the obſervation of circumciſion, as appears by his perſecution on that account, and by the offence they took at his doctrine, ver. 11.

(12.) Becauſe their ſeducers did deſerve excommunication, ver. 12. amplified by the reaſon, becauſe they urged ſuch things as were inconſiſtent with their Chriſtian liberty, to which they were called, ver. 13.——

II. Directions concerning the uſe of their Chriſtian liberty, where he (1.) cautions them not to uſe it ſo, as thereby to nouriſh any corruption. (2.) He adviſes them to uſe it in a way of love, ver.— 13. enforced by the nature of love, which is the fulfilling of the law, ver. 14. and by the miſchief that would follow upon the want thereof, viz. the ruin of their Church, ver. 15. Then

He proceeds to ſhew by what means they might prevent the abuſe thereof, i. e. by walking in the Spirit, ver. 16. which he proves by the contrary inclinations of theſe two principles, the fleſh and the ſpirit, ver. 17. and becauſe then they are not under the commanding power of the law, ver. 18. and, ſays he, the works of the fleſh are diſcovered by their open appearance in the life, ver. 19. —— which he enumerates particularly, ver. 19—21. and ſubjoins a recital of the various fruits of the Spirit, ver. 22, 23. Then

The Apoſtle adds argument to inforce the practice of the firſt rule, viz. That thereby we may approve ourſelves to be Chriſt's, ver. 24. and another alſo to enforce the walking in the Spirit, viz. That thereby we may approve ourſelves to be ſpiritually alive, ver. 25. And ſo concludes with

III. A dehortation from ambition, provocation, and envy, ver. 26.

Ver. 21. — They which do theſe things ſhall not inherit the kingdom of God.] Except they repent; for if we turn from theſe things to God, and repent of our evil deeds, though our ſins ſhould be as ſcarlet, we ſhall by the mercy of God, and the merits of Chriſt, be made as white as ſnow, i. e. Let our former ſins be never ſo grievous, they ſhall be forgiven, when truly repented of and forſaken.

Ver. 25. If we live in the Spirit, let us alſo walk in the Spirit.] Here note, that the Scripture-phraſe, to live in the Spirit, is generally explained a government of our lives and actions, according to the rules and temper of the Goſpel, which is the ſole rule and meaſure of our obedience, ſo that he that performs the things which the revealed Word of God requires of us may be aſſured, that he lives in the Spirit, for he that keepeth God's commandments dwelleth in him, 1 John. iii. 24. And if his converſation is ſpent in conſtant love, joy, peace, long-ſuffering, gentleneſs, goodneſs, faith, meekneſs and temperance, the wholſome virtues eminently required in a Chriſtian, he will prove by the fruit of it, that he lives in the ſpirit of Godlineſs; but on the contrary, he that has no other guide than, or that rules his actions by a ſecret impulſe or warmth he feels within him, muſt take care leaſt while he means no ſuch, but even the very contrary thing, he be in the end found a fighter againſt God, and by a violent conceit and ſpiritual pride, be at laſt precipitated into downright enthuſiaſm; and when men are thus unhappily miſtaken, they took on that as a ſupernatural effect, which in reality is no more than the extravagant motions of blood and ſpirits, whereby they are driven into a thouſand extravagancies unjuſtifiable both in reaſon and religion, and through a tenacious ſtiff-neckedneſs to their darling conceits, which makes them value none but themſelves, and to exclude all others from their charity, who oppoſe their obſtinacy, grow full of hatreds, variances, emulations, ſtrifes, envyings, murders, drunkenneſs, revellings, of whom the Apoſtle Jude witneſſeth; theſe be they who ſeparate themſelves being ſenſual, not having the Spirit. Therefore,

2. Obſerve that ſpirit in this place is not to be interpreted of the Supreme Divine Faculty that is in us, the ſoul of man, and of our various paſſions of joy or grief, neither is it taken for the ſpirit of bondage, i. e. the œconomy, or diſpenſation of the Moſaick law, when men were often moved with an inward zeal, and impowered to deſtroy immediately the enemies of God; neither, as ſome have fooliſhly conceited, does it ſignify thoſe ſupernatural and extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, by which the firſt preachers of Chriſtianity were endowed and enabled to overthrow the works of darkneſs, and to propagate the light of the Goſpel; but in a word, Spirit in my text ſtands as in many more places of Paul's Epiſtles, in oppoſition to the law ſet forth under the metaphorical title of the fleſh; and therefore, muſt be underſtood to ſignify properly the Goſpel it ſelf. So,

3. To walk in the Spirit, is the conſequent of living in the Spirit; for this, as I have ſaid above, is a ſtrict obedience to the revealed will of God, and a deteſtation of all ſpiritual pride, ſo to walk in the Spirit, does properly include a ſtrict performance of the religion we profeſs, by ordering our converſation according to the Goſpel of Chriſt.

CHAP. VI.

1 He moveth them to deal mildly with a brother that hath ſlipped, 2 and to bear one anothers burden. 6 To be liberal to their teachers, 9 and not weary of well-doing. 12 He ſheweth what they intend that preach circumciſion. 14 He glorieth in nothing, ſave in the croſs of Chriſt.

BRETHREN, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are ſpiritual, reſtore ſuch an one in the ſpirit of meekneſs; conſidering thy ſelf, leſt thou alſo be tempted.

2 Bear ye one anothers burdens, and ſo fulfil the law of Chriſt.

3 For if a man think himſelf to be ſomething, when he is nothing, he deceiveth himſelf.

4 But let every man prove his own work, and then ſhall he have rejoycing in himſelf alone, and not in another.

5 For every man ſhall bear his own burden.

6 Let him that is taught in the word, communicate unto him that teacheth, in all good things.

7 Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatſoever a man ſoweth, that ſhall he alſo reap.

8 For he that ſoweth to his fleſh, ſhall of the fleſh reap corruption: but he that ſoweth to the Spirit, ſhall of the Spirit reap life everlaſting.

9 And let us not be weary in well-doing: for in due ſeaſon we ſhall reap, if we faint not.

10 As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, eſpecially unto them who are of the houſhold of faith.

11 Ye ſee how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand.

12 As many as deſire to make a fair ſhew in the fleſh, they conſtrain you to be circumciſed; only leſt they ſhould ſuffer perſecution for the croſs of Chriſt.

13 For neither they themſelves who are circumciſed keep the law; but deſire to have you circumciſed, that they may glory in your fleſh.

14 But God forbid that I ſhould glory, ſave in the croſs of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world.

15 For in Chriſt Jeſus neither circumciſion availeth any thing, nor uncircumciſion, but a new creature.

16 And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Iſrael of God.

17 From henceforth let no man trouble me; for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jeſus.

18 Brethren, the grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with your ſpirit. Amen.

¶ Unto the Galatians, written from Rome.

In this chapter the Apoſtle, according to his wonted cuſtom to all the Churches which he had the care of.

I. Preſſes the exerciſe of mutual love, and that in two inſtances.

(1.) Towards thoſe who had been deceived and were fallen from the faith, by endeavouring to reclaim them in meekneſs, becauſe we alſo are frail, ver. 1. By bearing patiently with them, as Chriſt has commanded, ver. 2. and leaſt they ſhould be deceived and carried away alſo by ſelf-conceit, ver. 3. againſt which he preſcribes a remedy, viz. ſelf-ſearching; which he preſſes both by the benefit, rejoycing in himſelf, ver. 4. and becauſe every man's doom ſhall be according to his own works, ver. 5.

(2.) Of beneficence towards their miniſters; which is amplified by the extent thereof in all good things, ver. 6. (1.) In reſpect of the duty it ſelf, becauſe God is concerned therein, who cannot be mocked by their frivolous pretences and excuſes; and becauſe every one's reward ſhall be of the ſame ſort with his work, ver. 7, 8. (2.) In reſpect of perſeverance and continuance therein, with a motive from the reward, ver. 9. amplified by another exhortation, (by way of inference) to a general charity to all, yet limited by a ſpecial reſpect to ſome above others, ver. 10. And ſo,

II. Concludes the Epiſtle by

(1.) Inſinuating his great love to them by his large Epiſtle of his own hand-writing, ver. 11.

(2.) Shewing that the falſe prophets in their dealing with them, did act out of corrupt principles, ſuch as hypocriſy, worldly policy to eſcape perſecution, ver. 12. and vain-glory, ver. 13.

(3.) Propoſing his own Chriſtian Apoſtolick converſation by way of oppoſition to their corrupt converſation, ver. 14. ſhewing, that they are not the outward obſervances and privileges, but a new creature that avails to acceptance with God, ver. 15. By which they would reap peace, mercy, and a proof, that they were the true Iſrael of God, ver. 16.

(4.) And by diſcharging all from troubling him by their ſlanders, with the reaſon; becauſe the viſible tokens of his ſufferings did abundantly evidence the truth of his doctrine, and his conſtancy therein, ver. 17. And ſo,

(5.) Concludes all with his Apoſtolical benediction, ver. 18.

Ver. 9. And let us not be weary in well-doing ; for in due ſeaſon we ſhall reap, if we faint not.] Theſe excellent words of the Apoſtle Paul can never be too much conſidered, as they ſhew the great means by which Chriſtianity was firſt ſpread abroad, and muſt now be ſupported. This is ſo ſure, that when Julian the apoſtate deſigned, if poſſible, to retrieve the honour of the Heathen religion, he eaſily diſcerned that it was not enough for him to reſtore the prieſthood, to open the temples, to appoint the ſacrifices to be offered upon the altars ; but he found it neceſſary for them to imitate the Chriſtians in the ſtrictneſs of their lives, in the ſolemnity of their devotions, in the exactneſs of their diſcipline, and eſpecially in the erecting hoſpitals, and taking care of the poor. For he that would not believe the Chriſtian Religion to be from God, thought himſelf bound to give ſome probable account, how a religion ſo contrary to the intereſts and deſigns of this world, ſhould be able to prevail againſt all the arts and power of its many and potent enemies; and upon the deepeſt ſearch which could be made by himſelf, or the greateſt wits of the Heathens then about him, they concluded the flouriſhing and propagation of it to be chiefly owing to thoſe things which he ſo much commended to the Heathens imitation. And from hence they inferred, that if the ſame things could be brought into practice among the Gentiles, they ſhould be able to ſupplant Chriſtianity by its own methods, and reſtore Paganiſm by the ſame weapons by which it was overthrown. This was thought ſo ſubtle and artificial a device by him whoſe great deſign was to extirpate our religion in a ſoft and gentle manner, without the blood and cruelty of former times, that he writes an Epiſtle on purpoſe to Arſacius the chief prieſt of Galatia, requiring punctual obſervance of theſe commands ; and as to the chargeable and expenſive part, he offered large proviſions out of his own revenue to defray it.

But Paul had been beforehand with him in Galatia, having planted Churches with great ſucceſs there; and Chriſtianity, by his means, took ſo deep root in mens hearts, that neither the rage and fury of former perſecutions, nor the plauſible arts and inſinuations of Julian were able to root it out. It is true, that theſe Churches, ſoon after their planting, were in great danger of being over-run by the pernicious errors of ſome ſeducers of that time; (the apprehenſion whereof put Paul into that aſtoniſhment which he expreſſeth in the beginning of this Epiſtle, I marvel that you are ſo ſoon removed from him that called you into the grace of Chriſt unto another Goſpel, &c. Gal. i. 6.) yet by the early notice and care which he took to prevent the ſpreading of theſe corruptions among them, the Galatian Churches recovered the ſoundneſs of their faith, and have preſerved a name among the eaſtern Churches, though under great variety of conditions, to this day. Some take notice, that this is one of the ſharpeſt Epiſtles written by Paul. He appears, indeed, by the beginning of it, to have been much ſurprized and moved at the news of a great and ſudden alteration among them; which he was ſure was not for the better. And by this plain dealing with them, he knew, 'till they conſidered better, they would be offended with him; but withal he tells them this did beſt become a ſervant of Chriſt, who, like a good phyſician, hath more regard to the diſeaſe than to the palate of his patient; For if I yet pleaſed men, I ſhould not be the ſervant of Chriſt, chap. i. 10. But having vindicated his own honour, which the evil reports of the falſe apoſtles made neceſſary ; chap. i. 2. and argued with great ſtrength and conviction againſt the impoſers of the law ; chap. iii, iv. part of v. he betakes himſelf to the inforcing the practice of the general and neceſſary duties of Chriſtianity upon theſe Galatians. If they had ſuch a mind to keep the law, All the law, ſaith he, is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thy ſelf; Gal. v. 14. It was a vain and fooliſh thing for them to contend about keeping the law, who did overthrow the main deſign of it, by their heats and animoſities againſt each other ; which, inſtead of preſerving the honour of the law, was the certain way to deſtroy one another. But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not conſumed one of another; ver. 15. From hence he ſhews, that hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, ſtrife, ſeditions, hereſies, ver. 20. are as much the luſts of the fleſh, as adultery, fornication, murder, drunkenneſs, revellings and ſuch like; ver. 21. and as deſtructive to mens ſalvation; of the which, ſaith he, I tell you before, as I have alſo told you in time paſt, that they which do ſuch things ſhall not inherit the kingdom of God. And they that are true Chriſtians muſt crucify the fleſh with all theſe affections and luſts thereof; ver. 24. ſuch as vain-glory, love of contention, envying the reputation of others. Let us not be deſirous of vain-glory, provoking one another, envying one another; ver. 26. But the Apoſtle did not think the deſign of the law or the obligation of Chriſtianity was ſatisfied with abſtaining from doing injuries to others ; therefore he proceeds to tell them what exerciſes of tenderneſs, compaſſion and readineſs to do good to others were expected from them by the law of Chriſt.

(1.) If a man, through the frailty of human nature, or the ſudden ſurprize of a temptation, be overtaken in a fault, do not, ſaith he, trample upon him, nor inſult over him ; but endeavour with the ſpirit of meekneſs to recover him from his fall ; conſidering that we carry about us the ſame load of fleſh, and are expoſed to continual temptations our ſelves ; Gal. vi. 1.

(2.) If we ſee others groaning under the heavy burden of their own infirmities, or the preſſures and calamities of the world, do not add more weight to their afflictions; but put your own ſhoulders under to bear a part with them, to make their burthen more eaſy to them ; for herein lies a great deal of that duty which Chriſt hath laid on all his diſciples. Bear ye one anothers burthens, and ſo fulfil the law of Chriſt ; chap. vi. 2.

(3.) If it be impoſſible for men to attend the ſervice of your ſouls, and the affairs of this world together, never grudge nor repine at the exerciſe of your kindneſs and liberality towards your ſpiritual teachers, ver. 6. Let him that is taught in the word communicate to him that teacheth in all good things. Which inſtances being mentioned, the Apoſtle ſubjoins two things in this chapter.

1. A general propoſition, viz. That every man ſhall receive in another world according to the good that he doth in this; Be not deceived, God is not mocked; for whatſoever a man ſoweth, that he ſhall alſo reap. For he that ſoweth to his fleſh, ſhall of his fleſh reap corruption, but he that ſoweth to the ſpirit, ſhall of the ſpirit reap life everlaſting; Gal. vi. 7, 8. i. e. He that looks only after his preſent advantage in this world, and dares not venture to do any thing out of hopes of recompenſe for it in another life, he is ſaid to ſow to his fleſh; but he that is good and charitable and kind to others, without hopes of any other advantage than what God will give him for it, is ſaid, to ſow to the ſpirit; the fleſh and ſpirit being oppoſed as the two centres of the different worlds; the great thing to which all things tend in this world being ſomething carnal, or that relates to the fleſh; and the great principle of another world being wholly ſpiritual. And theſe two, fleſh and ſpirit are placed as two loadſtones drawing our hearts ſeveral ways, the one is much ſtronger, but at a greater diſtance; the other hath leſs force in itſelf, but is much nearer to us, by which means it draws more powerfully the hearts that are already touched with a ſtrong inclination to it. But the Apoſtle uſeth the ſimilitude of two fields, wherein the product of the ſeed anſwers to the nature of the ſoil; ſo he that ſows to the fleſh; i. e. that minds only his preſent intereſt in this world, his harveſt ſhall be proportionable to his ſeed, he may reap advantages to himſelf in this world ſuitable to his pains and induſtry; but the utmoſt this world can yield is but of a ſhort continuance, being of a temporary, tranſient, corruptible nature, he that ſoweth to the fleſh, ſhall of the fleſh reap corruption; but he that ſoweth to the ſpirit, i. e. hath ſo great a regard to the rewards of another life, that he is willing to let go a preſent enjoyment and bury it under ground, caſting it in as ſeed into the earth, in hopes of a future reſurrection, however he may be condemned as a weak and improvident man by the men of this world; yet as certain as there is a life everlaſting to come, ſo certainly ſhall all his good deeds yield an abundant encreaſe, and meet with a glorious recompenſe then, if there be no corrupt mixture in the ſowing which may ſpoil the virtue of the ſeed, for he that ſoweth to the ſpirit, ſhall of the ſpirit reap life everlaſting. And let not men deceive themſelves; if they look only at themſelves and the things of this world, let their pretences be never ſo ſpiritual, if they dare not do acts of charity ſo as to truſt God for a reward, they do but ſow to the fleſh; and though the world may be cheated, and men may ſometimes deceive themſelves, yet God cannot be mocked; he knows the hearts, and intentions, and ſecret deſigns of men, and according to them their reward ſhall be; for whatſoever a man ſoweth that ſhall he reap. This I take to be the natural and genuine meaning of the Apoſtle in thoſe words.

2. A particular exhortation, not to be diſcouraged in well-doing, which is the ſame with ſowing to the Spirit before, and with doing good in the following verſe, both which are to be underſtood of the works of charity; and therefore, we ought to take it in that ſenſe here. Theſe are eſpecially called good works in the New Teſtament; Dorcas is ſaid to be a woman full of good works and alms-deeds which ſhe did, Acts ix. 36. The widow that was to be taken into office in the Church, muſt be well reported of for good works; and theſe preſently follow, the bringing up children, the lodging ſtrangers, waſhing the ſaints feet and relieving the afflicted, 1 Tim. v. 10. In the Epiſtle to Titus, ch. iii. 8. Paul gives him a ſtrict charge, that he deliver it with great aſſurance, (διαβεβαιοῦσθαι) that they which believe in God might be careful to maintain good works; theſe things are good and profitable unto men, Tit. iii. 14. Where the ſame word is uſed in the Greek, that is, in the words of the text. And to the ſame purpoſe other words of a like ſignification are uſed, as εὐποιεῖν, To do good and to communicate forget not, Heb. xiii. 16. Ἀγαθοεργεῖν, Charge them that are rich in this world—that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to diſtribute, willing to communicate, 1 Tim. vi. 18. That ye may abound to every good work, ſaith Paul; which he after explains, by being enriched in every thing to all bountifulneſs, 2 Cor. ix. 8—11. So that although well-doing in the general may extend to every good action, yet by the particular ſenſe of that phraſe in the New Teſtament, and eſpecially from the coherence of theſe words with the foregoing and following verſes, it appears that the well-doing here ſpoken of, is to be underſtood of works of charity. Which the Apoſtle, as they were Chriſtians, did ſuppoſe them to practiſe, but being apprehenſive leſt the diſcouragements they met with in the world, ſhould make them grow cold and remiſs in this great duty, he therefore exhorts them not to faint or grow weary of doing it; and to that end he lays down the moſt powerful motive and conſideration; for in due ſeaſon ye ſhall reap if ye fail not, i. e. Ye ſhall not miſs of a reward from God.

So that from the words we may take notice of theſe two things, which deſerve our conſideration.

I. The many diſcouragements men meet with in the world, which are apt to make them grow weary in well-doing.

The precepts of charity deliver'd by our Saviour and his Apoſtles are ſo plain, ſo full, ſo many, ſo eaſy to be underſtood; and thoſe precepts inforced by ſo juſt, and reaſonable, and pious conſiderations, with reſpect to God, to the world, to Fellow-Chriſtians, to the honour of our religion, and laſtly, to our ſelves, from the comfort that is in well doing, and the reward that follows it; that a man muſt have great impudence, to profeſs himſelf a Chriſtian, and yet to think himſelf not obliged to do acts of charity. But notwithſtanding all this, and much more which might be ſaid to this purpoſe, there are too many ſtill who are ready to find out ſome plauſible pretences to excuſe them from well-doing; ſome of which, which carry the greater appearance of ſtrength may be properly confuted from this doctrine and paſſage of the Apoſtle to the Galatians. I ſay then,

1. Some would excuſe themſelves, perhaps, by the different ſtate of our times from thoſe when theſe commands of charity were given.

2. Others by the ſad proſpect of our own affairs, which ſeem rather to call for a care of our ſelves than charity to others.

1. The firſt pretence is from the difference of times; There was then, ſay ſuch men, great reaſon for charity which will not hold now; thoſe were times of perſecution for religion, and many were driven to great ſtreights and neceſſities on that account who deſerved to be relieved, and the Chriſtians had been worſe than Infidels not to do good to men that were brought to want merely for Chriſt's and the Goſpel's ſake; the laws then could take no care of theſe poor and indigent perſons; for the laws made them ſo, being then oppoſite to Chriſtianity: But now our religion is ſettled by the laws; and we have many laws made for a competent proviſion for the poor, which will be ſufficient if they be put in execution, and if they be not, what charity is this to relieve an idle and diſorderly ſort of people who live upon alms, when it is greater charity to ſuch to make them work and to provide for their own ſubſiſtence?

This is the force of the objection which ſeems to have a great deal of ſtrength and weight in it; but before I give an anſwer to it, I muſt acknowledge the truth of ſome things contained therein.

(1.) That there is a great difference in the caſe of charity, where our religion is ſettled by law, and where it is perſecuted by it. For a larger meaſure and degree of charity is juſtly required in a time of perſecution, in as much as thoſe are the trueſt objects of charity who prefer the keeping faith and a good conſcience before the good things of this life. And we ought to look upon it as an unvaluable bleſſing, that we have the Chriſtian, yea, the Reformed Chriſtian Religion ſettled by our laws. And God grant it may ever ſo continue.

(2.) It cannot be denied that we have very good laws for the maintenance of the poor, and that they might be ſufficient for their common neceſſities, if they were duly executed. And it is a very juſt and reaſonable diſtinction which our laws make between the involuntary poor, who are made ſo by the hand of Heaven, either by ſickneſs, or lameneſs, or age, or children, or fire, &c. and the voluntary poor, who may help themſelves but will not, being idle, diſſolute and ſlothful perſons. Theſe deſerve rather the hand of juſtice to puniſh them than that of charity to relieve them: For Paul himſelf is ſo far from thinking this to be true charity, that he hardly thinks it ſo to keep ſuch from ſtarving if we take that proverbial ſaying in its ſtrict and literal ſenſe, If any would not work, neither ſhould he eat, 2 Theſſ. iii. 10.

(3.) I grant that it is greater charity to put perſons upon providing for themſelves than to relieve their preſent neceſſities. For that is the greateſt charity which doth a man the moſt good. And he that reduceth a diſſolute and wandring beggar to the taking pains for himſelf and family cures an ill habit of his mind; puts him into the way of virtue and ſobriety; gives him a laſting ſtock for himſelf and family (for diligence and induſtry is ſo) keeps him out of the danger of the worſt ſort of company; gains him more friends, who will be far more ready to help a perſon induſtrious in his poverty than the moſt clamorous and importunate beggar. And therefore our laws have wiſely determined, that work-houſes are the beſt hoſpitals for the poor, who are able to help themſelves. But after theſe conceſſions, I am far from thinking the command of charity to be ſwallowed up in our laws for the relief of the poor. For,

(1.) If our laws were the beſt in the world for this purpoſe, yet, if they be not duly executed, they leave as much room for charity as if there were none. What if a law were made that there ſhould be no poor at all among us; but that immediate care ſhould be taken, upon any man's falling into decay, that his ſtock ſhould be ſupplied out of the ſuperfluities of the rich? If this law were not executed, men would be oltogether as miſerable in their poverty, and as great objects of charity as if there were no ſuch law in being. For the making of a law for their ſupply without putting it in execution, is but like the perſon in James, who ſaid to thoſe who were naked and deſtitute of daily food, be ye warmed and filled; but notwithſtanding gave them nothing needful for the body; what doth this profit? James ii. 16. What advantage or ſatisfaction is it to a man to ſtarve with the law on his ſide? Or can men be better fed or clothed with the words of a law than of any particular perſon? If not, then if care be not taken for the relief and maintenance of the poor according to the laws, there is as great need of charity as if there were none at all.

(2.) If we ſuppoſe the laws for relief of the poor to be duly executed, yet there are many particular caſes of charity which often happen which the laws cannot be ſuppoſe to provide for. The law takes care only of general, and notorious, and common caſes; but there are continual inſtances of ſingular and extraordinary caſes where relief is as much wanted, but rarely challenged. How often is ſome mens reputation a ſnare to themſelves and families; who had rather ſink ſilently into the gulf of miſery, than have their wants made known to their inſulting neighbours, among whom they have lived in as good faſhion as themſelves? How many have been tempted rather to put an end to a miſerable life than to be deſpiſed and contemned for their poverty in their old age! How many are unwilling to make known their condition for fear of a repulſe and being thought liars, or impudent and common beggars! How hardly will ſome pinch themſelves and families, before they will make known their neceſſities! and ſome have been known to have brought themſelves ſo low, that when their ſad condition hath been diſcovered, they have been paſt all poſſibility of recovery.

(3.) The obligations of charity reach much farther than the force of our laws doth. For how ſmall a matter doth anſwer the letter of the law, when perſons enjoy very great and plentiful eſtates? And is that all which their thankfulneſs to God, their love to their brethren, and the regard to our Saviour's commands will draw from them? Is this being merciful as our heavenly Father is merciful? Luke vi. 36. Is this giving our alms in ſecret, that thy Father which ſeeth in ſecret may reward thee openly? Matt. vi. 4. Is this making to our ſelves friends of the mammon of unrighteouſneſs? Luke xvi. 9. xxii. 21. Is this being rich towards God; being rich in good works, being ready to diſtribute, willing to communicate? 2 Tim. vi. 18. Is this doing good to all men as we have opportunity? Gal. vi. 10. Is this feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, viſiting the ſick and impriſon'd? Matt. xxv. 35, 36. Can we imagine that will be a good anſwer at the great day, that we have paid our rates to the poor? If the Chriſtian Charity had extended no farther, Julian needed not have been ſo ſolicitous to have the Heathens equal them?

The true charity of Chriſtians is a free and voluntary thing, not what men are forced to do by the laws; it is a largeneſs of mind, that diſpoſeth men to do good to others, and embraceth every opportunity for that purpoſe; it is the flowing of a fountain which runs freely, eaſily and conſtantly; and not like the pouring water out of a narrow-mouthed veſſel, where but little comes, and with a great deal of noiſe. Charity ſpreads itſelf like the beams of the ſun, and warms and enlivens the colder parts of the earth; it pierceth into the bowels of it, and makes itſelf a paſſage to thoſe ſecret and hidden objects which are out of the view of the world.

True Chriſtian Charity hath arms ſo large to comprehend the whole world within them; but it is the life and ſpirit of that body whereof Chriſt is the head; it paſſeth from one member to another, emptying it ſelf from the larger veſſels into the leſs, and ſo by a conſtant motion and courſe through the body it keeps heat and union in all the parts. To do good becauſe one cannot help it, is to obey the law of neceſſity, and not of charity. He that reſolves to go no farther in charity than the law requires him, declares he would not have gone ſo far unleſs the law had forced him; which is in effect to tell the world, he hath not ſo much as an inclination to charity.

The ſum is this, that we have no reaſon to be weary in well-doing, on the account of our laws for the common relief of the poor, becauſe thoſe laws cannot provide for all caſes of charity, and becauſe they do ſuppoſe the greateſt works of charity to depend upon the largeneſs and freeneſs of thoſe mens minds to whom God gives a heart to do great and worthy things with the eſtates he hath given to them.

2. But there is another plauſible pretence yet behind, viz. from the conſideration of our own times. “ Were the times calm and fixed, had we a fair proſpect of things before us, that were a great encouragement to charity; but we live in perplexed and doubtful times, and know not what may become of us all; mens minds are ſtrangely diſcompoſed, and full of fears, and therefore this is a very unſeaſonable time to perſwade them to charity, when they ought rather to lay up and ſecure ſomething againſt an evil day.

To which I anſwer,

1. What times were thoſe the primitive Chriſtians lived in, who ſo much abounded in charity? Paul tells us of himſelf and his brethren, they were hungry and thirſty, naked and buffetted, having no certain dwelling-place; labouring, working with their own hands, reviled, perſecuted, defamed, 1 Cor. iv. 11, 12, 13. and yet nothing relating to this world was ſo much their care and concernment as providing for the poor. For when he went up to Jeruſalem, and there conferred with James, Cephas and John, at his departure they had nothing to deſire of him and Barnabas, but to remember the poor, the ſame which I alſo was forward to do, as Paul relates it, Gal. ii. 9, 10. And you may ſee, 2 Cor. 8, 9. ch. how earneſt he was in it, by his dealing with the Corinthians, when he perſwades them to a liberal contribution to the poor Chriſtians in Judea, who then ſuffered much, either through famine, or perſecution, or both. Paul had undertaken for the Churches of Achaia (of which Corinth being a populous and trading city, was the chief) but the collection not being yet made among them, he ſends ſome on purpoſe to Corinth, to make all ready againſt his coming to them, and perſwades them to great liberality in their giving: For which end he makes uſe of the moſt powerful and prevailing arguments and great arts of inſinuation. (1.) He ſet before them the example of the Churches of Macedonia, 2 Cor. viii. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5. which is truly a very extraordinary inſtance of Chriſtian charity. They were under great trouble and deep poverty at that time themſelves, yet underſtanding by Paul this occaſion of more than ordinary charity, they not only ſtraitned themſelves, even beyond their abilities, but did it with that chearfulneſs and ſatisfaction of mind, that they entreated the Apoſtle to accept of what they had given, and to undertake the managing of ſo good a work. And Paul ſeems to ſpeak of it with a kind of tranſport, Moreover, brethren, we do you to wit of the grace of God beſtowed on the Churches of Macedonia; how that in a great trial of affliction, the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality; for to their power I bear record, yea and beyond their power they were willing of themſelves; praying us with much intreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowſhip of the miniſtring to the ſaints. Nothing can be added to the weight of theſe words, and the emphaſis wherewith they are penned. (2.) He lets them know what a ſhame and reproach it would be to ſo famous a Church for other Divine Gifts to come behind others in charity. Therefore as ye abound in every thing, in faith, in utterance, in knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us, (what artificial inſinuations are theſe!) ſee that ye abound in this grace alſo, 2 Cor. viii. 7. (3.) But leſt he ſhould ſeem to preſs too hard upon them, he draws off again; I ſpeak not by commandment, but by occaſion of the forwardneſs of others, and to prove the ſincerity of your love, ver. 8. (4.) Yet he hath no ſooner ſaid this, but he comes on again with the moſt prevailing argument taken from the example of our Bleſſed Saviour: For ye know the grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that though he was rich, yet for your ſakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich, ver. 9. Can any thing be more moving to Chriſtians than this? (5.) His deſign was not to lay a burthen upon them, but to excite mutual compaſſion in Chriſtians to one another, ver. 13, 14. (6.) This would be a demonſtration to the world of their kindneſs to him, and that he had not ſpoken great things of them without cauſe, 2 Cor. viii. 24. (7.) They might juſtly expect a retribution ſuitable to their bounty; But this, I ſay, he which ſoweth ſparingly ſhall reap ſparingly; but he which ſoweth bountifully ſhall reap alſo bountifully, ch. ix. 6. (8.) This would be the occaſion of many thankſgivings and prayers to God for them. For the adminiſtration of this ſervice, not only ſupplieth the want of the ſaints, but is abundant alſo by many thankſgivings unto God. (Whilſt by the experiment of this miniſtration they glorify God for your profeſſed ſubjection unto the Goſpel of Chriſt, and for your liberal diſtribution unto them, and unto all men) And by their prayer for you, which long after you for the exceeding grace of God in you. Thanks be unto God for his unſpeakable gift, ver. 12, 13, 14, 15. Wherein he ſuppoſes the thing as already done, as believing it impoſſible for them to reſiſt the force of ſo many arguments. And yet all this while Paul ſuppoſes their condition to be ſuch, as in a little time they might ſtand in need of relief from others; which he thought was ſo far from being an argument againſt preſent charity, that he uſeth it the other way; that now at this time your abundance may be a ſupply for their want, that their abundance may alſo be a ſupply for your want, ch. viii. 14. i. e. Do not conſider what times may come upon your ſelves ſo as to hinder doing good while it is in your power to do it; leave thoſe things to the wiſe Providence of God; if he think fit to reduce you to want, he that now excites your hearts to do good to them, will ſtir up others to make up the ſame meaſure to you. So that while the Chriſtians were either under great perſecutions, or in expectation of them, through the power of the magiſtrates, or the rage of the people; yet the Apoſtles preſſed them, and that with great ſucceſs, to a free, chearful, liberal contribution to relieve thoſe who labour under greater wants than others.

2. This very conſideration is uſed as an argument in Scripture to perſwade men to charity, viz. That we do not know what times may come upon us. Give thy portion to ſeven, and alſo to eight; for thou knoweſt not what evil ſhall be upon the earth, Eccleſ. xi. 2. This ſeems to the men of this world a ſtrange way of reaſoning, and it may be they ſuſpect from hence, that Solomon was not ſo wiſe a man as they took him to be. What! give away what one hath becauſe one knows not what times may come. No certainly, ſay they, we ought to get what we can, and to ſave what we have, for that reaſon. The difference of reaſoning in this caſe proceeds upon the different principles on both ſides. Solomon believed a Divine Providence, and they do not. And he thought that would be particularly concerned for the good of thoſe, whom no ſad proſpect of affairs could diſcourage from well-doing according to their ability and opportunity.

II. And ſo I come to the encouragement here given to patient continuance in well-doing; for, in due ſeaſon we ſhall reap if we faint not. Wherein are three things conſiderable.

1. The certainty of a future recompence for well-doing. God is not unrighteous, ſaith the Apoſtle, (Heb. vi. 10.) to forget your work and labour of love, which ye have ſhewed towards his name, in that ye have miniſtred to the ſaints and do miniſter. Though it be a work and labour, though it may ſeem uneaſy and troubleſome for a while, yet being a work and labour of love; it is but the work and labour of ſowing, which a man goes through the more cheerfully becauſe he expects a plentiful increaſe. He doth not reap preſently the very ſame which he ſowed, but a wonderful improvement of it, when the ſeed being caſt into a fruitful ſoil brings forth ſome thirty, ſome ſixty, ſome an hundred fold. And this harveſt doth not depend upon the uncertainty of the weather; here are no fears of blaſting and mildew, or locuſt to prevent the joyful expectation of it; no danger of the ſeed rotting in the ground, or being pickt up by the fowls of the air, but he that miniſtreth ſeed to the ſower, will multiply the ſeed ſown, and increaſe the fruits of their righteouſneſs, 2 Cor. ix. 10. His word is engaged that they which ſow ſhall reap a plentiful increaſe; and therefore, God will not be unrighteous in not performing his promiſe. This men may as certainly depend upon as that night and day ſhall follow each other; for Heaven and earth may paſs away, but the Word of God endureth for ever.

2. The time of this retribution, in due ſeaſon. Moſt men are unwilling to truſt God too long upon his bare Word; they would have ſomething in hand, and the remainder hereafter. And God by the courſe of his wiſe providence, doth very often order things ſo in this world that the moſt charitable men, although they may not abound with the greateſt riches, yet generally meet with the feweſt difficulties, and in their ſtreights find more unexpected aſſiſtance than other men. David made it the obſervation of his own time, that in all his days though he was then grown old, he never ſaw the righteous, i. e. the charitable man, forſaken, nor his ſeed begging bread, Pſal. xxxvii. 25. And they have far more reaſon than other men to hope, that if they do fall into trouble and ſickneſs, God will have a particular regard to them, xli. 1, 3. and beſides this, they have the natural or rather ſpiritual contentment that follows doing good; and they have more ſatisfaction and eaſe in it, than others have in hoarding up wealth for they know not whom. But none of all theſe are the reaping here mentioned, they are like Ruth's gleaning of handfulls in the field of Boaz, Ruth ii. 16. which ſhewed a more than ordinary kindneſs; notwithſtanding which he ſaid, The Lord recompence thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the Lord God of Iſrael, under whoſe wings thou art come to truſt ver. 12. So it is here, they may have better gleanings and fuller handfulls ſometimes in the common field of providence, but this is not the full recompence which the God of mercy will give to thoſe that truſt in his Word. That is only to be expected at the great day when the Lord the righteous Judge ſhall ſay, Come ye bleſſed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For I was an hungred and ye gave me meat; I was thirſty and ye gave me drink; I was a ſtranger and ye took me in; naked and ye clothed me; I was ſick and ye viſited me; I was in priſon and ye came unto me: For inaſmuch as ye have done it to one of the leaſt of theſe my brethren, ye have done it unto me, Matt. xxv. Who would deny any thing to a ſervant of that Lord who takes all kindneſſes to them as done to himſelf, and rewards them accordingly? What other apprehenſions will covetous and hard-hearted wretches then have of their ſordid penuriouſneſs in heaping up riches, without any tenderneſs or compaſſion to the neceſſities of their brethren and Chriſt's repreſentatives? How will they wiſh ten thouſand times, when it will be to no purpoſe to wiſh, that they had rather laid out their money in doing good, than laid it up for thoſe, who may go to hell the faſter for the great temptations they leave behind them. Neither let the prodigal fools think they ſhall eſcape better, for being ſo contrary to the griping and ſtingy humour of the covetous; for it is not the vain and careleſs ſquandring an eſtate away in riotous courſes will make a man's condition more tolerable at that day; but it is the provident, ſeaſonable, careful diſtribution of our charity for wiſe and good ends, which ſhall meet with ſo glorious a reward.

3. Eſpecially, in the laſt place, if we faint not, and do not repent of what good we have done, but continue ſo doing to the end of our lives. For this reaſon I preſume it is that many reſerve their greateſt acts of charity to their deaths; but it is dangerous putting off their repenting and doing good till they come to die, for fear their hearts, or thoſe whom they truſt deceive them. But if men begin to do well in their health and ſtrength, let them not faint when they come to die; but continue charitable as well as faithful unto death, and God will give them a crown of life.

Critical

Critical and Explanatory ANNOTATIONS,

ON THE

Epiſtle of PAUL the APOSTLE,

TO THE EPHESIANS.

The INTRODUCTION.

Epheſus was a celebrated city of Ionia, or the head city of the proconſular Aſia, by which is meant a country on the weſtern part of the leſſer Aſia. It was principally eſteemed by the Heathens for the famous temple of Diana, which drew an infinite reſort of ſtrangers thither, for it was accounted one of the ſeven wonders of the world; the length whereof was four hundred and twenty-five feet, and the breadth of it two hundred and twenty, ſupported by one hundred and twenty-ſeven pillars, made by ſo many kings; it was two hundred years in building, at the expence of all the provinces of Aſia.

Paul came firſt to Epheſus in the 54th year of Jeſus Chriſt, at which time he only abode there a few days, and went up to Jeruſalem, Acts xviii. 19, 22. But at his departure promiſed the Jews of Epheſus, who invited him to ſtay ſome time there, that he would, God willing, return at a proper ſeaſon, and comply with their requeſt; which he accordingly did a few months after, and continued there full three years, till he was obliged to leave the city upon a ſedition that was raiſed there by Demetrius the Silverſmith, Acts xix. 24. whoſe buſineſs conſiſted chiefly in making little ſhrines, temples, or, repreſentations of Diana of Epheſus; in which interval, the Apoſtle wrote his firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians.

The Epheſians were very much addicted to curious arts, to magic, ſorcery, and judicial aſtrology, inſomuch that the Epheſian characters or letters, Epheſia Grammatæ, grew to be a proverbial expreſſion for magic characters.

Certain Jews who took upon them to exorciſe perſons poſſeſſed with the Devil, for which they were to have a recompenſe in money, having one day performed this office upon a demoniack in the name of Jeſus Chriſt whom Paul preached, the poſſeſſed perſon leap upon them, uſed them ill, drove them away, and left them ſtark naked, ſaying to them, Jeſus I know, and Paul I know, but who are you? ſee Acts xix. 14, &c. Which accident affrighted the Jews and all the inhabitants of Epheſus in ſuch a manner, that ſeveral perſons who before had been addicted to curious arts burnt their books relating to ſuch ſubjects, publickly, the value whereof amounted to a very conſiderable ſum.

Aquila and Priſcilla, with whom Paul had lodged at Corinth, came from thence with him to Epheſus, and made ſome ſtay there; ſee Acts xviii. 2, 3---18. And not only John the Evangeliſt paſſed a great part of his life, and died there, but if we may credit the fathers of the council of Epheſus, the Virgin Mary died there, and was buried in that city, where they ſhewed her tomb, and dedicated their cathedral church to her memory; ſee Concil. l. 3. p. 574 and p. 1525. And, ſays the learned Calmet, we are aſſured, that Mary Magdalene came to this city, and died there in peace. Dict. Tit. Epheſus.

Timothy, Paul's diſciple, was made firſt biſhop of Epheſus by the Apoſtle with the impoſition of hands; ſee 1 Tim. iv. 14. and 2 Tim. i. 6. which nevertheleſs was no hindrance to the reſidence of John the Evangeliſt in that city, where he performed the function of an Apoſtle, and inſpected the whole province for many years. And,

If it be true that Timothy did not die till the year 97, in the reign of Nerva, and proconſulſhip of Peregrinus, John being ſtill in the Iſle of Pathmos, it can ſcarce be denied, but that the angel of Epheſus, whom John wrote to in Rev. ii. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5. was Timothy, whom he highly commends; but reproaches him in particular, for having left his firſt Love. See Rev. ii.

The Apoſtle, in his laſt journey which he made to Rome, took Epheſus again in his way; and while he was a priſoner at Rome, he wrote this letter in a moving and pathetick ſtrain, though it is alſo very elevated and ſublime. See Eph. iii. 31. Acts xxviii. 16. The chief deſign of the firſt part whereof was to preſerve them from the Judaizers, who held the neceſſity of obſerving the ceremonial law, and for that end, to put them in mind of God's love to them in their redemption, and of their glorious privilege of being Chriſtians; whereby, though they were moſt of them Gentiles by nature; ſee ch. ii. 11. and ſo ſtrangers to the covenant of the promiſe, which God made with Abraham, and his poſterity, the Jews; yet they were of God's houſhold, as well as the believing Jews themſelves, according to God's purpoſe from the foundation of the world, which he had made known by the Goſpel, an evidence or ſeal of which was their having received the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, and therefore there was no neceſſity for them to obſerve the Jewiſh law of Moſes, in order to their juſtification and ſalvation, as the falſe teachers pretended there was, for they were ſaved by the grace and mercy of God in Jeſus Chriſt, and not by the works of the law, ch. ii. 8, 9. and they were admitted to the ſame privileges with the reſt of God's Church. This doctrine of the calling and ſalvation of the Gentiles by Chriſt, he tells them, God had particularly revealed to him; and therefore encourages them in their faith in Chriſt; ſee the firſt three chapters. And,

In the fourth chapter he begins to preſs them to the end of the Epiſtle, to live up to their calling, even their Chriſtian Profeſſion, by loving one another, and doing their duty, every one in his proper ſtation; concluding, that if they would ſtand faſt in their Chriſtian courſe againſt all temptations, their armour muſt be truth, righteouſneſs, peaceableneſs, faith, hope, the Holy Word of God, and devout prayer.

CHAP. I.

1 After the ſalutation, 3 and thankſgiving for the Epheſians, 4 he treateth of our Election, 6 and Adoption by grace, 11 which is the true and proper fountain of man's ſalvation. 13 And becauſe the height of this myſtery cannot eaſily be attained unto, 16 he prayeth that they may come, 18 to the full knowledge, and 20 poſſeſſion thereof in Chriſt.

PAUL an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, by the will God, to the ſaints which are at Epheſus, and to the faithful in Chriſt Jeſus:

2 Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

3 Bleſſed be the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who hath bleſſed us with all ſpiritual bleſſings in heavenly places in Chriſt:

4 According as he hath choſen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we ſhould be holy, and without blame before him in love:

5 Having predeſtinated us unto the adoption of children by Jeſus Chriſt to himſelf, according to the good pleaſure of his will.

6 To the praiſe of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved:

7 In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveneſs of ſins, according to the riches of his grace;

8 Wherein he hath abounded towards us in all wiſdom and prudence,

9 Having made known unto us the myſtery of his will according to his good ſpleaſure, which he hath purpoſed in himſelf:

10 That in the diſpenſation of the fulneſs of times he might gather together in one all things in Chriſt, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him:

11 In whom alſo we have obtained an inheritance, being predeſtinated according to the purpoſe of him who worketh all things after the counſel of his own will:

12 That we ſhould be to the praiſe of his glory, who firſt truſted in Chriſt.

13 In whom ye alſo truſted after that ye heard the word of truth, the goſpel of your ſalvation: in whom alſo after that ye believed, ye were ſealed with that holy Spirit of promiſe,

14 Which is the earneſt of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchaſed poſſeſſion, unto the praiſe of his glory.

15 Wherefore I alſo, after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jeſus, and love unto all the ſaints,

16 Ceaſe not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers;

17 That the God of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Father of glory, may give unto you the Spirit of wiſdom and revelation, in the knowledge of him:

18 The eyes of your underſtanding being enlightned; that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the ſaints.

19 And what is the exceeding greatneſs of his power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power;

20 Which he wrought in Chriſt when he raiſed him from the dead, and ſet him at his own right hand in the heavenly places,

21 Far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but alſo in that which is to come:

22 And hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church,

23 Which is his body, the fulneſs of him that filleth all in all.

In this chapter, after the Apoſtle has introduced the Epiſtle with a prefatory inſcription, ver. 1. and ſalutation, ver. 2. as his manner is in all his Epiſtles. He,

I. Shews the grounds and cauſes of our ſalvation, viz. the free grace of God in Chriſt. And he propoſes it generally,

1. By way of thankſgiving to God, wherein he deſcribes firſt the object of his praiſe, God, by his two-fold relation to Chriſt, and then the ground thereof, all ſpiritual bleſſings, ver. 3.

2. By a particular recital, as prepared in God's eternal decree, ver. 4, 5, 6. and as purchaſed by Chriſt in his work of univerſal redemption, ver. 7. and again, as beſtowed upon us in an effectual calling, which he deſcribes by its effects wiſdom and prudence, ver. 8. the means, i. e. the Goſpel-revelation; the fountain, i. e. his good pleaſure, ver. 9. and the end intended by God in the uſe of theſe means, viz. The gathering together in one, all the ſcattered elect, ver. 10.

3. By application to the Jews, ver. 11, 12. and to the Gentiles, ver. 13, 14. Therefore,

II. He excites them to perſeverance and progreſs in the knowledge of his doctrine.

By his thankſgiving and prayer to God for them, ver. 15, 16, 17, 18. ——— Where you find a report of their faith and love, ver. 15. the effect, his thankſgiving and prayer itſelf, ver. 16. the matter of his prayer, an increaſe in wiſdom and ſaving knowledge, ver. 17, 18. and the ends why he prays for this wiſdom for them, that they might know,

(1.) Thoſe good things they were to partake of in Heaven, ver. — 18. And,

(2.) The working of God's almighty power in and towards believers, ver. 19. which power he further amplifies and deſcribes by its admirable effects towards Chriſt, in his reſurrection and exaltation, ver. 20. his ſurpaſſing glory above all creatures, ver. 21. his dominion over all; his headſhip over the Church, ver. 22. amplified by a deſcription of the Church; by her relation to Chriſt as his body, and by her high honour in being his fulneſs, ver. 23.

Ver. 1. — At Epheſus.] See the Introduction.

Ver. 3. — Heavenly places.] Or, things.

Ver. 4. He hath choſen us.] See 2 Tim. i. 9.

——— Before the foundation of the world.] See 1 Pet. i. 20.

——— That we ſhould be holy, &c.] See Luke i. 75. Col. i. 22.

Ver. 5. Having predeſtinated us.] See Rom. viii. 15, 29, 30.

Ver. 6. — In the beloved.] See Matt. iii. 17.

Ver. 7. In whom.] The beloved Son of God; ſee Acts xx. 28. Heb. ix. 12. and Col. i. 14.

Ver. 10. — In the diſpenſation.] Of his will by his Son.

——— The fulneſs of times.] See Heb. i. 2.

——— In Heaven.] The original has it in the Heavens, i. e. skies.

Ver. 11. Being predeſtinated.] See Rom. viii.

Ver. 12. We.] The Apoſtles and diſciples of Chriſt.

Ver. 17. — In the knowledge of him.] Or, for the acknowledgment of him, as the original ought to be rendred.

Ver. 22. And gave him to be the head over all things to the Church.] Theſe words in the original run thus, and gave him, viz. Chriſt Jeſus, the head over all things, unto the Church. So that the argument of this Scripture is the headſhip of our Saviour, againſt which there is a powerful contention by ſome that call themſelves Chriſtians here on earth, who ſtrive whether the ſpiritual Jeruſalem, and the temple of the living God, or Rome, the myſtical Babylon and the ſynagogue of Satan, ſhall be uppermoſt, i. e. Whether the true Church of Chriſt, or the apoſtate church of Rome, ſhall prevail, whether the Holy Bible, or in conjunction or rather ſubjection to human and unwritten tradition ſhall be the perfect rule of faith; whether the Spirit of God ſpeaking in the Scriptures, or the biſhop of Rome, the pope ſpeaking in his chair, ſhall be the infallible judge of controverſies in religion; whether the true worſhip of the only true and living God, who alone is holy ſhall be continued, and every where ſet up, or his glory be given to another, and his praiſe to graven images; whether there ſhall be but one mediator between God and man, the man Chriſt Jeſus, or antichriſtian ſuperſtition and idolatry, in ſetting up many mediators, ſhall uſurp his place. This, I ſay, being the controverſy between the true and pretended head of the Church, I ſhall endeavour to clear this point, at this Scripture, which ſo particularly declares Chriſt to be the head of the Church, by the following Diſſertation.

A Diſſertation on the headſhip of Chriſt.

In this Diſſertation I ſhall obſerve the following method.

I. I ſhall enquire from whence Chriſt derives his headſhip.

II. Over what he is head. And,

III. I ſhall ſhew the ſpecial reſpect and relation of his headſhip unto the Church, which the Apoſtle ſaith in the 23d verſe is his body, viz. his myſtical body; the fulneſs of him that filleth all in all.

I. The original of Chriſt's headſhip is God the Father: He that raiſed him from the dead, and crowned him with glory and honour, and ſet him at his own right hand in Heavenly places, far above all principalities and powers, and hath put all things under his feet: He it was that appointed and conſtituted him the head over all things, unto the Church.

If we conſider Chriſt as the only begotten Son of God, he hath a natural eſſential right to be head over all things, becauſe all things were made by him, and without him nothing was made, that was made, John i. 1, 2, 3. He derived his headſhip together with his Divine Nature, from the Father, and from his being together with him, the author of the whole creation, as Col. i. 15, 16, 17. The Apoſtle ſaith of our Saviour, that he is the image of the inviſible God, the firſt-born; that is the heir and Lord of every creature: For by him were all things made that are in Heaven, and that are in earth, viſible and inviſible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, principalities or powers: All things were made by him, and for him, and he is above all things, and by him all things conſiſt.

If we conſider Chriſt as Mediator, under which notion the Apoſtle doth here ſpeak of him; God the Father made him the head, by a voluntary diſpenſation, proceeding from his eternal purpoſe, to glorify his free and rich grace, in ſaving his elect in and by him. This the Apoſtle declares, when he ſaith, that God gave him to be the head to the Church. It is a gift both to Chriſt himſelf, as Mediator, that he ſhould be head over all things unto the Church; and alſo, to the Church, that his univerſal headſhip ſhould be directed to her benefit and advantage.

From hence I would obſerve by the way, that as all the glory of the Church, ſo all Chriſt's mediatorial glory is the gift of God the Father. Thus our Saviour himſelf doth acknowledge, John xvii. 24. where he prays on behalf of thoſe whom the Father hath given him, that they may be with him; where he is to behold the glory which the Father hath given him, particularly, that univerſal power which belongeth to the glory of his headſhip, he doth own it to be the gift of the Father: This our Saviour declared juſt before he entred upon the full adminiſtration of his kingdom, Matt. xxviii. 18. Jeſus came and ſpake unto his diſciples, ſaying, All power is given to me in Heaven and in earth. This is one reaſon why God the Father calls Chriſt his King, becauſe he hath his crown and ſceptre from him, as in Pſal. ii. 6. Yet have I ſet my King upon my holy hill of Zion. This in a lower ſenſe is applicable to David, who was a type of our Saviour; for, as Saul was the peoples king, ſo David was God's King; of whom he gave this teſtimony, that he was a man after his own heart, and ſhould do all his pleaſure. But in the higheſt and moſt excellent ſenſe, it doth appertain to Chriſt; he it is whom the Lord calls his King.

The fundamental reaſon why the Scripture doth derive our Saviour's headſhip from God the Father, is, becauſe he is the fountain of the Deity: Therefore, all Divine Communications are originally from him. It is ſaid in Cant. iii. 11. That the Church is the mother of our Saviour, becauſe the Virgin Mary (of whom he was born) is a daughter of the Church, and the Church is ſaid to crown him in the day of his eſpouſals; that is, when he entred into Heaven, then his mother crowned him. Not that he received his regal power and authority from the Church, but becauſe ſhe acknowledged his right to ſit at the right hand of his Majeſty on High, and prayed that the crown might be put upon his head; as Bathſheba did, that Solomon might have the crown of Iſrael.

Moreover, the Church did approve the fathers advancing Chriſt to the throne, by a willing and joyful ſubjection to his government.

A queſtion doth here offer itſelf, and requires an anſwer, What is meant by Chriſt's being the head? what is intended by his headſhip?

Anſwer 1. The headſhip of Chriſt denotes excellency. As the head is the moſt eminent part of the body; being not only in the higheſt place, but alſo the ſeat of knowledge and underſtanding, from whence the ſoul doth direct its commands to all its imperate powers; ſo is Chriſt ſuperior to all things in point of excellency.

Conſider him as God, he is infinitely above all creatures in Heaven and in earth; as Paul ſaith, Heb. i. 4. He was made much better than the Angels, as he hath by inheritance; that is, upon the account of his Divine Sonſhip, obtained a more excellent name than they: For unto which of the Angels ſaid he at any time thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee? Again, I will be to him a Father, and he ſhall be to me a Son. Again, in the 5th verſe, when he bringeth in the firſt-begotten into the world, he ſaith, let all the Angels of God worſhip him.

Chriſt as man, is the moſt excellent creature, his human nature, being hypoſtatically united unto the Divine Nature, in the perſon of the Son of God; as in 1 John i. 14. In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God, and the Word was made fleſh, and dwelt, or tabernacled amongſt us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father. They ſaw more than an human, or an angelical glory; even a Divine Glory in him, as they beheld the typical glory of God, firſt in the tabernacle, and after that in the temple; wherein the cloud of glory, which is called the Glory of the Lord, ſtood over the mercy-ſeat, between the cherubims, ſo in our Saviour, who is God manifeſt in the fleſh, the real and eſſential glory of God was ſeen by thoſe whoſe minds were enlightned by the Holy Ghoſt: They ſaw the Godhead dwelling in him, as in a living tabernacle, or temple. It is of him Paul ſpeaks, when he ſaith, 1 Tim. i. 16. That God was manifeſt in the fleſh. Before the Word of God was incarnate, he was inviſible, but after his manifeſtation in the fleſh, he became viſible; the Godhead being perſonally united in the incarnation, to the human nature: Then he that was always God, and could not ceaſe ſo to be, was ſeen, and heard, and felt, in the human nature, 1 John i. 3. And the works that were performed by that fleſh, are no leſs to be aſcribed to the Son of God, than the creation and government of the univerſe: And at the ſight of this man, it might have been ſaid, behold this is our God, Iſa. xxv. 9. Wherefore the man Chriſt Jeſus, by the grace of the perſonal union is lifted, in point of excellency, far above the Angels of Light; who, before this man was brought forth, were the top of the creation.

II. The headſhip of Chriſt doth include empire and dominion. He is the ruler and governor, Jer. ix. 6, 7. One of his titles which is written upon his veſture and upon his thigh is the King of Kings and the Lord of Lords, Rev. xvii. 14. and chap. xix. 20.

The government of our Saviour, in reference to thoſe things over which he is the head, is not only external and political, by laws and rules, with reſpect to Angels and men; who being endued with reaſon and underſtanding, are capable of this manner of government: But as to all, it is internal and efficacious; he ordereth and diſpoſeth every thing, by his Almighty Power and unerring wiſdom, as is moſt ſubſervient to the glorious deſigns of his mediatory kingdom; which is the glory of God in the ſalvation of his Church and people. When wicked and ungodly men do afflict his ſaints and ſervants, they are ſometimes the rod of his anger and the ſtaff of his diſpleaſure, correcting and chaſtizing them for their ſins; but the rod and ſtaff are always in his hand, and are directed by his love, Rev. iii. 19. Sometimes he permitteth this to be done, for the tryal and exerciſe of their graces, Rev. ii. 10. and what he always aims at herein, is the purification of his people. Their enemies are all under his power, they can proceed no further than he is pleaſed to ſuffer them; as the hand and feet, which are the chief inſtruments of action, in the natural body, either reſt or move, this or that way, according to the command given by the head; ſo, all things in Heaven and in earth, do act, or not act, according to the powerful direction of Jeſus Chriſt, whom God hath conſtituted the head over all things. The wrath of man ſhall praiſe him, and the remainder of wrath he will reſtrain. What degree of wrath he permits the enemies of his Church to expreſs, he will turn it to his own praiſe: And all that wrath, which if ſuffered to vent itſelf, would not redound to his praiſe, he will effectually ſuppreſs.

III. His headſhip doth imply ſubjection on the part of thoſe things over which he is the head. This the Apoſtle ſhews in this 22d verſe when he ſaith, that God hath put all things under his feet: It is a quotation from the viiith Pſalm; where David ſpeaking to God concerning our Saviour, ſaith, Thou haſt crowned him with glory and honour; thou makeſt him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou haſt put all things under his feet.

The Pſalmiſt cannot think, and ſpeak of this, without admiring at the grace of God, in exalting the human nature of Chriſt to this heighth of dignity and empire; for to him the Apoſtle, in Heb. ii. doth apply the words, which are to be underſtood of the elect in a lower ſenſe. What is man that thou art mindful of him, and the Son of man that thou viſiteſt him? For thou haſt made him a little, or a little while, lower than the Angels: He doth not mean in point of dignity, but ſtrength; which was done to him, as in the 9th verſe. For the ſuffering of death, him haſt thou crowned with glory and honour, thou haſt given him to have dominion over the works of thy hands, and haſt put all things under his feet. Some things are under the feet of Chriſt, ſo as to be trodden down and trampled on by him, as David, his type, walked up and down upon Goliah, the figure of Satan, the head of thoſe who perſiſt in their oppoſition to the kingdom of our Saviour: Theſe are under him as his footſtool, as in Pſal. cx. The Lord ſaid unto my Lord, ſit thou on my right hand, until I make thy foes thy footſtool. Theſe are all ſubject unto Chriſt, and although they yield not a voluntary obedience to his preceptive will; yet he makes uſe of them to accompliſh his glorious deſigns. The ſerpent and all his malignant ſeed are thus far in ſubjection to him: He turns their devices backward, and conquers them with their own weapons. When he was crucified, his enemies had their hour, and then was the power of darkneſs, Luke xxii. 53. and the prediction in Gen. iii. 15. was fulfilled, The ſerpent ſhall bruiſe his heel; but he got nothing by it, but a broken head: For Chriſt having ſpoiled principalities and powers, he made a ſhew of them openly, even by triumphing over them in the croſs, or, in himſelf. And when he hath accompliſhed his whole work upon mount Sion, he will bruiſe Satan and all his ſeed under the feet of his ſaints, and ſervants; who will have dominion over them, in the morning of the reſurrection. As for the aſſembly of the faithful, they are Chriſt's loyal and voluntary ſubjects, yielding a cheerful obedience to him, as their rightful king, according to the promiſe of the father, in Pſal. cx. 3. Thy people ſhall be willing in the day of thy power. The command in Pſal. xlv. 11. is directed to the Church ſtanding at his right hand, he is thy Lord, and worſhip thou him. Her dignity doth not exempt her from ſubjection to him: And Divine Honour and Worſhip will then more ſolemnly be done than ever yet he received from her: Not becauſe (as ſome vainly dream) our Saviour will perſonally and viſibly come from Heaven, and reign upon earth; but becauſe the Spirit in his graces will then be more plentifully and abundantly poured out.

Let me add, that as Chriſt is ſerved by that ſeed which is counted to him for a generation from amongſt men, Pſal. xxii. 30. So the holy Angels, the bright inhabitants of Heaven, who abode in the truth, do readily and joyfully obey him. They are his miniſters, ſent forth by him, to miniſter unto thoſe that ſhall be heirs of ſalvation, Heb. i. ult. They rejoyce at the enlargement of his kingdom, in the converſion of ſinners, and will join with the Church in ſongs of praiſe to God, for the downfal of Babylon; according to the command in the Revelation, Rejoyce over her thou Heaven, Rev. xviii. 20. as they had done before, upon the victory the kingdom of Chriſt obtained over Pagan Rome, as in ch. xii. 12. Rejoyce ye Heavens, and ye that dwell therein. And this brings us, 2dly, To conſider over whom Chriſt is the head. The Apoſtle declares, that God gave him to be head over all things. His empire and dominion is not limited to a part, but extendeth to the whole creation. He doth whatſoever pleaſeth him, in the army of Heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth.

Satan, with all the infernal powers, is ſubject to him, as the Apoſtle informs us, Phil. ii. 9. God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name, which is above every name; that at the name of Jeſus every knee ſhould bow, of things in Heaven, and things on earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue ſhould confeſs that Jeſus Chriſt is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. Our Saviour intendeth the ſame thing, when he ſaith, John v. 22. That all judgment is committed unto him: His meaning is, that not only the final judgment at the laſt day is put into his hand, but alſo, that he is inveſted with the government and adminiſtration of all affairs, both in Heaven and in earth: That as it follows, All men ſhould honour the Son, even as they honour the Father; giving to him the ſame Divine Worſhip that they direct unto the Father himſelf. There is nothing then, as Paul ſaith, 1 Cor. xv. 27. but what is put under the feet of Chriſt, he only excepted, that put all things under him.

Chriſt as the Son of God, is one with the Father, the ſame in ſubſtance, equal in power and glory, John x. 30. 1 John v. 7. Therefore it is ſaid in both theſe places, that they are one thing; this is the force of the Original Word, which denotes more than an agreement in purpoſe and teſtimony, even an unity and identity of nature. But Chriſt conſidered as Mediator, is inferior to his Heavenly Father, from whom he received his kingdom, and to whom he muſt again deliver it up. For when as in 1 Cor. xv. 28. All things ſhall be ſubdued to him, then ſhall the Son alſo himſelf be ſubject to him that put all things under him fully; that is, it ſhall then appear, that whatever Chriſt did as Mediator, was done by the authority of the Father: And that in the adminiſtration of his mediatory kingdom, he was all along ſubject to him, John vi. 38, 39, 40. He did nothing from firſt to laſt, but according to the commiſſion he received from his Father. So we proceed 3dly, To conſider the ſpecial relation and reſpect of Chriſt's headſhip over all things unto the Church. This the Apoſtle intends, when he ſaith, That he was given to be head over all things, unto the Church.

Many excellent truths may be gathered from this paſſage, but I ſhall only obſerve,

That the dominion and empire of Chriſt over all things in Heaven and earth, is deſigned and adminiſtred for the benefit and advantage of the Church, which is his myſtical body. Our Saviour ſaith, John xvii. 2. That the Father gave him power over all fleſh, that he ſhould give eternal life to as many as he had given him. It was for their ſakes, that he was inveſted with the office of a Mediator; and he hath an eye to their good, in the diſcharge of all the parts of it. As a Prophet, he doth teach them by his word and Spirit, the will of God, for which he is perfectly qualified, becauſe he is in the boſom of the Father, John i. 18. being the prime object of his love, and privy to all his ſecrets. As a prieſt, having ſhed his blood to redeem them from all iniquity, he entred into Heaven, the true ſanctuary, to make interceſſion for them, after the power of an endleſs life that he might ſave them, εἰς τὸ παντελὲς unto the uttermoſt, or unto perfection, Heb. vii. 25. And not only ſo, but alſo as the king upon a throne, he rules and defends his people, reſtraining and conquering all his and their enemies. The Prophet Daniel, ch. ii. 44. ſpeaks of a kingdom which the God of Heaven would ſet up, which ſhould never be deſtroyed, but break in pieces and conſume all thoſe kingdoms which were repreſented by Nebuchadnezzar's image, and ſhould ſtand for ever. This kingdom is the ſtone cut out of the mountains without hands, that ſmote the image upon his feet of iron and clay, and then became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth, Dan. ii. 34, 35. This is the kingdom which John Baptiſt, and our Saviour after him ſpake of in their ſermons, ſaying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of Heaven is at hand. By which is intended the Goſpel Church, conſiſting of believing Jews and Gentiles, gathered out of all nations, tongues and languages.

This our Saviour doth in a peculiar ſenſe ſtile his kingdom, of which, though it is in this world, yet he ſaith, that it is not of the world, becauſe it is of a ſpiritual and heavenly nature, having nothing of earthly and carnal pomp, erected and propagated without human viſible force; but by the Spirit of God ſecretly and effectually working in the hearts of men: Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit ſaith the Lord, Zach. iv. 6. The ſame thing is meant, by cutting the ſtone out of the mountains without hands.

Our Saviour ſpeaking of this kingdom, ſaith, that it cometh not with obſervation. The glory of it is internal, and the life of its members is hid with Chriſt in God, Col. iii. 3. The beauty and excellency of which none can diſcern, but thoſe whoſe minds are purged from carnality and made truly ſpiritual. The victories obtained in this kingdom, are over ſin and Satan, and the world, in the hearts of men. It is here that Chriſt rides in triumph, and ſets up his trophies, having conquered and made a ſpoil of his enemies, and offering the ſpiritual ſacrifice of praiſe to God: For breaking the adverſaries of our civil peace and proſperity, is more ſuitable to the nature of this kingdom, than thoſe carnal pompous ſhews, which are uſual upon days of thankſgiving: But theſe are not inconſiſtent with it, if ſo managed, as not to interfere with the ſpiritual and religious part of ſuch a day.

If the character of the ſubjects of this Heavenly Kingdom is enquired after, we have it in Rev. xiv. 12. Where they are deſcribed by their patient ſuffering for Chriſt's name ſake, Here is the patience of the ſaints! And alſo by the ſincere obedience to the Divine Laws, thoſe eſpecially which relate to religion, in oppoſition to antichriſtian ſuperſtition and idolatry: Here are they that keep the commandments of God. Finally, by their faithful adhering to Chriſt and his Holy Doctrine; here are they that keep the faith of Jeſus.

We have another deſcription of them, ch. xvii. 14. where it is ſaid of the companions of the Lamb, that they were called, namely, effectually, from amongſt thoſe who received the mark of the beaſt, either in their foreheads, or their right hand: Having their eyes opened; and being turned from darkneſs to light, and from the power of Satan to God. They were choſen, viz. before the foundation of the world, having their names written in the Lamb's Book of Life: And not only ſo, but they were ſingled out, to give teſtimony againſt the corruptions in doctrine and worſhip of Spiritual Babylon. And they were faithful to him that called and choſe them, being conſtant in following the Lamb whereſoever he went, notwithſtanding all the tribulations with which their faith and patience were exerciſed and tried. In ch. xiv. they are called Virgins, becauſe of the ſincerity of their love to God and the Lord Jeſus, which they expreſſed, in keeping themſelves pure from the falſe doctrines, and from the ſuperſtitious idolatrous worſhip, and the corrupt manners of the times wherein they lived. Of ſuch as theſe, our Saviour ſaith in his Epiſtle to the Church in Sardis, That they ſhall walk with him in white: That is, they ſhall reign and triumph with him; for white is both an imperial and a triumphal colour.

This now is the excellent character of the ſubject of Chriſt's kingdom, for whoſe ſakes he was given to be the head over all things, and doth exerciſe all that power in Heaven and in earth, which as Mediator he hath received from the Father. It is ſaid in Acts v. 31. That God hath exalted him to be a Prince and a Saviour, therefore to be a Prince, that he might be a Saviour. He is called by Zacharias the Father of John Baptiſt, a horn of ſalvation, Luke i. 69. As much as to ſay a king inveſted with authority and endued with power to ſave ſinners. Next unto the glory of God, this is the great and bleſſed end that Chriſt aims, in the adminiſtration of that univerſal empire and dominion he hath received from the Father. Whatever therefore men may intend in raiſing armies, and fighting battles in the field, and direct their victories and triumphs unto, our Saviour's deſign is the eternal ſalvation of his Church and people; that bleſſed aſſembly of whom the Holy Ghoſt hath given that excellent character before ſpoken of. Therefore,

The Church doth lay claim to him, as hers, declaring that it was for her ſake that he was born into the world; as in Iſa. ix. 6. Unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given, and the government ſhall be upon his ſhoulder: The accompliſhment of this Propheſy begun in the birth of Chriſt, for then the angel declared to the ſhepherds, that unto them was born, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Chriſt the Lord, Luke ii. 11. I come now to make application of what hath been ſaid.

1. We may infer from hence the Divinity of Chriſt, that he is, as Paul ſaith, Rom. ix. 5. Not only fleſh, but alſo God over all, bleſſed for ever. If he were a mere man, he would be incapable of the univerſal empire and dominion, he would ſink under the weight and burden of it. Therefore the Prophet Iſaiah having declared, that the government ſhould be on the ſhoulder of that child who was to be born to them, Iſa. ix. 6. To ſatisfy the Church concerning his capacity for it, he adds his character: His name ſhall be called wonderful Counſellor, the mighty God, the everlaſting Father, the Prince of Peace. None in Heaven or earth is worthy of this dignity, but the man that is God's fellow. It is the office of the angels in this kingdom, to miniſter for thoſe that ſhall be heirs of ſalvation, Heb xi. 4. But to ſit on the right hand of the majeſty on high, is the peculiar glory of Chriſt, of which the original reaſon is, becauſe our Saviour is the begotten Son of God, having the ſame Divine Nature, with all its eſſential Glory, that the Father himſelf hath. As to the bleſſed angels, the Apoſtle asks, Heb. i. 13. To which of the angels ſaid he at any time, ſit on my right hand? But as in the 8th verſe, To the Son he ſaith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever. Whilſt our Saviour, as Mediator, is in the place next in honour to the Father, ſitting at the right hand of the throne in the Heavens, the angels are in the poſture of ſervants, ſtanding before his face: And of them our Saviour ſaith, Matt. xviii. 10. That they always behold the face of his Father which is in Heaven. The expreſſion denotes not only their bleſſedneſs in the beatifical viſion of the Divine Glory; but alſo their diligent waiting for all intimations of the preceptive will of God.

2. We may infer from hence, that Divine Religious Honour, is to be given to our Saviour. This all the orders of angels are required to do unto him, Heb. i. 6. When he bringeth in the firſt begotten into the world, he ſaith, Let all the angels of God worſhip him: And in Pſal. xlv. 11. The ſame command is directed to the Church, ſtanding at his right hand, He is thy Lord, and worſhip thou him. This paſſage, I think, as was ſaid before, with ſubmiſſion to better judgments, and ſome other parts of this Pſalm, have a ſpecial reſpect to the latter times, wherein the Church will reign with Chriſt upon earth; accordingly we find in Rev. v. 9. to the end, where thoſe bleſſed days are ſpoken of; that in conjunction with the holy angels, the Church doth with the greateſt ſolemnity perform this duty, joining the Father and the Lamb in the ſame acts of adoration. The prime and fundamental reaſon of Divine Worſhip is the Divine Nature: Becauſe Chriſt is the moſt High God, therefore the glory due to that name is to be given to him; his being the head over all things is a motive hereunto, becauſe by this, he is manifeſted to be the true and Living God, as our Saviour ſhews, John v. 22. The Father, ſaith he, judgeth no man, that is, without the Son, and in a viſible form; but hath committed all judgment unto the Son, that all men ſhould honour the Son, even as they honour the Father, giving the ſame Divine Worſhip to both. He that honoureth not the Son in this manner, honoureth not the Father that ſent him. It is a diſhonour to the Father, to deny his begotten Son to be the moſt High God, and not to give to him the ſame Divine Worſhip which is directed to the Father himſelf. If our Saviour is but a mere man, and God only by office, and not by nature, it is idolatry to give Divine Worſhip to him; and he would not receive it, becauſe he was manifeſted to deſtroy this, as well as the other works of the Devil.

3. We learn from what hath been ſaid, whence it is that the Goſpel Church, or kingdom of Chriſt, ever ſince its firſt erection hath been hitherto preſerved, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition which from time to time hath been made againſt it. Herein the Prophecy in Dan. ii. 44. is in part fulfilled, In the days of thoſe kings, particularly in the days of the fourth king, which is the Roman Monarchy repreſented by the iron legs of the image whilſt Pagan; and by the feet, part of iron and part of clay, after its apoſtacy from pure Chriſtianity, which it had embraced, into an imitation of the old Pagan ſuperſtitions and idolatries; "In the days of this king, the God of Heaven ſhall ſet up a kingdom which ſhall never be deſtroyed, and the kingdom ſhall not be left to another people; but it ſhall break in pieces, and conſume all theſe kingdoms, and it ſhall ſtand for ever."

The firſt that ſet themſelves to oppoſe the kingdom of Chriſt were the unbelieving Jews: They deſpiſed him in their hearts, ſaying, How can this man ſave us? He ſhall not reign over us. The contention ended in the deſolation of Jeruſalem, and the total diſperſion of the Jewiſh nation, wherein the hand of our Saviour was ſo viſible, that ſpeaking of it in Matt. lxvi. 64. He ſaid to the high-prieſt, and the reſt of the council, "That they ſhould ſee the Son of Man, ſitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of Heaven." And it is obſervable, that this people, who expected that their Meſſiah would ſet up a worldly temporal kingdom, and give to them an univerſal empire, are the only people that have no civil magiſtrates of their own; wherein the propheſy in Hoſea iii. 4. is fulfilled. "The children of Iſrael ſhall abide many days without a king, and without a prince."

The Roman Pagan empire did next endeavour to deſtroy the kingdom of Chriſt; but the conflict iſſued in the Church's victory, as in Rev. xii. 7, 8. "There was war in Heaven, Michael and his Angels fought againſt the dragon; and the dragon fought and his Angels, and prevailed not, neither was their place found any more in Heaven." This was fulfilled upon the acceſſion of Conſtantine the Great unto the imperial crown. After this, when the empire relapſed again into idolatry, a more fierce and fiery perſecution was raiſed againſt the ſervants of God, and the martyrs of Jeſus, by thoſe who departed from the faith: But theſe alſo will be broken to pieces, becauſe Chriſt is head over all things unto the Church, and doth exerciſe his power and dominion on her behalf, as in Rev. xvii. 14. Theſe that is, the ten kings ſpoken of in verſe 12, 13. who ſhould agree in embracing the ſuperſtitions and idolatries introduced by the apoſtate Church of Rome, and ſhould employ their power and ſtrength to ſupport and propagate them, in oppoſition to the purity of the true Chriſtian Faith and Worſhip: Theſe ſhall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb ſhall overcome them: Of which, this is given as the reaſon, becauſe he is the Lord of Lords, and the King of Kings. By which character is declared our Saviour's right to rule the kingdoms of the earth; and his being endued with ſufficient power to aſſert his right, in taking full poſſeſſion of them, and to break all thoſe earthly powers who ſet themſelves in oppoſition to him, according to the Propheſy in Dan. ii. 34, 35. Nebuchadnezzar ſaw, until a ſtone was cut out of the mountains without hands; this is Chriſt, and his Church or kingdom: This ſtone ſmote the image upon his feet which were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces: Then were the iron and the clay, the braſs, the ſilver and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the ſummers threſhing-floor, and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them, and the ſtone that ſmote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth. This Scripture doth not preſage any evil to thoſe kings and princes who have renounced popery, and embraced the true Chriſtian Faith and worſhip; for they belong to the kingdom of our Saviour. But thoſe that ſet themſelves to keep up antichriſtian errors, ſuperſtitions and idolatries, he will pull down, and exalt other powers, that will be nurſing-fathers, and nurſing-mothers to his Church and people. This he will do, becauſe he is King of Kings, and the Lord of Lords: Of which we have inſtances in this nation within the reach of our own memories.

The kingdom of our Saviour was at firſt but as a ſtone, and ſo continued ſometimes greater, and ſometimes leſs; eſpecially under the tyranny of the kings repreſented by the toes and horns: Theſe the kingdom of our Saviour will break in pieces, and conſume as to their enmity and oppoſition againſt him, and then fill the earth with its glory, wherein the Propheſy in Rev. xi. 15. will be fully accompliſhed; "the kingdoms of the world are become the kingdoms of the Lord, and he ſhall reign for ever and ever;" wherefore, as is already done to ſome of the ten kings. We may then infer from hence, that thoſe princes who continue to oppoſe our Lord Jeſus and his kingdom, will be utterly deſtroyed, as he foretold in Matt. xxii. 43, 44. declaring to the chief prieſts and elders, "That the kingdom of God ſhould be taken from them, and given to a nation, bringing forth the fruits thereof, and whoſoever ſhall fall upon this ſtone, ſhall be broken, and on whomſoever it ſhall fall, it ſhall grind him to powder."

A fooliſh and ungrateful people that deſpiſeth the goodneſs of God, cannot promiſe themſelves, that he ſhould always exert his power on their behalf. Their rebellious ſins will ſooner or later ſeparate between him and them, which hath been frequently exemplified, and in none more ſignally than in the Jews, the once peculiar people of God, whom he had often crowned with glorious victories and triumphs over their adverſaries; nevertheleſs, when they forſook God and obſtinately refuſed to return to him, he would no longer help and ſave them; according to that of the Prophet Iſaiah, ch. lix. 1, 2. "Behold the Lord's hand is not ſhortned, that it cannot ſave, neither his ear heavy that it cannot hear, but your iniquities have ſeparated between you and your God, and your ſins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear." I ſhall only add, that when a ſinful people have provoked God to hide his face from them, and to ſhut out their prayers, they lye open to the power of their enemies; as in Pſal. xviii. 41, 42. "They cried, ſaith David, but there was none to ſave them, even unto the Lord, but he anſwered them not; then did I beat them ſmall as the duſt, I did caſt them out as the mire in the ſtreets."

CHAP. II.

1 By comparing what we were by 3 nature, with what we are 5 by grace: 10 He declareth, that we are made for good works, and 13 being brought near by Chriſt, ſhould not live as 11 Gentiles, and 12 foreigners in time paſt, but as 19 citizens with the ſaints, and family of God.

AND you hath he quickned who were dead in treſpaſſes and ſins,

2 Wherein in time paſt ye walked according to the courſe of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the ſpirit that now worketh in the children of diſobedience.

3 Among whom alſo we all had our converſation in times paſt, in the luſts of our fleſh, fulfilling the deſires of the fleſh, and of the mind; and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others.

4 But God who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us,

5 Even when we were dead in ſins, hath quickned us together with Chriſt (by grace ye are ſaved)

6 And hath raiſed us up together, and made us ſit together in heavenly places in Chriſt Jeſus.

7 That in the ages to come he might ſhew the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindneſs towards us, through Chriſt Jeſus.

8 For by grace are ye ſaved, through faith; and that not of your ſelves: it is the gift of God:

9 Not of works, leſt any man ſhould boaſt:

10 For we are his workmanſhip, created in Chriſt Jeſus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we ſhould walk in them.

11 Wherefore remember that ye being in time paſſed Gentiles in the fleſh, who are called uncircumciſion by that which is called the circumciſion in the fleſh made by hands;

12 That at that time ye were without Chriſt, being aliens from the commonwealth of Iſrael, and ſtrangers from the covenants of promiſe, having no hope, and without God in the world;

13 But now in Chriſt Jeſus, ye who ſometimes were far off, are made nigh by the blood of Chriſt.

14 For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us;

15 Having aboliſhed in his fleſh the enmity, even the law of commandments, contained in ordinances, for to make in himſelf, of twain, one new man, ſo making peace.

16 And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the croſs, having ſlain the enmity thereby:

17 And came and preached peace to you which were afar off, and to them that were nigh.

18 For through him we both have an acceſs by one Spirit unto the Father.

19 Now therefore ye are no more ſtrangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the ſaints, and of the houſhould of God;

20 And are built upon the foundation of the apoſtles and prophets, Jeſus Chriſt himſelf being the chief corner-ſtone;

21 In whom all the building fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord:

22 In whom you alſo are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit.

The Apoſtle, that he may the better eſtabliſh the Epheſians in the doctrine of free grace, and magnify the happineſs of that eſtate wherein that had placed them,

I. Commends it from a conſideration of the miſerable eſtate which the Gentiles had been delivered from, even the ſpiritual death of ſin; ver. 1. proved by the general tenor of their lives, which, ſays he, were guided by the world and the Devil, ver. 2. And of the Jews alſo, who have been in ſlavery to their luſts, were ſubject to God's wrath, ver. 3. but were now delivered from that ſtate of ſin and wrath of God's rich mercy and great love, ver. 4, 5, 6. to the manifeſtation of his grace, ver. 7. This is amplified by a repetition of the fountain of ſalvation; grace; and the means, faith: And then proved by excluding all things inconſiſtent with grace, from having any influence in our ſalvation; by aſſerting it to be God's gift, ver. 8. and by excluding the works of the law in particular; otherwiſe there would be matter of boaſting, ver. 9. and becauſe the power to do good is from God; beſtowed in the grace of regeneration; amplified by the uſe God has deſigned good works for, viz. to be the way for us to walk in, ver. 10.

II. Applies this doctrine in particular to the Epheſians, exhorting them to recollect how miſerable they were while Heathens, ver. 11, 12. and to look upon their preſent happy ſtate, which places them by their union with Chriſt, through his blood, nearer to God, ver. 13. proved by the work of his prieſtly office to be our peace, to unite the Jews and Gentiles in one Church, ver. 14, 15. reconciling them both to God, ver. 16. by the preaching of the Goſpel, ver. 17. So that

He concludes that the Gentiles have acceſs to God, as well as the Jews, ver. 18. and communion in all Church-privileges; which he illuſtrates by the ſimilitudes of a city, family, and building, deſcribed by its foundation, ver. 20. Divine Structure, and joining together of all its parts; and the perpetual increaſe and growth, ver. 21. Which he applies in particular to the believing Epheſians, ver. 22.

Ver. 1.——Quickned.] Spiritually by his grace.

——Dead.] Spiritually.

Ver. 2. Wherein.] i. e. Treſpaſſes and ſins; ſee ver. 1.

Ver. 3. The prince of the power of the air.] i. e. The Devil.

Ver. 15. Having aboliſhed in his fleſh the enmity, even the law of commandments, contain'd in ordinances.] To this the Jews anſwer, That God had given them commandments and ordinances to continue for ever; and therefore whoever ſhould pretend to aboliſh what God had made eternal could not be from God. Wherefore, in reply to this objection, I ſhall here ſhew you any thing or being may be ſaid to be eternal.

Firſt, Some things are ſaid to be eternal, on the account of the great length of time they were to laſt, though they both began to be long after the beginning, and were to have an end as long before the end of time. Thus the covenant of circumciſion is ſtiled an everlaſting covenant, Gen. xvii. though the firſt inſtitution of it was above two thouſand years after the creation; and though it was to ceaſe at leaſt as long before the conſummation of all things. But becauſe it was to be in force, and kept by all the poſterity of Abraham, through all ſucceſſive generations, till the promiſed ſeed, the appointed Saviour of the world, ſhould come, and by his obedience and ſufferings, work redemption and ſalvation for mankind; therefore it was called an everlaſting covenant, a covenant that ſhould endure, and be in force, for ever: And ſo, indeed, it was to be, though not according to the letter, yet according to the myſtical or ſpiritual ſenſe and meaning of it: That is, though the outward circumciſion of the fleſh was not, yet the inward circumciſion of the heart, which was ſignified, and chiefly aimed at by it, was to continue, and be incumbent on all men, till time ſhould be no more. For, ſays the Apoſtle, even after the outward circumciſion was aboliſhed, We are the circumciſion, which worſhip God in the ſpirit, and rejoice in Chriſt Jeſus, and have no confidence in the fleſh, Phil. iii. 3. As if he had ſaid, We are the true children of Abraham, and the circumciſion indeed, who live piouſly, and confeſs Chriſt crucified, and depend upon God's mercy only through the promiſe ſealed to us in Chriſt's blood, and ſo place no confidence in circumciſion, nor any ſuch outward performance.

Secondly, Some things are ſaid to be eternal, which, though they had beginning much more early, and are to laſt much longer; yet neither were before, nor ſhall have have any being after this preſent world. Thus Moſes ſpeaks of the everlaſting hills; Deut. xxxiii. 15. for ſo it ſhould be rendred according to the Hebrew, though our tranſlation reads it, laſting hills, the word in the original being the ſame in this place, that in other places is rendred, everlaſting. Now the hills are ſaid to be everlaſting, becauſe, as they had, in likelihood, their beginning with the world; ſo they ſhall not ceaſe to be, till the world itſelf ſhall be diſſolved, but they ſhall be diſſolved with it. For though we read of new Heavens, and a new earth, which the Apoſtle ſays, we may expect, according to God's promiſe, Pet. iii. 1—3. ſuppoſing we ought to underſtand him according to the letter, and that the new earth ſhall abound with hills and mountains, as this at preſent does, yet they will not be the ſame that now we ſee; for theſe can laſt no longer than this preſent earth, of which they are a part, and therefore, if they be made new, together with the earth, in that reſpect they cannot properly be ſaid to be the ſame they were before, becauſe, whatever is quite new, is quite another thing, though it may be of the ſelf ſame kind.

Thirdly, Some ſorts of beings are ſaid to be eternal, which had beginning, but will have no end of being: Such are Angels, and the ſouls of men, which by nature are immortal, or rather are ſo by Divine Appointment and Decree, which is by no means to be altered: And therefore, they can never ceaſe to be, but muſt endure, and live for ever. Thus we are told, concerning evil angels, by Jude; The Angels which kept not their firſt eſtate, but left their own habitation, God has reſerved in everlaſting chains under darkneſs, unto the judgment of the great day, ver. 6. The meaning of which paſſage is, That for their wilful rebellion God reſerves, or continues them in being, in a preſent ſtate of miſery, until the day of judgment; that then they may receive the ſentence of eternal condemnation, and accordingly continue to be for ever miſerable. And if it be thus with the apoſtate angels, that they ſhall never ceaſe to be, but are always to be kept in being, that they may be for ever miſerable; then, we may be ſure, all the good Angels will be likewiſe ſo preſerved in being, that they may be for ever, what they have always been, ſince they firſt began to be, glorious and happy: And if they muſt be always happy, then they can never ceaſe to be; becauſe, in a ſtate of non-exiſtence there is neither happineſs nor miſery, no ſenſe of pleaſure or of pain, nor of any good or evil. And ſo it is, and will be with the ſouls of men; which being of a ſpiritual nature, wholly void of all material ſubſtance, are therefore as immortal as the Angels: And though their preſent tenements of clay, theſe mortal bodies, die and rot, and periſh in the grave, yet they ſurvive for ever, incorruptible living ſubſtances, reſerved to an eternal future ſtate of happineſs or miſery, according as they ſhall be found to have deſerved, at the great day of trial and of judgment. And we may well ſuppoſe, it is on this account, what the inſpired preacher tells us, That when the duſt or body, ſhall return to the earth as it was, then ſhall the ſpirit or ſoul, return unto God who gave it, Eccl. xii. 7. That is, not to ſleep away eternity in a ſtate of non-exiſtence, but to receive its final doom from him, ſtill to exiſt, and be for ever happy or for ever miſerable.

But theſe are all improper notions of eternity, and even in the laſt and greateſt inſtance of the three, though angels and the ſouls of men ſhall never ceaſe to be, but ſhall remain alive for ever, though the whole world beſides ſhall be diſſolved; yet, ſince there was ſome time when they began to be, it cannot properly be ſaid, they are eternal, but only, that they are immortal. For to ſay of any being, that it is eternal, in the utmoſt ſenſe and meaning of eternity, is to affirm, not only that it never ſhall have any end, but that it always was, without any beginning of its being.

And that is the laſt, and only proper notion of eternity; which to define, or comprehend, ſurmounts the utmoſt reach and ſtrength of human reaſon: So that all attempts that way have been in vain, and fruitleſly exerted. To call it a duration, without beginning, and without end, is no proper definition of eternity, though it may be the beſt that we can give; becauſe duration ſtrictly, can agree with nothing, but what has beginning: And an eternal duration ſignifies no more, than that ſomething, which once began to be, ſhall never have an end of being. Nor could I ever find, among all our men of reaſon, who pretend to comprehend all things, and even eternity it ſelf, and contend that nothing ought to be believed, which human reaſon cannot comprehend, and on this principle decry all myſteries of faith, as downright cheats and forgeries: I ſay, I have not found ſo much as one among them all, who has given any tolerable, that is, plainly intelligible definition of eternity; though they do not ſtick to tell the world, with great aſſurance, that they do clearly comprehend it: Which to me, is an irrefragable argument, that, after all their boaſting, whatever they pretend, they do not clearly comprehend it; becauſe, whatever may be clearly comprehended by us, we may full as eaſily define, ſo that others may comprehend it likewiſe. But this has not been done by any man to ſatisfaction, though many have attempted it; nor is it poſſible for any being to give a perfect definition of it, but ſuch a one as is himſelf eternal: Becauſe, no other being can be capable of comprehending it. In ſhort, all men have owned, and no man can deny, that ſomething is eternal; that is, that there muſt be ſomething, which neither had beginning, nor will ever have an end of being, though no man can define, or comprehend, the manner how it is ſo. And as God muſt needs be ſuch a Being, or elſe he is not God; ſo there can be no ſuch Being in the world, beſides himſelf: It being, as a neceſſary, ſo an incommunicable attribute, or perfection of the Deity, to be in ſuch a ſort eternal, as that he ſhall not only never ceaſe to be; but alſo, that he ever was, without beginning to exiſt. It is, indeed, a myſtery, which human reaſon cannot fathom; nor any reaſon, leſs than that of God himſelf, can fully comprehend it. But that he is, and muſt be ſo eternally, is not ſo very difficult to ſhew. And therefore,

I ſhall now attempt to demonſtrate God to be eternal, according to the utmoſt ſenſe and meaning of the phraſe both from Scripture, and from reaſon.

Firſt, from Scripture. And here it would be endleſs to produce the multitudes of teſtimonies, which the Sacred Writings do afford us to this purpoſe; and therefore, I ſhall mention but a few, which may ſuffice for all.

Firſt, then, we have him ſtiled expreſly, by his ſervant Moſes, The Everlaſting God, Gen. xxi. 33. By which expreſſion is undoubtedly intended, not only, That he is a God who will continue to be ſuch for ever; but that, as he always was, without beginning, ſo he always will be God, without any end of being, Pſal. xc. 1, 2. And ſo much is affirmed expreſly by the Pſalmiſt, "Lord, ſays he, thou haſt been our dwelling-place in all generations. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadſt formed the earth and the world: Even from everlaſting to everlaſting, thou art God." And to the ſame purpoſe, but more largely, in another place; "Of old thou haſt laid the foundations of the earth, and the Heavens are the work of thy hands. They ſhall periſh, but thou ſhalt endure; they all ſhall wax old like a garment, and as a veſture ſhalt thou change them, and they ſhall be changed: But thou art the ſame, and thy years ſhall have no end; Pſal. cii. 25, 26, 27. Here then, the eternity of God, on both accounts, that is, a parte ante and a parte poſt, as we ſay, before, and after, according to the only proper notion of eternity, is plainly taught: For, firſt, if it was he that laid the foundations of the earth, and he that made the Heavens, then he muſt have been before theſe things, and, by conſequence, he muſt exiſt from all eternity: And, on the other hand, if he ſhall remain after all things are deſtroyed, or periſhed, and if there ſhall be no end of his years; then it follows, That he will be God to all eternity.

To this purpoſe alſo, the Prophet ſtiles him, The everlaſting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth; Iſa. xl. 28. That is, He who gave beginning to, and knows, and will be after the end of all things. And God himſelf, in the following chapter, thus beſpeaks us; "Who hath wrought and done it, calling the generations from the beginning? I the Lord, the firſt, and with the laſt, I am he;" chap. xli. 4. And again, the ſame Prophet calls him, in another place, "The high and lofty One, that inhabiteth eternity;" chap. lvii. 15.

And ſo the Apoſtle ſtiles him, "The King eternal, and immortal: Eternal, becauſe without beginning;" 1 Tim. i. 17. and immortal, becauſe he will be ever, without end of being. And again, "Who only hath immortality," chap. vi. 16. That is, who alone is immortal in himſelf; and from whom the immortality of other beings is deriv'd.

To which purpoſe alſo we may underſtand what James affirms concerning him; "Every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableneſs, neither ſhadow of turning;" James i. 17. For if he be incapable of change or variation, then he muſt have been always from eternity, and ſhall be always to eternity, what he is at preſent, the ſelf-ſame God, without beginning, and without end; the ſame yeſterday, to day, and for ever.

In ſhort, in the book of Revelations, we have abundant teſtimony to this truth; (Rev. i. 4,—8. chap. iv.—8. and xi. 17. and other places) That God is alpha and omega, the beginning and the end, the firſt and the laſt; who was from all eternity, and is at preſent, and will remain for ever God, without beginning of time, or end of days. And ſo much may ſuffice, to ſhew, that God is an Eternal Being, in the utmoſt ſenſe and meaning of the phraſe, from ſome of the many teſtimonies to this purpoſe, to be met with in the Holy Scriptures. Now,

To demonſtrate this great truth, from reaſon,

Obſerve firſt, if God were not ſo eternal, as to have been always God, without beginning to exiſt; then he muſt derive his Being from another: For whatever once began to be, muſt have and own ſome cauſe or author of its being, which muſt therefore be ſuperior to it, as every cauſe or author is to that, of which it is the cauſe or author. But then, whatever being is derived from any cauſe or author, as it cannot, for that reaſon, be without beginning, ſo neither can it poſſibly be God; becauſe no being can be God, who is not abſolutely perfect; and that being which is abſolutely perfect, muſt be abſolutely independent, and conſequently, ſelf-exiſtent; and that being which is ſo, muſt of neceſſity have had his being, or exiſtence, from eternity. Nor will it help us any thing, to ſay, That God began to be, or to exiſt, we know not when, from nothing; for then we muſt ſuppoſe ſome time, when he was not in being: And ſuppoſing any time, when he was not; there can be no time imagined, when he ſhould begin to be: At leaſt, if there could be any time imagined, when he was not in being; then it would be impoſſible that he ever ſhould be God; becauſe, whatever being was not always, never can be God. In ſhort, eternity is ſomewhat, for I know not what to call it, but eternity, that is, without beginning, as well as without end: And therefore, if God be properly eternal, as he muſt be, or he is not God; it follows, that he muſt be ſo eternal, as always to have been, without beginning of his Being.

Secondly, Some being muſt have from all eternity, without beginning to exiſt; or elſe, no other being could have had exiſtence. That is, no being could have been produced, without ſome cauſe or author that was able to produce it. For to aſcribe all things to chance, is to give the reputation of great conſtancy and regularity to that, which of all things in the world, is the moſt unconſtant and irregular: It is to aſcribe the production of all beings to that, which has no being of its own, but is a mere non-entity, a vain chimera, a notion, an imaginary nothing. And to aſcribe the production of all Beings to that, which has no real being of its own, but is a name or ſound, and nothing elſe, having no kind of ſubſtance to denominate its being, and ſo is nothing in the world; is ſuch a groundleſs notion and conceit, as, one would think, no man of common ſenſe and reaſon ſhould be guilty of affirming, much leſs endeavour to maintain. Briefly, then, whatever beings are produced, muſt have ſome cauſe or author of their being, or elſe they could not be; for nothing is without ſome cauſe: And whatever being is the cauſe or author of all other beings, can have no cauſe of his own being, but muſt be of himſelf, the firſt, becauſe the author of all other beings: And whoever is the firſt of beings, and author of all others, and conſequently, had no cauſe or author of his own exiſtence, muſt be acknowledged to have been from all eternity; which can agree to no one elſe, but God alone.

And that is the third and laſt reaſon I ſhall offer, why God is and muſt be ſo eternal, as to have been always God, without beginning to exiſt; to wit, becauſe all other beings in the world muſt have derived, and conſequently, own their exiſtence to have been from ſome firſt cauſe or author, who has exiſted from eternity. For how far ſoever we look back to find out the original of the ſeveral ſorts of beings in the world, we muſt ſtop at laſt at ſome one firſt of beings, who was the cauſe of being to all others, without any cauſe or author of his own, as exiſting neceſſarily of himſelf; who always was, without beginning to exiſt, and always will be God, without an end of his exiſtence.

For this muſt follow of neceſſity, that if God be ſo eternal, as to have been without beginning; he muſt, by conſequence, be ſo eternal, as to continue what he is for ever, without any end of being: Becauſe, as the abſolute perfection of his nature makes his exiſtence to be neceſſary; ſo likewiſe, it is utterly impoſſible, if he be abſolutely perfect, that he ſhould ever ceaſe to be. For, as he is an abſolutely perfect being, he neither can be ſubject to decay, as other beings are, nor is there any other being ſuperior or equal to himſelf on whom he can depend, or of whom he might be jealous, or from whom he can have any cauſe to apprehend himſelf to be in danger. In ſhort, as he knows no cauſe or author of his being, ſo neither is there any being, nor can be any cauſe, that can make him ceaſe to be: But as he has been always from eternity, ſo he will be always to eternity; even from everlaſting to everlaſting, he was, and will be God.

And now to draw to a concluſion of this point, I ſhall not enter on a nice diſcuſſion of that queſtion, whether in the eternity of God there be any of thoſe various kinds of ſucceſſion, as there are in time? That is, whether in eternity there be any ſuch ſucceſſive variations of night and day, of weeks, and months, and years? For that God is perfectly immutable; and ſince God, and the eternity of God, are one, and inſeparable; and laſtly, ſince ſuch ſucceſſion argues mutability in that nature where it is. It will follow, that it cannot poſſibly agree to uncreated, but only to created nature, to be ſubject to ſucceſſion; that is, though it does ſuit well enough, and cannot but do ſo, with time, yet it cannot do ſo with eternity, becauſe that ever was, and is, and will be ever unchangeably the ſame. Indeed, in all created nature, which is ſubject to change and alteration, and cannot but be ſo, there are and always will be ſuch viciſſitudes of time, the night ſucceeding day, and day ſucceeding night, and ſo the weeks, and months, and years ſucceeding one another, through all ſucceſſive generations. But with God, or uncreated nature, which knows no change, and is incapable of any, it neither is, nor can be ſo. For, as the Pſalmiſt ſpeaks, The darkneſs hideth not from him, but the night ſhineth as the day; the darkneſs and the light to him are both alike, Pſal. cxxxix. 12. And ſo Peter, to a queſtion put, belike, by ſome ungodly men, Where is the promiſe of his coming? 2 Pet. iii. 4. That is, of Chriſt's coming in judgment againſt the unbelieving Jews, as learned men have underſtood the place, makes anſwer thus: Beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thouſand years, and a thouſand years as one day, ver. 8. As if he had ſaid, Though you may be miſtaken in reckoning of times, in thinking that what the Prophets have foretold of the latter days, the times of the Meſſias, muſt be inſtantly performed, as ſoon as Chriſt is gone to Heaven, or elſe it will not be performed at all: Yet in this matter it muſt be conſidered, who it is that makes the promiſe, to wit, an infinite God; and then, though forty years, for example, is a very long time among us men, whoſe lives are ſo ſhort, yet with God, who is infinite, a thouſand years is no conſiderable ſpace, but a very ſhort and ſmall duration: And therefore, though the Prophecy be not yet fulfilled, about three or four and thirty years after Chriſt's departure from us, yet it may, and will moſt certainly, and that within a few years now. For the Apoſtle does not ſpeak of the years of God, as if with him there were no difference between a thouſand years and one day in reſpect of duration, becauſe he does not only ſay, A thouſand years are as one day, but alſo, that One day is as a thouſand years; and this, not that we ſhould infer from hence, that the ſhortneſs of one day, is equal to the length of a thouſand years: But he ſpeaks of the years of men, that the ſpace of a thouſand years with them, is but as it were one day with God. In ſhort, it appears, both from what went before, and from what follows after, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks here of the conſtancy of God in keeping his promiſes; and he ſhews, that whether God fulfils his promiſes inſtantly, or for ſome weighty reaſons defers the fulfilling of them till hereafter, yet he is always conſtant to himſelf, and will remember, and perform his promiſes, when the appointed time for fulfilling them ſhall come, and that no ſpace of time, though the longeſt with reſpect to us, can hinder his fulfilling of them. And we ought always to conſider, that God may have, though utterly unknown to us, ſome wiſe and gracious reaſon for delaying to perform his promiſes, and not do that under a thouſand years, which might be done in one day's time, as conſulting the welfare and ſalvation of all men, and that to this great end he may, by ſuch delays, bring a greater number to repentance. And ſo the Apoſtle tells us, in the following verſe; The Lord is not ſlack concerning his promiſe, as ſome men count ſlackneſs, but is long-ſuffering to us-ward, not willing that any ſhould periſh, but that all ſhould come to repentance. As if he had ſaid, "As for any ſlowneſs in performing his promiſe of coming, which they that expect and deſire to reap a ſudden fruit of it in their deliverance, or that others, who would corrupt them, and make them fall off through deſpair of it, are apt to charge upon God, it is merely a miſtake in them; for it is not thus deferred out of want of kindneſs to the perſevering Chriſtians, but out of the abundance of patience and long-ſufferance to the worſt, and an earneſt deſire that they may all amend and be delivered; without which amendment, whenſoever this coming ſhall be, all are infallibly deſtroyed." Upon the whole then, when the Apoſtle tells us, That One day with God, is as a thouſand years, and a thouſand years as one day; his meaning is, that he always was, and always will remain, unchangeably the ſame, as without beginning, and without end, ſo without ſucceſſion of times, or change of ſeaſons; becauſe, he is the ſame pure and ſimple, and immutable Divinity, both yeſterday, to day, and for ever. To which purpoſe alſo, let us hear the Pſalmiſt, with whom I ſhall conclude this point; A thouſand years, ſays he, in thy ſight are but as yeſterday, when it is paſt; and as a watch in the night, Pſal. xc. 4. As if he had ſaid thus "If in the old world, ſome of theſe who had offended, were permitted, as Adam among the reſt was, to whoſe ſin death was awarded by God, to live near a thouſand years after it, yet, alas! what is that, compared with thy infinity? Thou art without all beginning, moſt abſolutely eternal; a thouſand years being conſidered in thy duration, are but as a drop ſpilt and loſt in the ocean, no more than the ſhorteſt time amongſt men, but a day, and that paſt and gone; or but the ſixth part of that, the ſpace of four hours in the night, which is inſenſibly paſt over in ſleep."

Now from the whole you may learn how far any thing or perſon may be ſaid to be eternal; for nothing can be properly eternal, but God.

CHAP. III.

5 The hidden myſtery, 6 that the Gentiles ſhould be ſaved, 3 was made known to Paul by revelation: 8 And to him was that grace given, that 9 he ſhould preach it. 13 He deſireth them not to faint for his tribulation, 14 and prayeth, 19 that they may perceive the great love of Chriſt toward them.

FOR this cauſe, I Paul, the priſoner of Jeſus Chriſt for your Gentiles;

2 If ye have heard of the diſpenſation of the grace of God, which is given me to you-ward:

3 How that by revelation he made known unto me the myſtery, (as I wrote afore in few words,

4 Whereby when ye read ye may underſtand my knowledge in the myſtery of Chriſt)

5 Which in other ages was not made known unto the ſons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apoſtles and prophets by the Spirit;

6 That the Gentiles ſhould be fellow-heirs, and of the ſame body, and partakers of his promiſe in Chriſt by the goſpel:

7 Whereof I was made a miniſter according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me by the effectual working of his power.

8 Unto me, who am leſs than the leaſt of all ſaints is this grace given, that I ſhould preach among the Gentiles the unſearchable riches of Chriſt;

9 And to make all men ſee, what is the fellowſhip of the myſtery, which from the beginning of the world, hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jeſus Chriſt:

10 To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be known by the church the manifold wiſdom of God,

11 According to the eternal purpoſe which he purpoſed in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord.

12 In whom we have boldneſs and acceſs with confidence by the faith of him.

13 Wherefore I deſire that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory.

14 For this cauſe I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt,

15 Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named,

16 That he would grant you according to the riches of his glory, to be ſtrengthned with might by his Spirit in the inner man;

17 That Chriſt may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye being rooted and grounded in love,

18 May be able to comprehend with all ſaints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height;

19 And to know the love of Chriſt, which paſſeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulneſs of God.

20 Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we aſk or think, according to the power that worketh in us,

21 Unto him be glory in the church by Chriſt Jeſus, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

In this chapter the Apoſtle,

I. Declares the occaſion of his following prayer, at ver. 14, &c. amplified by a deſcription of himſelf in his preſent captivity in bonds; ver. 1.

II. Deſcribes the dignity of his Apoſtolic office towards the Gentiles, (by way of digreſſion from what he had began, at ver. 1.) firſt, more briefly; ver. 2. ſecondly, more largely, ſhewing,

(1.) His qualification and furniture for this office, viz. his knowledge and inſight into the myſtery of the Goſpel, which he was to preach; amplified by ſhewing (1.) the manner or means how he came by this knowledge, i.e. by revelation. (2.) The proof of it; for which he refers them to what he had written in the two former chapters; ver. 3, 4. (3.) The comparative unacquaintedneſs of former ages, with ſome Goſpel truths; ver. 5. (4.) A particular inſtance hereof, in the great myſtery of the calling of the Gentiles to a participation of Church-privileges; ver. 6.

(2.) His call to it; which he proves by his gifts and by the powerful aſſiſtance of God's Spirit; ver. 7.

(3.) The excellence of his office; proved (1.) by the unworthineſs thereof, in his own apprehenſion; (2.) By the excellence of the ſubject-matter he was to preach of, viz. the unſearchable riches of Chriſt; ver. 8. (3.) By the ends of this office, viz. the great benefit, which by the conſciencious diſcharge of it would redound not only to men; ver. 9. making them underſtand the myſtery more clearly; but alſo to angels; ver. 10. (4.) From the eternity of God's purpoſe to entruſt him with that office, for bringing about the fore-mentioned ends; ver. 11. and (5.) By a threefold privilege, viz. boldneſs, acceſs, confidence, which believers did partake of by means of his miniſtry; whereby they were brought to Chriſt, in whom they enjoyed all theſe; ver. 12.

(4.) The uſe they ſhould make therof; not to faint, but to be courageous; ver. 13.

III. Gives them the ſum of his prayer for them, (thereby to excite them to perſevere and proceed in the experimental knowledge of, and communion with Chriſt) wherein we are to obſerve,

(1.) His outward geſture; (2.) the object of his prayer, God; deſcribed by his relation to Chriſt; ver. 14. and to the Church; ver. 15. (3.) The matter of his prayer, or what he prayed for on their behalf, i. e. ſpiritual ſtrength; ver. 16. Chriſt's dwelling them the cauſe of that ſtrength, ver 17.— and their experimental knowledge and comprehenſion of Chriſt's boundleſs love (as the effect of his dwelling in them) which is propounded more obſcurely at ver.—17, 18. and more plainly at ver. 1*9*.— and laſtly, for the fulneſs of grace; ver. —1*9*. and then (4.) concludes with a deſcription of God, from his Almighty Power; ver. 20. and a doxology, or thankſgiving to God ſo deſcribed; ver. 21.

Ver. 1.—The priſoner of Jeſus Chriſt.] For preaching the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, at Rome. See the introduction.

Ver. 2.—The diſpenſation of the grace of God.] Or, the commiſſion which I have received [to preach the ſalvation to all nations, which God of his free grace has given to thoſe who embrace the Goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt in ſincerity and truth.

— Which is given unto you-ward.] See Acts ix. 15. and xiii. 2.

Ver. 4.—The myſtery.] Or, calling of the Gentiles; ſee ver. 6.

Ver 15.—The whole family.] Or, congregation of the faithful.

Ver. 20. Unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we aſk, or think.] Becauſe through him we live, we move, and not only have our being, but enjoy all the neceſſaries and comforts of this life, and reſerves in ſtore for them that love him and keep his commandments, ſuch things, as it is not poſſible for the heart of man to conceive.

CHAP. IV.

1 He exhorteth to unity, 7 and declareth that God therefore giveth divers 11 gifts unto men, that his Church might be 13 edified, and 16 grown up in Chriſt. 18 He calleth them from the impurity of the Gentiles. 24 To put on the new man. 25 To caſt off lying, and 29 corrupt communication.

I Therefore the priſoner of the Lord, beſeech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called,

2 With all lowlineſs and meekneſs, with long-ſuffering, forbearing one another in love;

3 Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

4 There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling;

5 One Lord, one faith, one baptiſm,

6 One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all.

7 But unto every one of us is given grace according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt.

8 Wherefore he ſaith, When he aſcended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men.

9 (Now that he aſcended, what is it but that he alſo deſcended firſt into the lower parts of the earth?

10 He that deſcended, is the ſame alſo that aſcended up far above all heavens, that he might fill all things)

11 And he gave ſome, apoſtles: and ſome, prophets: and ſome, evangeliſts: and ſome, paſtors and teachers;

12 For the perfecting of the ſaints, for the work of the miniſtry, for the edifying of the body of Chriſt:

13 Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the meaſure of the ſtature of the fulneſs of Chriſt:

14 That we henceforth be no more children, toſſed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the ſleight of men, and cunning craftineſs, whereby they lie in wait to deceive:

15 But ſpeaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Chriſt:

16 From whom the whole body fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint ſupplieth, according to the effectual working in the meaſure of every part, maketh increaſe of the body, unto the edifying of it ſelf in love.

17 This I ſay therefore, and teſtify in the Lord, that ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk in the vanity of their mind,

18 Having the underſtanding darkned, being alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance that is in them, becauſe of the blindneſs of their heart:

19 Who being paſt feeling, have given themſelves over unto laſciviouſneſs, to work all uncleanneſs with greedineſs.

20 But ye have not ſo learned Chriſt;

21 If ſo be that ye have heard him, and have been taught by him, as the truth is in Jeſus:

22 That ye put off concerning the former converſation, the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful luſts:

23 And be renewed in the ſpirit of your mind;

24 And that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteouſneſs, and true holineſs.

25 Wherefore putting away lying, ſpeak every man truth with his neighbour: for we are members one of another.

26 Be ye angry and ſin not: let not the ſun go down upon your wrath:

27 Neither give place to the devil.

28 Let him that ſtole, ſteal no more: but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth.

29 Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to the uſe of edifying, that it may miniſter grace unto the hearers.

30 And grieve not the holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are ſealed unto the day of redemption.

31 Let all bitterneſs, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil-ſpeaking be put away from you, with all malice.

32 And be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another; even as God for Chriſts ſake hath forgiven you.

The Apoſtle having in the three former chapters given a ſhort ſum of ſaving doctrine, comes next to exhort them to a ſuitable practice; wherein we find

I. A general exhortation, propounded by way of entreaty; and as an inference from what went before, to walk worthy of their vocation; ver. 1.

II. A more particular exhortation to ſuch graces as are branches of the foregoing general duty, and have a more ſpecial influence upon unity; ver. 2.

III. A ſpecial exhortation to unity; ver. 3. inforced by ſeveral arguments; as

(1.) The many unities which are in the Church, and all the true members thereof; the laſt whereof, one God, (ver. 6.) is amplified by a deſcription of him, ſuch as his dominion over all creatures; his power, providence, and ſpecial preſence with all true believers; ver. 4.—6.

(2.) The diverſity of gifts and graces, which yet all tend to union; where he propounds the divers meaſures of gifts and graces, beſtowed by Chriſt; ver. 7. and proves it by a teſtimony of David; who foretold it ſhould be ſo; ver. 8, 9. and then by the ſeveral ſorts of officers he appointed in his Church; ver. 11. Then he ſhews the end of all this was to perfect and edify the Church; ver. 12. and illuſtrates this argument by (1.) the term of the continuance of the miniſtry ſet forth in three expreſſions; the latter whereof is a further explication of the former; ver. 13. (2.) By two of its fruits, viz. preſervation from error; ver. 14. and growth in grace; ver. 15. (3.) By the manner or means of this edifying, viz. influence from Chriſt for this end, in alluſion to the growth of the natural body; where the orderly and firm union of the ſeveral parts the means of this union, the effect thereof; the proportion or degree, and the end of this increaſe are deſcribed in ver. 16.

IV. A dehortation from a prophane courſe of life; becauſe

(1.) It is walking like Heathens; whoſe courſe of life is here generally propounded at ver. 17. and particularly deſcribed in the ſeveral branches and degrees thereof, both as inward, in their underſtandings and affections, ver. 18, 19.— and outward in their converſation, ver. 19.

(2.) Becauſe the knowledge they had of Chriſt, was inconſiſtent with ſuch a licentious courſe of life; ver. 20. and this is amplified by a limitation to ſuch as have an inward work upon them, ver. 21. and proved by three things which that knowledge did ſtrongly oblige and incline them unto, as the mortification of the corruption of nature; ver. 22. a renovation of the mind; ver. 23. and the putting on of the new man; deſcribed by its pattern, the manner how it is wrought in us, i. e. by creations and its parts and branches; ver. 24.

V. An exhortation to ſeveral particular duties of the ſecond table.

(1.) Relating to the ninth commandment, expreſſed both negatively and poſitively, enforced by a conſideration of their mutual relation to each other; ver. 25.

(2.) Relating to the ſixth commandment, viz. to forbear exceſſive anger, or to ſuppreſs it ſpeedily, ver. 26. enforced by the miſchief of perſevering in ſinful anger, ver. 25.

(3.) Relating to the eighth commandment, negatively, not to ſteal; and poſitively to employ themſeves diligently in ſome honeſt calling, enforced by the benefit thereof; ability to ſupply others, ver. 28.

(4.) Relating to our ſpeech, expreſſed both negatively and poſitively; enforced firſt as to the poſitive part, by a motive taken from the advantage thereof, ver. 29. and ſecondly, as to the negative part, by an argument taken from the miſchief thereof, delivered in the form of a prohibition, thereby we ſhall grieve the Holy Spirit, which is diſſuaded by an argument taken from his office, or good work in our hearts, ver. 30.

(5.) To abſtain from all the branches, degrees, and effects of ſinful anger; ver. 31.

(6.) To exerciſe ſuch graces as are contrary to the ſins laſt mentioned; ver. 32.

Ver 1.——Vocation] i e. The calling or preaching of the Goſpel, by which we are called by the Spirit of God to newneſs of life, and faith in Chriſt.

Ver. 2, 3. With all lowlineſs and meekneſs, with long-ſuffering, forbearing one another in love; endeavouring to keep the unity of the ſpirit in the bond of peace.] In this Scripture the Apoſtle more particularly recommends charity and unity, thoſe two great Chriſtian virtues, to our practice; wherefore I ſhall conſider them alſo more particularly in this place. And firſt of charity.

There is no queſtion that charity is both neceſſary and worthy of our practice; for it is evidently the deſign of the Goſpel inſtitution, to enforce the exerciſe of this virtue, in the fulleſt ſenſe and importance of it. To love our enemies, is a precept of our Saviour's, exemplified in his own righteous practice, and founded on the example of God himſelf. To abound in love one towards another, and towards all men; to bear with the infirmities of the weak; to forbear one another, and forgive one another; to be patient towards all men; to give no offence to any man; to live peaceably with all men; to let our moderation be known unto all men, &c. are Apoſtolical precepts and injunctions, enforced upon us with the powerful motives of God's Love and Pity to mankind, as exhibited in the gracious work of our redemption by Jeſus Chriſt. Nevertheleſs in theſe acts of charity, it is evident we are both warranted and required to obſerve ſuch a meaſure of prudence as may anſwer the great ends of religion, the Honour of God, and the welfare of mens ſouls.

Indeed prudence is, as it were, of the eſſence of every virtue. We muſt not therefore, under the plauſible notion of charity and condeſcenſion, meekneſs and moderation, forbear to tell men of their faults and errors when the cauſe of God and religion requires it; but muſt ſo far practice theſe rules as they may ſerve to promote theſe ends, and no further.

In inſtances of manifeſt wickedneſs, to expreſs a juſt indignation of them, is but what we owe to the honour of God and religion, what is warranted by many Apoſtolical rules, what is juſtified by our Bleſſed Saviour's own example, what is needful to reclaim men from error and vice; and therefore cannot be deemed inconſiſtent with thoſe excellent precepts of meekneſs, moderation and charity which the Goſpel gives us.

He that can be ſilent and unactive in the cauſe of God's truth, when it is ſo boldly oppos'd; he that can bear the affronts and indignities that are offered to religion without ſome riſings in his heart at them; may paſs, perhaps, in vulgar eſteem, for a quiet and peaceable man, a man of temper and moderation; but, in truth, is acted by a far different principle, by a careleſs indifference towards all religion, or, in fine, by a ſecret good liking of thoſe principles and practices which, as yet, he is aſham'd or afraid to own.

The proper expreſſions of our Chriſtian Charity towards men that are fallen into dangerous errors, eſpecially when he would by ſcandalous practice, is according to Apoſtolick Practice, to warn and admoniſh them of the unreaſonableneſs, ſinfulneſs, and fatal conſequence of continuing in them, to cenſure and condemn, to reprove and rebuke, and in caſe of obſtinacy, to correct and chaſtiſe them for them.

It will be ſaid, that ſuch methods as theſe will but incenſe and exaſperate, will but harden men the more in their evil ways; and the ſofter methods of yielding and compliance (which, in the abuſive language of ſome men is meekneſs and moderation) will be recommended as far the more uſeful. But does the wiſe parent forbear to check and correct his child for his undutifulneſs and obſtinacy, for fear of his anger and reſentment? Does the ſkilful phyſician forbear to preſcribe the ſharpeſt medicines and bittereſt potions, when the caſe of his patient requires them, for fear he ſhould loath and diſguſt them? Does the preacher ſpare to reprove the profligate and notorious ſinner, for fear of provoking him to more deſperate courſes and hardned impieties? Were not the Prophets of the Old Teſtament to ſpeak to the rebellious houſe of Iſrael, whether they would hear, or whether they would forbear? Ezek. ii. 7. And are not the miniſters of the New, in caſe of any ſcandalous practice, to rebuke ſharply? Tit. i. 13. Is not indeed every man of right empowered, and in duty bound to be a cenſurer and reprover of evil manners? There is a juſt abhorrence, due from all men, of evil principles and practices; and ſharp reproofs are as needful to be uſed in ſome diſtempers of the mind, as ſharp medicines are in ſome diſtempers of the body. Ulcerous wounds muſt be laid open and cleared of their venom and rancour, before they can be effectually cured; ſo there is a foulneſs and virulency in the ſinful practices and evil principles of ſome men, that he that would cure and reform, muſt expoſe and ſhame them out of them.

Moderation and charity, meekneſs and forbearance are indeed not only great duties, but ſingular ornaments of the Chriſtian Life; but when we practice them to the prejudice of truth and piety, and to the abetting and encouraging of vice and error, they loſe their name and virtue. And this is taken to be the ſenſe of the Apoſtle.

Secondly, That other virtue which the Apoſtle here recommends to us in order to a worthy walking in our Chriſtian Vocation, unity, as at ver. 3. endeavouring to keep the unity of the ſpirit in the bond of peace. To keep the unity of the ſpirit (or by an Hebraiſm, which the writers of the New Teſtament do frequently uſe) a ſpiritual unity in the bond of peace, is to live in the unity of Chriſt's ſpiritual body the Church, by performing all the duties and offices which belong to us, as member of it, and by which we give the proof and evidence of our being ſo. And therefore it is not only an internal unity, a unity of faith and charity, but more eſpecially an external one, a unity of profeſſion and practice that is here recommended to us. And that this is the unity which the Apoſtle means, is intimated in the reaſon with which he does enforce it, namely, becauſe we are one body, ver. 4, 5. animated by one ſoul or ſpirit, called unto one hope, have one Lord, one Faith, one Baptiſm. For as this deſcribes the ſtate of a Chriſtian incorporated in a viſible ſociety, with particular privileges annext to it, ſo it infers an obligation to the external and viſible acts of unity, ſuch as joining in the communion of prayers and ſacraments, and in general, in the performance of all thoſe duties and offices, which by the laws of that ſociety, we are obliged to, if founded upon the word of God.

And to endeavour to keep this unity is (according to the literal importance of the word which the Apoſtle uſes) to be careful and diligent and in good earneſt in the proſecution of it. Which ſhews that the Apoſtle did not think the being and continuing in the unity of the Church an arbitrary or indifferent thing, which might be kept or broken at pleaſure, according as our humour, fancy, or intereſt leads us; but a matter of duty and neceſſity, and an eſſential part of Chriſtianity.

Therefore his exhortations to this duty are addreſt with a peculiar warmth and earneſtneſs, and urged and enforced with the moſt weighty motives. Thus 1 Cor. i. 10. Now I beſeech you brethren, by the name of the Lord Jeſus, that ye all ſpeak the ſame thing, and that there be no diviſions among you, but that ye be perfectly joined together, in the ſame mind, and in the ſame judgment. And Phil. ii. 1, 2. If there be therefore any conſolation in Chriſt, if any comfort of love, if any fellowſhip of the ſpirit, if any bowels and mercies, fulfil ye my joy, that ye be like-minded, having the ſame love, being of one accord, and of one mind.

Theſe and ſuch like exhortations to unity proceed upon the ſuppoſition of an eſtabliſhed order and government in the Church, to the which all that were members of it ought to yield a due obedience.

And there are evidences from Scripture ſufficient to ſatisfy an unprejudiced mind, of this eſtabliſhment. For as the names and characters which are therein given the Church imply government, ſuch as are thoſe of an houſe, a family, a city, and a kingdom; ſo there are inſtances of proper officers and miniſters, in whoſe hands this government was intruſted, together with many caſes and precedents of the actual exerciſe of it. And antiquity (the beſt interpreter of Scripture) ſhews, that from the very dawning of Chriſtianity, the Church has been under the charge and ſuperintendency of ſuch ſpiritual governors and miniſters, and that a deference and juſt ſubmiſſion to their authority have been conſtantly paid by all good Chriſtians.

Nor indeed is it poſſible that any ſociety, whether civil or Sacred, ſhould ever ſubſiſt without government. For this is like the ſinews or ligaments of the body; it keeps the parts of it in unity; and 'tis this unity that preſerves it in being.

Ver. 5. —— One Lord.] Jeſus Chriſt. See 1 Cor viii. 6.

—— One Faith.] In Chriſt.

—— One Baptiſm.] Into Chriſt. See Gal. iii. 27, 28.

Ver. 6. One God and Father of all.] Here the Apoſtle expreſly tells the Epheſians that they muſt believe in, and worſhip no other God than him, who is the Creator, or Father of us all. They had been ſervants of ſtrange gods, or it may be had lived as many do now-adays, as if there were no God to reward or puniſh them: And therefore I ſhall illuſtrate this Scripture by the following arguments.

To ſtate the true and proper notion of a God, there are three things generally taught concerning him. Firſt, that he is a neceſſary, ſelf-exiſting, independent Being; of himſelf alone from everlaſting, having no beginning, nor any cauſe or author of his being; and to everlaſting, without end of being. Secondly, that he is the original and ſole cauſe and author of all other beings whatſoever, without whom nothing ever was, nor ever can be. And laſtly, that he directs, provides for, rules and orders all other beings in the world, according to the greateſt, even infinite Wiſdom, Power, and Providence. Or, as our Church has excellently well deſcribed him in the firſt of her articles of religion, He is one living and true God, everlaſting, without body, parts, or paſſions, of infinite power, wiſdom and goodneſs, the maker and preſerver of all things, both viſible and inviſible. For if he were otherwiſe, in any one reſpect, he would be very far from being God; as will, by his aſſiſtance, be made appear hereafter.

Now, in order to perſuade to the belief of the being of a God, that is, that there is ſuch a Supreme Almighty Being as is before deſcribed; I know no better method can be taken, than by making out the folly and unreaſonableneſs of diſbelieving it. And this I ſhall endeavour from what the Pſalmiſt tells us more than once; The fool hath ſaid in his heart, there is no God, Pſal. xiv. 1. Corrupt are they, and have done abominable iniquity; there is none that doth good, liii. 1. Which Scriptures corroborate this apoſtolick aſſertion, and informs us,

I. That Atheiſm, or the diſbelief of God's exiſtence, if ſuch a thing there be, is very fooliſh and unreaſonable. And,

II. That mens believing that there is no God, or rather wiſhing there were no ſuch Being, is wholly owing to their wicked lives, the love they have for their vices, and their unwillingneſs to forſake their ſinful courſes, to ceaſe to do evil, and learn to do well. They are corrupt, and have done abominable iniquity; there is not one of them that cares to do good: And therefore they ſay in their hearts, there is no God.

I. Firſt then, That Atheiſm, or the diſbelief of God's exiſtence, if ſuch a thing there be, is very fooliſh and unreaſonable, will appear, I think, beyond all contradiction, from the following conſiderations.

Firſt, That to believe there is no God, is to believe a negative, not only which never has been, but which never can be proved.

It is true, indeed, To prove a negative, has always been accounted, in the general, an undertaking of great difficulty, and therefore, in moſt caſes, is not required: And in ſome caſes it is utterly impoſſible, and then it is moſt unreaſonable to require it. And as it would be juſtly thought unreaſonable to require proof of ſuch a negative, as cannot poſſibly be proved, ſo it is at leaſt unſafe, if not highly dangerous, to adhere to ſuch a negative: And no wiſe man will run ſo great a riſque, eſpecially when he ſees any reaſon and probability of advantage in believing and adhering to that matter, whatever it be, which, on the contrary, is affirmed.

If any negative be capable of proof, it cannot be by any other negative; becauſe that negative which is brought to prove another, muſt firſt be proved itſelf: And ſo we may be always proving, and be as far from any proof at laſt as ever we were. Nor can the proof of any negative be ſuch as is direct, unleſs we think it is enough to ſay, ſuch a thing is not, becauſe it is not; which is, in truth, no proof at all: But it muſt be by ſome juſt and neceſſary conſequence from ſomething that is true and certain. As for inſtance, ſuppoſe it be affirmed concerning any perſon, that he was at ſuch a place at ſuch a time; the only way for him to prove he was not there at ſuch a time, which is the negative he ought to prove, if poſſible, is to bring proof of his being or abiding at ſome other place at that ſame time; from whence the conſequence will be, that he could not poſſibly be there where he was affirmed to be at ſuch a time, becauſe no man can be in two places at one and the ſame time. Or, if a piece of bread ſhould be preſented to be ſeen and felt and taſted by us, and any perſon ſhould affirm it to be real fleſh, we ſee and feel and taſte it to be bread, and nothing elſe; and then, by conſequence, it cannot poſſibly be fleſh, becauſe this being a matter obvious to ſenſe, as to which our ſenſes cannot be deceived, if by our ſenſes it is proved to be the former, it cannot be the latter: And ſo this negative is likewiſe proved by the true and proper way of proving it.

But now, whatever may be done towards proving ſome ſuch negatives as theſe; yet, that there is no God, is ſuch a negative as can never be proved directly, nor by any conſequence whatever. For this being a matter no way obvious to ſenſe, none of our ſenſes can be brought to prove it. And if we have recourſe to reaſon, that appears plainly on the ſide of the affirmative, that there is, and muſt be ſuch a Being. And then if ſenſe and reaſon fail us, I know no other way or means whereby his nonexiſtence can be proved. To ſay, there is no God, becauſe we cannot ſee him, is as abſurd and as fooliſh as to ſay, there is no ſuch country as America, notwithſtanding all reports of travellers, only becauſe we never have been there to ſee it. And to think of making out the nonexiſtence of a God, only by ſaying, ſuch a Being is not neceſſary, is every whit as fooliſh and unreaſonable as the other, becauſe one negative is brought to prove another by, which is itſelf incapable of being proved, as will be ſeen hereafter. At preſent I proceed to

A ſecond conſideration, whereby the folly and unreaſonableneſs of Atheiſm will appear; to wit, that the arguments that have been urged to prove the being of a God, have at leaſt a ſhew of reaſon and probability, if they do not amount to a demonſtration of the thing; and that there have been hitherto no arguments produced on the other ſide of force enough to overthrow them. And I ſhall do little more than mention ſome of the arguments that have been commonly made uſe of to prove the being of a God; and by the way conſider briefly what is uſually alledged on the other ſide, in contradiction to this principle, and ſhew of how little force all that is urged againſt it is, and how far from overthrowing any of the arguments that are brought to prove it.

Now the arguments I ſhall take notice of, and endeavour to corroborate, are theſe that follow.

1. That if there be no God, there can be no tolerable account given of the original of the world, and the continuance and preſervation of all things in it in their ſeveral kinds, and in their proper frame and order hitherto.

2. That neither can it be imagined how man ſhould be, and continue what he is, without ſuppoſing ſuch a Being for his Maker and Preſerver. And,

3. That no reaſon can be given why men ſhould be ſo much concerned about their actions, as it is plain they are, in that they cannot help expreſſing a cheerfulneſs of ſpirit when they have done well, and manifeſting ſhame and terror in their minds for having done any evil; I ſay, there can be no good reaſon given of theſe things, unleſs ſome ſuch Being is ſuppoſed, who ſees and knows and takes account of what we do, and who by infinite juſtice and goodneſs is prompted and inclined to puniſh or reward men in a future ſtate, according as they ſhall be found to have deſerved in this life.

Firſt, then, we are informed by the author of the Book of Geneſis, that in the beginning God created the Heaven and the earth, Gen. i. 1. To which that of the Prophet is very agreeable, He hath made the earth by his power, he hath eſtabliſhed the world by his wiſdom, and hath ſtretched out the Heavens by his underſtanding, Jer. li. 15. In which words the Prophet plainly intimates, "That even in this viſible world there are manifeſt tokens or footſteps by which we may diſcover it to be the work or product of ſome Being who is infinitely powerful, wiſe and good. And that of theſe footſteps or ſigns there be innumerably many, which, ſingly taken, do diſcover ſuch perfections to be concerned in the production of them; the relation of ſeveral to each other, does more plainly and ſtrongly confirm the ſame, the connexion and correſpondence of all together does ſtill add more force and evidence thereto, each atteſting to the exiſtence of ſuch perfections, and all conſpiring to declare them concentred and united in one cauſe of being."

And, indeed, when we look upon and conſider even ſome of the meaneſt and leaſt conſiderable things in nature, how can we but admire the exactneſs and excellency of the skill appearing in the workmanſhip and contrivance of them, and acknowledge the unſpeakable wiſdom of their Maker? When we behold the flowers of the field, and obſerve how variouſly and curiouſly they are painted, ſo as no art can imitate or come near it; in ſhort, how pleaſing they are to the eye, how delightful to the ſmell, how beyond meaſure or expreſſion grateful to all our ſenſitive faculties; Quid aliud clamitat illa tam amæna naturæ vernantis facies, quam Opificis Dei Sapientiam, Bonitati parem? As a learned author hence concludes; What elſe can ſo pleaſant an aſpect of flouriſhing nature denote, but the wiſdom and goodneſs of God, the Author and Maker of it?

If we conſider, farther, the continual ſucceſſion of things in the ſame quality and order of nature, and as tending always to the ſame ends as at firſt they did; the production of the ſame fruit from the ſame ſeed; the exactmeſs of time they keep, every thing conſtantly flouriſhing in its proper ſeaſon, and continuing ſo to do, from one generation to another: We have reaſon to conclude, "That although it be not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that one or two things ſhould happen to be in the ſame manner; yet, that all things ſhould conſpire by chance, is a moſt unreaſonable and abſurd ſuppoſition: And that what thing ſover is univerſal and perpetual, cannot reſult from chance." But, as an ancient author notes it for a very ancient ſaying, and frequent in the mouths of all mankind, ſo we may venture to affirm, and have reaſon to believe, that from God all things, and by him all things were ſo conſtituted, and do ſubſiſt.

And if we with mature conſideration inſpect the curious art expreſſed in the make and form of natural things, the handſome ſhapes, and pleaſant looks of things below, which paſs the skill of the greateſt artiſt in the world, ſo much as to counterfeit any of them; if, as an ancient father has obſerved, that opinion of the Stoicks hold true, That the world was made, or has its being, for our ſakes, and all things contained therein, and which it brings forth, do apparently tend to the profit of man in the uſe of them: If the hiſtory of the creation, as we have it in our Bibles, tells us truly, that all things elſe were made before man had any being in the world; and if the poet, though an Heathen, confeſſes as much, that every region had its proper inhabitants, the firmament full of ſtars, the ſea abounding with fiſh, the earth with beaſts and creeping things, and the air with fowls of all ſorts; yet, after all,

Sanctius his animal, mentiſque capacius altæ
Deerat adhuc; & quod dominari in cætera poſſit.

There wanted yet ſome creature, more noble than all theſe, and of a more capacious and aſpiring ſoul, who might rule over them; and afterwards he tells us,

Natus homo eſt, &c.

A man was made: If, after all, I ſay, it does, or may appear, that man, though the moſt noble of all beings that are viſible, was yet uncapable of making any of theſe things we ſee, and do converſe with; Whom can we imagine able, that is, of power and skill ſufficient, to rear up ſuch a roof as the Heavens, and to lay ſuch a floor as the earth, but one who muſt not only be before, but above all other beings whatſoever?

Therefore, when we behold, and meditate upon all viſible beings in this lower world, and ſee how orderly they are framed, and how perfectly regulated, ſo as for ſo many ages ſucceſſively, even through all diſtances of time, as well as diverſities of place, to perſiſt in the ſame appearances, not to alter diſcernably, or to ſpeak of either in magnitude, or ſhape, but to continue ſtill in the ſame order and conſtitution, as they have always done; we cannot help thinking how theſe things ſhould be, and who ſhould be the author of them: And at laſt, when we have ſtrained our weak, ſhort-ſighted reaſon to the utmoſt length it is capable of reaching, we muſt conclude, that they could neither be by chance, nor of themſelves, but that, as we ſee all things in nature have ſome cauſe of being, they muſt undoubtedly begin to be by the unfathomable skill, and boundleſs power of ſome one firſt Almighty Being, who is the very ſame that we call God.

And if from theſe earthly things we mount our meditations to the ſpangled roof of Heaven, and there behold, and contemplate the orderly ſituation of the ſtars; how they are always regulated in the ſame order, and ſtand fixed, as it were, in their unfixedneſs, and ſteady in their motions; that they do not vary at all, ſenſibly, in their revolutions; how the ſun continues his wonted courſe, and the moon hers; and that theſe things never alter: We ſhall undoubtedly conclude, That thoſe cœleſtial ſquadrons could never be ranged in a form ſo proper, and march on ſo regularly, without the marſhalling and conduct of ſome moſt skilful captain, who at firſt appointed to every one of thoſe bright luminaries its proper ſtation, and marked out its way. And why ſhould not this be as convincing an argument to us, that a moſt wiſe and conſtant mind and will does direct, and an Almighty Hand uphold theſe things, as it was to men in ancient times, who had the only light of nature for their guide? Of whom we are informed, That when they took notice, that the ſun, moon, and ſtars, taking their courſe about the earth, did conſtantly ariſe alike in their colours, equal in their bigneſs, in the ſame places, and at the ſame times; did from ſuch obſervations as theſe, deduce the notion, and belief of the exiſtence of a God.

Man is, indeed, the only creature in this lower world, endued with reaſon, whereby he is rendred capable of diſcerning, and judging of the probability of things. But, as the Roman orator has ſomewhere very well obſerved, Who would call him a man, that beholding ſuch certain motions of the Heavenly bodies, ſuch ſettled ranks of ſtars, all things there ſo connected and ſuited together, ſhould deny ſome reaſon to be concerned in the production and ordering of thoſe things, or affirm thoſe things are by chance, which no underſtanding can conceive with how great counſel they are performed? And, as he puts the queſtion in another place, What other matter in the world can be ſo plain and reaſonable to us, who ſhall behold the Hervens, and contemplate things divine, as that there is, and muſt be ſome moſt excellent Divinity, by whom theſe things are governed? We may, therefore, with the Pſalmiſt truly ſay, The Heavens declare the Glory of God, and the firmament ſheweth his handy work; Pſal. xix. 1. And with the Apoſtle, The inviſible things of him from the creation of the world, are clearly ſeen, being underſtood by the things that are made, even his eternal Power and Godhead; Rom. i. 20. But,

Secondly, As the exiſtence of a God is thus reaſonably believed, from the conſideration of all the parts of this viſible world; ſo by conſidering man eſpecially, the moſt noble and excellent of all ſublunary beings, how fearfully and wonderfully he is made, we ſhall ſee yet more and greater reaſon to believe it.

Now man is made up of two main conſtituent parts; a body and a ſoul: A body viſible and ſenſible, and a ſoul inviſible and rational: A body mortal, that is, ſubject to death; and a ſoul, immortal, which never dies.

And firſt, if we conſider his body, the curious workmanſhip thereof from head to foot, how fitly all its members are connected and joined together for the relief and ſupport of each other, and the welfare of the whole; how neatly every part is fitted for the performance of its proper motion, how the nerves and ſinews are made the meet-helpers, whereby all the parts are moved, that the parts do not move all at once confuſedly, but every one in its proper place and time, and order, as need requires. If we obſerve, how the veins, and other ſluces are appointed to keep the blood within its due bounds and compaſs that it cannot intermix by over-flowing, with any other matter belonging to the body, how by theſe veſſels the blood is conveyed into all parts of the body; how by, or according to the motion of the pulſe theſe fountains do continually ebb and flow: If we could inſpect the curious frame and conſtitution of other internal parts, and ſee how regularly they all execute their proper functions: Or, if we but conſider, what we may more eaſily acquaint ourſelves withal, with how great art and skill there are particular members, whereby every ſenſitive faculty performs its office, as the hands and fingers to feel, touch and handle; the noſe to ſmell; the palate to taſte; the ears to hear; and the eyes to ſee: Upon the whole, we muſt acknowledge human bodies to be the product of an Almighty Power, Wiſdom and Goodneſs. But then,

Secondly, If we conſider the excellency of the ſoul, that principle of operations, as philoſophers term it; if we could view it in all its perfections, and amazing productions; if we could ſee how the reaſon and underſtanding work together for the guidance, inſtruction and management of the will; and how all three ſometimes conſpire together to make both ſoul and body happy, both at preſent, and for ever: How could we but acknowledge the greateſt, even infinite wiſdom to have been concerned in the production of it? To be ſhort; As the ſoul ſhews its ſuperiority over the body, by deriving life and motion to it; ſo from this power and excellency of the ſoul, is manifeſted a power and excellency ſuperior to that: And as we know, though we had not been told it, that without the ſoul, the body is dead; ſo we may certainly conclude, that the life of the ſoul is maintained by ſome moſt perfect being, who is life it ſelf. And now,

The third argument I mentioned, whereby to ſhew the folly and unreaſonableneſs of Atheiſm, or the disbelief of God's exiſtence, is, mens being ſo much concerned about their actions, as it is plain they are, in that they cannot help expreſſing a cheerfulneſs of ſpirit when they have done well, and maniſeſting ſhame and terror in their minds for having done evil: Of which, I ſaid, there can be no good reaſon given, unleſs ſome ſuch Being is ſuppoſed, who ſees, and knows, and takes account of what we do; and who by infinite juſtice and goodneſs is prompted and inclined to puniſh or reward men in a future ſtate, according as they ſhall be found to have deſerved in this life.

There is no man but has a conſcience, whoſe convictions are frequent and irreſiſtible. It is a near and ready witneſs, by no means to be quieted, or bought off; and ſuch an impartial judge, as will never have reſpect to perſons, but either accuſes and condemns, or excuſes and acquits all alike, and will be ſure to act its part, and do juſtice to every man ſometime or other. Let the wicked act his ſins never ſo ſecretly, his conſcience will be privy to them, and take ſome proper ſeaſon to convince him of the guilt he has contracted, and torment and vex him with it. And what account can be given of ſuch a witneſs, and of ſuch a judge in every man's own breaſt, if there be not ſome Supreme All-knowing Being, with whom he muſt account, ſometime or other, for all that he has done? For, that this uneaſineſs, which the conviction of a man's conſcience cauſes in him, does not always ariſe from fear of puniſhment from men, is very plain; in that firſt, a ſin may be ſo ſecretly committed, as not to be diſcovered and detected by any man whatever. Or, ſecondly, the ſinner may be one, who is, if not above the power, yet out of the reach of human laws. And in either of theſe circumſtances, what cauſe can ſuch a ſinner have to be afraid of human puniſhment, or that his mind ſhould be diſturbed on that account? Beſides, there are not wanting inſtances of ſome, who have deſired others to diſpatch them, in hopes they might be freed thereby from the terrors of a guilty mind; as if conſcience were to take her leave with this life, and not to accompany the ſoul into the next; the contrary to which will undoubtedly be found to be moſt true: Which conviction in the minds of men in this life, and thoſe terrors of conſcience which attend it, are chiefly cauſed by the unavoidable apprehenſion of ſome ſuperior judge, who will call men to account, and deal impartial juſtice to them one day, according to the merit of their actions; and that judge muſt be God. And ſince this fear, even in the moſt hardned and obſtinate offenders, is not by any means to be extinguiſhed; it follows, that the opinion of a God, which men have univerſally, and the fearful apprehenſion of his juſtice, conſequent on that opinion, are imprinted on mens minds by God himſelf, who will not ſuffer wicked men to ſin ſecurely, though they may be in no danger of any human judgment.

Nor is the comfort that mens conſciences afford them, when they have at any time done well, a leſs convincing argument of the exiſtence of a God, than the torment and vexation conſequent upon their doing evil. Even wicked men do ſometimes find ſuch peace and ſatisfaction in their minds upon their having done ſome good and virtuous actions, that they cannot help expreſſing it by a cheerful countenance, and an unuſual, becauſe an eaſy and unforced pleaſantneſs of humour at ſuch times. Which, as it ſhews that goodneſs and virtue give the trueſt pleaſure and ſatisfaction even in this preſent life, ſo it evinces that inward ſenſe and apprehenſion all men have, and cannot help expreſſing, of the exiſtence of ſome being, who is privy to, and takes account of all their actions: Or elſe, there can no reaſon be aſſigned, of theſe ſo frequent alterations in the minds of men; that they ſhould according as they have done well or ill, be ſo eaſy, and ſo naturally pleaſant ſometimes, and at other times ſo uneaſy and dejected; and that they cannot help diſcovering it to be ſo with them, notwithſtanding all endeavours to conceal it, and to appear otherwiſe affected.

In ſhort; "Every particular man has a particular remembrancer in himſelf, as a ſufficient teſtimony of his Creator, Lord, and Judge. We know there is a great force of conſcience in all men, by which their thoughts are ever accuſing or excuſing them, as the Apoſtle has it, Rom. ii. 15. They feel a comfort in thoſe virtuous actions which they find themſelves to have wrought according to their rule, and a ſting and ſecret remorſe for all vicious acts and impious machinations. Nay, thoſe who ſtrive moſt to deny a God, and to obliterate all ſenſe of Divinity out of their ſouls, have not been leaſt ſenſible of this remembrancer in their breaſts. It is true, indeed, that a falſe opinion of God, and a ſuperſtitious perſwaſion which has nothing of the true God in it, may breed a remorſe of conſcience in thoſe who think it true; and therefore, ſome may hence collect, that the force of conſcience is only grounded upon an opinion of a Deity, and that opinion may be falſe. But if it be a truth, as the teſtimonies of all the wiſeſt writers of moſt different perſwaſions, and experience of all ſorts of perſons of moſt various inclinations do agree, that the remorſe of conſcience can never be obliterated, than it rather proves, than ſuppoſes an opinion of a Divinity: And that man, who moſt peremptorily denies God's exiſtence, is the greateſt argument himſelf that there is a God. Let Caligula profeſs himſelf an Atheiſt, and with that profeſſion hide his head, or run under his bed, when the thunder ſtrikes his ears, and lightning flaſhes in his eyes; thoſe terrible works of nature, put him in mind of the power, and his own guilt of the juſtice of God; whom while in his wilful opinion he weakly denies, in his voluntary action he ſtrongly aſſerts. So that a Deity will either be granted or extorted; and where it is not acknowledged it will be manifeſted. Only unhappy is that man, who denies him to himſelf, and proves him to others, who will not acknowledge his exiſtence, while yet he cannot be ignorant of his power. In a word, God is not far from every one of us: And it was the proper diſcourſe of Paul to the philoſophers at Athens, That they might feel after him, and find him, Acts xvii. 27. Some children have been ſo ungracious, as to refuſe to give the honour due unto their parents; but never any ſo irrational, as to deny they had a father. As for thoſe who have diſhonoured God, it may ſtand moſt with their intereſt, and therefore, they may wiſh there were none; but it cannot conſiſt with their reaſon to aſſert there is none: Since, as the Apoſtle told the ſame philoſophers, even the very poets among the Heathens have taught us, That we are his off-ſpring," ver. 28. And in the Scripture before us he tells the Epheſians, that he is the Father of us all.

And now, what can any Atheiſt ſay to all theſe arguments; either from the frame and conſtitution of the world in general, or of man in particular, or from the witneſs of conſcience in his own ſoul, to ſhew the invalidity of either of them to prove the exiſtence of a God? Or what oracles of reaſon can be brought to prove the contrary, or to make out how theſe things are, ſuppoſing there is no ſuch being? To ſay, the world, or any being in it, was of itſelf, is to contradict the ſenſe and reaſon and experience of all ages; which all agree, that nothing viſible in nature is, or could be of itſelf, but every thing has its being from ſome cauſe without itſelf, and no inſtance can be given of the contrary. And to aſcribe theſe things to chance, is to give the reputation of great conſtancy and regularity to that, which of all things in the world, is the moſt unconſtant and irregular. And to ſay, that all things were at firſt produced by a fortuitous concourſe of atoms, without knowing whence thoſe atoms were, and not being able to conceive how they ſhould happen to fall in ſo regularly with one another, as to produce at once, or by degrees, ſo many ſorts of beings in the Heavens, earth and ſeas, ſo beautiful, ſo conſtant, and ſo regular in all their motions and appearances; is to derive the being of all things from that, which can neither be, nor act itſelf, without ſome other cauſe: For no particle of matter can move, or act upon another but as it is ſet on work by ſome external cauſe of motion. And, laſtly, to aſcribe the being and continuance of all things to that firſt moving principle, as ſome have called it, the ſoul of the world, is to come pretty near to an acknowledgment of God's exiſtence, if it does not amount to a downright owning of it: For either that ſoul of the world, if ſuch a principle there be, muſt have ſome cauſe of its own being, and then it cannot be the cauſe of all things; or it muſt be from all eternity, a living, active being, of itſelf, and from no other, and then it muſt be that ſame being, that very God, for whoſe exiſtence we have been hitherto contending. For ſome firſt moving, and firſt living principle there muſt be, who was the cauſe of all things elſe, as having none of his own being; and that can be no other, than him whom we call God.

And now, to all that has been offered, by which it appears very probable at leaſt, if not abſolutely neceſſary, that there ſhould be a God, who at firſt made, and does ever ſince preſerve the world, and all things in it; I might add, the conſideration of that inſcrutable wiſdom, by which bodies politick are ordered and upheld, and the unſearchable reaſon of ſupernatural effects, of which we can give no tolerable account, unleſs by ſuppoſing ſome Supreme Almighty Being, whoſe wiſdom and power are ſufficient for ſuch productions. I might alſo produce innumerable teſtimonies of men in all ages, who having only the light of nature for their guide, have yet with one conſent born witneſs to the being of a God; from whence, if there were no other argument for it, the belief of God's exiſtence would appear highly reaſonable, becauſe, as Grotius very well obſerves, It is taken from the maniſeſt conſent and ſuffrage of all nations, among whom reaſon and good manners are not wholly laid aſide, and their people become brutes. For hence we may conclude with the philoſopher, What ſeems true to ſome wiſe men, is ſomewhat probable; what ſeems true to moſt, or to all wiſe men, is very probable; what moſt men, wiſe and unwiſe aſſent to, ſtill more nearly reſembles truth; but what all men univerſally conſent in, has the higheſt probability, and approaches near to demonſtrable truth; ſo near, that it may juſtly be accounted ridiculous arrogance and ſelf-conceit, or intolerable obſtinacy and perverſeneſs to deny it. But I muſt haſten to the Third, and laſt conſideration, by which, I ſaid, the folly and unreaſonableneſs of Atheiſm would appear; to wit, That ſuppoſing the uncertainty were equal on both ſides, and there were no better reaſon to believe, than there is to disbelieve a God; yet, ſince to disbelieve a God can be no manner of advantage, but may prove a mighty diſadvantage to us, if we ſhould be miſtaken; and ſince to believe a God can be no real injury, but may be vaſtly beneficial to us, if there is ſuch a Being: Then it is very fooliſh, as well as dangerous, not to take the ſafeſt ſide.

And to make good this, I ſhall only propoſe to be ſeriouſly conſidered, what an excellent prelate of our Church has very well and truly obſerved;

The Atheiſt, ſays he, contends againſt the religious man, That there is no God; but upon ſtrange inequality and odds, for he ventures his eternal intereſt; whereas the religious man ventures only the loſs of his luſts, which it is much better for him to be without, or at the utmoſt but of ſome temporal convenience; and all this while is inwardly more contented and happy, and uſually more healthful, and perhaps meets with more reſpect and faithfuller friends, and lives in a more ſecure and flouriſhing condition, and more free from the evils and puniſhments of this world, than the Atheiſtical perſon does; however, it is not much that he ventures: And after this life, if there be no God, he will be in as good a condition as the other; but if there be a God, the religious man will be in a much better condition than the Atheiſt, even as much as unſpeakable and eternal happineſs is better than extreme and endleſs miſery. So that, if the arguments for and againſt a God were equal and it were an even queſtion, Whether there were a God or not? Yet the hazard and danger is ſo infinitely unequal, that in point of prudence and intereſt every man were obliged to incline to the affirmative: And whatever doubts he might have about it, to chuſe the ſafeſt ſide of the queſtion, and to make that the principle to live by. For he that acts wiſely, and is a throughly prudent man, will be provided againſt all events, and will take care to ſecure the main chance, whatever happens: But the Atheiſt, in caſe things ſhould fall out contrary to his belief and expectation, has made no proviſion for this caſe. If contrary to his confidence it ſhould prove in the iſſue, that there is a God, the man is loſt and undone for ever. If the Atheiſt, when he dies, ſhould find that his ſoul remains after his body, and has only quitted its lodging, how will this man be amazed and blanked, when, contrary to his expectation, he ſhall find himſelf in a new and ſtrange place, amidſt a world of ſpirits, entered upon an everlaſting and unchangeable ſtate? How ſadly will the man be diſappointed, when he finds all things otherwiſe than he had ſtated and determined in this world? When he comes to appear before that God, whom he has denied, and againſt whom he has ſpoken as deſpightful things as he could, who can imagine the pale and guilty looks of this man, and how he will ſhiver and tremble, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his Majeſty? How will he be ſurprized with terrors on every ſide, to find himſelf thus unexpectedly, and irrecoverably plunged into a ſtate of ruin and deſparation? And thus things may happen, for all this man's confidence now. For our belief or disbelief of a thing does not alter the nature of the thing. We cannot fancy things into being, or make them vaniſh into nothing, by the ſtubborn confidence of our imaginations. Things are as ſullen as we are; and will be what they are, whatever we think of them. And if there be a God, a man cannot, by an obſtinate disbelief of his exiſtence, make him ceaſe to be, any more than a man, by winking, can put out the ſun.

This may ſuffice for a proof, that Atheiſm, or the diſbelief of God's Exiſtence, if ſuch a thing there be, is very fooliſh and unreaſonable. And,

II. Secondly, If any men believe that there is no God, or rather wiſh there was none, it is wholly owing to their wicked lives, the love they have for vice, and their unwillingneſs to forſake their ſinful courſes, to ceaſe to do evil, and learn to do well. They are corrupt, and have done abominable iniquity; there is not one of them that cares to do good: And therefore, they ſay in their hearts, There is no God.

They ſay in their hearts; that is, they wiſh, or deſire there may be no God. They have no ground to believe, or ſo much as to hope there is none; for all the reaſon in the world is againſt them, ſtrongly ſuggeſting, if not clearly proving, that there is a God. However, it is for their intereſt that there ſhould be none, and therefore they wiſh, or ſay in their hearts, there is none; for the reaſon given by the Pſalmiſt.

They are corrupt, ſays the Pſalmiſt. And ſo all men are by nature, ſince the fall; every man comes into the world with the ſtain and guilt of original ſin upon him: And if this of it ſelf were enough to incline men to Atheiſm, one would think all men ſhould be Atheiſts naturally, and conſequently, that by this time, there ſhould be no notion of a

God to be found in the world. But the contrary to this is manifeſt, beyond diſpute. Therefore, the meaning of the Pſalmiſt muſt be this: That the Atheiſt is not only corrupt by nature, as all other men are; but does likewiſe yield and give way to the corruption of his nature, and is more ſtrongly inclined to gratify his luſts, than other men: And therefore, that he may do this with as little diſturbance to his mind as is poſſible, he fancies, and would fain perſuade himſelf, that there is no God: Becauſe, ſuppoſing it to be according to his wiſh, that there is no ſuch being in the world, he may indulge himſelf the more ſecurely in his beloved ſins, and take his ſwinge of every thing that is pleaſing to his ſenſual appetite, and be more free from fearful apprehenſions of a reckoning to come, than it is poſſible he ſhould be, ſuppoſing ſuch a being. Then

The Pſalmiſt adds, They have done abominable iniquity. That is, ſuch perſons know themſelves to have been guilty of many great and enormous wickedneſſes, for which, if there be a God, they muſt one day come to an account, and be for ever puniſhed, if they die without repentance; and therefore, they cannot but think it much for their intereſt, and from thence be ſtrongly inclined to wiſh, that there were no ſuch being. And truly, it would be happy for ſuch perſons, if all things were according to their wiſh; if there were no God, nor any future ſtate of happineſs, or miſery, but the end of the preſent life were alſo the end of being to all men: For then, they that make the moſt of this life, that is, who moſt indulge themſelves in vanity and pleaſure, and have eſtates to carry them thro' all licentiouſneſs, and make uſe of them accordingly, might be looked upon as the wiſeſt and happieſt of mankind; it being true, what the Apoſtle ſays of all religious men, If in this life only they had hope, they are of all men moſt miſerable; 1 Cor. xv. 19. becauſe, upon their principles, they muſt abridge themſelves of all, or moſt of the enjoyments of this life, which are by others thought to conſtitute man's happineſs, only in hope of a truer, more ſubſtantial, and more durable felicity, which, upon the Atheiſt's principles, is no where to be found. But if the religious man is in the right, and the Atheiſt in the wrong; that is, if there be a God, and future ſtate of rewards and puniſhments; then Atheiſm is the greateſt folly, and the Atheiſt will ſurely find himſelf the moſt miſerable creature in the world; becauſe he has done abominable iniquity, and lives in the practice of all ſorts of wickedneſs, upon a very falſe, and groundleſs principle, which has no reaſon to ſupport it.

And laſtly, ſays the Pſalmiſt, There is none that does good. The Atheiſt is ſo wholly bent to the gratifying of his luſts, that he cannot bring himſelf to think of any thing, but what has, ſome way or other, a tendency thereto. He has not God in all his thoughts; nor does he care to ſpend a thought on any thing that is good, much leſs to practice it; but all his care and cunning are laid out in contriving how to pleaſe his vicious inclinations, and entertain his ſenſual appetite with new delights and pleaſures. For, non ſemper erunt ſaturnalia; the thread of life he knows is ſhort, at longeſt, and may be quickly cut aſunder; and then, he thinks, or would perſuade himſelf, if it were poſſible, that there is nothing to be met with on the other ſide the grave: Therefore he thus beſpeaks his bon companions, whom he knows to have the ſame complaiſance that he himſelf has entertained for vice, for vanity, and ſenſual pleaſures; Let us eat and drink, for to morrow we die; 1 Cor. xv. 32. Let us enjoy our ſelves while we may: A merry life, though ſhort, is beſt, becauſe, when we go from hence, we have nothing farther to expect; but as we once were nothing, ſo, when this life is ended, we ſhall again be nothing to eternity. In ſhort, all the imaginations of his heart are only evil, and that, continually: He cares not to do, or think on any thing that is good; and therefore, he ſays in his heart, There is no God.

——— Who is above all, and through all, and in you all.] As the Apoſtle had ſaid, this God, our Father, who created Heaven and earth, is not like unto thoſe falſe gods you have renounced for the faith of Chriſt; but he is every where, and extends his Divine Providence over all the works of the creation; endeavouring thereby to confirm his aſſertion of a God by theſe two Divine Attributes, immenſity and providence. Of which two attributes, I ſhall endeavour to give as clear an account as Scripture and reaſon afford us. And firſt,

A Diſſertation on the Immenſity of God.

The Prophet Iſaiah ſpeaking of the immenſity of God, has theſe remarkable words, very expreſſive of the nobleneſs of the ſubject; he ſpeaks in the name of the Lord, ſaying, Thus ſaith the Lord, the Heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footſtool: Where is the houſe that ye build unto me? And where is the place of my reſt, Iſai. lxvi. 1. For if Heaven be the throne of God, and earth his footſtool, it muſt follow of neceſſity, that he is ſo preſent both in Heaven and on earth, that is, in all the world at once, as to be neither circumciſed within, nor limited unto, nor yet excluded out of any place, at any time: In ſhort, that he is preſent every where, after an ineffable and inconceivable manner, ſo as there can be no place in the whole world imagined, where he is not.

I. In order to make out the immenſity, or omnipreſence of God from Scripture, I ſhall take notice of two ſorts of teſtimonies, which the Sacred Writings do afford us to this purpoſe.

One ſort is, whereby he is expreſly affirmed to be immenſe, and omnipreſent.

The other is, ſuch as from which we cannot but infer, he is, and muſt be ſo.

The firſt, then, ſhall be taken from the Prophet Jeremy, Am I a God at hand, ſaith the Lord, and not a God afar off? Can any hide himſelf in ſecret places, that I ſhall not ſee him? ſaith the Lord: Do not I fill Heaven and earth? ſaith the Lord, Jer. xxiii. 23, 24. As if he had ſaid, I am a God that fills, and is preſent in all places.

Another teſtimony to this purpoſe, is, thoſe words of Solomon, in his prayer at the dedication of the temple; But will God indeed dwell on the earth? Behold, the Heaven, and Heaven of Heavens cannot contain thee; how much leſs this houſe that I have builded? 1 Kings viii. 27. This is as expreſs as one would wiſh, for the immenſity of God. But,

Thirdly, We may add to theſe thoſe words of Zophar; Canſt thou by ſearching find out God? Canſt thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is as high as Heaven, what canſt thou do? Deeper than hell, what canſt thou know? The meaſure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the ſea, Job xi. 7, 8, 9. That is, as the Pſalmiſt has expreſſed the infinity, and ſo the immenſity of God, Great is the Lord; and his greatneſs is unſearchable, Pſal. cxlv. 3. Becauſe, as the old tranſlation reads it, There is no end thereof. To all which,

Fourthly, I ſhall add one teſtimony more, which I take to be as plain as any to this purpoſe; and that is from the Pſalmiſt too Whither ſhall I go from thy Spirit? Or whither ſhall I flee from thy preſence? If I aſcend up into Heaven, thou art there: If I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermoſt parts of the ſea; even there ſhall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand ſhall hold me, Pſal. cxxxix. 7, 8, 9, 10.

But, beſides theſe expreſs and poſitive teſtimonies to this matter, I ſaid, there is another ſort, from which we cannot but infer, that God is, and muſt be immenſe and omnipreſent: And they are ſuch as ſpeak of God's working all things, in all places; and of his upholding all things by the word of his power; and by conſequence, his being not far from every one of us. With reſpect to which laſt inſtance, the reaſon given, why he is ſo near to every one, is this; becauſe, in him we live, and move, and have our being. Now we can no way be more certain of the preſence of any perſon any where, than by the actions and operations of that perſon in ſuch or ſuch a place: And it is as impoſſible for any one to act, where he is not preſent, as it would be, if he were not in being.

Thus, then we ſee, the Scriptures clearly teach, that God is immenſe and omnipreſent; and this I think, is not denied by any. Only the manner how he is ſo, is diſputed; whether he be ſo eſſentially, or only potentially, and providentially? that is, Whether God be ſo immenſe and omnipreſent, by, or according to his eſſence, or only by his providence and power? For we have nothing now to do with any of thoſe various ways, in which God is ſaid to be peculiarly preſent in ſome places, and with ſome perſons, upon ſome ſpecial and extraordinary occaſions: As he is ſaid to be in Chriſt, by the hypoſtatical union of the Divine with the true human nature, and the fulneſs of the Godhead dwelling in him, Col. ii. 9. as he is ſaid to be in Heaven by his glory, and in the Church by his grace. Nor have we any thing to do at preſent, with any ſymbolical preſence of the Deity, whereby God has ſometimes manifeſted himſelf to his ſervants in viſible ſymbols, as he did to Moſes in the buſh, Exod. iii. 2. to the people of Iſrael in the pillar of a cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, ch. xiii. 21. and to the fathers in the form of men or Angels: Nor with his myſtical or ſacramental preſence, by which he exhibits and conveys, and ſeals his grace unto us under certain external elements and ſigns to be adminiſtred unto, and received by all the faithful, as the appointed means in order thereunto. Nor, laſtly, with the quickning preſence of his Holy Spirit, by which he is ſaid to dwell in the hearts of all his faithful ſervants, 1 Cor. iii. 16. 2 Tim. i. 14. For, that according to theſe ſeveral ways he is more peculiarly preſent in ſome places, than in others, and with ſome perſons, than with others, is not that I can find, denied by any; and therefore, there can be no diſpute concerning either of them. But the matter controverted is, the general preſence of God, by, or according to his eſſence; by which, if he be immenſe, he muſt be preſent every where at once. And this leads me to endeavour,

II. In the ſecond place, to make out God to be immenſe and omnipreſent, from the reaſon of the thing.

Now, though it be a matter of inſuperable difficulty, to ſay preciſely how God is immenſe and omnipreſent; yet, that he is, and muſt be ſo, is not difficult to ſhew, becauſe our moſt natural and eaſy notions of a God do imply, and prove him to be ſo. For God, as ſuch, cannot be bounded by, nor circumſcribed within, nor limited to any place, of how vaſt extent ſoever; and if he cannot be ſo bounded, circumſcribed, nor limited, then he muſt be every where at once; which is the proper notion, or rather definition of immenſity. For by the immenſity of any being, is always to be underſtood, that ſuch a being is unmeaſurable, as having no dimenſions, no length, nor breadth, nor depth to be by any means diſcovered by us. And ſuch a being God muſt be, or elſe he muſt be bounded by, and limited to place; ſince whatever may be meaſured, is, and muſt be ſo: Becauſe, how long, or broad, or deep ſoever it may be, there muſt be ſome ſpace beyond it, or beneath it, or above it, to render it capable of being meaſured; or elſe it muſt be thought to fill all places, and to be preſent every where at once, to render it unmeaſurable, which nothing that is finite can be thought to do: For nothing leſs than infinite can fill all places at one time; and whatever being does not ſo, neither is, nor can be God.

But now, how can we imagine God to be immenſe and omnipreſent, unleſs he be eſſentially ſo? For if, as has been ſhewn, the Divine Eſſence, or nature, is infinite, it muſt likewiſe be immenſe and omnipreſent; ſince reaſon will inform us, without the aſſiſtance of any other light, that whatever being is not omnipreſent, and by conſequence, immenſe, neither is, nor can be infinite. And ſince whatever is in God, is God, to ſay, what all muſt own, that God is preſent every where by his power, knowledge, providence, &c. is the ſame as if we ſhould affirm him to be preſent every where as God. For as the power, &c. of the Deity cannot be without the eſſence or nature of the Deity; ſo by conſequence, wherever any of thoſe attributes of power, knowledge, &c. are exerted, there the Divine Nature alſo muſt exiſt; becauſe the former, as they are in God, cannot be without the latter.

Now, that by his power and providence he is preſent every where is plain, from what we read concerning him in Scripture; that he produces and governs, and directs all things: And with reſpect to man particularly, that he works in every one to will and do according to his pleaſure; and that, in ſhort, it is in him, or by his power, that we live, and move, and have our being, Acts xvii. 28. And that he is alike preſent to all places, and all beings whatſoever by his knowledge, is as plain, from the account which the ſame Scriptures give us of him; that he ſees, and is perfectly acquainted with all things that either are, or ever have been, or ever ſhall be. For, ſays the author to the Hebrews, There is no creature that is not manifeſt in his ſight; but all things are naked and open unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do, Heb. iv. 13. But it is very difficult, if not utterly impoſſible, to conceive the omnipreſence of his knowledge, providence and power, without the immenſity and omnipreſence of his eſſence, or nature. Nor will it help us any thing, to ſay, it is his Holy Spirit, by which he thus ſearches, and is intimately preſent to, and in, and with all things, all places, and all perſons; becauſe, if God be a moſt pure and ſimple Spirit, as he muſt be, or he is not God, then by conſequence, the Spirit of God is God: And ſo, to ſay, The Spirit ſearches all things, and is preſent every where, is the very ſame, as if it ſhould be ſaid, that God, who is a Spirit, is preſent every where, and ſearches, and is perfectly acquainted with all things.

And ſo we muſt be always underſtood, when we ſpeak of God's immenſity and omnipreſence; not that he is preſent every where, and uncapable of bounds and limitations and circumſcription as a body, but as a Spirit, which by reaſon of its being wholly void of matter, is capable of penetrating any place, and as ſuch a Spirit too, which, contrary to the nature and capacities of all other ſpirits, does actually penetrate all places, and is preſent every where at once. For, that God is not preſent every where as a body, is plain; becauſe no body can be ſo. For whatever is material, as all bodies are, how big ſoever it may be, is circumſcribed within ſome place; that is, there is ſome ſpace beyond it, in which it is not preſent: And therefore, by juſt conſequence, if God were at all corporeal, he could not be immenſe and omnipreſent, becauſe it is the ſettled nature of all bodies, or corporeal ſubſtances, ſo to be limited to place, as when they are in one, to be abſent from all other places at that time. Therefore, I ſay, when we ſpeak of the immenſity and omnipreſence of the Deity, we muſt be underſtood to mean, his being preſent in all places at one time, as an infinite all-penetrating Spirit, whoſe greatneſs is ſuch, as no line of thought can fathom, nor any reaſon comprehend; and whoſe ſole property it is, to be boundleſs, and unſearchable by men or Angels, or elſe he is not God.

And thus, I think, it does ſufficiently appear, that God is immenſe and omnipreſent, and that he is eſſentially ſo; both from Scripture and the reaſon of the thing. Now,

III. For the conſent of all the wiſer Heathens to this truth; though, after what has been already offered, their evidence can be of little uſe to prove it; becauſe, if it has Scripture and reaſon on its ſide, no farther teſtimony can be needful to confirm it: Yet, conſidering how agreeable to reaſon, as well as conſonant to Scripture, their teſtimony is, who had no other way of knowing God, but only by the light of nature, or unaſſiſted reaſon, it is not to be wholly ſlighted and diſregarded by us, as to this affair.

Therefore, to be ſhort on this particular; when by the beſt of Heathen authors we are told, "That there is no place where God is not, but he fills all his works, ſo that, wherever we go, he will find us out, and wherever we are he is preſent with us; that he is preſent in, and fills all places; that he at once traverſes, and in the ſelfſame inſtant with his preſence fills, both the Heavens, earth and ſeas; that our perſons and our actions are naked and open to his view, and under his inſpection wherever we are, and how ſecretly ſoever we may act; and, to ſum up all, that he is an indeterminate circle, whoſe centre is every where, but his circumference no where to be found:" Theſe, and the like deſcriptions of the Deity, which we meet with very frequently in the writings of the beſt and wiſeſt Heathens, do plainly ſhew it to be conſonant to the moſt natural and eaſy notions mankind ever had of God, and what they might and did diſcover by the light of unaſſiſted reaſon only, that God by nature, or according to his eſſence, is, and muſt be, immenſe and omnipreſent.

Though after all I muſt confeſs, if this doctrine had not Scripture as well as reaſon to ſupport it, the difficulties which attend it would make it very hard to be believed. For how any Being ſhould be preſent every where at once, and fill all places with his preſence at one time, is what unaſſiſted human reaſon cannot comprehend; that is, we cannot poſſibly conceive the manner how it is, or can be ſo, nor by conſequence could we eaſily be perſuaded to believe it is ſo, if the Scriptures, which we take and own to be the Word of God, had not plainly told us that it is ſo. And yet I muſt acknowledge likewiſe, that it would be no leſs difficult to think how any being ſhould be God, and yet be circumſcribed within, or bounded by, or limited to any place. Now, therefore, that it is revealed unto us in and by thoſe Sacred Oracles, by which we know we cannot be deceived; we may aſſuredly believe it is, and muſt be ſo; that God, whoſe eſſence or nature is infinite, cannot poſſibly be otherwiſe than immenſe and omnipreſent, though we cannot comprehend the manner how he is ſo.

It is true, the inſpired Preacher tells us, God is in Heaven, and we upon earth, Eccl. v. 2. But we are not ſo to underſtand him, as if God were ſo confined to Heaven, as not to be preſent alſo with us on the earth. For the ſame perſon tells us in another place, That the Heaven, and Heaven of Heavens cannot contain him, 1 Kings viii. 27. And the Prophet has aſſured us in the place firſt cited, that as Heaven is the throne of God, ſo the earth is his footſtool, Iſaiah lxvi. 1. which explains theſe words of the Apoſtle, who is above all, and through all, and in you all. For ſo he muſt be preſent on the earth as well and at the ſame time as he is preſent in the Heavens. For, as another Prophet tells us, He fills both Heaven and earth, Jer. xxiii. 24. Therefore, when God is ſaid to be in Heaven, he is not ſaid to be ſo there, as to be excluded from the earth, or as if he were ſo confined to Heaven, as to be preſent no where elſe; but becauſe Heaven is his throne, he is ſaid to be in a more eminent and peculiar manner preſent there than he is in any other place.

But then, it may be asked, if God be thus immenſe and omnipreſent by or according to his eſſence, What reaſon can we give for lifting up our eyes to Heaven when we pray? Which all men do by nature, and we Chriſtians are required, or at leaſt encouraged to do in the Sacred Writings. For thus while our belief or opinion is, that God is every where at once, our practice is as if he were really in Heaven only. To clear this matter, therefore, I ſhall briefly give the reaſon in the following particulars.

Firſt, That when we would draw nigh to God in prayer, we ought to withdraw our thoughts and affections from all earthly tranſitory things, and fix them wholly and ſolely upon God; and that at ſuch a time, and in ſuch an action eſpecially, we ſhould entertain no thoughts of God but ſuch as are great, and noble, and excellent; and in order thereunto, we ought rather to fix the eyes of our bodies, and of our underſtandings alſo, upon his throne, than upon his footſtool, to lift them up to Heaven, rather than caſt them on the earth.

Secondly, That we ſhould contemplate Heaven, and look up to it, as the ſeat and throne of God, where he both vouchſafes a more illuſtrious manifeſtation of himſelf, and a more abundant communication of his grace and glory; and from whence all ſorts of bleſſings, preſent and future, are to be ſought for, and expected by us: As under the Old Teſtament œconomy, when they prayed to God, they were wont to turn their faces towards the Ark and Temple; not becauſe God was ſhut up in, or confined to either of them, for that could not be; but becauſe of the ſingular manifeſtation of his grace and goodneſs, which he uſed to vouchſafe unto them in, and as it were, from thoſe Holy Places.

Thirdly, That we may always gratefully, and with comfort, pleaſure, and ſatisfaction, remember, that Heaven is to be the place of our eternal reſt and happineſs, which God has prepared for us, and which we ſhould always long for, and aſpire after; and that, as the exiled Iſraelites were wont, not only to look back towards their own beloved country, and the Temple, or Houſe of God which was therein, but to ſend up daily vows and prayers to the Throne of Grace, that they might again return thither; ſo we ſhould in like manner, as pilgrims and ſtrangers here below, continually breath after, and deſire to come into our country, the Heavenly Jeruſalem, which is above, and in which we know we ſhall be happy to all eternity.

But, laſtly, the reaſon why we Chriſtians, more eſpecially, do thus look up to Heaven when we pray, is this, becauſe we have now no place on earth to look unto: But as Heaven is the place into which Jeſus, our High Prieſt, is entered for us, ſo we ought to look up thither, and preſent our petitions to him there, that they may be ſanctified by him, and by him preſented to his Father, and for his ſake prevail to our preſent and eternal welfare.

In ſhort, that God is not confined to any certain place, is plain, in that he is ſo often ſaid to come to, and depart from men, to aſcend, and to deſcend, &c. Nor do ſuch inſtances, by which ſome ſort of motion ſeems to be aſcribed to God, as from one place to another, in any wiſe prejudice the the doctrine of his immenſity and omnipreſence; becauſe ſuch things as theſe are ſaid of God, not with relation to his eſſence, but only with reſpect to the divers kinds operation of his Providence, and Grace, and Power; according to which he is ſaid to be either abſent from, or preſent with ſuch perſons, at ſuch a certain time, and in ſuch or ſuch a place. So that God is ſaid to viſit, or come to ſuch a place, or ſuch a perſon, when he diſtinguiſhes ſuch a place or perſon by ſome peculiar mark of love and favour, or ſome extraordinary token of his anger and diſpleaſure: And he is likewiſe ſaid to depart from ſuch a place or perſon, when he withdraws the influences of his Grace, the light of his glorious Goſpel, and other ſaving privileges and advantages from them, and tranſlates unto other places, or to other perſons that are worthy of them.

God grant that we may always ſo behave our ſelves towards him, as to be accounted worthy to have him always preſent with us; not in anger and diſpleaſure, but by his grace and favour, to bleſs, preſerve and keep us in this preſent life, till he tranſlates us to that infinitely better life which is to come.

N. B. The Diſſertation on Divine Providence ſhall conclude this Epiſtle, whither I refer the pious Reader.

Ver. 11. And he gave ſome, Apoſtles: and ſome, Prophets: and ſome, Evangeliſts: and ſome, Paſtors and Teachers; For the perfecting, &c. to the end of the thirteenth verſe.] Now after the Apoſtle had exhorted the Epheſians in a very pathetical manner to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith they were called, ver. 1. in all Chriſtian humility, and charity, and to live in perfect peace and unity, ver. 2, 3. he endeavours to enforce that good inſtruction by mentioning the ſeveral bands or ties wherewith Chriſtians are united among themſelves under Chriſt Jeſus their head; ſee ver. 4, 5, 6. And whereas Chriſt had ſettled different gifts and offices in the Church, he ſhews that no one ought therefore to be tempted to fall into contention or diviſion, or to envy one another on that account, for that they were ſo inſtituted and appointed, as in their very nature of them to tend directly to the uniting and edifying of the whole body. And ſo he ſays, at ver. 8. Unto every one of us is given grace according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt; who according to the prediction of a prophetic Pſalm, when he aſcended up on high, gave gifts unto men, ver. 10. aſcend to this very purpoſe, that he might fill all things, and all with his preſence, as I have ſhewn in the preceding Diſſertation, and influence; and particularly that becoming the head of his body, the Church, he might fill this his body with the influences of his Divine Spirit, to which end as it follows at this 11th verſe, he gave ſome Apoſtles, &c. From whence we have a good argument for the diſtinct orders or officers appointed in the Church of Chriſt: We plainly are told by whoſe authority they are commiſſioned: We are informed of the buſineſs or work committed by Chriſt to them, and the great end or deſign of their inſtitution. All which I ſhall illuſtrate in the following manner. By ſhewing you,

I. The ſeveral diſtinct officers appointed in the Church of Chriſt. They are ranked under the following Heads; Apoſtles; Prophets; Evangeliſts; Paſtors and Teachers.

That by Apoſtles is to be underſtood thoſe eleven perſons who had been choſen by our Lord in the time of his life, and received a particular commiſſion from him after his reſurrection from the dead, together with Matthias choſen in the room of the traitor Judas, and Paul appointed by our Lord in a viſion from Heaven, there can be no doubt. Theſe were perſons ſent forth by our Saviour, as he was by his Father; and their buſineſs was to be witneſſes of his reſurrection, in his name to preach the Goſpel to all the world, to gather a Church out of the reſt of mankind, and to direct and govern it by his authority, and under the immediate and miraculous conduct of his ſpirit.

By Prophets is plainly meant thoſe, who receiving an extraordinary meaſure of the ſpirit were thereby qualified to interpret the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament, and to preach the Goſpel to ſuch as ſhould embrace the Chriſtian Faith.

By Evangeliſts, Paul ſignifies, not ſo much thoſe who wrote the Goſpel, whom we do now particularly diſtinguiſh by that title, as thoſe who were ſent abroad by the Apoſtles to aſſiſt them in publiſhing the Goſpel to the world.

Finally, By Paſtors and Teachers, I underſtand the ſtated officers ſettled in every Church, as the ordinary and conſtant guides and governors thereof. Where 'tis obſervable, that the Apoſtle joins Paſtors and Teachers together, denoting that the offices imply'd in thoſe words belong to one and the ſame perſon. For although there might be teachers which were not Paſtors of the Church, ſuch as for inſtance Philip the Evangeliſt, Acts xxi. 8. yet every Paſtor was obliged, by virtue of his office, to teach and inſtruct the ſouls committed to his care. They were, in the phraſe of our Apoſtle elſewhere, to feed (that is to inſtruct and govern) the Church of God, Acts xx. 28. with the overſight of which they were entruſted, and this in his name, and in ſubordination to him, who is in the moſt eminent ſenſe, the Shepherd and Biſhop of our ſouls, 1 Pet. ii. 25.

From this brief account of the perſons here named by the Apoſtle, it appears, that he makes mention both of the extraordinary and the ordinary officers of Chriſt's Church; thoſe who were appointed only, or chiefly, for the planting of Chriſtianity, together with thoſe who were to be the ſtanding officers in his body to the end of all things. The Apoſtles, Prophets and Evangeliſts, I take to be of the former kind; the Paſtors and Teachers, of the latter. Where, when I affirm the three former to be extraordinary, I do not mean that the Apoſtles were altogether ſuch. They were indeed with reſpect to ſome parts of their office extraordinary, and conſequently but temporary, viz. As they were choſen by our Lord himſelf, and ſent by him to be witneſſes to the world of what they themſelves had heard and ſeen, particularly of that great and fundamental doctrine, his reſurrection from the dead; as they were to lay the foundation of the Chriſtian Church; and as they were extraordinarily inſpired and qualified for the diſcharge of theſe parts of their function. But then as they were Paſtors, that is, Guides and Governors of the Church, and in that office to be ſucceeded by Biſhops, their function may be juſtly reckoned among the ſtanding offices deſigned to continue as long as the Church ſhould need to be guided and governed. Which may be fairly aſſigned as the reaſon why Paul, when he names the ſtanding officers, mentions only Paſtors and Teachers, including in thoſe general denominations both Biſhops and Presbyters, the former of which were ſufficiently ſignified under the title of Apoſtles, whoſe authority in preſiding over the Church, and over the inferior Paſtors and Teachers of it, was to be transferred to the Biſhops in every Church which ſhould be planted and ſettled by them.

If it be ſaid, that here is no mention of Deacons, and conſequently that all the ordinary and ſtanding miniſters of the Church are not here named, 'tis enough to obſerve, that if Deacons are not included in the word Teachers, they being frequently allowed by the Biſhops to execute that part of their miniſtration; they are omitted, (which I rather take to be the caſe) becauſe the Apoſtles deſign was not to name every ſtanding officer, but only the moſt eminent, thoſe to whom the care of the Church was principally committed, who were not only Teachers, but Paſtors alſo. Again,

It is to be obſerved, that in this enumeration of the officers appinted by Chriſt, there is not the leaſt hint, nor I think any where elſe in the Holy Scriptutes, of any diſparity in the authority and power in the Apoſtles. The Apoſtles, without preferring one before another, are continually ſpoken of as the prime governours of the Church, under Chriſt the head of it, and this by a joint authority, and a commiſſion of equal extent. And accordingly the houſe of God is ſaid to be built on the foundation of the Apoſtles and Prophets; Eph. ii. 12. without diſtinguiſhing one Apoſtle from another, Jeſus Chriſt himſelf being the chief corner-ſtone. Which I the rather mention, not only in oppoſition to the extravagant pretence of the church of Rome, in making Peter the prince of the Apoſtles, and giving to his ſucceſſors to the Roman See a ſupremacy over all the Biſhops in the Church; but alſo on account of the fancy of a late writer (Vid. Mr. Dodwell's Paræneſis ad Extoros. p. 15, &c.) who in contradiction indeed to the Romaniſts, but not at all to the ſervice of the epiſcopal cauſe, ſubſtitutes James, the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, and the kinſman of our Saviour, in the room of Peter. He would perſuade us, that the firſt regimen of the Catholick Church was monarchial; that not only James was the centre of union, but that as long as there were to be found any diſciples of our Saviour's family, they did, and would have ſucceeded in the ſame dignity; but that line failing, the authority of the Biſhop of Jeruſalem devolved upon the Biſhops of the ſeveral Churches, who were equally partakers of it, and thenceforward the government of the Church became ariſtocratical. There is in truth ſo little appearance of argument for the ſupport of this imagination, that it needs not elaborately to be refuted. It may ſuffice to ſay, That as it has no ſolid foundation in the writings of the New Teſtament, ſo I am perſuaded that our Apoſtle, who ſays of himſelf, that he was in nothing behind the very chiefeſt Apoſtles; 2 Cor. xii. 11. and elſewhere, that henceforth they knew no man after the fleſh, and that though they had known Chriſt after the fleſh, yet now henceforth they knew him no more; 2 Cor. x. 6. had no thought of any peculiar authority delegated to James, or to any other of our Saviour's kinſmen, above that of their brethren Apoſtles. The fault of this hypotheſis, beſides that of its wanting juſt proof, is, that it takes off epiſcopacy from its true and ancient foundation, upon which it has hitherto firmly ſtood, namely, that of an authority and power imparted by our Lord to his Apoſtles equally, and by them derived to the Biſhops as their ſucceſſors, and aſſigns to it a later original and eſtabliſhmeut.

Then, that alohough there was no inequality in the authority of the Apoſtles; yet from the very foundation of the Church there was an inequality among its paſtors. The Apoſtles are here, and elſewhere conſtantly mentioned as ſuperior to all others, and this by the appointment of our Lord himſelf, who gave ſome, Apoſtles, in the firſt place; and we have very plain inſtances in the writings of the Apoſtles, of different degrees of authority and power communicated from them to others. Witneſs the caſe of Timothy and Titus, who were appointed by Paul, not only to direct and govern the Churches of Epheſus and Crete, but in particular to ordain elders amongſt them, and to exerciſe authority over the elders themſelves. The atteſtation to this truth drawn from the angels of the ſeven Churches; Rev. i. 20. mentioned in the Revelations of John is undeniable; underſtanding by thoſe Angels, as is highly reaſonable, the Biſhops of thoſe Churches; amongſt which, if Polycarp were the Angel of the Church of Smyrna, as there is reaſon to believe that he was, 'tis well known what ſort of Biſhop he was, even ſuch as the friends of that order contend for; one to whom all the Presbyters of the Church of Smyrna were inferior. And in truth, were there no particular and expreſs teſtimonies to be found in Sacred Writ, yet the plain and certain account which we have of the diſtinction of Biſhops and Presbyters, as ſuperior and inferior officers in the ſeveral Churches planted by the Apoſtles of which we have any hiſtory, even down ſucceſſively from their times, is of itſelf a teſtimony ſo very clear, that 'tis hard to conceive how any that are not ſlaves to an hypotheſis, ſhould withſtand the force of it, ſo as ever to bring that matter into farther debate. See the Cyprianic Age.

II. The perſon by whom, or by whoſe authority theſe ſeveral officers were appointed was he who according to the preceding verſes, deſcended firſt into this lower region, and afterwards aſcended far above all Heavens, that he might fill all things. He, who being glorified at God's right hand, became there the head of the Church, and from thence ſent down that Divine Spirit, who was to enliven his body, and in a more ſpecial manner to guide and aſſiſt thoſe whom he appointed to direct and govern the reſt of his members. Some of theſe our Lord himſelf choſe out and appointed, whilſt he was upon earth, namely, the Apoſtles, together with the ſeventy diſciples.

Others he marked out, after his aſcenſion into Heaven, by conferring upon them ſingular gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, particularly the Prophets mentioned in the text. Others were called and appointed by the Apoſtles, who acting by our Lord's authority, and by a ſpecial commiſſion from him, and being extraordinarily qualified by a Divine Inſpiration to execute their commiſſion, thoſe whom they appointed might as truly be ſaid to be given by Chriſt, as thoſe whom he had called by name. Such were the Evangeliſts, together with the paſtors and teachers here ſpoken of, particularly thoſe principal paſtors, the Biſhops, whom the Apoſtles, before their leaving the world, ſettled in the Churches which they had founded, to ſucceed them in preſiding over all others.

But it will not be needful to enlarge on this head; it may ſuffice only to obſerve from it, how ſacred the inſtitution of a miniſtry in the Church is. It was our Lord who gave not only Apoſtles, Prophets, and Evangeliſts, but alſo paſtors and teachers, as a ſettled and ſtanding miniſtry, and this by virtue of that authority and power which he aſcended into Heaven to exerciſe. He himſelf is the chief Paſtor and Biſhop of ſouls, and theſe are given by him to officiate in his name, and by his authority. As the Church of Chriſt is not ſuch a voluntary ſociety, as that the members of it lie under no obligation to aſſociate, and to hold communion with each other; ſo neither are thoſe who miniſter to our Lord in his Church ſubject to the arbitrary appointment of the people, either to be ſet up or depoſed at their pleaſure, but as they were given by our Lord at firſt; ſo having been once dedicated to the ſervice of Chriſt in his Church, they cannot without ſacrilege alienate themſelves, nor, without great contempt of a Divine Inſtitution, be arbitrarily alienated by any other.

Not that any man is hereby exempted from the juſt authority of his ſuperiors, whether eccleſiaſtical or civil. For, as it is the duty of the chief paſtors of the Church to inflict upon thoſe that are under them ſuch ſpiritual cenſures, as by offences committed againſt the rules of the Goſpel they may juſtly incur; ſo it is equally the duty of civil governors to reſtrain and puniſh, by the authority committed to them, perſons of what rank or order ſoever, that ſhall demean themſelves injuriouſly or unworthily towards the ſtate; all which is exactly agreeable to the articles of our Church, which aſſert, that the King's Majeſty hath the chief power in this realm, and other his dominions, unto whom the chief government of all eſtates —— whether they be eccleſiaſtical or civil, in all cauſes, doth appertain. And again it is ſaid to be the prerogative which we ſee to have been given always to all Godly princes, in Holy Scriptures, by God himſelf, that they ſhould rule all eſtates and degrees committed to their charge by God, whether they be eccleſiaſtical or temporal, and reſtrain with the civil ſword the ſtubborn and evil doers, Art. 37.

All therefore that I intend to aſſert in this caſe is, what is very evident both from Sacred Writ, and from the conſtant practice of the moſt pure and primitive ages of Chriſtianity, that the authority by which the officers of the Chriſtian Church exerciſe their reſpective functions in that body, was neither at the firſt given, nor can be taken away, by the arbitrary will and pleaſure of men; but that as it was derived from our Lord, ſo it is to be continued and exerciſed in his eame. But the ſacredneſs of the Chriſtian miniſtry will yet farther appear from,

III. The buſineſs, or work committed to theſe officers of the Chriſtian Church, which is thus expreſſed, For the perfecting of the ſaints, the work of the miniſtry, the edifying of the body of Chriſt. By perfecting of the ſaints, I underſtand, according to Paul's uſe of a like word elſewhere, the gathering together and joining of Chriſtians into one body or ſociety, 1 Cor. ix. 16. By the work of the miniſtry, is plainly meant the adminiſtration of the Word and Sacraments. And by edifying of the body of Chriſt, the conſtant improvement of the members of that Body in Chriſtian faith, temper and practice. The miniſtry of the word and Sacraments is, indeed, the means whereby the other two parts of their work are performed. It is by publiſhing the doctrine of the Goſpel, that men are at firſt prevailed upon to embrace the Chriſtian faith, and to become members of the body of Chriſt. It is by conſtant preaching of the ſame word in the aſſemblies of Chriſtians, and applying it as there is occaſion in private for their inſtruction, reproof, admonition and comfort, that the body of Chriſt is edified. It is by the ſacrament of Baptiſm, that thoſe who embrace the Chriſtian faith are incorporated into one body; and it is by the other ſacrament of the Lord's Supper, that they maintain communion with Chriſt as the Head, and with each other as fellow-members of the ſame Body.

And from this account it will be eaſy to infer the true boundaries between that authority and power which truly belong to the Church, and that which the ſtate of right challenges, and to ſhew that there is no interfering between them, no ſuch Imperium in imperio, as can be charged with limiting and endangering the juſt authority of the civil magiſtrate, as is all along falſely and very maliciouſly inſinuated by a late author, in his Rights of the Chriſtian Church.

That our Lord hath committed to proper officers the work of the miniſtry, for the perfecting of the ſaints, and for the edifying of his Body, is very expreſly aſſerted by our Apoſtle, and is the conſtant doctrine of the New Teſtament. When our Lord gave to his Apoſtles their commiſſion, it was in ſuch terms as theſe, Go and diſciple all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, teaching them to obſerve all things whatſoever I have commanded you, Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. And again, Go ye into all the world, and preach the Goſpel to every creature, Mark xvi. 20. And once more, As my Father hath ſent me, even ſo ſend I you. Receive ye the Holy Ghoſt. Whoſeſoever ſins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whoſeſoever ſins ye retain, they are retained, John xx. 21, &c. Thoſe who had been thus commiſſioned, ordained others to ſucceed them in the work of the miniſtry, requiring them, as Paul expreſly charges Timothy, To commit the things which they had heard of them to faithful men, who ſhould be able to teach others alſo, 2 Tim. ii. 2. which precept how it was to be underſtood, viz. that there ſhould be a perpetual ſucceſſion of men ſet apart for the work of the miniſtry, and conſecrated to that ſervice by prayer and impoſition of hands, is undoubtedly evident, both from divers other directions in the Epiſtles to Timothy and Titus, and from the univerſal and conſtant practice of the Church down from that time. For although, as has been already obſerved, there were ſome particulars in the Apoſtolical function which were extraordinary, namely, ſuch as were neceſſary for the firſt planting of Chriſtianity, for which they were qualified by gifts as extraordinary as their work; yet, as the text aſſerts, all true paſtors and teachers of the Church are alſo given by Chriſt for the work here ſpecified. They are obliged by their office to preach the doctrine of Chriſt wherefoever they have opportunity, and particularly in that part of the Church in which by Providence they ſhall be placed, and Wo be them, 1 Cor. ix. 16. Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. if they do it not. They are bound to receive into the Church by baptiſm ſuch as ſhall profeſs to believe in Jeſus Chriſt, and to ſubmit to his precepts, and hereby to admit them into a ſtate of forgiveneſs of ſins. They are bound to hold aſſemblies for Divine Worſhip, according to the inſtitution of our Lord by his Apoſtles, and the conſtant practice of them and their followers. In thoſe aſſemblies they are obliged to offer up the praiſes and prayers of the Church, to preach the word of Chriſt, and to adminiſter the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper to the members of their reſpective congregations, and thereby to continue them, if they really are what they profeſs to be, in a ſtate of remiſſion. And foraſmuch as this is their peculiar buſineſs, they muſt be allowed to judge whoſe ſins they ſhall remit, and whoſe they ſhall retain; that is, whom they ſhall receive into the Church by baptiſm, and continue in it by adminiſtring to them the other Sacrament; and to whom they ſhall prohibit the uſe either of the one or the other. In a word, they are obliged to preſide over, to direct, to admoniſh, to comfort, to rebuke and cenſure all that are under their charge, according to the directions of God's word. And for all this, if they cheriſh and excite that good Spirit which is promiſed to all the living members of Chriſt's Body, if they ſtir up the gift of God which is in them by the laying on of hands, 2 Tim. i. 6. when they are dedicated to any ſpiritual office, they will find themſelves ſufficiently qualified by him, who hath promiſed to be always with them, Matt. xxviii. 20. This I take to be the ſum of that ſpiritual authority which is conferred upon the miniſters of Chriſt's Church, and belongs to them only; and this, whether the civil ſtate be Chriſtian or Pagan. For the converſion of a nation to Chriſtianity does not at all alter the caſe; the Church is ſtill a diſtinct, though not a ſeparate ſociety, from the Chriſtian nation: It has its proper officers, and they their proper work, which appertains not to the civil magiſtrate, but is ſtill peculiar to them as it was before.

Nor is this in the leaſt injurious or derogatory to the civil power, becauſe that remains as entire as it was before the nation became Chriſtian. The miniſters, as well as the members of the Church, are equally ſubject to the ſtate as they were before their converſion. If they keep within the limits of their ſpiritual functions, inſtead of injuring the ſtate, they will be eminently ſerviceable to it, binding all thoſe duties upon the conſciences of men, which otherwiſe would be performed no longer than fear or intereſt required, If the miniſters or members of the Church exceed their due bounds, to the prejudice or offence of the ſtate, they are as liable to cenſure and puniſhment from the magiſtrate as any other ſubjects are.

So that the civil power, particularly where it is Chriſtian, is always under an obligation of conſcience to favour and protect the ſpiritual, keeping within its due bounds; and the Church is always under the like obligation to pay all due regard to the civil power, never willingly to give the leaſt offence or ſuſpicion; but on the contrary gratefully to acknowledge the benefits it receives from it, heartily to pray for, and promote its welfare. In a word, where the Church and State are both truly Chriſtian, the civil and ſpiritual authority will be ſo far from interfering with each other, that they will unanimouſly conſpire to promote the honour of God, the intereſt of Chriſtianity, and the good of the whole community. For,

IV. The great deſign and end of this inſtitution of the officers mentioned in it, and of the work in which they are employed, is ſo to teach and do, till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the meaſure of the ſtature of the fulneſs of Chriſt; that is, till all the particular and genuine members of Chriſt's body arrive at that degree of Chriſtian faith and knowledge together with a ſuitable temper and practice, which will render them perfect Chriſtians, and will fortify and eſtabliſh them againſt all the attempts of ſuch as would ſeduce or corrupt them, that we may be men, and no more children, ver. 14. as it follows, toſſed to and fro with every wind of doctrine, but ſpeaking the truth in love we may grow up into him in all things who is the head, even Chriſt, ver. 15. And this, till the whole body of Chriſt, Jews and Gentiles incorporated, be come to its full age and ſtature, even to that fulneſs which is by our Lord deſigned for it. For thus again our Apoſtle repreſents this matter in another place in this Epiſtle, ſaying, That God gave Chriſt to be the head over all things to the Church, which is his body, the fulneſs of him that filleth all in all, ch. i. 22. Then it ſeems will Chriſt himſelf be compleat, at the head of his Church, when all his members ſhall be united into one body; and all together partake of his influences in a very plentiful manner.

O bleſſed day that! When the Church of Chriſt ſhall be delivered from its preſent imperfect, corrupt and divided eſtate, when the man of ſin ſhall be deſtroyed; when all the errors and corruptions that have by degrees been introduced, either in faith, or worſhip, or manners, ſhall be rooted out; when its breaches ſhall be made up, and its wounds healed; when ſound faith, ſolid and ſubſtantial piety and virtue, and univerſal charity ſhall be reſtored; when the Jews ſhall be converted, and the fulneſs of the Gentiles brought in; when with one heart and one mouth we ſhall all glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, unfeignedly and fervently love one another, and abound in all the fruits of the Divine Spirit; in fine, when our Lord ſhall have ſo thoroughly cleanſed and ſanctified his Church, as to preſent it to himſelf a glorious Church, not having ſpot or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing, but that it may be holy, and without blemiſh, Eph. v. 26, 27. And oh! that God would be pleaſed to put it into the hearts of all the paſtors of his Church, and of all the Chriſtian Princes of the earth, to do whatſoever in them lieth towards the introducing of this happy ſtate. Let me only obſerve farther on this head, that we may naturally infer from it, that without all queſtion the miniſtry ſettled by Chriſt in his Church was not a temporary inſtitution, but was intended to be perpetual, even till theſe great things which I have been now mentioning ſhall be accompliſhed. If there were nothing elſe in the Holy Scriptures to make good this aſſertion, that promiſe of our Saviour, when he gave his Apoſtles their commiſſion, would ſuffice, Lo I am with you always even to the end of the world. But leſt any ſhould in after-times perverſly interpret the συντέλεια τȣ̃ αἰῶνος, there mentioned, as denoting no more than theend of that age, behold here a farther confirmation of the ſame truth, in words not to be ſo evaded. He hath given paſtors and teachers for the perfecting of the ſaints, &c. till we all come to the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, &c.

Ver. 14. That we henceforth be no more [as] children, toſſed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the ſlight of men, and cunning craftineſs, whereby they lie in wait to deceive.] Now after the Apoſtle has given you an account of the various degrees of miniſtry he obſerves, beſides the other ends already explained, that the miniſtry of the Chriſtian Church was inſtituted and appointed to preſerve the faithful from error and ſeduction, to prevent inſtability of mind, and unſettledneſs of judgment, and confirm them in fundamental truths; That we henceforth be no more children.

In which caution the Apoſtle is very happy in the choice of his words to expreſs his meaning fully, and to fix it deeply upon the underſtanding of his converts. For,

What can better expreſs the folly of unſtable perſons, and unſettled profeſſors than the word children, which denotes, in the very natural and firſt notion of the word, imperfection and weakneſs of underſtanding, inſtability and ungroundedneſs in knowledge. Again,

The double metaphor of being toſſed to and fro and carried about from place to place, the former of which is drawn from a wave of the ſea, and the latter from a cloud in the air, which never ſtand ſtill, incomparably declares the unſteadineſs of unſettled believers, which like a wave or cloud have no conſiſtency, but are conſtantly moving with the leaſt wind. Therefore,

The cauſe of which ſtirring, ſays he, is every wind of doctrine: And indeed, they who have no ſolid principles every wind of doctrine has power over to drive them to and fro, every teacher can caſt them into what mould he pleaſes, and blow them like glaſſes, into this or that ſhape at his pleaſure; but ſome may ſay, why wind of doctrine? Becauſe there is no ſolidity in it; but, being wind in the teacher, it breeds but wind in the hearer, becauſe of its variety and novelty, and becauſe of its prevalency over unſtaid men. For, how ſuddenly is ſometimes a family, a town, yea, a whole country leavened with a particular error? And as it is well obſerved by a good author, it is the temper of thoſe that are tainted with erroneous opinions, as it is of ſome that are infected with peſtilential diſeaſes, that they delight in infuſing the malignity; ſee Lactantius de Juſtitia, lib. v. c. 10. So,

When the Apoſtle gives the character of theſe impoſtors and ſeducers he ſays, they uſe ſlight; which is a metaphor taken from gameſters, who with art and ſlight of hand know how to cog the dice, and cheat thoſe with whom they play. For ſeducers cheat with falſe doctrines, as gameſters do with falſe dice; ſo that cunning craftineſs, imports, that thoſe ſeducers, who endeavour to cheat the ſoul are like the old ſerpent, old and cunning gameſters, ready and ſkilful to deceive; they lie in wait to deceive, they contrive how they may catch and entrap men within the ambuſh of their impoſtors.

Thus you ſee with what caution and ſtrength of expreſſion the Apoſtle endeavours to fortify the Epheſians againſt religious impoſtors, that were already crept into the Church to deceive the faithful in his Apoſtolick days; therefore, how ſhould we behave in this diſtance of time? I ſay, what danger are believers now in at the end of ſeventeen hundred years, when ſchiſm, hereſy and apoſtacy have tried with all their ſlights and craftineſs to deceive the righteous. If the danger was great in the Apoſtolick age, as Paul here intimates it to have been, what muſt it be now, when the world is almoſt over-run with error and deceit? It is ſadly true we have not a Paul to fight our cauſe; but let us take his advice, and let the miniſters of God's Word and Sacraments imitate his honeſty, faith and reſolution, as it is their duty; for thereunto they are ordained and appointed miniſters of the flock of Chriſt. Let them, as Paul did, in his days diſcover to their hearers, the ſleights, and cunning crafts of the deceivers in our days; and do not be afraid to tell them, that if they would not be toſſed to and fro, they muſt avoid thoſe that lie in wait to deceive; and when this is faithfully executed they have done no more than their duty. Now,

If we ſearch into the ſleights and cunning crafts of the deceivers of our days, who endeavour to deprive us of that ſaving knowledge which we have in Chriſt Jeſus, we ſhall find that one of their artifices is, either to reject, or to pervert Scripture.

For, Whereas the Word of God is the only infallible touchſtone of doctrines; ſome, conſcious to themſelves that theirs will not bear that teſt, decry it as a dead letter, and ſet up another judge of controverſies. Thoſe of the Church of Rome reſolve all into the infallibility of their Church, and Quakers into the infallibility of the ſpirit that is within them. Theſe pretend, from an inward light, imperceptible to all but themſelves, to expound the moſt difficulty of Scripture. Learning, that ſhould help to explain it, they decry as a carnal thing, not allowable in ſpiritual matters. Thus, by taking away the key of knowledge, they make their proſelytes incapable of judging how diſagreeable their opinions are to the mind of God, and ſecurely propagate their errors. And thoſe deceivers that pretend to follow the directions of Scripture, giving heed to ſeducing ſpirits, wreſt and pervert the Word of God, to ſerve their own turns, as the Devil did when he tempted our Saviour. But we, ſaith Paul, are not as many, who corrupt the Word of God, but as of ſincerity ſpeak, as in the ſight of God; 2 Cor. ii. 17. not walking in craftineſs, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; chap. iv. 2.

Another artifice of deceivers, is hypocriſy; which conſiſts in being one thing in appearance, and another in reality.

Our deceivers have found it a very uſeful ſtratagem, in religion as well as in war, to hold out falſe colours. As the grand impoſtor ſometimes puts on the diſguiſe of an Angel of light, ſo he teaches his agents to perſonate Saints. If they have any wicked deſign in hand, being men of tender conſciences, they muſt firſt ſeek God, they muſt make long prayers, and proclaim a ſolemn faſt, as Ahab did before he ſeized Naboth's vineyard, and then they are prepared for rapine and violence; ſee 1 Kings xxi. 9. Their previous faſting ſharpens their appetites, and makes them the more eager for devouring widows houſes. Under colour of coming to a farther reformation, they ſecretly contrive to ſubvert the eſtabliſhed Church. The growth and increaſe of Popery is their continual cry, that by keeping us alarmed from that quarter, they may drown the noiſe of their undermining us from another. They would have us buſy in caſting up a mound againſt a religion which our laws have ſufficiently fenced out; that at the ſame time they may open a wide gap, for a ſect no leſs dangerous to break in upon us like a deluge. Religion is always their pretext, but it is the God of this world that they chiefly pay their veneration to. If they occaſionally comply with God's true worſhip, it is only in order to ſerve mammon. Hereſy and ſedition they gild over with the glory of God, and reformation of abuſes: And then the pills are readily ſwallowed by their unthinking multitude, who are always taken with ſhew and outward appearance. A counterfeit zeal for the good of their country, makes them paſs with ſome for extraordinary Patriots; and their ſeeming concern for the true worſhip of God, carries with it an appearance of extraordinary piety; whereas they have nothing extraordinary in them, but only their diſſimulation. And if we conſider the commotions both in Church and State, and the ſevere perſecutions that have been raiſed by theſe pretenders to peace and moderation; we ſhall find the character that our Saviour gives of ſome hypocrites of old, to be equally applicable to our modern Phariſees, that they appear in ſheeps cloathing, but inwardly are ravening wolves; Matth. vii. 15.

Another artifice of deceivers is falſhood; of which God complains by the Prophet Jeremiah, and ſaith, they cauſe my people to err by their lies; Jer. xxii. 32.

Truth is the agreement of our words with our thoughts: But there is no judging of the thoughts of theſe men by what they ſay; when they deſign to enſlave us, they cry up liberty, and when they intend to invade our poſſeſſions, they extol property.

Another artifice of our deceivers is ſlander. They fix ignominious names and characters upon the miniſters of Chriſt's Church, that by reflecting upon their perſons they may inſidiouſly bring their doctrines into diſrepute. This they are taught by him that is called the accuſer of the brethren, whoſe name Διάβολος ſpeaks him to be a calumniator.

Paul, though he kept under his body, and brought it into ſubjection; 1 Cor ix. 27. was repreſented as one that walked according to the fleſh; 2 Cor. x. 2. And our Saviour himſelf was by the Phariſees ſlandered as a wine-bibber, a glutton, a ſabbath-breaker, and a friend of publicans and ſinners; Matt. xi. 19. xii. 24. They aſcribed his miracles to the aſſiſtance of infernal ſpirits, and falſe witneſſes roſe up againſt him; Matt. xxvi. 60. Pſal. xxxv. 11.

Let not his followers therefore be ſurprized, if at any time they meet with the like uſage; for he ſaith, Men ſhall revile you, and ſhall ſay all manner of evil againſt you falſly for my ſake; for ſo they perſecuted the Prophets that were before you; Matt. v. 11, 12. Such affronts therefore as were put upon the maſter, the ſervants muſt not expect to be exempted from. It is not at all ſtrange, that what was poured upon the head, ſhould afterwards fall upon the members.

What Ariſtotle obſerves of virtue, holds as well of true religion: That it is ſlandered and abuſed by both extremes: Fortitude by the raſh, is called cowardice, and by cowards is called raſhneſs. Liberality by the niggard, is called prodigality; and by the prodigal it is repreſented as parſimony. So by the Popiſh party we are accuſed of Puritaniſm: and the Puritan, on the other ſide, accuſes us of too near approaches to Popery. Such reflections from both extremes, virtue and true religion muſt always expect to meet with.

Another artifice of deceivers is, to accommodate their doctrines to the inclinations of their hearers. This was a fraud practiſed by the falſe prophets of old, they ſowed pillows to all arm-holes; Ezek. xiii. 18. they ſoothed men in their vices, to make their conſciences eaſy and ſecure; they took no care to ſpeak right things; Iſa. xxx. 10. ſo they could but ſpeak ſmooth things, to pleaſe the people, and gratify their itching ears; 2 Tim. iv. 3.

It was by indulging men in their ſins that the Gnoſticks gained ſo much ground in the firſt ages of Chriſtianity; and it is by the ſame art that our modern deceivers have ſo much prevailed. Some perſuade their converts that they have no ſin, and conſequently need no repentance; that to the pure all things are pure; 1 Tit. i. 15. that the holineſs of the perſon ſanctifies the action: So that the ſame things that in unregenerate men would be rebellion and injuſtice, in the Saints are commendable actions.

Solifidians ſooth their auditors in their vices, and encourage them to live looſe and profligate lives, by perſuading them that good works are not neceſſary to ſalvation; that faith alone is ſufficient for their juſtication; that they are the elect of God, choſen and predeſtinated to happineſs, and can never fail of ſalvation.

Thus (ſaith God by the Prophet Jeremiah) They ſtrengthen the hands of evil-doers, that none doth return from his wickedneſs; Jer. xxiii. 14.

Another ſort of deceivers there is, that encourage men in their vicious courſes, by perſuading them, that they can upon eaſy penances, not only give them abſolution for all their paſt offences, but likewiſe grant them indulgences for many years to come; and can, if they ſhould at laſt die in their ſins, by prayers and maſſes for the dead, procure them a ſpeedy paſſport from purgatory to the Joys of Heaven.

Theſe doctrines, how groundleſs ſoever, being ſuited to the inclinations of men, are apt to prevail upon weak judgments; they that are laden with divers luſts, are eaſily led captive to embrace that religion which will either comply with their ſins, or abſolve them upon eaſy terms.

They of the Church of Rome perſuade their followers, that as ſoon as a prince is excommunicated and depoſed by the Pope, all his ſubjects are abſolved from their allegiance.

Fifth-Monarchy-Men tell their auditors, that they owe no ſubjection but to King Jeſus.

Levellers will have all to be equal, and teach men that government is nothing but an encroachment upon their liberties, an uſurpation upon their native freedom; and that God's people ought to be, as the Jews originally were, under a theocracy, that God only ought to be their king.

This, therefore, is one artifice of deceivers, that they accommodate their doctrines to the inclination of their hearers.

Another artifice of deceivers is, to perſwade men, that it is a thing indifferent what ſect or congregation they join themſelves to, provided they hold faſt the fundamental articles of the Chriſtian Faith. But this is a dangerous error, for it is certainly a great ſin to make unneceſſary ſchiſms and diviſions; whereby the unity of Chriſt's Church is deſtroyed, his ſeamleſs coat is divided, and the Lord of life is, in a manner crucified over again, by having his myſtical body torn and rent. Beſides, how provoking a ſin ſchiſm is, appears from the puniſhment of Corah and his accomplices. They offered no ſtrange fire, ſet up no new religion; but only made a cauſeleſs ſeparation from the eſtabliſhment which God had appointed Moſes to make. Yet, for this it was that the earth opened her mouth, and let them down quick into Hell.

And though in theſe days we find no ſuch miraculous judgments inflicted upon ſchiſmaticks; yet there is danger, leſt by aſſociating ourſelves with them, we undergo the ſame final deſtruction. For Jude ſpeaks of ſome under the Goſpel that periſh in the gainſaying of Core. And that we know them, gives them this character: Theſe be they that ſeparate themſelves, murmurers, complainers, they deſpiſe dominion, and ſpeak evil of dignities. And though theſe men make mighty pretenſions to the Spirit, as the Montaniſts of old did; yet Jude adds, they are ſenſual, not having the Spirit, Jude v. 19. And Paul not only reckons hereſies among the works of the fleſh in Gal. v. 20. but makes diviſions alſo to be a piece of carnality; For, whereas there are among you diviſions, ſaith he, are ye not carnal? 1 Cor. iii. 3. And he beſeeches the Corinthians, by the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that there be no diviſions among them, ver. 1—10. Which he would not preſs with ſo much earneſtneſs, if to make a ſchiſm in the Church were ſo trifling and inſignificant a thing as ſome would repreſent it. But then it is to be noted that, as the ſchiſm of Core, ſo muſt all other ſchiſms be on account of uſurping ſome authority which God has forbid ſhould be given to ſuch men.

Other deceivers allow themſelves a greater latitude, and perſwade men that they may be ſaved in the profeſſion of any religion, though never ſo erroneous; making it a thing indifferent, whether we go to the Church of God, or, in the expreſſion of John, to the ſynagogues of Satan, Rev. ii. 9. But as it is no indifferent thing whether, for the nouriſhment of our bodies, we take poiſon or wholſome food; ſo it concerns us to beware what doctrines we imbibe for the preſervation of our ſouls.

It is plauſibly inſinuated by deceivers, that God is as much pleaſed with variety of religions, and divers ways of worſhipping him, as he is with divers languages and complexions; and that it is no more his will that men ſhould agree in their judgments, than in their taſtes. This is an opinion very ſuitable to them that can be of any religion for their intereſt: For upon theſe grounds they may occaſionally conform to Mahometaniſm, or to Judaiſm, and yet be ſafe.

But Peter ſpeaks of ſome that ſhall bring in damnable hereſies, 2 Pet. ii. 1. whereas no hereſies are damnable, if men may be ſaved in the profeſſion of the falſeſt religions.

He ſpeaks of others that wreſt the Scriptures to their own deſtruction, ch. iii. 16. But this is impracticable, if ſalvation be attained by men of the moſt erroneous opinions. Orthodox doctrine is in Scripture compared to good ſeed, ſown by Chriſt, Matt. xiii. 24. and hereſy to evil ſeed, ſown by the Devil. It is no indifferent thing therefore what opinion we are of in matters of religion: For, if he that doubteth is damned, Rom. xiv. 23. what favour can Infidels expect?

It was looked upon as a ſevere puniſhment in the primitive times of Chriſtianity, to be excluded from the communion of the orthodox Church; becauſe that he has not the Church for his Mother, ſaith Cyprian, cannot have God for his Father.

As Eve was the mother of all living, in a natural ſenſe; ſo the Church, which is the ſpouſe of the ſecond Adam, is the mother of all living in a ſpiritual ſenſe.

I am the vine, ſaith our Saviour, ye are the branches. As long as we abide in Chriſt, ſo long we ſpiritually live, and grow in grace. But if we cut ourſelves off from him by ſchiſms and hereſies, we then become like branches ſevered from the vine, which, ſaith our Saviour, are caſt forth, and wither, and men gather them, and caſt them into the fire, John xv. 5, 6. Thus it fares with them that are ſevered from the Church of Chriſt, their portion is to be caſt into the fire unquenchable.

Noah's ark was a figure of the Church; and as they only were ſaved that entered into the ark; ſo they only can regularly hope for ſalvation, that are admitted into the Church of Chriſt by baptiſm. In the days of Noah, ſaith Peter, while the ark was a preparing, eight ſouls were ſaved by water; the like figure whereunto even baptiſm doth now ſave us; 1 Pet. iii. 20, 21. Salvation therefore is not attainable in the profeſſion of thoſe religions that reject baptiſm. So that it cannot be thought unchriſtian to ſay, They are to be accurſed that preſume to ſay, that every man ſhall be ſaved by that law or ſect which he profeſſeth; ſee the 18th article of the Church of England.

Another artifice of deceivers is, to perſwade men that there is no miniſtry of God's peculiar appointment, but that any that are gifted may take upon them the miniſterial office. This was the ſin of Corah and his adherents. For, whereas the prieſthood, by God's appointment, belonged to the houſe of Aaron, this appropriation of it they would not allow of, but pretended that any of God's people had an equal right to execute the prieſtly office: And they gathered themſelves together, and ſaid, Ye take too much upon you, ſeeing all the congregation is holy every one of them? Wherefore then lift ye up your ſelves above the congregation? And they took every man his cenſer, and put fire in them, and laid incenſe thereon, Numb. xvi. 3, 18. But the incenſe that they offered could not atone for ſo great an offence. God made good his word, the ſtranger that came nigh was put to death, Numb. iii. 10.

Now, if they that are under the Aaronical prieſthood, offered incenſe in contempt of an earthly prieſt, had their final doom anticipated by a ſudden eruption of infernal flames. If he that touched but the outſide of the tottering ark with unhallowed hands, was puniſhed with immediate death: Then how ſhall they eſcape that, under the Evangelical diſpenſation, preſume to ruſh into the moſt Holy Place, and to offer up the ineſtimable ſacrifice of the body and blood of Chriſt with unconſecrated hands, in contempt of him who is a prieſt for ever? If the blood of bulls and of goats was not to be offered up, but by thoſe that had authority from Heaven, ſhall leſs regard be had to the blood of the covenant, the moſt Holy thing wherewith we are ſanctified? Jeroboam, having made a defection from the true worſhip of God, that he might not want prieſts to inſtruct the people in his erroneous way, conſtituted prieſts of the loweſt of the people, whoſoever would, he conſecrated him: wherewith God was ſo far provoked, as the Scripture expreſly ſaith, that for this very thing he cut off the houſe of Jeroboam from off the face of the earth, 1 Kings xiii. 33, 34. And if ſo, then the Evangelical prieſthood being appropriated, as the Aaronical was; for, no man taketh this honour to himſelf, ſaith Paul, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron, Heb. v. 4. It follows, that it is a great preſumption to be inſtrumental in ſetting up a miniſtry which cannot be warranted to be derived down to them, by an uninterrupted ſeries of ordinations from Chriſt, and his Apoſtles, gradually propagated by the fathers of the Church, as the Aaronical prieſthood was conveyed by a lineal deſcent from Aaron and his ſons.

Theſe inſtances may ſuffice to diſcover the ſlights and cunning crafts of them that lie in wait to deceive. And now,

I proceed to ſhew, that if we would be ſtedfaſt in the faith, if we would not be toſſed to and fro, we muſt avoid thoſe that lie in wait to deceive. In trivial matters we may take pleaſure in being deceived; we ſometimes reward men, that by their ſlights, artificially impoſe upon our ſenſes. But when the conſequence of our being deceived, is the loſs of our lives and fortunes, we then think it highly concerns us to beware of being deluded. How much more when the loſs is an eternal inheritance, and life everlaſting?

There are many deceivers, ſaith Paul, that ſubvert whole houſes, teaching things which they ought not for filthy lucre's ſake, by good words and fair ſpeeches they deceive the hearts of the ſimple, 1 Tim. x. 11. Shall we then, when we are forewarned that there are ſuch deceivers abroad, Rom. xvi. 18. put our ſelves in the way of being deluded by them? When we are told that an ambuſh is laid for us, ſhall we ſeek deſtruction? It is a prepoſterous thing for ſheep, that are wont to fly at the ſight of wolves, to run into their jaws, and voluntarily to offer themſelves a prey to them. In the words of the text, the ſlights and cunning crafts of impoſtors are, as I have noted before, expreſſed by a metaphor, taken from cunning gameſters, that know how to impoſe upon unwary and unskilful players. Now, few men are ſo ſimple, as to venture their money with ſuch known cheats; eſpecially when they are conſcious to themſelves that they have neither skill nor dextrity to cope with them. Certainly, then, if men were as wiſe in their everlaſting concerns, as they are in the things of this life, they would not, by venturing themſelves with notorious deceivers, lay their ſouls at ſtake, and hazard that which is of more value to them than the whole world.

Paul's advice is, Mark them that cauſe diviſions, contrary to the doctrine that ye have learned, and avoid them, Rom. xvi. 17.

" John, the diſciple of our Lord, going into a bath at Epheſus, with a deſign to waſh himſelf, with a deſign to waſh himſelf; when he ſaw Cerinthus in it, ſtarted back unwaſhed, and ſaid, let us flee away, leſt the bathing-houſe fall upon us, for Cerinthus, the enemy of truth, is in it. And Polycarp, who was taught by the Apoſtles, and was by them conſtituted Biſhop of Smyrna, meeting Marcion, the heretick, who ſaid, Do not you know me? Anſwered, I know you to be the firſt-born of Satan. Such a religious care the Apoſtles and their diſciples took, not to have any communication, ſo much as in word, with them that adulterated the truth; as St. Paul ſaid, an heretical man avoid. Euſeb. Eccleſiaſt. Hiſt. Lib. 4. cap. 14.

Paul exhorts us to avoid Hereticks; but John the diſciple of our Lord, goes farther, not allowing us ſo much as to ſalute them; for he that biddeth them God-ſpeed, is partaker of their evil deeds; and with good reaſon, for there is no peace to the wicked, ſaith God. We ought therefore to fly from them. Epiphanius adverſus Hæreſes, Lib. 1. Tom. 3. Hæreſ. 34. Sect. 13.

And our Saviour ſaith, Matt. xvi. 6. and xxiv. 4. Beware of the leaven of the Phariſees, and take heed that no man deceive you. It is ſafer to ſhun danger, than to encounter it. Why do we pray to God not to lead us into temptation, if we ourſelves voluntarily run into it? Beloved, ſaith Peter, ſeeing ye know theſe things before, beware leſt, being led away with the error of the wicked, ye fall from your own ſtedfaſtneſs, 2 Pet. iii. 17. Hereſy in the body of the Church is like a canker in the body natural; it ſpreads itſelf, and corrupts the ſound parts.

——————— Solet immedicabile Cancer
Serpere, & illæſas vitiatis addere partes. Ovid. Met. l. 2.

Paul, ſpeaking of the hereſy of Hymeneus and Philetus ſaith, their words eat as doth a canker, and have overthrown the faith of ſome, 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18. There is a contagion in vices and falſe opinions. He that toucheth pitch ſhall be defiled therewith; and he that hath fellowſhip with a proud man ſhall be like unto him, ſaith the ſon of Sirach, Ecclus. xiii. 1 Many that at firſt went only out of curioſity to hear them that lie in wait to deceive, have at length been caught in their ſnares. Common prudence teaches us to keep at a diſtance from thoſe infectious diſeaſes that may prove deſtructive to our bodies: How much more then ought we to ſhun the contagion of hereſy and ſchiſm, which tend to the ruin of our ſouls?

We have been inſtructed from our childhood, carefully to avoid thoſe men-ſtealers, that would ſell us into temporal ſlavery: And ſhall we be leſs circumſpect to avoid thoſe deceivers, that with feigned words make merchandize of ſouls, and ſend them to the regions of endleſs horror and deſpair? Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowſhip hath righteouſneſs with unrighteouſneſs? And what communion hath light with darkneſs? And what concord hath Chriſt with Belial? Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye ſeparate, ſaith the Lord, 2 Cor. vi. 14, 15, 16.

Some deceivers may, perhaps, take themſelves to be in the right; they may think they are doing God ſervice, while they are carrying on the work of the Devil. For, Paul ſpeaks of ſeducers, whom he deſcribes deceiving and being deceived, 2 Tim. iii. 13. But this will not excuſe either the ſeducers, or them that are ſeduced. For, our Saviour has told us what ſhall become both of blind guides, and of them that are blindly led: They ſhall both fall into the ditch, Matt. xv. 14. If the pilot, for want of skill, ſplits upon a rock, he and all that are embarked with him fare alike. The advice, therefore, of Moſes to the followers of Corah and Dathan, may be as proper to them that are followers of deceivers in our days: Depart, I pray you, from the tents of theſe wicked men, and touch nothing of theirs, leſt ye be conſumed in all their ſins. We command you therefore, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, that ye withdraw yourſelves from every brother that walketh not after the tradition which he received of us, 2 Theſſ. iii. 6. Thus, if ye would be ſteadfaſt in the faith, ye muſt avoid thoſe that lie in wait to deceive. And,

Whereas we are expreſly told in the context, that Chriſt gave ſome Apoſtles, ſome Paſtors and Teachers, to withſtand deceivers, and diſcover their frauds, or, That we henceforth be no more children, toſſed to and fro, by the ſlights or cunning crafts of them that lie in wait to deceive; ſo it is the part of good paſtors, not only to feed their flocks, and to keep them from ſtraying, but likewiſe to repel thoſe ravenous beaſts, that would break in upon them; to ſpare the wolves would be cruelty to the ſheep.

Ver. 15. — Which is the head even Chriſt.] See the notes on ch. i. ver. 22.

Ver. 17. — In the vanity of their mind.] See Rom. i. 21.

Ver. 18. —— Blindneſs.] As, hardneſs.

Ver. 21. If ſo be ye] Epheſians.

——— Have heard him.] i. e. Paul, who has taught you, as the truth is in Jeſus.

Ver. 22. — The old man.] See Rom. vi. 6.

Ver. 24. — Put on the new man] See Rom. vi. 4.

——— Which after God is created in righteouſneſs, &c.] See ch. ii. ver. 10.

Ver. 25. — We are members one of another.] See Rom. xii. 5.

Ver. 26. Be angry and ſin not.] This Scripture confirms the univerſal conſent of learned men, who have never been ſo ſevere as to ſay or teach that anger conſidered in itſelf, and upon all occaſion whatſoever, is unlawful. For, it is implanted in us by nature. So that the firſt motions of it ſeem to be mechanical and neceſſary; the haſtineſs and ſlowneſs to it depends in a great meaſure upon the temper of the body, and the animal ſpirits. Thus far it is not ſubject to the power of our own will, or to the corrections of reaſon and religion.

This alſo is a paſſion (like all thoſe ſtiled ſimple and natural) capable of ſerving excellent purpoſes, when managed with ſobriety and diſcretion. For, there is a tameneſs of ſpirit, which deſerves cenſure and reproofs, and in ſome caſes we do even well to be angry. For, admitting anger according to the received notion of it, to proceed upon a deſire of obtaining ſatisfaction for ſome injury done, or conceived to be done to us, or to thoſe we love; the honour of God; the reverence due to the laws of our Lord, the love of virtue, the protection of good men, may make this not only innocent, but neceſſary and commendable, viz. when the name of God, his word and truth, things which ought to be moſt ſacred, are boldly violated and impiouſly trampled upon, no good Chriſtian can, none in a publick character may ſee this done with indignation; nor is he obliged to ſuffer the offenders to paſs unrebuked, for their wickedneſs and folly. Thus Moſes, when he ſaw the molten calf, waxed hot with anger, Exod. xxxii. 19. And the Evangeliſt Mark records that our Bleſſed Saviour looked upon the Phariſees with anger, iii. 5. And as theſe occaſions where the glory of God, and the good of others, are concerned, juſtify ſome reſentments of this kind. So Paul here ſeems to imply, that they may be warrantable alſo with regard to private injuries and affronts, provided always, that due care be taken, to reſtrain their exceſſes, and to conquer and compoſe them in time.

The manner of this exhortation doth plainly argue, that however upon ſome occaſions, and in ſome degrees, anger may be lawful; yet the juſteſt anger cannot be excuſed, when it continues too long. For, though the firſt motions of our paſſion may not be under our check and juriſdiction; though we deſire and grieve and reſent, as naturally and unavoidably as we hunger and thirſt; yet when that firſt guſt is over, the governing part of the ſoul may, and ought to interpoſe its powers, and by a timely and prudent care quell the rebellious diſturber of our peace. For, it is certain, that every one who continues in a ſtate of enmity and wrath commits a fault, which the higheſt provocation cannot juſtify, and expoſes his ſalvation to infinite hazards and danger. And this is indeed the meaning of thoſe very ſignificant words in the context, not to give place to the Devil. As to the not letting the ſun go down upon their wrath, it was a maxim or precept of that Pythagorean philoſophy, in which the Epheſians had been educated; the diſciples of Pythagoras, always after a quarrel ſhook hands and profeſſed an hearty reconciliation at the ſetting of the ſun. So that the Apoſtle firſt acquaints his converts with a duty which their philoſophers had taught, and then adds an enforcement of greater weight, viz. the ill conſequences that muſt attend the neglect thereof, that a longer than due continuance in anger, baniſheth the Holy Spirit, ſee ver. 30. and makes room for the reception of the Devil into the heart and ſoul; ſee Mr. Collier's Sermon on this text.

Ver. 31. Let all bitterneſs and wrath, and anger and clamour, and evil ſpeaking be put away from you, with all malice] i. e. Or, that is attended with malice, or a private deſire of unjuſt vengeance. This Scripture may be called the counter part of that exhortation which the ſame Apoſtle gave the Romans, ſaying, As much as lieth in you, live peaceable with all men, Rom. xii. 18. And therefore, this to the Epheſians may be properly explained by that to the Romans, live peaceably with all men. Therefore note,

Living peaceably then, muſt import ſomething more than the external acts, and the mere pretenſions of amity. It regards the inward frame and temper of the mind, as well as the outward behaviour; and ſeems to be a complication of other virtues, of humility, patience, and kindneſs. By the firſt of which, a man is taught a modeſt opinion of himſelf, and reſtrained from diſturbing the quiet of others, either by thinking of evil, or by offering them any injurious treatment. By the ſecond, he is ſo much a maſter of himſelf, that he is not eaſily provoked, but keeps his mind ſmooth and eaſy, under any ſlight miſfortune, and prevents the fire, which, perhaps, is juſtly kindled in his breaſt, from breaking out into flames. And laſtly, by being kindly-affected, he contributes his utmoſt to ſerve the common intereſt, and to promote the proſperity of all men.

So that this duty imports a peaceable diſpoſition, which ſhews it ſelf in ſuch actions, as tend to preſerve peace where it is, and to reſtore it where it is broken. And no one is allowed, in the Apoſtle's ſenſe, to be a peaceable man, who does not in his way and capacity, endeavour to maintain, or to reſtore, both private and publick peace. For,

This injunction takes in the whole extent of human ſociety, not only private perſons, but publick communities; and implies, firſt, a mutual accord between man and man, in oppoſition to contentions and quarrels. Secondly, A good underſtanding and agreement between nations, kingdoms, and commonwealths, in oppoſition to war. And laſtly, obedience and conformity, in contra-diſtinction to rebellion and ſchiſm. To ſchiſm, I ſay, becauſe communities are to be conſidered, either as political or ſacred. And, when we ſpeak of peace, with reference to the former, we mean by it, the peace of the ſtate; but, with relation to the latter, we underſtand the peace of the Church.

Now, in each of theſe reſpects, every one is obliged, as far as is poſſible and lawful, to behave himſelf peaceably. Common charity and good neighbourhood require peace and amity, with particular Chriſtians, our brethren. Intereſt and ſelf-preſervation call for the ſame temper and behaviour towards ſocieties: For, every kingdom divided againſt it ſelf is brought to deſolation, Matt. xii. 25. And, the very nature and contrivance of our religion, and the ſeveral commands in Scripture, enjoin us to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace: Not only to maintain peace with the Church in general, but to hold communion with that part of it where we live, if we can lawfully. For, as this ſpiritual ſociety is the moſt ſacred of all others (it being the myſtical body of Chriſt) ſo, on the one hand, no duty is more ſtrictly enjoined, none more earneſtly prayed for, than this of unity and love; and, on the other, no ſin more zealouſly inveighed againſt, none more highly threatned, than that of ſeparation and hereſy.

Happy were it, if they, who are miſled by a blind guide, a furious zeal, or a falſe fire, would conſider the evil, and the danger of their ways; that their ſeparation is a manifeſt breach of peace and unity. With a right apprehenſion of theſe things, it is not to be conceived, that men ſhould be wrapped, and made giddy, with the ſpirit of pride, and ſelf-conceit; and miſtake that for a ſign of grace, and a fruit of God's Holy Spirit, which the Apoſtle reckons among the works of the fleſh. But,

Let us now conſider what methods are moſt probable to render it practicable, and how far our endeavours will, in all likelihood, conduce to the obtaining ſo great, and univerſal a bleſſing. I ſay, in all likelihood, becauſe it is ſuppoſed here in this precept, that peace with all men (though a very deſirable happineſs) is not abſolutely in our power; and though we do, what in us lies, to obtain it, yet we may meet with inſuperable difficulties in the attempt.

Beſides, ſometimes it is not to be purchaſed, but upon unreaſonable terms, at the expence of honour and juſtice, and with the loſs of an infinitely greater bleſſing, peace with God, and the tranquillity of one's own mind. In this caſe, there can be no fair and honourable accommodation; for a good conſcience is always to be preferred before the good-will of the greateſt men breathing; and where we cannot conciliate their friendſhip, but with the loſs of God's favour, we are to obſerve, that God muſt be pleaſed, though they, though all the world be diſobeyed.

But the method which ſeems to bid faireſt for peace with all men, is, in general, this; Every one is to take care, that by an inoffenſive behaviour, he gives no juſt grounds for any to build a quarrel upon. To this purpoſe, the ax is to be laid to the root of the tree. Firſt,

1. Thoſe luſts and vices, which naturally breed diſcord and confuſion, are to be reſtrained, and brought under the government of reaſon. And then,

2. The contrary virtues and good diſpoſitions will ſway the affections and the will, and incline us to lead quiet and peaceable lives. But, where men fail in theſe points,

3. The magiſtrate's aſſiſtance becomes neceſſary; who, though he cannot reach the vicious thoughts and intentions of mens hearts, can yet effectually puniſh the wickedneſs, and in ſome meaſure, prevent the diſorders of their lives. And firſt,

It is in every one's power by the grace of God, and a vigilant care, to reſtrain thoſe luſts, which lead directly to diſorder and confuſion.

Now it is to be obſerved, that thoſe very vices, which give diſturbance to men, conſidered in a private capacity, are very extenſive, and ſworn enemies to men combined together in ſociety; and they that treſpaſs more immediately and directly upon peace, are theſe that follow; Firſt,

1. Pride, which blows up a man with ſuch a great opinion of himſelf, that there is not room enough in his mind, for one kind thought of any other. Such a one therefore never looks upon his fellow-creatures, but with ſcorn and diſdain: If he behold them, it is afar off, as if they were a different ſpecies, infinitely below him. The leaſt overſight or diſreſpect provokes him beyond all patience; and no tolerable uſage is to be expected from him, unleſs you pay him an adoration, ſuitable to the mighty eſteem he has for his own dear, fooliſh, ſelf.

But the miſchief is —— The world will never come up to this extravagant degree of vanity. Every man, as ſuch, has a title to ſome proportion of honour; but whoever ſwells beyond his juſt ſize and ſhape, takes up too much room in the world, and becomes troubleſome to all about him. This raiſes him up enemies on every ſide. All look upon him, as a vain-glorious invader; all pour in upon him contempt and hatred, anſwerable to his unjuſt and impudent pretenſions; for the truth is, all (not excepting his very flatterers) hate a proud man. So inſufferable a creature is he, that, as he ſcorns and defies all the world, ſo he draws back the ſame wide circumference of contempt and ill uſage, and centers it all upon himſelf. And ſo infallibly true are the wiſe king's obſervations, Prov. xxviii. 25. He that is of a proud heart, ſtirreth up ſtrife. And (Prov. xiii. 10.) from pride only (i. e. for the moſt part) cometh contention.

Unbounded avarice is alſo a reſtleſs enemy to peace. This, beſides the unſpeakable trouble it gives the perſons labouring with it, brings a thouſand diſorders to the publick. It is the main ſpring of violence and wrong: It treads down the bounds of juſtice, and violates the rules of charity. It fills the court with brawls, and the place of judgment with wickedneſs. Hence it is, that the law, though in it ſelf very good, is uſed unlawfully: That ſome perſons eyes are blinded, and their conſciences laid aſleep: That God's miniſters happen to forget themſelves, and execute wrath upon them that do well: That power becomes a privilege for violence, and gives a ſort of right to the committing of it: That while great and mighty ſins are paſſed over in ſilence, at leaſt with impunity, the juſt are afflicted, and the poor turned aſide in the gate from their right, Amos vi. 12.

The ſame vicious principle ſuborns falſe witneſſes, and brings thoſe profligate wretches into the place of righteouſneſs: Where, by ſpeaking falſhood, inſtead of truth, or by ſhuffling both together, or by maiming, and not delivering the whole truth, and laſtly, by calling the God of Truth to atteſt their damnable lies, they turn the courſe of juſtice, and oblige the moſt righteous judge (who is to give ſentence according to evidence) to do things contrary to right and equity. Though by the way, if the innocent ſuffer hereby in goods, good name, or in any other reſpect, the injury is to be fathered, not upon the judge, but upon thoſe ſons of Belial, the falſe witneſſes.

Theſe therefore, are juſtly to be looked upon as enemies to peace: For ſurely, oppreſſion and wrong are (as Solomon complained, Eccleſ. vii. 7.) Enough to make even a wiſe man mad. And his royal father expoſtulating with the judges of Iſrael, imputed the diſturbance of that kingdom to their partiality and injuſtice; complaining, that by their male-adminiſtration, they had thrown the foundations of the earth out of courſe, Pſam lxxxii. 5. Again,

As avarice is the principle ſpring of injuſtice, ſo ambition, that has no regard to honour and conſcience, is another mover of ſedition; for to make room for its own monſtrous ſize, it overturns every thing, that ſtands in its way.

Hence it is, that nation riſes againſt nation, and kingdom againſt kingdom. For whatever are the pretended reaſons for a war, yet generally dominion and rapine are the chief objects in view.

A revengeful temper is alſo an implacable enemy to peace. It imprints new reſentments upon the mind, when the old ones are almoſt worn out, and forgotten. It keeps the coals of contention alive, and perpetuates a quarrel; and by repaying old injuries with freſh provocations, renders peace and reconciliation impracticable.

Theſe are ſome of the moſt unſociable vices, which the Apoſtle here forbids and (like ſmall ſparks, that prevail into devouring flames,) firſt interrupt the peace of private perſons, and then naturally diffuſe their troubleſome influence among the whole community. And indeed, every other irregular luſt ſeems to be charged with miſchief, and to threaten the publick with ſome remarkable calamity. All diſorders within them muſt be ſuppreſſed; otherwiſe, they will ſhew themſelves in the genuine effects of diſcord and violence without. For from whence come wars and fightings among us, but from thoſe luſts which war in our members? Jam. iv. 1. But then,

After the reducing of theſe unſociable vices to the government of reaſon, due care ſhould be taken to cheriſh, and improve their oppoſite virtues, which will diſpoſe us to lead quiet and peaceable lives. In order to which,

Let us learn to be humble and modeſt; and inſtead of doating with a blind fondneſs, upon our ſuppoſed excellencies, we may do well ſometimes to take a view of our real imperfections: Never to inſiſt with rigour, upon what we might juſtly require; and always to pay that regard and deference, which others have as good a right to demand of us. To this purpoſe, we are charged to be cloathed with humility, 1 Pet. v. 5. and ver. 10. of this chap. to be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love, in honour preferring one another. And Phil. ii. 3. to eſteem others better than ourſelves.

Such ſober thoughts, ſuch mutual condeſcenſions, could not but make men engaging and acceptable. They would take down the high looks of the proud, baffle the inſolence of the ſcorner, and make his ſwellings look monſtrous and ſingular. They would render the ſtubborn diſpoſitions of men pliable; and the moſt rough and unconverſable, gentle and eaſy to be intreated. Beſides,

A modeſt opinion of ourſelves would reſtrain our curioſity from medling with other mens affairs. It would confine us within the bounds of our own proper callings. It would teach us to obſerve the Apoſtle's precepts, viz. to ſtudy to be quiet, and to do our own buſineſs, 1 Theſſ. iv. 11. and to pay tribute, cuſtom, fear, and honour, to whom they are reſpectively due, Rom. xiii. 7. And thereby contribute towards preſerving the peace of communities, both civil and ſacred; which is diſturbed by nothing more, than by the contrary, conceited, buſy humour. Again,

In oppoſition to covetouſneſs, which ſtrongly inclines to diſhoneſt practices, and thereby interferes with the peace of mankind, let us again conſult the precepts of religion. Theſe will teach us to be content with our condition, to be true to our word, faithful in the diſcharge of our truſt, and juſt in all our dealings. Nay, they will reach the inward man, and remove from the heart all approbations or deſigns of injuſtice, all the firſt cauſes of differences and animoſities; and implant in their room, thoſe lively qualities, which are apt to produce a good underſtanding between man and man; and promote the welfare of all conſidered, either in their private or ſocial capacities. So likewiſe,

For the great diſturbers of the world, who unpeople countries, and glut the jaws of death with human blood—Would they hearken to the peaceable genius of the Goſpel, that would perſwade them to diſcharge all ſelfiſh and ambitious deſigns, help them to aſſwage their frightful proud ſwellings, and bring them down to their juſt proportion.

Would they ſuffer the peace of God to rule, and bear the greateſt ſway in their hearts, it would keep down all aſpiring thoughts, and bring every paſſion in ſubjection to reaſon. It would judge among contending nations, and rebuke the ambition of many people. Then an univerſal peace would obtain throughout the Chriſtian world. The warlike people would beat their ſwords into plow-ſhares, and their ſpears into pruning-hooks. Nation would no longer lift up ſword againſt nation, neither would they learn war any more, Iſai. ii. 4.

And, as happy ſhould we be in our leſſer ſocieties, could we be perſwaded to be kind and beneficent, and to render good for evil to all men. Such a glorious and god-like temper is the apteſt inſtrument to ſoften the diſpoſition, and to win the affections of the moſt ſpiteful and malicious.

The wiſdom of this world indeed may ſuggeſt rage and fierceneſs, as the beſt expedients to repel injuries, and to keep the ſons of violence upon their good behaviour. But certainly, nothing can be more amiable and endearing, for nothing carries with it greater force, even irreſiſtible charms, than innocence and meekneſs. Theſe may ſtrike ſome minds with terror, and extort an outward profeſſion of peace. Theſe go deeper, to the laſt remains of humanity: They melt down the moſt unſociable paſſions into eaſineſs and good nature, and make a nobler conqueſt in the ſtubborn heart of man, than the utmoſt efforts of violence and terror.

Who is he, that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good? ſays Peter, 1 Ep. iii. 13. None certainly, but ſome few wicked and unreaſonable men; ſuch as are born under the diſadvantage of ill nature, and have been nurſed up in cruelty, and wear no other appearance of humanity, but the meer external form and ſhape.

These indeed are in their nature, ſo fierce and implacable (though it is to be hoped, they are as rarely met with as other monſters) that even the cleareſt innocence, and the brighteſt virtue, ſhall ſerve only to enrage them. And others perhaps there are, who will never lie with us in a ſtate of friendſhip, unleſs we concur with them, in foul and diſhoneſt practices. The very propoſals of peace, upon fair and reaſonable terms, ſhall ſerve only to irritate the more, and make them ready to battle.

In theſe unhappy caſes, though peace is impoſſible, yet ſtill it is our duty to contain within the bounds of charity and integrity; to ſuffer long, and to be kind, to bear a principal regard to the rules of honeſty, and the dictates of conſcience; and to let the world perceive, that as we gave no juſt cauſe of offence, ſo neither have we any inclination to keep up the quarrel; but that we ſtill bear a Chriſtian affection, and are always in a temper and readineſs to be reconciled. And thus we ſhall, as the Apoſtle exhorts us, put away all bitterneſs and wrath, &c.

CHAP. V.

2 After general exhortations to love 3 To fly fornication, 4 and all uncleanneſs, 7 not to converſe with the wicked, 15 to walk warily, and to be 18 filled with the ſpirit, 22 he deſcendeth to the particular duties, how wives ought to obey their husbands, 25, and husbands ought to love their wives, 32 even Chriſt doeth his Church.

BE ye therefore followers of God, as dear children;

2 And walk in love, as Chriſt alſo hath loved us, and hath given himſelf for us, an offering and a ſacrifice to God for a ſweet-ſmelling ſavour.

3 But fornication, and all uncleanneſs, or covetouſneſs, let it not be once named amongſt you, as becometh ſaints:

4 Neither filthineſs, nor fooliſh talking, nor jeſting, which are not convenient: but rather giving of thanks.

5 For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean perſon, nor covetous man who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Chriſt, and of God.

6 Let no man deceive you with vain words: for becauſe of theſe things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of diſobedience.

7 Be not ye therefore partakers with them.

8 For ye were ſometimes darkneſs, but now are ye light in the Lord: walk as children of light,

9 (For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodneſs, and righteouſneſs, and truth)

10 Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord.

11 And have no fellowſhip with the unfruitful works of darkneſs, but rather reprove them.

12 For it is a ſhame even to ſpeak of thoſe things which are done of them in ſecret.

13 But all things that are reproved, are made manifeſt by the light: for whatſoever doth make manifeſt, is light.

14 Wherefore he ſaith, Awake thou that ſleepeſt, and ariſe from dead, and Chriſt ſhall give the light.

15 See then that ye walk circumſpectly, not as fools, but as wiſe,

16 Redeeming the time, becauſe the days are evil.

17 Wherefore be ye not unwiſe, but underſtanding what the will of the Lord is.

18 And be not drunk with wine, wherein is exceſs, but be filled with the Spirit:

19 Speaking to your ſelves in pſalms, and hymns, and ſpiritual ſongs, ſinging and making melody in your heart to the Lord,

20 Giving thanks always for all things unto God and the Father, in the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt;

21 Submitting your ſelves one to another in the fear of God.

22 Wives, ſubmit your ſelves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord.

23 For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Chriſt is the head of the church: and he is the Saviour of the body.

24 Therefore as the Church is ſubject unto Chriſt, ſo let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing.

25 Husbands, love your wives, even as Chriſt alſo loved the church, and gave himſelf for it:

26 That he might ſanctify and cleanſe it with the waſhing of water, by the word,

27 That he might preſent it to himſelf a glorious church, not having ſpot or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing; but that it ſhould be holy, and without blemiſh.

28 So ought men to love their wives, as their own bodies: he that loveth his wife, loveth himſelf.

29 For no man ever yet hateth his own fleſh; but nouriſheth and cheriſheth it, even as the Lord the church:

30 For we are members of his body, of his fleſh, and of his bones.

31 For this cauſe ſhall a man leave his father and mother, and ſhall be joyned unto his wife, and they two ſhall be one fleſh.

32 This is a great myſtery: but I ſpeak concerning Chriſt and the church.

33 Nevertheleſs, let every one of you in particular, ſo love his wife even as himſelf; and the wife ſee that ſhe reverence her husband.

I. To ſome general duties, as

(1.) To the imitation of God (by way of inference from the duty laſt mentioned, viz. mutual forgiveneſs, ch. 4. ver. 32.) at ver. 1.

(2.) To walk in love, urged by Chriſt's example of love to us, which he amplifies by the diſcovery and fruit of his love, giving himſelf for us, by his end therein, to be a propitiatory ſacrifice; and finally by the efficacy thereof, rendering God well pleaſed, ver. 2.

(3.) To avoid ſeveral ſorts of ſins, as fornication, &c. Becauſe they are unſuitable to, and inconſiſtent with our profeſſion; beſides, ſays he, they are inconvenient, ver. 3, 4. they exclude their practitioners from the kingdom of Heaven, as they very well know, ver. 5. and bring down God's wrath upon them, ver. 6.

(4) Not to partake with other men in their ſins (by way of inference from the former argument) ver. 7. inforced by a conſideration of the great change wrought in them by their converſion, which requires a forſaking former ſins, and walking anſwerable to the religion which they at preſent profeſs, ver. 8. which he confirms, by the reaſon of the conſequence, becauſe ſuch a ſuitable walking is the natural reſult of their ſpiritual condition, ver. 9. Then he explains it, by ſhewing the means of attaining unto ſuch a ſtate of ſalvation, viz. by ſearching the Scriptures to find out God's will therein, ver. 10. All which is amplified by a repetition of the laſt mentioned prohibition (at ver. 7.) and of an injunction of the contrary duty of reproof, ver. 11. which he inforces by a conſideration of the abominable filthineſs by thoſe ſins they were guilty of, ver. 12. and of the benefit of reproof, viz. the conviction of the ſinner, ver. 13. and from God's own example, who reproves the world of ſin, and thereby conveys light into them; wherein he ſhews how in their preſent ſtate they are aſleep, dead; and that it is their duty to awake and riſe, that they may receive light, ver. 14.

(5.) To circumſpect walking; which is urged, becauſe true wiſdom conſiſts therein, ver. 15. explained in one branch, i. e. redeeming the time, with the reaſon, ver. 16. amplified by an inference, ſhewing the means to enable us to this circumſpect walking, expreſſed both negatively and poſitively, ver. 17.

(6.) To avoid drunkenneſs, enforced by the ill conſequent thereof.

(7.) To be filled with the Spirit, ver. 18. explained, by ſhewing how to give vent to this fill of the Spirit, viz. by ſinging forth the praiſes of God, ver. 19. giving thanks for all things, ver. 20. and by mutual ſubmiſſion, ver. 21.

II. To particular relative duties, viz.

(1.) Of wives, their ſubmiſſion to their huſbands, amplified by the manner, as to the Lord, ver. 22. then by the ground, which is the huſband's headſhip and protection of her, illuſtrated by its reſemblance unto Chriſt's headſhip over the Church, and protection thereof, ver. 23. thirdly by the pattern, the Church's ſubjection to Chriſt; and finally by the extent, in all things, ver. 24.

(2.) Of huſbands, their love preſſed home by Chriſt's example and pattern of his love to his Church, amplified by the proof thereof, his giving himſelf for it, ver. 25. and by the end of his giving himſelf, her ſanctification, amplified by the means thereof, baptiſm and the word, ver. 26. Her glorification or perfection of holineſs in the world to come, ver. 27. Then he urges this love from the near union or oneneſs between huſband and wife; and therefore he ought to love her, ver. 28. For all men love their own fleſh, expreſſed both negatively and poſitively; and again, Chriſt takes care of his Church, ver. 29. becauſe there is a ſtrict union between Chriſt and his Church, by virtue of the ſpiritual marriage between them, ver. 30. And beſides the ancient law of marriage expreſly enjoins ſo much, ver. 31. Amplified by ſhewing the myſtical application of this paſſage, ver. 32. and by a recapitulation of the duties of huſbands and wives, in theſe two words, love and reverence, ver. 33.

CHAP. VI.

1 The duty of children towards their parents, 5 Of ſervants towards their maſters. 10 Our life is a warfare, 12 Not only againſt fleſh and blood, but alſo ſpiritual enemies. 13 The compleat armour of a Chriſtian, 18 and how it ought to be uſed. 21 Tychicus is commended.

CHILDREN, obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right.

2 Honour thy father and mother, (which is the firſt commandment with promiſe)

3 That it may be well with thee, and thou mayeſt live long on the earth.

4 And ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath: but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

5 Servants, be obedient to them that are your maſters according to the fleſh, with fear and trembling, in ſingleneſs of your heart, as unto Chriſt:

6 Not with eye-ſervice, as men-pleaſers, but as the ſervants of Chriſt, doing the will of God from the heart;

7 With good will doing ſervice, as to the Lord, and not to men:

8 Knowing that whatſoever good thing, any man doth, the ſame ſhall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free.

9 And ye maſters, do the ſame things unto them, forbearing threatning: knowing that your maſter alſo is in heaven, neither is there reſpect of perſons with him.

10 Finally, my brethren, be ſtrong in the Lord, and in the power of his might.

11 Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to ſtand againſt the wiles of the devil.

12 For we wreſtle not againſt fleſh and blood, but againſt principalities, againſt powers, againſt the rulers of the darkneſs of this world, againſt ſpiritual wickedneſs in high places.

13 Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withſtand in the evil day, and having done all, to ſtand.

14 Stand therefore, having your loyns girt about with truth, and having on the breaſt-plate of righteouſneſs;

15 And your feet ſhod with the preparation of the goſpel of peace;

16 Above all, taking the ſhield of faith, wherewith ye ſhall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked.

17 And take the helmet of ſalvation, and the ſword of the Spirit, which is the word of God:

18 Praying always with all prayer and ſupplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perſeverance, and ſupplication for all ſaints;

19 And for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the myſtery of the goſpel:

20 For which I am an ambaſſador in bonds: that therein I may ſpeak boldly, as I ought to ſpeak.

21 But that ye alſo may know my affairs, and how I do, Tychicus a beloved brother and faithful miniſter in the Lord, ſhall make known to you all things:

22 Whom I have ſent unto you for the ſame purpoſe, that ye might know our affairs, and that he might comfort your hearts.

23 Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith from God the Father, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

24 Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jeſus Chriſt in ſincerity. Amen.

¶ Written from Rome unto the Epheſians, by Tychicus.

In this chapter the Apoſtle,

I. Inſiſts upon, and preſſes other relative duties in regard of families; as (1.) The duty of children to their parents, whoſe obedience is here limited or explained in regard of the manner, or rule, viz. in the Lord; and urged by the equity of ſuch an obedience, ver. 1. and by God's command, deſcribed by a ſpecial encouragement annexed thereto, namely, welfare and a long life, ver. 2, 3.

(2.) Of parents, who muſt not provoke their children to diſobedience by ill uſage, and muſt give them pious education, ver. 4.

(3.) Of ſervants, whoſe obedience is deſcribed by its properties, as an earneſt care to pleaſe, and their faithfulneſs, ver. 5, 6. and this is inforced from the great advantage they ſhall reap thereby, ver. 8.

(4.) Of maſters, doing the ſame things. Moderation in their threatning and correction, urged by the conſideration of that account their Heavenly maſter will call them to, ver. 9.

II. Preſſes them to prepare for the Chriſtian warfare, wherein we find,

(1.) A general exhortation or encouragement to provide themſelves with ſpiritual ſtrength, ver. 10. And,

(2.) A more particular direction (as a means to the former) to get the ſpiritual armour; wherein he gives us an account of the kind or quality, quantity, and uſe of this armour; and of the enemy, the Devil, with whom we are to fight, and the manner of his fighting with us, ver. 11. Then

He inforces this direction by a conſideration of the terror and greatneſs of the adverſaries; deſcribed firſt, negatively, not fleſh and blood; and then poſitively, in regard of their government, ſtrength, territories, nature, and ground of the war, about heavenly things, ver. 12.

(3.) A repetition of the exhortation (by way of inference) wherein the note of inference, the exhortation it ſelf are joined with arguments to inforce it, taken from the time of the war, viz. the evil day, and the happy iſſue thereof, even certain victory, ver. 13.

(4.) The poſture they are to obſerve in the fight.

(5.) The ſeveral pieces of armour we muſt make uſe of; firſt, ſuch as are defenſive; as, the grace of ſincerity, the inherent righteouſneſs of an holy converſation, ver. 14. a firm reſolution to charge through all difficulties, wrought by the Goſpel, ver. 15. the ſhield of faith, commended from its excellency and uſefulneſs, ver. 16. and the well-grounded hope of ſalvation. Then ſuch as are offenſive, namely, an acquaintance with the Word of God, ver. 17.

(6.) An exhortation to prayer, where we find the duty enjoined, and its neceſſary qualifications; how it ſhould be general, for all ſaints, ver. 18. and particular for himſelf, ver. 19. becauſe he was in a ſtate of affliction, ver. 20.

III. The concluſion of the Epiſtle, wherein the reaſon of his ſending Tychicus to them, ver. 21, 22. and his Apoſtolical benediction.

(1.) To them in particular, ver. 23. And,

(2.) To all the lovers of Chriſt in general, ver. 24.

A Diſſertation on Divine Providence.

In ſearch after this fundamental truth, viz. the over-ruling providence of Almighty God, I ſhall obſerve the following method.

I. I ſhall directly prove the point, that God does by his providence ſuperintend, i. e. preſerve and govern all things. And,

II. I ſhall conſider and reply to what has been moſt uſually objected againſt this doctrine. Therefore,

I. I begin with work or act of Divine Providence whereby God ſuſtains, upholds, governs, and preſerves all things, both as to their eſſence or nature, and as to the peculiar qualities and properties with which they are endued in ſuch a ſtate of being, and for ſuch a ſpace or length of time, as ſeems to his Infinite Wiſdom moſt fit and convenient for them, and moſt proper to the ends for which they have their being. Thus,

For inſtance, it is by the ſuperintendency of his providence alone, that ſome ſorts of beings, ſuch as the ſun, moon, and ſtars, &c. are continued and preſerved in the ſame ſtate of being, and to the ſame ends and purpoſes of being, from the beginning, even to the end of the world; the ſame Almighty Power being neceſſary ſtill to ſuſtain and uphold theſe things, as was neceſſary at firſt to the creation and production of them: And the cauſe of preſervation is the ſame, as to ſuch other beings as have a fixed and limited duration, much ſhorter, but proportioned to the ſettled nature of them; and which cannot of themſelves continue that ſhort time, without the care and watchfulneſs and power of that firſt of beings, by whom they were created; no power leſs than his being ſufficient to preſerve or continue them in being for any time beyond their firſt appearance in the world. And laſtly, it is by the ſame moſt wiſe and powerful providence, that the various kinds of beings are continually propagated, ſo as no one ſpecies or race of creatures do all ceaſe to be, but every kind is ſtill ſupplied in ſuch order, and after ſuch a manner, as ſeemed at firſt moſt fit and proper to that end; ſo that, as any ſingle individual of any kind drops off, and periſhes, another ſtraight appears to fill its room, and to ſupply its place and office, in the courſe of nature: Of which I might give multitudes of inſtances; but I think it wholly needleſs, to any one who but conſiders how mankind, and all ſorts of living creatures, and even ſuch as are inanimate, as herbs and plants, are conſtantly ſupplied by a new generation ſtarting up in the room and ſtead of thoſe that, when their time is come, do according to the ſettled courſe of nature ceaſe to be. And,

Now that all this happens, that is, that all things are preſerved in ſuch a manner, by his providence alone, by whom they were at firſt created, the Scriptures plainly teach us. Thus the Apoſtle tells us, He, that is, God giveth to all life, and breath, and all things,——For in him we live, and move, and have our being, Acts xvii. 25——28. That is, as every thing derives its being from his power; ſo whatever is neceſſary to the preſervation of all beings, is owing to his providence and care, by whom alone they are, and without whom they could not be preſerved. To which purpoſe let us hear the Prophet, Nehem. ix. 6. Thou even thou art Lord alone, thou haſt made Heaven, the Heaven of heavens, with all their hoſt, the earth, and all things that are therein, the ſeas, and all that is therein; and thou preſerveſt them all. So again the Pſalmiſt tells us, He giveth to the beaſt his food, and to the young ravens which cry, Pſal. cxlvii. 9. And in another place, Pſal. civ. 27, 28, 29, 30. concerning ſome particular ſorts of beings he had ſpoken of, he thus concludes; Theſe wait all upon thee, that thou mayſt give them their meat in due ſeaſon. That thou giveſt them they gather; thou openeſt thy hand, they are filled with good. Thou hideſt thy face, they are troubled; thou takeſt away their breath, they die, and return to their duſt. Thou ſendeſt forth the ſpirits, they are created; and thou reneweſt the face of the earth, Pſal. xxxvi. 6. And ſo, as he tells us in the place firſt quoted, God by his Providence preſerves both man and beaſt. To which purpoſe alſo our Saviour has aſſured us, that he provides for, takes care of, and preſerves the very fowls of the air, and even the flowers of the field; ſee Matt. vi. 26, &c. Luke xii. 24. Matt. x. 29. ver. 30. So that, as he tells us, Not one ſparrow, though ſo cheap and inconſiderable, that two of them were ſold for a farthing, yet not one of them falls to the ground without God's permiſſion. And immediately after, that even the hairs of our heads are all numbred by him. That is, as the meaneſt of all other creatures, ſo the ſmalleſt things that belong to us, are under his immediate care and inſpection; ſo that, as we owe our being to his Power, we muſt aſcribe our preſervation to his Providence; becauſe, as without the former we could not have been, ſo without the latter we could not be preſerved in being, but muſt have long ſince periſhed. But,

Secondly, as God by his Providence, ſuſtains, upholds, and preſerves all things and beings in the world; ſo he does likewiſe, by the ſelf-ſame Providence, direct and rule, and govern all things; moſt wiſely ordering and diſpoſing of all beings ſo, as they may beſt anſwer thoſe great ends for which he firſt created them, to wit, the promotion of his own glory, and the benefit of mankind.

His Providence, in this reſpect, does ſo extend to all things, that there neither is, nor can be any thing or being in the world, but what is governed and directed by it. Thus the ſun, for inſtance, is ſo ordered and diſpoſed, ſo governed and directed by his Providence, as to communicate its light and heat to all parts of the world, and its maturating influence to all the various kinds of beings in it; and ſo all the heavenly bodies are not only moſt exactly fitted, and moſt powerfully directed, but do accordingly perform their ſeveral offices in ſuch a manner, as he at firſt ordained they ſhould, and effectually, from time to time, do bring about the wiſe and gracious ends of his good Providence for which they were created by him. Hence the Pſalmiſt tells us, Pſal. xix. 1, 2, 3, 4. The Heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament ſheweth his handy work. Day unto day uttereth ſpeech, and night unto night ſheweth knowledge. There is no ſpeech nor language, where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. (To which purpoſe ſee Pſal. civ. and cxxxvi. and Job xxxviii. and xxxix.) For though they are not furniſhed with language or words, or an articulate intelligible voice, as we men are; yet they have ways of expreſſing themſelves, ſo as to make known to all mankind the wonderful power, and goodneſs, and providence of God. And as to one of thoſe glorious bodies in particular, our Saviour has told us, He maketh his ſun to riſe on the evil, and on the good, Matt. v. 45. And of the ſtars the Pſalmiſt tells us, He telleth the number of the ſtars; he calleth them all by their names, Pſal. cxlvii. 4. To which that of the Prophet is very agreeable, Lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created theſe things, that bringeth out their hoſt by number: He calleth them all by names, &c. Iſa. xl. 26. Now, he that can number the ſtars, and call them all by their names, muſt be ſuppoſed to govern and direct them alſo; becauſe this act of numbring, and the other of calling them by names, does of neceſſity imply his having perfect knowledge of them; and what he has ſuch perfect knowledge of, he does undoubtedly direct and govern; whereas without the former he could not do the latter: For, no being can direct and govern what he does not know, or is not well acquainted with. And that ſame Almighty Providence does over-rule the air, and govern and direct whatever that affords, the rain, the winds, and whatever elſe is formed therein, and flows to us from thence, the Pſalmiſt plainly teaches, when he tells us, He covereth the Heaven with clouds, and prepareth rain for the earth; by which he maketh graſs to grow upon the mountains, Pſal. cxlvii. 8. where, otherwiſe, there is no moiſture to produce it. And ſo our Saviour ſays, He ſendeth rain on the juſt, and on the unjuſt, Matt. v. 45. That is, he cauſes ſhowers to deſcend upon the earth for the benefit of all mankind. And from the care and working of his providence in this reſpect, he is ſaid to open the Heavens, when he ſends rain upon the earth; and to ſhut them up, when he withholds it. In ſhort, it is God that waters the earth, and makes it fruitful of, and bring forth abundantly, all ſorts of nouriſhment convenient for men, as the Pſalmiſt has expreſly taught us, ſaying, Thou viſiteſt the earth, and watereſt it; thou greatly enricheſt it with the river of God, which is full of water: Thou prepareſt them corn, when thou haſt ſo provided for it. Thou watereſt the ridges thereof abundantly; thou ſettleſt the furrows thereof. Thou makeſt it ſoft with ſhowers; thou bleſſeſt the ſpringing thereof, Pſal. lxv. 9, 10. As if he had ſaid, " Thy gracious providence is diſcernable, as in the dearths and famines, ſo in reſtoring fruitfulneſs to a land; a work of God's ſpecial care and favour, in opening the clouds of Heaven, to water, and refreſh, and enrich the parched earth, and give it all that plenty: Thoſe clouds being as it were God's ſtore-houſe, and that very richly repleniſhed; and the earth ſo placed by God's wiſdom in the creation, that they ſhould be ready to anſwer and ſatisfy all the wants thereof, whenſoever God ſhould ſee fit to diſtil and rain them down upon it. And, indeed, by the ſeaſonable diſpenſing of this it is, that the ground is prepared to ſend forth increaſe, when the corn is ſown in it; and by the ſame again, whereby it proſpers and thrives after it comes up. Therefore, as the Pſalmiſt ſays in another place, The eyes of all wait on thee, and thou giveſt them their meat in due ſeaſon. Thou openeſt thy hand, and ſatisfieſt the deſire of every living thing, Pſal. cxlv. 15, 16. That is, " This mercy and benignity of his, is an inexhauſtible ſpring of all good things, a treaſure of abundant ſupply to all creatures in the world, which conſequently attend and wait his pleaſure, and never fail to receive from him timely, and ſeaſonably, according to their neceſſities, whatever they really ſtand in need of.

And the Divine Providence, in theſe reſpects, is farther manifeſt, in that he has been ſometimes known, in a ſpecial and extraordinary manner, to vouchſafe theſe bleſſings to ſuch as have been careful to obey and ſerve him as they ought to do; and to with-hold or with-draw them from thoſe that are diſobedient; and which, though it be much worſe, is yet a farther argument of his over-ruling providence, he ſometimes orders matters ſo, that thoſe very things, which are great bleſſings to the good and virtuous, are given for a curſe and puniſhment to the wicked: So that, as he is often known to bring good out of evil to the former, he does alſo many times bring evil out of good unto the latter. Inſtances of both theſe kinds are very frequent in the Scriptures; of which, at preſent, I ſhall mention but a few.

As to the firſt ſort, therefore, Moſes thus beſpeaks the Jews; " It ſhall come to paſs, if you ſhall hearken diligently unto my commandments which I command you this day, to love the Lord your God, and to ſerve him with all your heart, and with all your Soul; that I will give you the rain of your land in due ſeaſon, the firſt rain, and the latter rain, that thou mayeſt gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil. And I will ſend graſs in thy fields for thy cattle, that thou mayeſt eat and be full, Deut. xi. 13, 14, 15. And again more largely, in ch. xxviii. 1, &c. If thou ſhalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to obſerve and do all his commandments which I command thee this day; that the Lord thy God will ſet thee on high above all nations of the earth. And all theſe bleſſings ſhall come upon thee, and overtake thee, if thou ſhalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God. Bleſſed ſhalt thou be in the city, and bleſſed ſhalt thou be in the field. Bleſſed ſhall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increaſe of thy kine, and the flocks of thy ſheep. Bleſſed ſhalt thou be when thou comeſt in, and bleſſed ſhalt thou be when thou goeſt out, &c. So likewiſe elſewhere; If ye walk in my ſtatutes, and keep my commandments, and do them; then I will give you rain in due ſeaſon, and the land ſhall yield her increaſe, and the trees of the field ſhall yield their fruit. And your threſhing ſhall reach unto the vintage, and the vintage ſhall reach unto the ſowing-time; and ye ſhall eat your bread to the full, and dwell in your land ſafely, Levit. xxvi. 3, 4, 5. Which may ſuffice to ſhew, how the Divine Providence takes care for the welfare of the good and virtuous, by ordering and adminiſtring all things ſo, as to make them contribute to their advantage in every reſpect. Then,

Secondly, his providence and power are as clearly ſeen, in reſtraining and with-holding, or with-drawing all theſe benefits from thoſe that will not be obedient to him. With reference to theſe, he is ſaid to ſhut up the Heavens, that the rain may not deſcend; and to make the Heavens iron, and the earth like unto hard braſs, for dryneſs. Thus he threatens in the book and chapter juſt now quoted; I will make your Heaven as iron, and your earth as braſs: And your ſtrength ſhall be ſpent in vain; for your land ſhall not yield her increaſe, neither ſhall the trees of the land yield their fruits, ver. 19, 20. And again, in another place; Thy Heaven that is over thy head ſhall be braſs, and the earth that is under thee ſhall be iron. The Lord ſhall make the rain of thy land powder and duſt; from Heaven ſhall it come down upon thee, until thou be deſtroyed, Deut. xxviii. 23, 24. Accordingly we find, that Ahab and his people were thus puniſhed for their ſins, by a moſt grievous famine, occaſioned by the want of rain, for the ſpace of three years and upwards, 1 Kings xvii and xviii. Of which James makes mention, ſaying, Elias was a man ſubject to like paſſions as we are, and he prayed earneſtly that it might not rain: And it rained not on the earth by the ſpace of three years and ſix months. And he prayed again, and the Heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit, Jam. v. 17, 18. That is, upon the at leaſt ſeeming repentance of that people.

In ſhort from theſe and many other paſſages of Scripture that might be quoted; ſee Pſal. cvii. 34, &c. it appears, that whatever happens to the good and virtuous, or to the wicked, for the benefit of the former, or for the puniſhment of the latter, is the effect of God's juſt providence, either immediately appointing, or at leaſt permitting it to happen to them. It is by the guidance and direction of his providence alone, that all other creatures ſerve effectually to the good and happineſs of thoſe that love and are obedient to him; and for evil, and to make them miſerable, who will not obey him. So that, as the Apoſtle ſays on one hand, All things work together for good to them that love God, Rom. viii. 28. we may as truly ſay on the other hand, that he makes all things work together for evil to them that hate him, as all they are ſaid to do, who are not careful to obey and ſerve him; for he is over all.

But it would be endleſs to enumerate all the texts of Scripture which aſſert the ſuperintendency of Divine Providence over, and its preſerving, directing, and governing all things. For as the Sacred Writings do frequently join the works of creation and providence together, as if they were, though not one and the ſame, yet at leaſt inſeparable; ſo the ſame Holy Scriptures, by which the providence of God over all things in the world is proved, are ſo very numerous, there being ſcarce a page in the whole Bible that is not furniſhed, more or leſs, with teſtimonies to this purpoſe; that nothing is inculcated more frequently, nothing taught more clearly and expreſly there, than this. You may conſult, at leiſure, Job xii. 38, 39, 40, and 41. Pſal. viii, xix, xci, civ, cvii, and cxxxvi. Prov. xvi. and xx. Jer. x. Matth. vi. and ſo Acts xiv. and xvii. And indeed, in almoſt every chapter of the Bible, ſomething may be met with, to make out, that God does by an over-ruling providence preſerve and govern all things. Therefore, I ſhall not, becauſe I need not, ſtay to illuſtrate this, which is ſo plain a truth, by ſhewing how it may be made appear, or reaſonably inferred, from the many types and ſymbols of it, to be met with here and there in Sacred Writ, or by any other arguments from thence, beſides theſe that have been offered, but rather now ſhew, that this truth is no leſs plain from reaſon, than it has been ſhewn to be from Scripture. And,

Firſt, I argue from the nature of the Deity, which of neceſſity infers ſuch a ſuperintendency of the Divine Providence as we have been hitherto contending for; ſince without it nothing could ſubſiſt, any more than it could be at firſt created: Becauſe the ſelf-ſame reaſons which moved him to create, muſt likewiſe be ſuppoſed to move him to be equally concerned in the government and preſervation of the things he has created: Beſides, as God is of himſelf, and knows no cauſe or author of his being, and for that reaſon is abſolutely independant; ſo all other beings muſt depend on him, as the ſole cauſe and author of their being: And by conſequence, all ſecond cauſes, to which ſome have aſcribed the government and preſervation of the world muſt depend on ſome firſt cauſe, which can be none but God, both for their being, and their acting in ſuch a manner as they do, and to ſuch certain ends and purpoſes for which they have their being, and to which all their operations manifeſtly tend. Nor can we think him infinitely wiſe, and powerful, and good, unleſs we be perſwaded alſo, that he is thus concerned in governing the world, and all ſorts of beings in it. For if he were not at all concerned in the government of the world, it muſt be either from his want of knowledge and ſkill, or his want of power, or at leaſt his want of will to do it. But it would be blaſphemy to ſay, or think ſuch things of God; who, as he is moſt wiſe, muſt intimately know all things, and have ſufficient ſkill to govern and direct them; and, as he is moſt powerful, muſt be abundantly able to effect whatever he deſigns, for to Omnipotence nothing is impoſſible; and as he is the beſt of Beings, and was, by the greateſt and moſt perfect goodneſs, moved to create at firſt, ſo he cannot but be moved to govern and preſerve the world, which he by his Almighty Power has created. But,

Secondly, I argue from the nature and condition of all created beings; which, as they could not make themſelves, ſo neither could they be ſuſtained one moment, unleſs the ſame Almighty Arm and Power, by which they were created, were ſtill as much concerned in the preſervation of them. To which purpoſe let us hear the Pſalmiſt, "O Lord, ſays he, how manifold are thy works? In wiſdom haſt thou made them all; the earth is full of thy riches. So is the great and wide ſea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both ſmall and great beaſts. There go the ſhips, there is that Leviathan, whom thou haſt made to play therein. Theſe wait all upon thee, that thou mayeſt give them their meat in due ſeaſon. That thou giveſt them, they gather; thou openeſt thy hand, they are filled with good: Thou hideſt thy face, they are troubled: Thou takeſt away their breath, they die, and return to their duſt, Pſal. civ. 24, &c. The ſenſe of which is briefly this: That as all theſe things were made by God, ſo it is from his good Providence alone, that they receive whatever is needful to their preſervation, without the conſtant care of which, they muſt inſtantly ceaſe to be. Beſides, if we conſider how many things there be, which neither ſee, nor are any way ſenſible of any end for which they have their being, yet are by certain laws directed to ſome end, and do by nature conſtantly purſue it; we muſt conclude, they are directed to that end by ſome ſuperior, moſt wiſe and powerful Providence, which both foreknows the end of all things, and can and does infallibly direct and guide them to it.

Thirdly, If the world and all things in it were not governed and directed by an Almighty and moſt wiſe Providence, how were it poſſible that God, or men by him inſpired, ſhould be able to foretel ſo punctually, as they have often done, ſuch events as did not, neither were to happen in ſeveral after they were ſo foretold? For if ſuch things have happened, in every circumſtance exactly as they were foretold, and when they very much depended on the wills and inclinations, and affections of free agents; this argues, beyond all contradiction, that they muſt be over-ruled and guided by ſome higher Power, who, againſt all oppoſition, was able to effect and bring to paſs what had been ſo foretold; and that Power can be nothing elſe but the Divine Almighty Providence and Power of God, by which all things were made, and by which all things are governed.

Fourthly, That the conſtitutions and revolutions of kingdoms and ſtates are directed and managed by an unſeen, but certain and unerring Providence, by which ſceptres and crowns are diſpoſed of, and transferred from one perſon to another, which ſets up kings and princes, and throws them down at pleaſure, and which changes times and ſeaſons uncontroulably, is not denied even by the worſt of men. And, indeed, from whence elſe ſhould it be, that kingdoms are erected and eſtabliſhed, and preſerved when ſo eſtabliſhed; that laws ſhould be obſerved inviolably, and a ſettled order kept up and maintained ſo ſtrictly in every conſtitution, that the world does not become a ſtage of all the villanies which human ſkill is able to invent, or human force to execute, ſince the number of bad men ſo far exceeds the number of the good and virtuous, ſince thoſe that would over-turn all laws are far more numerous and powerful than thoſe that would obſerve and keep them? Surely no other cauſe or reaſon can be imagined or aſſigned, why things are not quite otherwiſe than now they are, and always have been; unleſs we do ſuppoſe them to be governed and directed by that God, by whom kings reign, and princes decree juſtice, Prov. viii. 15. who, as the Prophet Daniel told a very great one, ruleth in the kindom of men, and giveth it to whomſoever he will, Dan. iv. 32.

Fifthly, That the providence of God does ſuperintend, direct and govern all things, is farther manifeſt, from the extraordinary benefits and judgments he pours down, the one upon the good and virtuous, and the other on the wicked, beſide, above, and ſometimes contrary to all order and appearance of human affairs, when all things ſeem to tend to quite another iſſue and event.

And laſtly, The force and actings of mens conſciences within them is another cogent argument of the ſuperintendency of Divine Providence. For, if the world, and men, and all things in the world, were not governed and directed by it, but all things came by chance and fortune, as ſome have choſe; whence comes it, that the conſciences of men do conſtantly, according to the nature of their actions, either excuſe or elſe accuſe them? Why is it, that this faithful witneſs, this impartial and inexorable judge, cannot be ſo removed or ſilenced, but that he will return and ſpeak again, till he either bring the hardned wretch to ſenſe and reaſon, or leaves him utterly without excuſe? And how is it, that the moſt obdurate ſinners are ſo caſt down and terrified by the ſecret whiſpers of this officious, but juſt and faithful Miniſter within them, if it were not from a ſenſe of having offered ſome affront to that good Providence, and ſo provoked that Power, by which they were created, and are conſtantly provided for, preſerved, and governed?

But, as this doctrine of the providence of God is thus clearly taught in Scripture, and is ſo agreeable to reaſon; ſo we have the ſuffrage of all men in all ages for it, except only a little inconſiderable ſect of Epicureans, who, for ſome reaſons, to themſelves beſt known, if at all known, appeared againſt it. All the wiſer Heathens have with one conſent affirmed it; of which innumerable inſtances might be given: But I ſhall content my ſelf with two or three at preſent.

Plato lays down this as the foundation of one of his Divine Diſcourſes, ὥς εἰσιν ἐπιμελούμενοι θεοὶ πάντων μικρῶν ϗ μειζόνων, That the gods take care of all things, ſmall and great. And Ariſtotle, or whoever was the author of the booſt de Mundo, thus beſpeaks us, ὥσπερ ἐν νηῒ κυβερνήτης, ἐν ἅρματι ἡνίοχος, &c. What a pilate is to a ſhip, a driver to a chariot, a chanter to a choir, a law to a city, or a commander to an army, the ſame is God to the world. That is God is as certainly the Supreme Governor of the world, as they are governors of their reſpective ſtations and employments; and conſequently, all things are directed, ordered and diſpoſed, according to his will and pleaſure.

I ſhall not trouble you with quotations out of Seneca and Cicero, who, by various arguments taken from the ſituation and motions of the Heavenly Bodies, the ſtability and beauty of the earth, and ſeveral other inſtances of things and perſons, have proved effectually the neceſſity of a Divine Providence ſuperintending, governing, preſerving and directing all things or beings in the world; becauſe their teſtimonies to this purpoſe are too numerous to find room in this Diſcourſe. Such, briefly, was the ſuperſtitious eſteem that ſome of the ancient Heathens entertained of Providence, that they inſtituted and performed religious worſhip to it, as a ſeparate Divinity, accounting the cauſe or author, not only of the fruitfulneſs of the earth, but of all the bleſſings they enjoyed.

In ſhort, and to conclude this point; There is no argument made uſe of for the proof of God's exiſtence, but will ſerve as well to prove his Providence: For the Divine Nature and Providence are ſo knit together, that they are not to be ſeparated without deſtroying both; and he that affirms or denies the Providence of God, muſt alſo affirm or deny his very Being. And hence the Scriptures oftentimes diſtinguiſh the true God from idols, or falſe gods, by the ſole argument of the ſuperintendency of his Providence. To this purpoſe holy Job thus ſpeaks to his friend Zophar; Ask now the beaſts, and they ſhall teach thee; and the fowls of the air, and they ſhall tell thee: Or ſpeak to the earth, and it ſhall teach thee; and the fiſhes of the ſea ſhall declare unto thee. Who knoweth not all theſe, that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this? In whoſe hand is the ſoul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind, Job xii. 7, 8, 9, 10. This is an appeal to all creatures for the providence of God. And by this very argument of his Providence, he diſtinguiſhes himſelf from all falſe gods, ſaying by the Prophet, or the Prophet, Iſa. xli. 22, 23. rather ſpeaking by his order, thus: Let them bring them forth, and ſhew us what ſhall happen: Let them ſhew the former things what they be, that we may conſider them, and know the latter end of them; or declare us things for to come. Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are gods: Yea, do good or evil, that we may be diſmayed, and behold it together. And again; I am the Lord, that is my name, and my glory will I not give to another, neither my praiſe to graven images. Behold, the former things are come to paſs, and new things do I declare: Before they ſpring forth, I tell you of them, ch. xlii. 8, 9. And even among the very Heathens, as the terms God and Providence, were uſed promiſcuouſly, to ſignify one and the ſame Almighty Being; ſo they were wont to brand for Atheiſts, not only thoſe who denied the Being, but thoſe alſo who denied the Providence of God.

And thus I have proved directly, I hope to ſome degree of ſatisfaction, that God does by his providence ſuperintend, preſerve, and govern all things and beings in the world. Now, therefore,

II. Secondly, I ſhall conſider and reply to what has been moſt uſually objected againſt this doctrine.

Now there are three things eſpecially, that have been urged as objections againſt the truth of this doctrine of Divine Providence, by atheiſtical perſons.

1. That the good and virtuous are oftentimes under very evil circumſtances in the preſent life.
2. That thoſe perſons who are moſt wicked, are not ſeldom very proſperous and happy here. And,
3. That the very ſame evils are frequently inflicted in this world on good and bad men indifferently.

Now to all theſe three objections it may be ſaid in general, firſt, that no man can for certain know, or be infallible in his judgment of another man's goodneſs and virtue: For it very often happens, that very great wickedneſs lies hid, and is concealed under the cloak, or outward ſhew of virtue and religion; and the minds and inward thoughts of men can be known to none but God, who ſees and knows the hearts of all men. And, ſecondly, there are many evils, as we think them, which befal the good and virtuous, that are natural; and ſo common to them with other men, and are not evils of the mind, but of the body only. And therefore, they are not truly evil, becauſe their contraries are not always truly good, but very often have ſome evil conſequence, as they may be the occaſions or inſtruments of ſome impiety, and ſo the cauſes of, or inlets to the greateſt miſery imaginable. But leſt ſuch a general reply ſhould not be thought ſufficient; I ſhall be ſomewhat more particular; and give a diſtinct and ſeparate anſwer to each objection, in its proper place and order.

1. And firſt, it is objected againſt the providence of God, That the good and virtuous are oftentimes under very evil circumſtances in the preſent life.

To which I anſwer; That the evils which befal ſuch perſons in this life, are ſent by a moſt wiſe and gracious God, not as real evils to them for their hurt, but for their good, as having the reaſon or cauſe within themſelves, and ſo being fit and proper means of ſome much greater and more excellent and deſirable good, thereby deſigned them. For,

Firſt, By their patient and conſtant ſuffering of all evils inflicted on them, or permitted to beſal them, by a wiſe and gracious God, and their perſevering faithful and obedient to him under all that can happen to them; his glory is very much promoted: And nothing can be better for any man in this life than always, and by all means to endeavour to promote God's glory; becauſe, by this he is infallibly conducted to the never-failing glories of a better life to come.

Secondly, This procedure with the good and virtuous does ſometimes tend to and effect the conviction and converſion of ungodly men, and the quickning of the negligent and ſlothful to the performance of their duty; when they take notice of the generous piety of ſuch perſons, ſo brightly ſhining through all ſorts of ſufferings; and cannot but eſteem it worthy of their imitation: And thus, again, the afflictions of the righteous tend to their unſpeakable advantage, as they are thereby made one ſort of means of the converſion and ſalvation of the wicked, than which nothing can adminiſter more ſolid comfort to them in this life, and nothing can be more effectually conducive to their eternal happineſs in another world.

Thirdly, By the afflictions good men labour under here, they are fitted and prepared and qualified for the glories and felicities of a better life; becauſe, not only their faith and patience are hereby tried and proved, but they are more confirmed in piety and virtue, their prayers are ſent up to God with greater fervency and ardor, as quickned by the ſenſe of their afflictions, and eſpecially of their ſins, which they believe to be the ſole procuring, and meritorious cauſe of all the evils they endure; and becauſe they are reſtrained thereby from falling into ſin, or are thereby gently puniſhed, as receiving only fatherly correction, when at any time they do offend; and ſo at length being thus tried, and having ſhewn their faith and patience to be ſuch as God requires and will accept, they are approved by him, and his approbation of them is followed with peace of conſcience here in this life, and hereafter, being ſo approved, they ſhall receive the never-fading crown of righteouſneſs, which God has promiſed and prepared for them that ſerve and pleaſe him in that other life which is to come. And ſo much may ſuffice, at preſent, in anſwer to the firſt objection.

2. The ſecond is, That thoſe perſons who are moſt wicked, are not ſeldom very proſperous and happy here. To which I anſwer;

Firſt, That the good things which wicked men enjoy in this life are not truly good, becauſe not put to that good uſe by them, for which they are deſigned. Beſides, that God's beſtowing on ſuch perſons the good things of this life, is no argument of his approving, or that he does not highly diſapprove, and even abhor them for their wickedneſs; but he does it with a gracious intent, that ſuch his goodneſs to them may lead them to repentance, Rom. ii. 4. and engage them in his ſervice: And if it has not this effect upon them, it will be a means or reaſon very juſtly, of their heavier condemnation. For,

Secondly, When by the abundant goodneſs of a gracious God, men have conferred upon them all the preſent good they wiſh for or deſire to make them happy, and they notwithſtanding, walk on ſecurely in their evil ways, and never think of forſaking their ſins, and amending their lives; then all this goodneſs of God towards them is juſtly turned to evil to them, and they are thereby more effectually fitted for deſtruction; and it does not ſeldom happen, that ſuch perſons do receive ſome heavy puniſhment in this life, as an earneſt of that future never ending miſery, to which they ſhall be ſentenced in the life to come.

Thirdly, Neither have wicked men that ſubſtantial comfort and ſatiſfaction in the enjoyment of the things of this world, which the good and virtuous feel; for their conſciences are ever and anon vexing and tormenting them with the ſenſe and aggravation of their ſins, which, though by ſome means uſed it may at ſome times ſeem to be aſleep, and ſo afford ſome little reſpite to them for a time, yet it awakes again; and it is impoſſible for any man to impoſe a perfect total ſilence on it, but it will be often putting men in mind of whatever they have done amiſs: So that, in the midſt of the greateſt affluence of worldly goods, they are wholly void of ſolid joy and comfort, and God will never ſuffer them to reſt ſecure from a ſenſe of guilt and anguiſh for the many ſins they have committed, and continue to commit, though they may not labour under any preſent evil. But,

Fourthly, The Scriptures are not wholly void of inſtances of the Divine Wrath and Vengeance poured on wicked men, even in this life. Not to ſpeak of that general deſtruction of mankind, except eight perſons, by the dreadful univerſal deluge; nor that other terrible effect of Divine Juſtice on the cities and inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrha; nor that aſtoniſhing vengeance, which after a ſo long exerciſed, and ſo very much abuſed and affronted patience, God at length ſhowered down and executed on his own peculiar people the Jews: We have the particular and eminent examples of the ſeverity of his Vindictive Juſtice, even in this world, in the perſons of Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, Herod, and ſeveral others; which no one can be ignorant of, who has but ſmall acquaintance with the Sacred Writings; ſee alſo what has been ſaid concerning God's Judgments under the firſt particular above. And,

Laſtly, However wicked men may fare in this world, God has provided for them, and will certainly inflict upon them, a moſt ſevere and laſting puniſhment in the next. So that, though their puniſhment at preſent be deferred, it will not always be ſo, but will one day meet or overtake them, and lie upon them everlaſtingly. And though they may live free from evil here, yet they will not be able to avoid thoſe unſpeakably greater evils of the future ſtate; and their being outwardly ſo happy in this preſent life, renders their caſe not much unlike that of ſome rich criminals, who live high, and fare ſumptuouſly in a priſon, till they are carried out to execution: So wicked men may thrive and proſper in the world, notwithſtanding all the ſins and wickedneſſes committed by them; till God's time is come to call them hence unto that fearful judgment, which neither any skill or cunning, nor any force or power ſhall be able to avoid, or to reſiſt.

Therefore, in ſhort, though from the miſeries which good and virtuous men do ſometimes feel and labour under, and the happineſs on the other hand, which wicked and ungodly men do oftentimes enjoy, ſome have been inclined to deny, and others, even good men, have been apt to doubt of the ſuperintendency of Divine Providence; yet there is nevertheleſs ſufficient reaſon to believe it.

Firſt, Becauſe though the reaſon of Divine Providence does require that things ſhould go well with good men, and quite otherwiſe with the wicked; yet it does not require it to be always ſo abſolutely with either of them: Nay, on the contrary, the greateſt and moſt excellent wiſdom is evident ſometimes, in ſuch ſeemingly unequal diſpenſations; in that, as God ſometimes puniſhes mens ſins in this life, to vindicate his Juſtice, and aſſert his Providence over all; ſo he does ſometimes let them go unpuniſhed here, that we may hence conclude, there is another life to come hereafter, in which he will be ſure to render to every man according to his deeds. And hence an ancient father very well obſerves, That if every ſin a man is guilty of were puniſhed in this life, we ſhould be apt to think there would be no judgment afterwards; and if, on the other hand, no ſins at all were puniſhed here, we ſhould be ready to deny, or at leaſt to doubt of the Providence of God. Therefore, as he tells us elſewhere, It pleaſed the Divine Providence to appoint and prepare ſuch good things for the good and virtuous againſt the time to come, of which no wicked perſon ſhould partake; and ſuch evil things for the wicked in another world, in which no righteous man ſhould ſhare. But as for all temporal good things, theſe he has made common to both ſorts; that we ſhould neither be too earneſtly deſirous of preſent happineſs, ſince we ſee wicked men enjoy as great a ſhare of that, as any of the righteous do; nor too ſollicitous to avoid, by any baſe and unbecoming ways and means, the evils of the preſent life, ſince we ſee good and holy men are ſo obnoxious to, and ſo frequently afflicted with them. For,

Secondly, If we look into the Sacred Treaſury, from whence all good and evil things are ſent forth and diſtributed to men, ſometimes according to their merits and deſervings, either for reward, or puniſhment; and ſometimes for ſome other wiſe and righteous ends and purpoſes. We ſhall eaſily perceive, that thoſe things are not always real evils, with which the righteous are afflicted, though they ſeem to us to be ſo, becauſe they are not ſeldom turned to their advantage; and that the good things of this preſent life are not always truly ſuch to wicked men, tho' we may think they are, becauſe they are oftentimes, if not the inſtruments, or cauſes, yet, at leaſt, the reaſons of their final ruin and deſtruction. So that, as the worſt of preſent evils are often turned to good, to thoſe that are obedient to the will of God; ſo, on the contrary, the greateſt preſent good is frequently converted into evil, for the puniſhment of thoſe that will not be obedient to him. The whole 73d Pſalm is very clear and full to this ſame purpoſe; where the Pſalmiſt makes it his endeavour to demonſtrate the unreaſonableneſs of disbelieving, or but doubting of the Providence of God, on account of the proſperity of the wicked, and the evil condition of many righteous perſons here in this life; for that God does often ſhew his vengeance on the former, and his loving kindneſs to the latter, for the puniſhment of the one, and to reward the other. And hence we may infallibly conclude, that in the future ſtate, as theſe latter will be much more happy, ſo the former will be far more miſerable, than either of them can be here.

obdient

I might now largely ſhew the ſenſe the very Heathens had of this affair; and particularly how Seneca has appeared on the behalf of Divine Providence, in a book written by him on ſet purpoſe, to evince the ſuperintendency of it over all affairs of this world, from this very argument of the ſeemingly unequal diſtributions of good and evil, which ſome have urged againſt it: But I muſt haſten to,

III. The laſt objection mentioned; namely, That the very ſame evils are frequently inflicted in this world, on good and bad men indifferently.

To ſtrengthen which objection, the Prophet is brought in, who thus beſpeaks the Jews; Thus ſaith the Lord, Behold, I am againſt thee, and will draw forth my ſword out of his ſheath, and will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked; Ezek. xxi. 3. Nay, we are told, that ſometimes the righteous have been puniſhed on the account of the unrighteous; as in the inſtances of the univerſal deluge, and the deſtruction of Sodom and Gomorrah; Gen. vii. and xix. in both which it cannot well be doubted, but many harmleſs infants were deſtroyed, on the account of the great wickedneſs of their parents. So likewiſe the hiſtorian ſeems to intimate, that for the wickedneſs of Achan, not only himſelf, but his whole family, and all his ſubſtance were deſtroyed; and that this was highly acceptable to God, in that the fierceneſs of his anger againſt Iſrael was thereby turned away; Joſh. vii. 24, 25, 26. And ſo again, we read, that for David's ſin, in numbering the people, no leſs than ſeventy thouſand of his ſubjects, who were innocent, at leaſt in that reſpect, died of the peſtilence; ſee 2 Sam. xxiv. Nay, it is farther urged, that ſometimes the innocent poſterity of wicked men, have been cut off for the iniquities of their parents; as in the caſe of ſeven ſons of Saul, and of Solomon's poſterity, and the poſterity of Ahab, and ſeveral others; ſee 2 Sam. xxi. 1 Kings xl. chap. xxi. To all which, I anſwer in the general.

Firſt, That it is one thing to be cut off, and another thing to be puniſhed: The cutting off of any perſon being an act of that dominion which agrees to, and is inherent in that Being, who has abſolute ſovereignty over other beings, and power either to beſtow upon them life and being, or to deprive them of their life and being at his pleaſure; but the puniſhing of any perſon is an act of judgment, which always has relation to ſome crime committed by the perſon puniſhed. And,

Secondly, It is one thing for any perſon to be puniſhed on the account of another's ſin; and another thing for him to be puniſhed as an innocent and inoffenſive perſon. From which two eaſy and familiar diſtinctions, which muſt always be admitted in this caſe, it will be very eaſy to give a clear and ſatisfactory anſwer to what is thus objected againſt the providence of God. And,

Firſt, It is not true, that God puniſhes the innocent; for, neither his juſtice nor his goodneſs will agree to this. He may ſometimes, for ſome wiſe reaſons, involve the righteous in the ſame general deſtruction with the wicked; but then, he does not puniſh them with the wicked. It is true, the puniſhment, as well as the ſins of wicked men, is more highly aggravated by his cutting off the righteous with them; as when innocent children are cut off with their ungodly parents; or when the righteous are taken away from the midſt of an unrighteous generation of men, to ſhew them how unworthy of their company they were, &c. But as to the righteous themſelves, who ſeem to be thus puniſhed, as they are hereby, as it were, made the means or inſtruments of expreſſing God's anger and wrath againſt the wicked; ſo their afflictions here, even their cutting off, ſhall undoubtedly turn to their unſpeakably greater advantage in the future ſtate. But,

Secondly, No man lives without ſin; and therefore, though the righteous are not puniſhed with the wicked, as being guilty of the ſame ſins with them; yet they may be puniſhed for their own, and becauſe they have been guilty in ſome reſpect or other. So that, as God ſometimes takes away the righteous, for the greater aggravation of the ſins and the puniſhments of the wicked; ſo he ſometimes cuts them off, to vindicate his juſtice, which will not ſuffer ſin to go unpuniſhed: And ſo, becauſe he will not puniſh them eternally in another world, he lays his hand upon them here, and fatherly chaſtiſes them in this life, that their ſouls may be ſaved in that which is to come. In ſhort, all men are guilty before God; for all have ſinned, and come much ſhort of ſhewing forth his glory as they ought to do: The moſt juſt perſon falls ſeven, that is, ſeveral times in a day; and therefore God may juſtly puniſh ſuch a perſon for his own, though he does not for another's ſins. And therefore,

Thirdly, As to thoſe multitudes that were cut off for David's ſin, of which they were not guilty; they were not altogether innocent, and therefore juſtly might be puniſh'd for the ſins they had themſelves been guilty of; that is, upon their own account, as well as for the greater aggravation of that ſin of David's, for which the Scripture ſays they were cut off.

Fourthly, We are not told expreſly, that Achan's ſons, &c. were actually puniſhed with him: But if the paſſage muſt be ſo interpreted, it muſt be on this ſuppoſition, that they were privy and conſenting to that ſin, for which he was ſo puniſhed. For it cannot be ſuppoſed that Joſhua would ſo ſoon tranſgreſs that law, which ſays expreſly, The fathers ſhall not be put to death for the children, neither ſhall the children be put to death for the fathers; but every man ſhall be put to death for his own ſin; Deut. xxiv. 16. And,

Laſtly, Neither do we meet with any expreſs inſtance or example of any man's poſterity being puniſhed, or cut off, merely on the account of the ſins he had been guilty of in his life-time. For as to the poſterity of Saul, of Solomon, and of Ahab, they cannot be ſuppoſed to have been altogether innocent, and free from ſin: Neither did their fathers wholly eſcape being puniſhed for their own ſins whilſt they lived. For, as to the firſt, we are expreſly told, that he was ſlain in battle; and for the ſecond, he was threatned in his life-time, that for his idolatry, as a puniſhment thereof upon himſelf, in that it muſt be grievous to him to have this foreknowledge of it, that ten of the twelve tribes ſhould be rent from his poſterity; and as to Ahab, the laſt inſtance, he, according to the prediction of the Prophet, fell in battle, and the dogs licked up his blood.

In ſhort; God is ſo far from puniſhing, or cutting off the innocent, purely on the account of thoſe that have been guilty, that he has been always rather inclined to ſpare the guilty, even ſuch as had moſt heinouſly provoked him by the worſt of ſins, on the account, and for the ſake of the innocent and virtuous. Thus, if there had but been ten righteous perſons to be found in Sodom and Gomorrha, he would have ſaved thoſe cities for their ſakes, Gen. xviii. 32. But when God has determined abſolutely to puniſh or deſtroy the wicked, or to bring upon a people any great and heavy judgment for their ſins, which they ſhall by no means be able to eſcape; he has often taken ſuch effectual care of the righteous that dwelt among them, as that they might be delivered from the vengeance threatned and expected. And this he has done ſeveral ways; ſee Jer. li. 6. and Revel. xviii. 4. Either by a ſeaſonable admonition to them to depart from amongſt a wicked generation; or by preſcribing them the certain means whereby they might be ſaved from the general deſtruction, as in the caſe of Noah, Gen. vi. or by ſending his Angels to bring them forth out of the common danger, as was the caſe of Lot; Gen. xix. or by cauſing their enemies to favour them, which was the caſe of Jeremiah, Jer. xxxix. and xl. or laſtly, at leaſt, by taking them timely out of the land of the living, before he ſends his threatned judgments on it, that they may not ſee, nor be partakers with the wicked in the ſore calamities he had reſolved to bring upon them: To which purpoſe, we are told, The righte- ous periſheth, and no man layeth it to heart; and merciful men are taken away, none conſidering that the righteous is taken away from the evil to come; Iſa. lvii. 1. Of which we have examples, in the ſon of Jeroboam; and in the good king Joſiah; ſee 1 Kings xiv. 12, 13. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 27, 28. They that require farther ſatisfaction in this great point, will, while they think themſelves wiſe, act like the fool, who ſays in his heart, there is no God.

Therefore, if it be true, as undoubtedly it is, That God's providence is over all; then,

Firſt, As it is our duty to acknowledge our dependance on his providence, for whatever we can need; ſo we ſhould own our ſelves indebted to the ſelf-ſame providence, for whatever we enjoy to make us happy here in this life.

Secondly, It is our duty, likewiſe, whatever our condition or external circumſtances may be in this world, not to repine or murmur at his wiſe and righteous providence, who both knows, and does vouchſafe us, what is truly good and uſeful to us; and though our preſent circumſtances may ſeem very hard, in compariſon with other mens, yet, if our hardſhips have that good effect upon us, to render our ſubmiſſion to his will and pleaſure chearful, and manifeſt our faith and patience to be ſuch as he requires, and will accept; then we may reſt ſatisfied with this well-grounded confidence, That as we know him to be able, ſo we ſhall find him willing to make us full amends in the other world, for all the evil we can meet with or endure in this. For ſo the Apoſtle has aſſured us, That, provided we are conſtant to our duty, Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; 2 Cor. iv. 17.

Thirdly, Though it be to the Divine Providence we are indebted, for whatever bleſſings we enjoy at preſent, no leſs than for thoſe infinitely greater and more valuable bleſſings we expect to meet with in the future life; yet we are not therefore to be idle, and leave all to God: But we muſt work with our own hands, that is, we muſt do our endeavour, in our lawful callings and employments, and then expect a bleſſing from his goodneſs on our labours, in order to our living well and happily, who will not fail, on that condition, to give ſucceſs thereto; provided we are careful to perform our duty to him as we ought, in thoſe reſpects, wherein his honour is immediately concerned; I mean, in the performance of religious duties in their proper times and ſeaſons, as well as minding other ſecular concerns: For while we are neglectful of our duty towards God, and only mind the things of this world, we have no reaſon to expect to thrive and proſper here; and much leſs to be happy in another world. Our duty, therefore, towards God, and our induſtry in our lawful callings, muſt not claſh and interfere, ſo as to juſtle out one another; but each muſt take its turn; and the firſt muſt have the preference, when the latter cannot well be followed without injury to that: And if we ſo behave our ſelves, we have great reaſon to expect his bleſſing on the labours of our hands at preſent; and hereafter, we are ſure, we ſhall not fail of meeting ſuch a happineſs, as, both for the greatneſs and duration of it, will by infinite degrees excel whatever can be here expected, or enjoyed.

And laſtly, To our juſt endeavours, we muſt add our daily prayers to God, for his bleſſing upon us and them; without which, we cannot hope they ſhould ſucceed in any meaſure. For as we have encouragement to ask, and to expect good things from God, upon condition that we ask them; ſee Matt. vii. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11. ſo we have no manner of encouragement to hope for, or expect them, if we do not ask them of him. In ſhort; we muſt not only pray, nor only work: But working and praying muſt be always joined together, to engage a gracious providence to bleſs us. And, to conclude; as an ancient author has expreſſed it, We muſt ſo work, as if we were to do all for our ſelves; and yet ſo pray, as if God by his good providence were to do all our buſineſs for us: Or in other words, When we work we muſt make a virtue thereof by doing it chearfully, and acknowledge it as God's bleſſing, and pray that God will proſper our handy work.

A Diſſertation on Truth and Falſhood.

This is added here, becauſe it is the concluſion of the Apoſtolick exhortation to unity. He had ſhewn, that we are fitly joined together by the blood of one Redeemer; by one baptiſm, by one rule of faith, and that we are all one myſtical body, animated by one and the ſame Spirit of God, who is in all, through all and over us all (which I have explained in the preceding Diſſertation, and then from this manifold tye of relation and endearment he thus concludes; Wherefore, putting away lying, ſpeak every man truth with his neighbour, ver. 25. He knew that God had done his part; but he alſo was as ſenſible, that man was backward in his return for all that God had done for us. So after he had ſhewn the manner how God had united Chriſtians into one body under Chriſt their head; he ſhews by what means man muſt approve himſelf to be a good ſubject under Chriſt's direction or Goſpel. And this, ſays he, muſt be done by putting away lying, and ſpeaking truth; for falſhood is of that nature, that it will deprave the ſoul, withdraw it from the obedience due to God, and inliſt it under the banner of Satan, who is the father of lies; on the contrary, truth is the ſure means of obtaining God's bleſſing, who neither deceiveth, nor can be deceived.

Let us therefore, enquire into the nature of falſhood and truth, that we may ſee in what they conſiſt. Now,

The falſhood, which is the ſubject of our preſent enquiry, and commonly goes by the name of a lye, is not a miſtaken notion, or an error in the underſtanding: For ſuch ſpots there will be in the cleareſt head. Nor is it a logical untruth, when our words agree not with the nature of things. A logical truth may be a moral lye: For we ſpeak not truly in a moral ſenſe, becauſe the thing is true, but becauſe we conclude it ſo to be. The falſhood here is of the wilſul kind, when a man ſpeaks otherwiſe than he thinks in his heart, though the thing ſpoken ſhould be true. We have caſuiſts, I know, of great authority, who make an evil intention an eſſential ingredient in the conſtitution of a lye; but this I believe, will appear to be rather an aggravation of the ſin, than a part of its eſſence.

From this definition of a lye, we may eaſily collect the nature of that truth oppoſed to it by Paul, at ch. ix. ver. 25. For the Apoſtle in this place, conſiders man as a creature framed for ſociety, and preſcribeth the rule he is to act by as ſuch: And conſequently the truth here preſcribed cannot be a right notion of things reſiding only in the mind: Nor barely, the truth of a propoſition, or the agreement of our ſpeech with the ſubject it is applied to; but muſt jointly conſiſt in the conformity of the tongue with the ſentiments of the heart, for upon this all the good of ſociety depends. The nature of truth and falſhood being thus explained and ſtated, I proceed,

To conſider the ſeveral kinds of falſhood, and whether a lye of any kind, or in any caſe be allowable.

Of all the ſorts of falſhood, the moſt criminal is that of the pernicious kind; and the moſt deſtructive of this kind, is the ſpeaking evil of dignities; either by loading them with vices they know not, which is ſlander: Or, by clipping thoſe virtues they ſhine with, which is detraction. And it is equally fatal in the effect, whether the arrow flyeth by night, or killeth at noon-day; whether a good name be battered down by open calumny, or blown up by whiſper.

Reputation gives the life and luſtre to a magiſtrate, and turns every thing he toucheth into gold: It is better than precious ointment: For it not only maketh the bones fat, and refreſheth the ruler upon every reflection, but the virtue of it will raiſe the dead, and work wonders on his people; whereas detraction and ſlander, by a ſtrange magick, will take off the wheels of his chariot, the edge of his ſword, and the vigour of his thought, and render the beſt man uſeleſs to the publick. This made Chriſt himſelf that he could do no mighty work, (Mark vi. 5.) in his own country. As to all other pernicious lies of an inferior nature, I need ſay no more, but that in every miſchievous lye there is a two-fold iniquity, falſhood and injury; a ſin againſt the God of Truth, and againſt the right of our neighbour, and therefore unqueſtionably evil.

Another ſpecies of falſhood is the jeſting lye; when we ſpeak falſly not with an intention to hurt, but to delight only. And conſidering how much truth is ſacrificed to this idol, both in converſation and writing, one would be apt to think it a ſocial virtue to make merry at the expence of truth. But I take this to be unlawful, and for theſe reaſons.

Firſt, Becauſe the formality of a lye conſiſts in the intention to ſpeak a falſhood, and therefore no end can juſtify an intention evil in it ſelf; the jeſting lyar ſins leſs than the pernicious one, but ſtill he ſins, not by intending to pleaſe, but by intending to do it by a lye.

Secondly, Truth is a pearl of infinite value, not to be ſold to ſave my own life, much leſs to feed another's vanity; and one might as well aſk me to ſteal for his ſupport, as to lye for his diverſion. I ſhall only add, that the ſtated rule of Chriſtian converſation is Yea, yea; and nay, nay; for whatſoever is more than theſe cometh of evil. And if we believe that our Judge will call us to an account at the laſt day for every idle word, we can hardly think it adviſeable to venture ſo near damnation for a jeſt.

As to parables and other fictions of the facetious kind, if they are not repreſented as truths, nor fairly to be taken as ſuch, according to the common modes of ſpeech, then are they warranted from Scripture and reaſon; becauſe, when juſtly applied, they do inſinuate ſome unwelcome truths with a better grace, and drive the wedge with a more agreeable force than downright arguments can do.

The only point then that will admit of a diſpute, is the officious or charitable lye: To reſcue ſuffering innocence by the help of a lye, ſeems ſo beautiful an error, (if it be one) that a good man can hardly forbear eſpouſing the charity with this imperfection about it. The bleſſing likewiſe upon the Egyptian midwives ſeemeth to authorize a pious fraud; and it is the judgment of conſiderable caſuiſts, that it is no ſin to deceive him by a lye, who has no right to truth.

Now in matters of morality the rule is perpetual, and without exception. We muſt not do evil that good may come; and therefore if a lye be a moral evil, no circumſtances can make it good. In every lye there is an intention to deceive, and this very intention, I ſay, is in it ſelf evil; for it is a voluntary deviation from the will of God, whoſe moral perfection is never to intend or will a falſhood, but always to love the truth; and therefore as neceſſarily as God loves himſelf, ſo neceſſarily muſt he hate that which is repugnant to his own veracity. Our God is by nature a God of Truth, and hath made us after his own Image, and commanded us to be perfect as he is perfect; and therefore we are indiſpenſably obliged to conform to the Divine Will; to do, as we imagine the God of Truth would do in our place, and as the Son of God did do in our nature. So that to aſk, Whether an officious lye is not lawful, is in effect to aſk, Whether it is not lawful to do like the father of lyes, that good may come? Whether it is not lawful to love my neighbour better than my God, who is Truth it ſelf; or whether I may not pleaſe my Maker by acting in oppoſition to his eſſential Holineſs? The paſſions in themſelves are neither good nor evil, and therefore God has ſet them their bounds which they ſhall not paſs; We may be angry, and ſin not; and conſequently, anger in its own nature cannot be ſinful; but it is no where ſaid, Hitherto ſhalt thou lye, and no further. The art of lying by rule and meaſure, with views and reſerves, cannot be from above; for the Widom from thence hath frequently and univerſally declared, Lying lips to be an abomination to the Lord, and that no lye is of the truth.

But if a lye may be more or leſs ſinful in proportion to the good of the end; it may ſeem to be little or no ſin at all when the good doth more than balance the evil of the lye. For if the Truth of God hath more abounded through my lye, why yet am I judged as a ſinner? To ſteal for the poor is indeed leſs ſinful than to ſteal for my luſts; becauſe it argues leſs pravity in the will; but the charity intended will not take out the ſtain, and make it juſt to ſteal. The blood of Chriſt will compenſate for ſins committed, but even that moſt precious blood cannot make it lawful to commit ſin; becauſe it cannot alter the eternal reaſons of good and evil; and therefore, if it be impoſſible in nature for God himſelf to lye, it ſeems equally impoſſible for him to make it allowable in man.

As to the Egyptian midwives, I know it is generally concluded they told an untruth; but I ſee no certain ground for the concluſion. For if, the more the Iſraelites were afflicted, the more they multiplied; why might not the Hebrew women by the ſame diſtinguiſhing providence be delivered e'er the midwives came in unto them: Though when they came, they ſaved the men children alive in awful regard to the God of Iſrael? But ſuppoſing they did lye; it is certain they were not rewarded for ſo doing; for it is ſaid, becauſe the midwives feared God, that he made them houſes, Exod. i. 21. The thing rewarded was the godly fear, and not the falſhood. This in mercy he paſſed over, and did them good for doing good to his people. After all, no preſedents of old are perfect enough for our imitation; for we are to live by rule, and not by example. It is not what one of Egypt, &c. might do; but whether one of the Heavenly Jeruſalem may lye upon any conſideration? And then we anſwer with Auſtin, lib. contra. Mend. cap. 5. As it is ſaid in Joh. ii. 21. that no lye is of the truth: And of the citizens of this city it is written, In their mouth was found no guile, Revel. xiv. 5. They of old did not do well in lying, and if we imitate them, we do worſe.

And now if the greateſt good upon earth ought not to be compaſſed by the means of a lye; what a melancholy reflection is it, to conſider how much truth falls day by day a victim to pride, revenge, ambition and intereſt; and even to the modes and faſhions of the world that are altogether lighter than vanity it ſelf; to ſee nothing but the ghoſt of integrity walk about in the form of ſound words and good looks, and occaſionally kneeling down even at the horns of the altar! Truth is a virtue divinely fair, and venerable in any dreſs; ſhe looks well, and commands a ſecret reverence from Herod himſelf, when ſhe is cloathed only like her preacher the Baptiſt, with camels hair, and a leathern girdle about her loins; but when ſhe is in her ſoft cloathing, made for kings houſes; when ſhe is arrayed in all the graces of education and politeneſs, then ſhe ſhines in perfection and beauty irreſiſtible. And therefore,

We may hence learn the motives why the Apoſtle exhorts to the practice of mutual ſincerity, when he adds, for we are members one of another.

And here I ſhall conſider man, firſt, in his natural ſtate, or meerly as a ſocial creature.

It is not good that man ſhould be alone: But he cannot enter into ſociety, nor be happy in it, without fixing the ſignification of words, and keeping to that current meaning which cuſtom hath ſtamped upon them; and therefore, to ſpeak one thing, and mean another, to bleſs with the mouth, and curſe inwardly, is high-treaſon againſt the fundamental law of ſociety. The tongue was given by God to expreſs the ſentiments of the heart, and when it deviates from this, it goes counter to the will and deſign of its Maker. Thus again, to gild over malice with a ſmile, to betray with a kiſs, or ſtab in an embrace, are circumſtances that add horror almoſt equal to the crimes; and why? Becauſe theſe are the external marks, the natural image and ſuperſcription of kindneſs in the inward parts; and by walking in this vain ſhew of truth, we look a lye, as well as ſpeak one; and therefore, to counterfeit the hand-writing of nature, to borrow the face of innocence the better to do miſchief, is doubly unnatural.

Was the ſtate of nature indeed a ſtate of war, then it would be equally indifferent which way we carried it on, whether by words ſofter than oyl, and by cutting throats with a feather, or by ſwords, and open violence. But now if we are born for ſociety, for the help and comfort of one another, if our natural averſions to ſolitude, and our mutual dependencies, prompt us to mutual benevolence, if the culture of arts and ſciences, of trade and commerce, if the delights of friendſhip, the beauty and ſtrength of government, with all that is worth living for, if all theſe turn upon the fidelity of the tongue, ſurely then we are obliged to ſincerity, as united by one common nature, and by all the ties and motives to happineſs in this world.

Let us now look upon our ſelves in a nobler view, not only as men, but as Chriſtians.

The Priſcillianiſts upon this very account, (ſee Aug. lib. contra Mend. cap. 2.) and from theſe very words of the Apoſtle extracted a ſalvo for lying to Infidels; becauſe they and Chriſtians were not members one of another. And what theſe Hereticks built up, lo others have daubed with untempered mortar! For have not Chriſtians diſtinguiſhed Chriſtians out of their lives, even againſt the publick faith, and by equivocation and mental reſervation ſpun out the art of leaſing to ſuch extreme fineneſs and ſubtlety, that by the ſlight of theſe inward ſupplies the Devil himſelf need never tell a lye to ſerve his ends? But this, in the phraſe of the Prophet, is to ſin as it were with a cart-rope: It is to draw men to lye upon principle, and to be ten times worſe by religion than they are by nature, for if the light that is in them be darkneſs, how great is that darkneſs!

We are all purchaſed with the ſame blood, and nouriſhed with the ſame ſpirit, we have renounced the father of lyes at our baptiſm, and often eat of the bread of ſincerity and truth at our maſter's table; and love, unfeigned univerſal love, is the badge our Lord will have his diſciples known by; and therefore inſincerity is ſuch a ſoleciſm in a Chriſtian, as iniquity is in a judge, or ill breeding in a courtier: It is a ſin againſt our profeſſion, and in that very thing, which is the principal part and beauty of our calling. Let us therefore examine our ways, and ſee whether we walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called? How did the primitive ſaints bleſs their perſecutors, and how do we revile our benefactors? Can we be members of Chriſt, and citizens of Heaven, while we deal ſo much in craft and diſſimulation upon earth, while our lips drop as an honey-comb, and ſpread the fineſt flowers of the tongue upon the falſeſt heart? What is converſation now a-days but a match at fencing, where we falſify a blow to make that part unguarded, which we deſign to ſtrike? What is friendſhip but the skin of ſincerity ſtuffed out with wind and complement, with profeſſions of infinite reſpect and kindneſs, when the heart intends nothing thereby, or ſomething worſe than nothing? Truly, was the Apoſtle here he would ſay, My brethren, theſe things ought not ſo to be.

And after all, ſincerity is the moſt eaſy, pleaſant, and ſureſt way to make our fortunes in this world, as well as in that to come.

For it is much eaſier to be honeſt in truth, than in appearance only; becauſe honeſty hath not far to go, and the way is plain before her, ſhe hath not many words to make, but is believed and truſted without more ado; ſhe is conſcious of no evil, and therefore ſtands in no need of art and colouring, but loves the light, and is always ready to come forth in her native ſimplicity, and to appear as ſhe is; whereas hypocriſy has a longer journey and a worſe road to travel, ſhe dares not ſtir abroad without her varniſh, and is extremely hard put to it to play the part of nature to the life, and to make picture paſs for reality. The double-minded man is at variance with himſelf, and unſtable in all the ways; he is often bewildered, and at a loſs which way to turn; his head is perplexed to cover the iniquity of his heart, and perpetually at the anvil to forge one plot for the ſupport of another; But the integrity of the upright ſhall guide them, not only by a more direct and eaſy paſſage, but by a more delightful one alſo.

When a man's ways pleaſe the Lord, they always pleaſe himſelf, and at the long run his enemies too. While he propoſes a good end, and purſues it by fair means, all goes well within: He has good reaſon to hope, and none to fear; and therefore if he meets with rubs and diſappointments from without, he is ſatisfied from himſelf. He has two faſt friends, God and his conſcience, and they will ſtand by him in the day of trouble, and conduct and comfort him in all his goings. But diſſimulation and falſhood lay waſte the inward ſatisfactions of the ſoul, and wound that ſpirit, which alone would bear our infirmities: They put the diſſembler upon the rack, and force him to look well in the face, when he is ſick at heart, and to be conſtantly inconſiſtent with himſelf. He cannot ſincerely enjoy the preſent ſucceſs of his devices, for fear of future diſcovery: For whenever the mask drops off (and it is next to impoſſible to keep it always on) then all the fine ſchemes periſh; then the craftſmen and their craft, the ſpider and the ſpider's web come down even to the ground. And when a man hath once made ſhipwreck of his honeſty by his cunning, who will believe him when he ſpeaks true, or truſt him when he intends honeſtly? So that wiſdom and innocence are the only things that will carry us through every ſtage with pleaſure, and hold out to the end. For,

The lip of truth ſhall be eſtabliſhed for ever, but a lying tongue is but for a moment, was Solomon's maxim, and hath been verified in all ages. A lye is a ſickly thing, and hath but a ſhort time to live: It cometh up, and is cut down like a flower: It fleeth as, it is indeed, a ſhadow, and never continueth in one ſtay. It is like a default in nature, or a male-formation of parts, which gives conſtant pain, and requires perpetual patching, and which no skill can ever rectify; whereas honeſty, like a juſt and vigorous conſtitution, wants not the help of phyſicians, and without any trouble wears well to the laſt. Truth is a rock that will ſtand the teſt of time and malice: But when we build upon falſhood and artifice, we build upon the ſand; and though mighty ſtructures have been raiſed upon this ſlippery foundation, and made a goodly ſhew and glitter for a while, yet when the winds blew and beat upon that houſe, it fell, and great was the fall of it. He that would preſerve the beauty of his character freſh and lovely to the end, muſt be ſure to act upon ſteady and uniform principles; for nothing can long ſupport the reputation of a great name, but the two pillars of prudence and ſincerity.

The path of the juſt is as the ſhining light, that ſhineth more and more unto a perfect day, Prov. iv. 18. They riſe like the ſun, and rejoice to run the courſe of virtue; and though envy and ignorance, faction and prejudice may overcaſt their morning; yet integrity by degrees will clear their way, whereby they acquire new ſtrength in every advance, and ſhine more and more unto a perfect day; then we rejoice in the light, and ſee no more ſpots in the ſun. It was the ſaying of the wiſeſt prince, that righteous lips are the delight of kings, and they love him that ſpeaketh right, Prov. xvi. 13. Flattery and cunning may delight and flouriſh for a ſeaſon, but in our heart we can love nothing but honeſty; inſincerity is the uglieſt vice in nature, and the laſt thing we can forgive. He then that walketh uprightly, walketh ſurely; he reflects with a God-like ſatisfaction upon all his works, and this reflection carries him on his way with ſecurity and pleaſure, and brings him peace at rhe laſt, when he ſtands moſt in need of it; the juſt man walketh in his integrity, and his children are bleſſed after him, Prov. xx. 7. He leaves a good name behind him, and the bleſſing of God and man upon his childrens children; whereas the man of falſhood, ambition and avarice, can neither look backward nor forward with any ſolid comfort; he ſees nothing in himſelf he can approve, and ſo goes out of the world with much greater anxiety and confuſion than he lived in it.

Thus honeſty will be found the beſt policy in every reſpect: It is the moſt eaſy, pleaſant and ſure way to happineſs here and hereafter; and therefore, ſays the wiſe ſon of David, forſake her not, and ſhe ſhall preſerve thee, love her, and ſhe ſhall keep thee; when thou goeſt, thy ſteps ſhall not be ſtraitned; and when thou runneſt, thou ſhalt not ſtumble; when thou lieſt down thou ſhalt not be afraid; yea, thou ſhalt lie down, and thy ſleep ſhall be ſweet. To conclude, therefore, he that would ſee good days both now and ever, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they ſpeak no guile; for ſincerity is the virtue that muſt crown us in both worlds.

Critical and Explanatory ANNOTATIONS,

ON THE

Epiſtle of PAUL the APOSTLE,

TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

The INTRODUCTION.

Philippi was a city of Macedonia, and a Roman colony. See Acts xvi. 12, 13, &c. Paul came to preach there in the fifty-ſecond year of the vulgar Æra, and converted many people there to the faith in Chriſt; in which number was the pious Lydia, a ſeller of purple. He alſo caſt a devil out of a maid-ſervant, who was poſſeſſed by a familiar ſpirit, which gave her ſhrewd gueſſes at future events, and ſo brought her in great eſteem among the credulous and ſuperſtitious crowd, and proved of great advantage to her maſters. Theſe ſtirred up the whole city againſt Paul, and the magiſtrates cauſed him to be ceaſed, whipped, and put into priſon; but the day following they not only let him out again, but, being informed that he was a Roman citizen, made excuſes for their ill treatment of him. Now,

It was to the Chriſtians, who ſerved the Lord in this city, that Paul wrote this Epiſtle. They were a very grateful people, and always full of acknowledgment for the grace of faith they had received from God, through the miniſtry of Paul; for they had often aſſiſted him, on ſeveral occaſions: They ſent him money while he was in Achaia; and now, hearing of his impriſonment at Rome, they renewed their collection for his relief, and ſent it by the hands of Epaphroditus, their Biſhop, who fell ſick, and was like to die at Rome, in the great fatigue he underwent while he attended the Apoſtle. Therefore,

Paul, when Epaphroditus was ſo well recovered as to be able to ſet out on his journey home to Philipi, wrote and ſent this Epiſtle by him, in which he kindly acknowledges their reſpects for him, and for the Goſpel; aſſuring them his impriſonment and troubles were a joy to him, becauſe they tended, by his example of courage under them, to make the Goſpel to be more taken notice of and publiſhed at Rome. But then,

It is to be obſerved, that the particular deſign of this Epiſtle appears to be the ſame with the former to the Epheſians, viz. to keep them ſtedfaſt in the true faith, both in reſpect to any perſecutions they might ſuffer for the ſake thereof, and alſo in reſpect to the Judaizing Chriſtians, that they might not be affrighted out of their holy profeſſion by perſecutions, but that they ſhould ſtand faſt in the midſt of tribulation. To which purpoſe, he alſo very paſſionately, and with great earneſtneſs, preſſes them to avoid all diſſenſion, and to maintain union; and to this end, That they carry themſelves humbly, and with lowly-mindneſs one towards another, after Chriſt's example; and this is the ſubſtance of the firſt and ſecond chapter. But,

In the third chapter, he openly cautions them to beware of the Judaizers, who would plant the ſame evil doctrine there, as they had done in other Churches, concerning the obligation to the law of Moſes, as to circumciſion and other Moſaical rites, ſo often mentioned before; declaring that, as for his own part, none could lay more claim to the privileges which the Jews valued themſelves ſo much upon, than himſelf. Yet he accounted all ſuch, but loſs, for the excellency of the knowledge of Chriſt. He propounds himſelf a pattern for their imitation in this reſpect, and in promoting unity, and a true Heavenly Converſation; and then, laſtly, expreſſes his ſatisfaction in their charity towards him, and ſo concludes.

CHAP. I.

1 He teſtifieth his thankfulneſs to God, and his love toward them, for the fruits of their faith and fellowſhip in his ſufferings, 9. daily praying to him for their increaſe in grace: 12 He ſheweth what good the faith of Chriſt had received by his troubles at Rome, 21 and how ready he is to glorify Chriſt either by his life or death 27 exhorting them to unity, 28 and to fortitude in perſecution.

PAUL and Timotheus the ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, to all the ſaints in Chriſt Jeſus, which are at Philippi, with the Biſhops and deacons:

2 Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

3 I thank my God upon every remembrance of you.

4 (Always in every prayer of mine for you all, making requeſt with joy)

5 For your fellowſhip in the Goſpel from the firſt day until now;

6 Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work in you, will perform it until the day of Jeſus Chriſt:

7 Even as it is meet for me to think this of you all, becauſe I have you in my heart In as much as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the goſpel, ye all are partakers of my grace.

8 For God is my record, how greatly I long after you all, in the bowels of Jeſus Chriſt.

9 And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge, and in all judgment;

10 That ye may approve things that are excellent; that ye may be ſincere, and without offence till the day of Chriſt.

11 Being filled with the fruits of righteouſneſs, which are by Jeſus Chriſt unto the glory and praiſe of God.

12 But I would ye ſhould underſtand, brethren, that the things which happened unto me, have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the goſpel:

13 So that my bonds in Chriſt are manifeſt in all the palace, and in all other places.

14 And many of the brethren in the Lord waxing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to ſpeak the word without fear.

15 Some indeed preach Chriſt even of envy and ſtrife; and ſome alſo of good will.

16 The one preach Chriſt of contention, not ſincerely, ſuppoſing to add affliction to my bonds:

17 But the other of love, knowing that I am ſet for the defence of the goſpel.

18 What then? notwithſtanding every way, whether in pretence, or in truth, Chriſt is preached; and I therein do rejoyce, yea, and will rejoyce.

19 For I know that this ſhall turn to my ſalvation through your prayer, and the ſupply of the Spirit of Jeſus Chriſt,

20 According to my earneſt expectation, and my hope, that in nothing I ſhall be aſhamed, but that with all boldneſs, as always, ſo now alſo Chriſt ſhall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life or by death.

21 For to me to live is Chriſt, and to die is gain.

22 But if I live in the fleſh, this is the fruit of my labour: yet what I ſhall chooſe I wot not.

23 For I am in a ſtrait betwixt two, having a deſire to depart, and to be with Chriſt; which is far better:

24 Nevertheleſs, to abide in the fleſh, is more needful for you.

25 And having this confidence, I know that I ſhall abide and continue with you all, for your furtherance and joy of faith:

26 That your rejoycing may be more abundant in Jeſus Chriſt for me, by my coming to you again.

27 Onely let your converſation be as it becometh the goſpel of Chriſt: that whether I come and ſee you, or elſe be abſent, I may hear of your affairs, that ye ſtand faſt in one ſpirit, with one mind, ſtriving together for the faith of the goſpel;

28 And in nothing terrified by your adverſaries: which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to you of ſalvation, and that of God.

29 For unto you it is given in the behalf of Chriſt, not only to believe on him, but alſo to ſuffer for his ſake;

30 Having the ſame conflict which ye ſaw in me, and now hear to be in me.

In this chapter the Apoſtle begins with

I. A preface, wherein we find the inſcription at ver. 1. and his ſalutation at ver. 2. Then

II. He encourages them, the Philippians to conſtancy and progreſs in faith and piety, ver. 3. to ver. 12.

III. He ſhews them the grounds of comfort againſt the ſcandal of the croſs which befel him, from ver. 12. incluſive to 27. And ſo concludes this chapter with

IV. An exhortation to a Goſpel-converſation from ver. 27. incluſive to the end of the chapter.

Ver. 6. Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work in you will perform it, &c.] Here the Apoſtle encourages the Philippians to conſtancy and progreſs in piety and faith from a conſideration of God's continual aſſiſtance, alledging that God never changeth: Of which immutability of God the Apoſtle James alſo declares, That with God there is no variableneſs nor ſhadow of turning, James i. 17. Therefore,

Let it be obſerved, that God is incapable of change or alteration in his nature any way, both in regard of his nature, and counſel or purpoſe. For,

Firſt, To ſuppoſe the nature of God may be ſo changed, as that he ſhould become, ſometimes, a quite other kind of Being, than what he is at other times; is to ſuppoſe he may be ſometimes God, and at other times not God: Which is not only plainly inconſiſtent with the nature of God, but even deſtructive of his very Being. For ſuppoſing that there is ſuch a Being in the world as God, we muſt ſuppoſe him to be ſuch a Being, as is at all times what he is at any time; that is, if he be God at all, at any time, he muſt be always ſo. Hence he is called Ἀφθαρτὸς Θεὸς, the uncorruptible God, Rom i. 23. in oppoſition to corruptible man; becauſe he is not ſubject to change or alteration by corruption, as man is, from one kind of ſubſtance to another; but is as unchangeable, as he is pure and ſpiritual, which as he ever was, ſo he ever will be, and cannot poſſibly be otherwiſe, while he is God: And if he was God at any time, ſo he is ſtill, and muſt be God for ever. The ſubſtance of a man, and ſo all other ſubſtances that are material, are therefore changeable. But God having nothing of matter in his nature, is not, neither can be ſo. For whatever is purely ſpiritual, that is, whatever ſubſtance is immaterial, will be always what it is, without any change or alteration in its nature; though perhaps it may admit a change as to its ſtate of being. Thus, for inſtance, every human ſoul is a ſpiritual, that is, an immaterial ſubſtance; and ſuch it ever was, from the firſt moment of its being, and ever will be ſuch. For though it changes ſeveral times its ſtate of being; as, firſt, inhabiting in a corruptible body, and ſo abiding for a time in a ſtate of trial or probation; then, ſecondly, departing from the body, the place of its firſt reſidence, into a ſtate of ſeparation and expectance; and laſtly, being again united to its former body, and with it entring on an everlaſting ſtate of reward or puniſhment, of happineſs or miſery, ſuitable to its deſervings. Yet in all, and every one of theſe ſo different ſtates of being, the ſoul is ſtill the ſame, unaltered and unchanged, as to its nature, from what it was at firſt, a living, active, immaterial ſubſtance. But with the body, it is otherwiſe; for that being a material ſubſtance, is ſubject to corruption, and ſo to change and alteration, as all matter is. Hence death is called a change; becauſe, firſt, the body is then turned into its priſtine duſt: For ſo it was determined, upon the fall of our firſt parents; Duſt thou art, and unto duſt thou ſhalt return, Gen. iii. 19. and then ſhall the body return to the earth as it was, Eccl. xii. 7. beſides our own experience of the thing, that ſo it is, ſo changed from fleſh and skin and bones, to earth and duſt. Then, ſecondly, We are aſſured, it ſhall be raiſed to life again, and changed from what it was before, from a natural, to a ſpiritual body; and in this ſenſe, the Apoſtle tells us, though we ſhall not all ſleep, yet we ſhall all be changed, 1 Cor. xv. 51. that is, though all men will not die, but ſome will be found alive at the day of judgment, yet all ſhall undergo ſome change or other, equivalent to death, before they be admitted into Heaven; becauſe theſe bodies, thus qualified as now they are, cannot go thither. But now, God being wholly immaterial, ver. 50. void of all corporeal ſubſtance and qualities whatever, a Being the moſt pure and ſpiritual of all beings in the world, can admit no change or alteration in his nature or ſubſtance, but was, and is, and will be always, the ſelfſame unchangeable Divinity, yeſterday, to day, and for ever. But,

Secondly, There is another kind of change, by increaſe; when any thing is made, or grows to be more, or bigger than it was at firſt.

We ſee that this kind of change is proper, and even neceſſary to all material beings whatſoever. Nothing in nature that we ſee and have to do with, but comes to perfection by degrees. In vegetables, the fruit does not appear as ſoon as the ſeed is put into the ground, nor is it ripe as ſoon as it appears, but ſeveral changes are paſſed through, that is, there are many different appearances, before the fruit is fit for uſe, And ſo it is with man, who, though the moſt excellent and perfect of all ſublunary beings, yet is not perfect ſo ſoon as he begins to be, but ſuffers many changes, both in his body and his mind, before he comes to the perfect or complete ſtature of a man, either for bulk or underſtanding. Thus our Bleſſed Saviour is ſaid to increaſe in wiſdom and ſtature, and in favour with God and man, Luke ii. 52. That is, in reſpect of his human nature, as he was man, made up of a body and a ſoul, he did grow and improve; his ſoul improved in wiſdom, and his body in ſtature, ſize and bulk, as others are wont to do, and withal became daily a more eminent illuſtrious perſon in the eyes of all. Nay, man, of all beings in this lower world, is alone uncapable of perfection in this life; I mean he only cannot attain, in this ſtate, to the utmoſt perfection of which he is capable, as all other beings do; but muſt undergo another kind of change, in order to perfection, which other beings do not undergo. So that, he is never perfect, notwithſtanding all the various alterations in the frame and conſtitution, both of his mind and body, till he comes to that ſtate of being, where mortality ſhall be ſwallowed up of life; where that which is in part ſhall be done away, and that which is perfect ſhall come in its ſtead.

But now, with God, or the Divine Nature, it is not ſo. For as he knew no beginning of his own exiſtence, ſo neither was there any time when he was leſs, nor ſhall there be any time when he will be more perfect than he is. To ſay, that he is God, is to own him to be all that God can be; and therefore, to ſuppoſe him capable of improvement or increaſe, is to ſuppoſe him to be more a God at one time, than at another. If he was ever God, he muſt be always ſo; and ſince the notion of a God implies all poſſible perfection to be in that Being whom we call by that name, if he be God, he muſt be by nature abſolutely perfect; and no being can be abſolutely perfect, but what was always, and always muſt be ſo. And hence we may conclude, that if God was always, and always muſt be abſolutely perfect, and as God he never could, nor ever can be otherwiſe; then the perfection of the Deity admits of no degrees, nor can it poſſibly be more than it ever was, and ever will be: And, by conſequence, he is in this reſpect unchangeable, as well as in the former.

Thirdly, Another kind of change or alteration, may be thus effected; namely, when the ſubſtance of a thing is diminiſhed, or made leſs.

But this is likewiſe inconſiſtent, as the former has been ſhewn to be, with the notion of a God. For that which can never be more, could never be leſs than it is: And abſolute perfection, which is ſuppoſed to be in God, and is neceſſary to his very being, ſince he who is not abſolutely perfect, cannot poſſibly be God; I ſay, Abſolute perfection can admit of no degrees of more or leſs, but muſt be always equal and alike, that is, always abſolute perfection. The ſubſtance of an human body may be leſſened, by the loſs of any member; and the faculties of an human ſoul may be impaired by ſickneſs or old age: But the ſubſtance of the Deity we know very little of, more than that it is incapable of increaſe, or diminution. And for the attributes of God, they can be affected by no accident, nor impaired by any length of time; but as they have been always what they are at preſent, ſo they will be always what they are and ever have been. For inſtance, God could never, nor ever can be more or leſs holy, juſt and good, than now he is. For his holineſs, his juſtice, and his goodneſs, are abſolute perfections of his nature; and therefore can admit of no degrees of perfection, and never can, nor ever could be more or leſs in him, than now they are. But,

Laſtly, Another kind of change or alteration is, when the ſame nature or ſubſtance is multiplied, and ſo made more in number than it was, or, at leaſt, than it was ſuppoſed to be at firſt; by which means, though its quality and quantity be ſuppoſed to be the ſame, yet its unity is utterly deſtroyed; which being ſuppoſed to be eſſential to the thing, or being, of whatſoever kind it be, ſuch multiplication of it does effect a change or alteration in it; as making that to become many, or ſeveral at leaſt, which was at firſt, and perhaps ought to be, but one.

But ſuch a change or alteration in the Deity as this, if it ſhould but be ſuppoſed, much more if granted, will lead us to be guilty of ſeveral moſt palpable abſurdities and contradictions, which can by no means be avoided. For,

Firſt, Such a multiplication of the Deity does of neceſſity ſuppoſe, that the Deity at firſt was one, and only one; that is, that there was but one God originally, who by himſelf created and produced all other ſorts of beings in the univerſe. And that from this one ſingle ſolitary Deity, ſome time or other all at once, or elſe at ſeveral times by one and one, or more, proceeded many other gods, who all muſt have, and be partakers of the Divine Nature, only by communication from him, as the fountain of the Deity; and ſo, by conſequence, muſt have and own ſome cauſe or author of their being. Which is utterly repugnant to, and inconſiſtent with the notion all men have of God; which is, that he is a neceſſary, ſelf-exiſting being, who neither knows, nor will acknowledge any cauſe or author of his being. Therefore, to ſuppoſe, that many other gods came out of one, is to ſuppoſe what cannot be; to wit, that ſome being may be God, who was not ſo, neither had any being, but a little while before. For whatever being once was not, but did in time derive his being from another, cannot poſſibly be God, as even unaſſiſted reaſon will inform us.

Secondly, Such a derivation of being from another, does of neceſſity ſuppoſe the dependance of that being ſo derived, upon that other being from whom it is derived; as the creation of a thing ſuppoſes the dependance of that thing upon the being that created it. But no being that depends upon another can poſſibly be God; becauſe, to be abſolutely independent, is one of thoſe perfections, which are neceſſary to his being God. And therefore, he that depends on any other being whatſoever, neither is, nor can be God.

Thirdly, Suppoſing the Deity to be ſo multiplied, as to become many, or more than one God; either thoſe ſeveral gods are equal and alike in all reſpects, or they are not. Now to ſuppoſe more gods than one, who are all equal and alike in all reſpects, every one abſolutely perfect, independent, all-ſufficient, &c. is to ſuppoſe what need not, nay, what cannot be. For if one God be abſolutely perfect, all-ſufficient, and the like; then there is no need of any other: Becauſe one ſuch being is ſufficient to all intents and purpoſes, for which ſuch a being can be neceſſary. And if no more are needful, no more are poſſible; becauſe there can be nothing, or no partnerſhip in the Deity, which is to no purpoſe: For God can neither be, nor do any thing in vain. And ſuppoſing ſeveral Gods, who are not equal and all alike in all reſpects, is to ſuppoſe all perfection not to be in ſome, if it can be found in any of them: That is, ſome one or other of thoſe gods muſt be leſs perfect than the reſt, or be endued with ſome perfection which the reſt have not. But he that is leſs perfect, or that has not any one perfection which ought, and is ſuppoſed to be in God, cannot poſſibly be God; becauſe he wants ſome perfection, without which he cannot be ſo; and becauſe, as God cannot be more, ſo neither can he be leſs perfect than he ſhould be.

Laſtly, Suppoſing ſuch a change or alteration to have been made in God, by ſuch multiplication of the Godhead; we muſt likewiſe of neceſſity ſuppoſe, that all but one have not their being of themſelves, but have derived it from that one, who was as we ſuppoſe, from everlaſting of himſelf alone, having no cauſe or author of his own being, and being the ſole cauſe and author of all other beings whatſoever. And then, I do not ſee how this conſequence can be avoided; that he, the one Supreme Almighty firſt of Beings, having in time produced ſome more ſuch beings as himſelf, not ſuch in all reſpects, for nothing can be equal to its author; I ſay, the conſequence of ſuch a ſuppoſition muſt be this, that he can utterly diſſolve and annihilate thoſe other godlike beings, as well, and full as eaſily if he pleaſes, as he at firſt produced them. But if this may be, then all thoſe beings which may be diſſolved into their firſt nothing, can by no means be accounted gods; becauſe God is ſubject to no power whatſoever, but has the power over all things; and as there can be no time thought of, when he was not in being, ſo neither can there be any time to come, when he ſhall ceaſe to be. And therefore, whoever either once was not, or may not be at any time hereafter, as owing his being to another as the cauſe or author of it, and by conſequence, depending on that other for his preſervation and continuance in being; he cannot poſſibly be God.

Neither is any thing that I have offered here repugnant to the doctrine of a Trinity of Perſons in the Godhead, however it may ſeem to be ſo. Becauſe we may eaſily conceive a difference between three perſonal diſtinct and ſeparate gods, and three equally Divine Perſons ſubſiſting in one Godhead; though we are not able to conceive or comprehend the manner how three perſons really diſtinct, are one inſeparably, and the ſelf-ſame God. That the latter may be, cannot be denied; becauſe that one God, who cannot lie, has in his Sacred Word declared it is ſo: But the former is impoſſible; becauſe it cannot be without deſtroying the Divine Unity, which is eſſential to the Deity.

Thus then, I think, it has been made appear ſufficiently plain, that God is unchangeable as to his nature, by either of thoſe kinds of change or alterations, to which other beings are, or may be ſubject. I ſhall conclude this firſt particular with the confeſſion of the Pſalmiſt, in which we may, and ought to join, becauſe it has the ſtrongeſt reaſon, as well as the beſt evidence, the Word of God himſelf, for its ſupport: Of old haſt thou laid the foundations of the earth, and the Heavens are the work of thy hands. They ſhall periſh, but thou ſhalt endure; they all ſhall wax old like a garment; as a veſture ſhalt thou change them, and they ſhall be changed: But thou art the ſame, and thy years ſhall have no end, Pſal. cii. 25, 26, 27. As if he had ſaid, It was thou, O God, who by thy Almighty Power at firſt created the whole world and all the parts thereof; and though by the ſame power thou wilt in thy due time either deſtroy, or change them quite from the condition of their firſt creation, yet through all theſe tranſmutations thou ſhalt continue the ſame to all eternity. And

As God is thus unchangeable as to his nature, ſo he is alike immutable, as to his counſel or purpoſe, as may be evinced by the following conſiderations.

1. That God can have no ſuch grounds or motives, for the change or alteration of his purpoſes or counſels, as other beings have.

2. That there is nothing in the Scriptures, that can with any ſhew of reaſon be ſo interpreted, as to make him mutable, or ſo much as ſeem to be ſo.

3. And laſtly, It is evident from the abſolute perfection of his nature, that ſuch a change or alteration of his purpoſes or counſels is utterly impoſſible. And,

1. God can have no ſuch grounds or motives, for the change or alteration of his purpoſes or counſels, as other beings have.

I ſhall mention only five or ſix, which I take to be the chief; becauſe, if God cannot have any of thoſe motives to the changing of his purpoſes, which are more principal, and of the greateſt conſequence; he cannot poſſibly have any other, that are of leſſer moment.

The firſt ground or motive I ſhall mention, is that of intereſt. And this may be preſent or future, for the better and more effectual promotion of either, or both of which, mens purpoſes and reſolutions are frequently varied, changed and altered. So that when a man has purpoſed or reſolved upon the doing ſuch or ſuch a thing, and is afterward perſwaded that the doing of that thing will be againſt his preſent intereſt; he thinks he ſhall do wiſely, and what he ought to do in changing ſuch a purpoſe, or ſuch a reſolution, and cheriſhing ſome other in its ſtead, that may be more for his advantage. But, whether this be ſo or not, be ſure, when his eternal intereſt is concerned, if he is convinced, or only doubtful, that his preſent purpoſe will, or may be any prejudice to that; he will certainly do well, or not amiſs at leaſt, in changing or departing from it.

But now, with God it is far otherwiſe; he can have no intereſt or advantage of his own in view, by which he ſhould be prompted or inclined to change, or alter, or depart from any of his purpoſes; and his own honour is ſo dear unto him, that he cannot be ſuppoſed to change his purpoſe, to the prejudice of that, for the ſake of any other being whatſoever.

As to himſelf, that he can have no intereſt or advantage of his own, that can be any way promoted or advanced by ſuch a change or alteration of, or departure from his purpoſes, of whatſoever kind or nature they may be, is plain; in that, he can have no addition to his happineſs, as having perfect happineſs in and of himſelf, and being the fountain whence the happineſs of all other beings flows, and is derived: And as to other beings, of whom he is the cauſe and author, as their good or evil ſtate can neither add unto, nor detract from his felicity and glory; ſo the latter will be vindicated either way, according as they ſhall be found to have deſerved; and therefore, there can be no reaſon given or imagined, why he ſhould change or alter, or depart from any of his purpoſes on their account. And then, we may very well ſuppoſe, nay, we may be aſſured, that if there is no reaſon either on his own account, or for the ſake of any other being, for the changing of his purpoſes, he will not change them; becauſe he will do nothing without reaſon, or for which there is no reaſon.

Secondly, Another motive or inducement to ſuch change of purpoſe, in inferior and leſs perfect beings, may be pleaſure. But, whatever reaſon any man may ſee, or fancy, for ſuch change or alteration of his purpoſes on that account; God can have no ſuch motive or inducement ſo to do. Becauſe, as he is the never-failing ſource and fountain of all happineſs to others, and has the moſt abſolute and perfect happineſs in and of himſelf; ſo we are aſſured, that in his preſence is fulneſs of joy; and at his right hand there are pleaſures for evermore, Pſal. xvi. 11. So that, for God to change or alter any of his purpoſes, cannot create him any new, nor give him any greater pleaſure, than what he always had, and does, and ever will enjoy.

Thirdly, A man may be convinced that he ought to change his purpoſes and reſolutions ſometimes, for the preſervation or recovery of his health. When by any reſolution put in practice by him, he finds his health in danger, or in any meaſure injured; then he may with reaſon, and is obliged in juſtice to himſelf to change his former purpoſe, and reſolve upon ſome other courſe or method, for the preſervation of it, or in order to recover and reſtore it to a better ſtate. But with God is the fountain of life, Pſal. xxxvi. 9. He cannot be approached, and much leſs injured, by any ſickneſs or diſeaſe. He only has immortality; and to him alone belong the iſſues of life and death. In ſhort, his life and health are ſuch, ſo perfect, and ſo permanent, as not to be endangered or impaired by any accident whatever. Therefore, there is no need that he ſhould change or alter any of his purpoſes on that account: And what he need not, that he will not do; becauſe he neither will, nor can do any thing in vain, or to no purpoſe.

Fourthly, Another motive or inducement to men to change their purpoſes, is, fear, either of offending others, or of injuring themſelves. But whom can the Almighty fear? Or, of what evil can he be in danger, who is the moſt perfect, and conſequently, the moſt happy being? Men having always ſome ſuperiors, may be afraid of giving them offence, if they ſhould put in practice what they have reſolved upon. Or, they may poſſibly foreſee ſome damage, that may ſome other way accrue unto themſelves from ſuch a reſolution, if they ſhould reduce it into practice. But with God it is not, neither can be ſo. For he is over all, having no ſuperior nor equal to be jealous or afraid of: And he is ſo perfectly bleſſed and happy, that no evil can come nigh his dwelling. And therefore, he can have no reaſon to change or alter any of his purpoſes or counſels, to keep the friendſhip of any perſon, or to avoid any danger whatſoever.

Fifthly, Men may change their purpoſes and reſolutions in hope, either of pleaſing others, whom they think themſelves obliged to pleaſe in what they may; or of advantaging themſelves on ſome account or other. But God cannot be ſuppoſed to change or alter any of his purpoſes or counſels, on either of theſe accounts. For firſt, there is no other being whom he can be, or think himſelf obliged to pleaſe; nor from whom he can receive the leaſt advantage to himſelf. And then, ſecondly, he cannot with any ſhew of reaſon be ſuppoſed to change his purpoſe, in hope of pleaſing, or reaping any benefit from any other being whatſoever. All that God does is for his own glory, and for the benefit of his creatures; but not from a deſign, or hope, or proſpect, of receiving any from them. And whether we uſe rightly, or abuſe the bleſſings he vouchſafes us; yet glory will infallibly redound to him, one way or other, and all his purpoſes and counſels remain unchanged, and ever will be ſo, whatever we can do, or however we may fare. Therefore, though men may change their purpoſes and reſolutions, in hope of ſome good turn or other, from others in a higher place or ſtation, which may be advantageous to them; yet God, having no ſuperior, can have no ſuch hope, or proſpect of advantage from any being whatſoever: And therefore, he cannot be ſuppoſed to be inclined to change or alter any of his purpoſes on that account.

Laſtly, Men may ſometimes change their purpoſes and reſolutions, through ſhame, or from remorſe of conſcience, occaſioned by the folly, or the evil, or the danger of them. But now, God can have, or make no purpoſes, or reſolutions, but what are perfectly, holy, juſt and good; that is, none but what are perfectly agreeable to the abſolute holineſs, juſtice and goodneſs of the Divine Nature. And whatever purpoſes and reſolutions are ſo qualified, and do flow beſides from infinite wiſdom, cannot poſſibly be cauſes either of ſhame, or of remorſe; and by conſequence, there can be no reaſon for the change or alteration of them on either of thoſe accounts. Mens purpoſes and reſolutions, and counſels, may be ſometimes very fooliſh, other times very evil and ſinful; and ſometimes hurtful too, or, at leaſt, dangerous, either to themſelves, or others: Becauſe they are not ſo wiſe and knowing, as to be able to foreſee, and to provide againſt all accidents, or all events of things, that poſſibly may happen; not ſo holy, juſt and good, as to be free from all poſſibility of doing what is evil and hurtful, or dangerous at leaſt. And therefore, they may often have juſt cauſe to be aſhamed of, and ſorry for the reſolutions they have taken, ſo as to wiſh they never had been made or taken by them. But with God, who muſt be infinitely wiſe and knowing, and moſt perfectly holy, juſt and good, or elſe he is not, neither can be God, it neither is, nor can be ſo: And if any man ſhould think it can, he would think blaſphemouſly of him. For God can, neither will, nor purpoſe, nor reſolve on any thing, but what muſt needs be very wiſe and holy, juſt and good; becauſe theſe are perfections eſſentially inherent in his nature, and conſequently, neceſſary to his being God: And therefore, he cannot poſſibly have any after ſhame, or ſorrow, or remorſe, for any of his counſels, purpoſes, or reſolutions; nor conſequently, any reaſon for a change or alteration of them.

Theſe then, are the principal grounds or motives, or inducements, on which men often change their purpoſes and counſels, and betake themſelves to other methods than thoſe they had before reſolved upon. And ſince God can have none of thoſe inducements ſo to do, he cannot poſſibly have any other, that are of leſs moment: And therefore, hitherto, there is no reaſon to believe he is, or can be mutable, as to his purpoſes and counſels. And this is proved from many texts of Scripture.

I ſhall begin with the words of Balaam, to Balak king of Moab. God is not a man, ſays he, that he ſhould lie, neither the Son of Man, that he ſhould repent: Hath he ſaid, and ſhall he not do it? Or hath he ſpoken, and ſhall he not make it good? Numb. xxiii 19. So again, to the ſame purpoſe, and almoſt in the ſame words, the Prophet Samuel to Saul, Alſo the ſtrength of Iſrael will not lie, nor repent: For he is not a man, that he ſhould repent, 1 Sam. xv. 29.

The next I ſhall produce, is the teſtimony of the Pſalmiſt. The Lord bringeth the counſel of the Heathen to nought; he maketh the devices of the people of none effect. The counſel of the Lord ſtandeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations, Pſal. xxxiii. 10, 11. As if he had ſaid, Whatſoever godleſs men deſign, or propoſe to themſelves, contrary to the Will of God he blaſts and fruſtrates it, diſſipates all their contrivances, be they never ſo prudently managed by whole multitudes and aſſemblies of them. Only that which he has decreed and purpoſed, ſhall immutably come to paſs.

Hear alſo what the wiſe man ſays to this matter. There are many devices in a man's heart; nevertheleſs, the counſel of the Lord, that ſhall ſtand, Prov. xix. 21. That is, how mutable ſoever mens purpoſes and counſels may be, it is not, neither can be ſo with God; his counſel and his purpoſe is the ſame, immutable for ever. For, as holy Job confeſſes, He is in one mind, and who can turn him? And what his ſoul deſires, or decrees to do, even that he does, Job xxiii. 13.

The Prophet Iſaiah makes this one argument, among others, of his being God, and the only God. Remember the former things of old, for I am God, and there is none elſe, I am God, and there is none like me. Why ſo? The reaſon follows: Declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet come; ſaying, My counſel ſhall ſtand, and I will do all my pleaſure; ſee Iſa. xlvi. 9, 10.

Again, the Prophet Malachi, or rather God by him, gives this as a reaſon of his patience and long-ſuffering towards a ſinful people; namely, That he has purpoſed, or decreed to bear with ſinners, as long as may conſiſt with the honour of his juſtice ſo to do. For, ſays he, I am the Lord, I change not: Therefore ye ſons of Jacob are not conſumed, Mal. iii. 6.

The author to the Hebrews, likewiſe, gives evidence to this great truth. Wherein God willing more abundantly to ſhew unto the heirs of promiſe the immutability of his counſel, confirmed it by an oath: That by two immutable things, in which it was impoſſible for God to lie, we might have a ſtrong conſolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope ſet before us, Heb. vi. 17, 18. As if he had ſaid thus: As men are wont to ſwear by the greater, ſo God was pleaſed to ſwear by himſelf, having no greater to ſwear by, ver. 13. and by that means to aſcertain thoſe to whom his promiſes belong, that is, all conſtant Chriſtians, of the performance of his promiſe, concerning believers, the ſpiritual ſeed of Abraham: That by promiſing firſt, which, when the condition is not neglected, is immutable; and then by adding an oath to it, he might give us ſecurity of enjoying what we hope for, of receiving the reward propoſed to us.

I conclude theſe quotations with the teſtimony of James, who thus beſpeaks us: Every good gift, and every perfect gift, is from above, and cometh down from the Father of Lights; with whom is no variableneſs, neither ſhadow of turning, Jam. i. 17. In which words, the Apoſtle affirms God to be ſo far from ſuffering any real change or alteration in his nature or purpoſe, as not to be capable of the leaſt ſhadow of any ſuch thing. That is, he not only does not change as other beings do, or as the ſun, for inſtance, does, but he does not ſo much as ſeem to do ſo. And this leads me,

2. To ſhew, That there is nothing in the Scriptures, that can with any ſhew of reaſon be ſo interpreted, as to make God mutable, or ſo much as ſeem to be ſo.

There are, indeed, in Scripture, ſeveral paſſages which may, be thought to look that way; becauſe they ſpeak of God's repenting, either of what he had already done, or what he had threatned, and, one would be apt to think, by conſequence, deſigned to do. And ſince repentance ſignifies a change, either of actions, or of purpoſes, or both; ſuch inſtances may on firſt view be thought to argue mutability in God.

Thus we read, for inſtance, That it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. And the Lord ſaid, I will deſtroy man, and beaſt, &c. for it repenteth me that I have made them, Gen. vi. 6, 7. So again, It repenteth me, ſays God, that I have ſet up Saul to be king; for he is turned back from following me, and hath not performed my commandments, 1 Sam. xv. 11. And again, The Lord repented that he had made Saul king over Iſrael, ver. 35. So again, At what inſtant I ſhall ſpeak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to deſtroy it: If that nation, againſt whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them. And at what inſtant I ſhall ſpeak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to build and to plant it: If it do evil in my ſight, that it obey not my voice, then I will repent of the good, wherewith I ſaid I would benefit them; Jer. xviii. 7, 8, 9, 10. And ſo laſtly, for I ſhall name no more, with reſpect to the Ninevites, we read, That God ſaw their works, that they turned from their evil way, and God repented of the evil that he had ſaid he would do unto them, and he did it not; Jon. iii. 10.

Now, in anſwer to theſe, and the like paſſages, I have only three or four things to offer, which I think may be ſufficient to ſet us right, as to the matter now before us: And I ſhall diſpatch them very briefly.

Firſt, then, It may be conſidered, that repentance, properly and ſtrictly, ſignifies an inward grief of mind ariſing from the conſideration of ſomething done amiſs, which the perſon that has done it would have undone again, if poſſibly he could. And therefore, that the cauſes of repentance muſt be either ignorance, or imprudence in the perſon acting, who either could not, or at leaſt did not foreſee the event of ſuch or ſuch an action; or impotence, that is, the perſons inability to accompliſh what he had deſigned; or laſtly, inconſtancy, by which he afterward diſlikes what he at firſt approved. Now every one of theſe are unworthy of the Deity, and neither of them can be in it: For he can be no god, who is not Omniſcient, or has not perfect prudence, and an unerring foreſight of all poſſible events; nor can he be God, who is not Omnipotent, and ſo able to effect whatever he deſigns; nor can he poſſibly be God, who is not always conſtant to himſelf, and perfectly immutable in his approbation or diſlike of every thing, according to its nature, cauſes, and effects. So that, it being utterly impoſſible that God ſhould be, and yet be either ignorant, or imprudent, or impotent, or inconſtant; it is alike impoſſible that he ſhould have any after-grief or ſorrow for any thing that he can will, or do. And therefore, when the Scriptures attribute repentance to the Deity, it is not in a ſtrict and proper ſenſe, as if God did indeed repent, as men are known to do; but by way of condeſcenſion to our mean capacities, who can have no conceptions of him, but as he is repreſented by ſuch actions, or affections, as are analogus, that is, bear ſome reſemblance to the actions and affections of a man. But,

Secondly, The repentance which the Scriptures attribute to God, is ſo far from arguing any real change, or mutability, in his purpoſes or counſels, that it plainly proves the contrary, that he is moſt conſtant, and immutable. For it being his conſtant, and unchangeable purpoſe and decree, to receive all that are truly pious, and all that ſincerely repent and turn to him, into a ſtate of grace and favour, and to reward them with ſalvation; but to reject the ungodly and impenitent, and throw them down into perdition: He cannot be conſtant to himſelf, if he does not deal with both accordingly. And therefore, when any man revolts from God, and bids adieu to all that is good, and betakes himſelf to a ſinful courſe, and perſiſts and dies therein; the eternal purpoſe of God ſtands ſure, and is made good in the eternal puniſhment of ſuch a perſon: Becauſe, it is not he that once was righteous, but he that dies a righteous man, that is entitled to the promiſes of God, of pardon and ſalvation; nor is it he that once was wicked, but he that dies impenitent, that is undoubtedly obnoxious to eternal wrath and puniſhment from God. For ſo God tells us, by his Prophet, When a righteous man turneth away from his righteouſneſs, and committeth iniquity, and dieth therein; for his iniquity that he hath done, ſhall he die. Again, when the wicked man turneth away from his wickedneſs that he hath committed, and doth that which is lawful and right, he ſhall ſave his ſoul alive, Ezek. xviii. 26, 27. And therefore,

Thirdly, In all God's promiſes of good, and threatnings of evil, to any perſon, or to any people, theſe two conditions are certainly implied, [though they may not ſometimes be expreſſed. Thus in the caſe of Nineveh, the threatning was poſitive, and abſolute, and no condition mentioned; yet forty days, and Nineveh ſhall be overthrown, Jon. iii. 4. But the iſſue plainly ſhews, that a condition was implied; namely, If they would not repent before that time expired: For upon their humiliation and repentance, God was appeaſed, and did not execute his threatned judgment on them. And this according to his eternal purpoſe, not to puniſh, but forgive and ſave all ſuch as ſhall repent ſincerely, and truly turn tohim.]

In ſhort, The Scriptures evidently teach, as I have already ſhewn, that God's purpoſes and counſels are immutable: And therefore, when they any where aſcribe repentance to him, they muſt be ſo interpreted, as only condeſcending to our mean capacities, and not as affirming any real change or alteration of his purpoſe, or decree; becauſe we are aſſured by many other Scriptures, of the ſame Divine Authority, that this is utterly impoſſible. For if the Scripture be the word of God, as undoubtedly it is, it cannot contradict it ſelf. And therefore, when it ſeems to teach in one place, quite different things of God, than what it teaches in another; we muſt ſtick to that interpretation of both places, by which the abſolute perfection of the Deity is beſt aſſerted and eſtabliſhed. So that,

3. It is evident, from the abſolute perfection of his nature, that ſuch a change or alteration of his purpoſes or counſels is utterly impoſſible.

Abſolute perfection is eſſential to the Deity; that without which, no being can be God. But mutability is utterly inconſiſtent with the notion of a being abſolutely perfect; in that it is a manifeſt argument and proof of imperfection in any being where it is. To ſay of God, that he is abſolutely perfect, and yet mutable, is to affirm a contradiction: And common reaſon will imform us, that whatever being has abſolute perfection cannot be mutable; and whatever being is mutable, cannot have abſolute perfection. For, whatever is ſubject to change or alteration, is therefore ſo, becauſe it is not abſolutely perfect. In ſhort; God, as he is an abſolutely perfect, ſo he is a neceſſary, ſelf-exiſting, independent being: In whom no other being can effect a change or alteration. All created things are mutable, becauſe they have their being from another; and may, by conſequence, be changed and altered by that other, from whom they have their being. But God cannot be ſo, but is, and ever wil remain immutable, becauſe he exiſts neceſſarily of himſelf, and knows no cauſe or author of his Being. He, therefore, cannot poſſibly be changed into a better, becauſe he is the beſt of beings; nor can he alter for the worſe, becauſe he cannot be otherwiſe than an abſolutely perfect Being: And, as Auſtin ſomewhere has obſerved, Quicquid a meliore in deterius, & a deteriori in melius mutatur, non eſt Deus; whatever being is or may be changed from a better to a worſe, or otherwiſe, from worſe to better, is not God. Therefore, in a word; God's purpoſes and counſels cannot change or alter, either for the worſe, or better, becauſe he has abſolute perfection, by which he muſt be free from all thoſe cauſes of mutation which are in other beings; to wit, becauſe he neither depends on any other, nor is ſubject or liable to paſſion, error and inconſtancy, as men are found to be, with whom it cannot poſſibly be otherwiſe, by reaſon of the imperfection of their nature in their preſent ſtate of being.

And now, to ſhew what influence this doctrine of the immutability of God, both in his nature, and in his purpoſes and counſels, ought to have upon us, which was the Apoſtle's deſign in this his exhortation to the Philippians:

Firſt, It may teach us to expect, with the utmoſt aſſurance, the performance of his promiſes, and the execution of his threats. That, according to his purpoſe, he will certainly render to every man according to his deeds. To them who by patient continuance in well-doing ſeek for glory, and honour, and immortality; eternal life: But unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteouſneſs; indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguiſh, upon every ſoul of man that doth evil; Rom. ii. 6, 7, 8. For, ſays the ſame Apoſtle, and it is the word and purpoſe of that God, who changes not; We muſt all appear before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good, or evil; 2 Cor. v. 10. That is, "There will certainly come a day, when every perſon that ever lived ſhall be judged by God, ſet, as it were, in an eminent conſpicuous place, as men that are impleaded are wont to be, and every action of his life taken into conſideration, that accordingly every man may be puniſhed, or rewarded, body and ſoul together, according to his actions, of what ſort ſoever they be, whether good or bad, which in his life-time he has committed in his body and ſoul together." Therefore,

Secondly, Since theſe things are ſo, What manner of perſons ought we to be in all holy converſation and godlineſs? 2 Pet. iii. 11. That is, ſince God has purpoſed to judge the world in righteouſneſs, and to reward or puniſh every man according as his actions ſhall be found to have deſerved in this life; Acts xvii. 31. and ſince this, as well as all his other purpoſes, ſtands ſure, and is unalterable, what care ought we to take of our behaviour, that it may be pleaſing to him, and eternally rewarded by him? In a word; God, as has been ſhewn, is not only unchangeable, as to his nature, but alſo conſtant and immutable, as to all his purpoſes and counſels: And it concerns us highly to be like him as much as is poſſible, by being conſtant and unchangeable, as to our purpoſes and reſolutions of leading virtuous and religious lives; that we may all partake of his promiſes in the future life, which he has made, and will be faithful to perform on that condition, to the praiſe and glory of his grace, and the eternal welfare of every ſoul among us. And therefore we may always ſay in the words of the Apoſtle; We are confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work in us, will perform it until the day of Jeſus Chriſt.

Ver. 21. For to me to live is Chriſt, and to die is gain.] The Apoſtle was at this time in bonds, for the ſake of Chriſt and his Goſpel, perſecuted by Pagans, and maligned by falſe brethren, who preached Chriſt out of contention, not ſincerely, ſuppoſing to add affliction to his bonds, ver. 16.

In which double trial our holy champion puts on the breaſt-plate of righteouſneſs, and the helmet of ſalvation; and takes in one hand the ſword of the ſpirit, and in the other the buckler of faith. I know, ſaith he, that this ſhall turn to my ſalvation through your prayer, and the ſupply of the Spirit of Chriſt Jeſus, &c. See ver. 19, 20. And then he gives the reaſon, For to me to live is Chriſt, and to die is gain, or, to make it more Engliſh, Chriſt is gain unto me both to live and to die. Yet he had declared before, and ſo he doth after, that he held it a far greater gain for him to die for Chriſt, and would rather glorify him by his death, than by his life. Which is to ſome a myſtery; and therefore, I ſhall explain this text in the following manner.

Chriſt being ſent unto men to be a gain unto them, it is preſuppoſed thereby that they are at a loſs without him. Man's natural loſſes are the deprivation of God's knowledge in his underſtanding, and of God's righteouſneſs in his will: Whence follow heavy judgments upon him in his life, and eternal woe after his death.

To help him in this ſad condition, the Son of God hath brought from the boſom of his Father unto mankind that Heavenly Doctrine of Glory to God on high, and on earth peace, good-will towards men; which being embraced with obedience of faith will prove ſuch a gain unto him, that thoſe ſpiritual loſſes ſhall be repaired, his temporal wants ſhall be ſupplied, his afflictions ſhall be removed, or ſo ſanctified that they will prove lucrative unto him. And death, that proper and diſmal ſtipend of ſin, will prove unto him the greateſt gain of all; for, inſtead of tumbling him down into hell, it will pour him into the boſom of his Father which is in Heaven, that bottomleſs depth of goodneſs and glory. Of which goodneſs and glory the ſummary is to be fully conformed (in man's meaſure) unto Chriſt his ſovereign good, and to be joined with him for ever.

To reſume theſe, conſider a little what a wretched thing a man is that hath not learned Chriſt. As for his underſtanding, he is plunged in deep ignorance, knowing neither God nor himſelf, nor his danger nor his remedy. Much like one, who being fallen from a high place, is ſo ſtunned with the fall, that he knoweth not that he is fallen. Carnal men are much like moles that dig under ground with great induſtry, but are blind in the ſun-ſhine: So naturally ignorant in the things of God, that the wiſeſt of this world, the philoſophers, were divided into more than two hundred opinions about the ſovereign good: And that the ingenious nations, the Egyptians and Grecians were the moſt monſtrous of all in their religions; the Egyptians worſhipping oxen and crocodiles, onions and leeks; the Grecians imagining in Heaven feaſts and combats and adulteries among their gods. And even in our days, corrupt men have ſo entailed ignorance upon religion, that we are taught by Popery, that faith conſiſteth in ignorance, which is a virtue eaſily attained.

Well, to heal mens minds of ignorance in the things of God, God hath ſent his Son into the world, who hath brought life and immortality to light by the Goſpel; 2 Tim. i. Here is a gain indeed. Here is that pearl of great price, Matt. xiii. 46. which that a man may have, he muſt ſell all that he hath and buy it. Here is that wiſdom, the merchandiſe whereof is better than the merchandiſe of ſilver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. She is more pricious than rubies, and all the things thou canſt deſire are not to be compared unto her; Prov. iii.

The excellency of that gain is then made moſt manifeſt when from the illuminating of our underſtanding it paſſeth to the regulating of our affections and the ſanctifying of our hearts: Chriſt enabling our ſpirits freely to join with his Spirit to ſubdue all our inward ward rebellions, and bringing them captives under the throne of Chriſt, ſay unto him, Lord, rule thou in the midſt of thine enemies. Is not liberty a great gain to a ſlave and a priſoner? To a man that ſerved his luſt, his belly, his money, his revengeful mind, and the Devil by them, what a gain is it by ſerving God to become a maſter at home; to feel in his breaſt, inſtead of a ſtorm of unruly paſſions, the peace of God which paſſeth all underſtanding; and to find to his great comfort, that where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty?

What a great gain is it to be made rich in good works, rich in God? What a great gain is it for us to give thoſe goods which we cannot keep, and thereby to purchaſe goods which we cannot loſe? To ſow upon earth that which we ſhall be ſure to reap in Heaven? To put out our money to God's bank, who will repay it an hundred fold?

And how great a gain is the practice of Godlineſs? Godlineſs is a great gain, μετ' ἀυταρκέιας, with ſufficiency. A great gain which brings along ſufficiency and contentment, for ſo the text muſt be underſtood.

Of that many a good ſoul could ſay much by feeling experience. For although the great gain of Godlineſs be not for this world, (as the kingdom of Chriſt is not of it) yet Chriſt, who is the Sovereign Lord of nature, as well as King of the Church, engageth his Royal Word, that all that ſerve him, and ſincerely ſeek his glory, ſhall not need to ſay, What ſhall we eat, or what ſhall we drink, or wherewithal ſhall we be clothed? becauſe their heavenly Father knoweth that they have need of all theſe things. But ſeek ye firſt the kingdom of God and his righteouſneſs, and all theſe things ſhall be added unto you; Matt. vi. 33. This is the charter of Chriſt's diſciples, that they may confidently caſt their eyes upon him, for he careth for them, and ſo forſake all intereſſes to follow him.

But this is the leaſt gain that we get by Chriſt in this life. The great gain is the beginning of eternal life. For the ſpiritual life in a godly man's breaſt is of one piece with life everlaſting after the temporal is ended. To have at hand the directions of his Word, the counſels of his Spirit, the comforts of his Love, the joys of his ſalvation: To have a free acceſs unto the throne of grace at all times: To make one already in the choir of Angels and Saints ſinging with them Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of hoſts, Heaven and earth is full of the Majeſty of his glory: To be joyful in hope, looking up unto Jeſus the author and finiſher of our faith, who went up through the rough way of the croſs to glory, to make us a plain way to the ſame. This is the gain that comes to us, even in this life, by having Chriſt.

Join to theſe the comforts that we reliſh in all conditions. Is it proſperity? the true Chriſtian takes it as an effect of God's promiſe, that by humility and the fear of the Lord are riches and honour and life; Prov. xxii. 4. and that Godlineſs is profitable for all things, having the promiſes of this life, and of that which is to come; 1 Tim. iv. 8. In every morſel he will reliſh how the Lord is gracious; in his health, in his wealth, in his hopeful family, he will ever look more to the giver than to the gift, and adore him in whom he liveth and moveth, and hath his being and his well being.

Is he in adverſity? He will ſay, I know whom I have believed. God hath a hand in all this. I will be dumb and not open my mouth to murmur, for thou O Lord haſt done it; Pſal. xxxix. My croſs is my Saviour's livery. My humble conformity to his ſufferings will end in a conformity to his glory, If I may have the ſame mind which was alſo in Chriſt Jeſus, who humbled himſelf and became obedient unto death, even the death of the croſs. Wherefore God alſo hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name.

Now that gain which we have by Chriſt in this life, is but a preparative to that grand and unmatchable gain in Chriſt which his true diſciples attain unto by death.

Chriſt is a gain unto them to die, two ways, by avoiding the ſting and the terrors of death, and by a paſſage unto an eternal life of holineſs and glory.

The ſting and terror of approaching death is moſt tormenting to thoſe that have taken no pains to make Chriſt the gain of their life. What a cutting of their heart is it when they have fixed it upon the beloved world, and they muſt be violently torn off from the world! Linquenda tellus & domus & placens uxor. And of all the wealth which they have heaped up with anxious care and wicked labour, they ſee they carry nothing away but a winding ſheet.

But the worſt ſting of death is that which they feel in their conſcience, when it ſets before them the years ſpent in deboiſh, the unrighteouſneſs of their purchaſes, their contempt of God's word, their ſlighting of his ſervice, their blaſphemous and unclean converſation, and upon that pronounceth unto them the doom of Divine Juſtice which muſt be ſhortly executed upon them.

It is true, many of thoſe ſinners in grain die ſenſeleſs; yet before their death the ſting of eternal death meets with their conſciences, even in the midſt of their jollities. And many ſinners of a lower form feel it all their lives-time.

To heal conſciences of that ſting was the great end of the Son of God's coming and dying in our fleſh; as you have it illuſtriouſly ſet forth, Heb. ii. 14. That Chriſt took part of fleſh and blood, that through death he might deſtroy him that had the power of death, that is, the Devil; and deliver them who through fear of death are all their lives-time ſubject unto bondage.

This is the great remedy againſt that mortal ſting of death ſent by the Father of mercies to poor ſinners: A never-fading remedy, when ſinners have the grace to receive it with a ſincere faith, effectual in an humble repentance, and a ſerious amendment. For then the ſoul reconciled with God looks upon death with quite another eye than before, and ſaith, O death where is thy ſting? O grave where is thy victory? Rom. vii. Death, do not look grim upon me, I know who hath overcome thee; Conſcience, do not think to fright me, I know whom I have believed; I have committed my ſpirit aſſoiled with Chriſt's blood into his victorious hands. And I know he is both willing and powerful to defend it againſt all the principalities and powers of Hell that are roaring about me to devour me.

After that deliverance from the ſting and the terror of death followeth the attainment of eternal life, and death it ſelf is the paſſage unto it. There is that difference between the death of the reconciled and that of the unreconciled ſinner, as was between the butler's and the baker's of Pharaoh going out of the ſame priſon, the one to the gallows, the other to enter into the joy of his maſter. Oh the bleſſed hope of a ſoul arrived even into the mouth of that haven of ſalvation, ſaying with a holy impatience, Open me the gates of righteouſneſs; I will go into them, and praiſe the Lord; This gate of the Lord into which the righteous ſhall enter; Pſalm cxviii. Lord Jeſu thou art gone in before unto thy Father and our Father, and to thy God and our God; Oh make good now thy promiſe, that thou wilt come to us and take us to thee, that where thou art there we may be alſo; ſee John xiv. 18. Let me have once, let me have now the final completing of my Chriſtian happineſs, and of my gain in Chriſt; ſee John xvii. 24.

It was a gracious ſpeech of Ambroſe on his death-bed to his friends weeping about him, Non ſic vixi ut pudeat me inter vos vivere: Sed nec timeo mori, quia bonum habemus Dominum. I did not ſo live as to be afraid to live among you: Neither do I fear to die, becauſe we have a good Lord. So it ſhould be the voice of all good Chriſtians, knowing that when this earthly houſe of this tabernacle was diſſolved, he had a building of God, a houſe not made with hands, eternal in the Heavens. And

As every one, no doubt, is deſirous that Chriſt may be to him a gain to die; ſo that when his ſoul departs out of his body it may be received by Chriſt, and brought into his eternal habitations. So we muſt take great heed of diſ-joining the parts of the text. For it is ſure, that Chriſt ſhall not be a gain unto thoſe in their death, who neglect to make him a gain unto themſelves in their life. Piety (ſaith Paul) is a great gain: Then every one muſt labour to make that great gain by Chriſt; muſt ſtudy to follow him who left us an example that we ſhould follow his ſteps; muſt learn of him that he is meek and humble of heart, that we may find reſt unto our ſouls; muſt alſo learn of him not to ſeek our glory, but that of him who ſent him; muſt go about doing good as he did; muſt love our enemies; muſt pray for thoſe that perſecute us, as he did for thoſe that crucified him. For, if we do not endeavour to be conformable unto him, and to be guided by his doctrine and example in our life, we ſhall not find him a gain unto us in our death. The ſpiritual life of the Chriſtian in this world, and his eternal life in the next world, is but one life; all the difference is in the growth, in earth it is growing, in Heaven it is full grown. Therefore, let us now to our power make Chriſt a gain to live; ſo, and no otherwiſe, he ſhall be our gain to die, and to live for ever with him after our death.

CHAP. II.

He exhorteth them to unity, and to all humbleneſs of mind, by the example of Chriſt's humility and exaltation: 12 To a careful proceeding in the way of ſalvation, that they be as lights to the wicked world, 16 and comforts to him their Apoſtle, who is now ready to be offered up to God. 19 He hopeth to ſend Timothy to them, whom he greatly commendeth, 25 as Epaphroditus alſo whom he preſently ſendeth to them.

IF there be therefore any conſolation in Chriſt, if any comfort of love, if any fellowſhip of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies;

2 Fulfil ye my joy, that ye be like-minded, having the ſame love, being of one accord, of one mind.

3 Let nothing be done through ſtrife, or vain-glory, but in lowlineſs of mind let each eſteem other better than themſelves.

4 Look not every man on his own things, but every man alſo on the things of others.

5 Let this mind be in you, which was alſo in Chriſt Jeſus:

6 Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God:

7 But made himſelf of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a ſervant, and was made in the likeneſs of men.

8 And being found in faſhion as a man, he humbled himſelf, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the croſs.

9 Wherefore God alſo hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name:

10 That at the name of Jeſus every knee ſhould bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth;

11 And that every tongue ſhould confeſs, that Jeſus Chriſt is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

12 Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my preſence only, but now much more in my abſence; work out your own ſalvation with fear and trembling.

13 For it is God which worketh in you, both to will and to do of his good pleaſure.

14 Do all things without murmurings, and diſputings:

15 That ye may be blameleſs, and harmleſs, the ſons of God, without rebuke, in the mids of a crooked and perverſe nation, among whom ye ſhine as lights in the world:

16 Holding forth the word of life; that I may rejoyce in the day of Chriſt, that I have not run in vain, neither laboured in vain.

17 Yea, and if I be offered upon the ſacrifice and ſervice of your faith, I joy, and rejoyce with you all.

18 For the ſame cauſe alſo do ye joy, and rejoyce with me.

19 But I truſt in the Lord Jeſus, to ſend Timotheus ſhortly unto you, that I alſo may be of good comfort, when I know your ſtate.

20 For I have no man like-minded, who will naturally care for your ſtate.

21 For all ſeek their own, not the things which are Jeſus Chriſts.

22 But ye know the proof of him, that as a ſon with the father, he hath ſerved with me in the goſpel.

23 Him therefore I hope to ſend preſently, ſo ſoon as I ſhall ſee how it will go with me.

24 But I truſt in the Lord, that I alſo my ſelf ſhall come ſhortly.

25 Yet I ſuppoſed it neceſſary to ſend to you Epaphroditus, my brother and companion in labour, and fellow-ſoldier, but your meſſenger, and he that miniſtred to my wants.

26 For he longed after you all, and was full of heavineſs, becauſe that ye had heard that he had been ſick.

27 For indeed he was ſick nigh unto death: but God had mercy on him; and not on him only, but on me alſo, leſt I ſhould have ſorrow upon ſorrow.

28 I ſent him therefore the more carefully, that when ye ſee him again, ye may rejoyce, and that I may be the leſs ſorrowful.

29 Receive him therefore in the Lord with all gladneſs, and hold ſuch in reputation:

30 Becauſe for the work of Chriſt he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life to ſupply your lack of ſervice toward me.

This chapter begins with an exhortation to ſeveral duties, and a dehortation from ſeveral vices intermingled: As, a vehement and pathetical exhortation to unity, ver. 1, 2. A diſſuaſive from ſtrife and vain-glory, ver. 3. —— An exhortation to lowlineſs of mind, with a deſcription thereof, ver. 3. —— A diſſuaſive from ſeeking, ib. An exhortation to ſeek the welfare of others, from the example of Chriſt, ver. 4, 5. which the Apoſtle amplifies by ſhewing Chriſt's natural majeſty and glory, ver. 6. and his voluntary ſtate of humiliation, in his incarnation, ver. 7. and death on the croſs, ver. 8. Then he ſhews his ſtate of exaltation, ver. 9. amplified by the conſequences thereof, viz. The adoration of all reaſonable creatures, ver. 10. and their open confeſſion of his glory and dignity, ver. 11. And then the Apoſtle applies, by way of inference, what he has ſaid, in an exhortation to a diligent uſe of all means conducing to their ſalvation, ver. 12. enforced by a powerful motive, God's concurrence with them in ſo doing, ver. 13.

His next exhortation is to avoid diſſenſion and diſcord, ver. 14. preſſed by the good end or event that will iſſue from thence, both in reſpect to themſelves, ver. 15, 16. and to the Apoſtle alſo, ver. 16. — amplified by a declaration of his readineſs to lay down his life for their good, ver. 17. and their duty therefore to rejoice with him.

In the next place Paul endeavours to comfort them, ſaying, that he will ſend Timothy to them, ver. 19—23. That he himſelf will come ſhortly to them, ver. 24. and that in the mean time he had ſent back Epaphras their own miniſter to them; amplified by his character of him, ver. 25. and by the reaſons of his ſending of him, ver. 26. —28. with an exhortation to receive him gladly, ver. 29. becauſe he had worn himſelf almoſt out by waiting upon Paul in priſon, ver. 30.

Ver. 6. Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God.] This is a plain expoſition of the Evangeliſt's declaration, that the Word was God, John i. 1, 14. See the notes on that chapter, and the Diſſertation at the end thereof, concerning the Divinity of Chriſt.

Ver. 7. —— Took upon him the form of a ſervant,] Of God, viz. A good man, for he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by doing good.

Ver. 10. — At the name of Jeſus, &c.] See Dr. Hammond and Whitby, on this text.

CHAP. III.

1 He warneth them to beware of the falſe teachers of the circumciſion, 4 ſhewing that himſelf hath greater cauſe than they, to truſt in the righteouſneſs of the Law: 7 which notwithſtanding he counteth as dung and loſs, to gain Chriſt and his righteouſneſs, 12 therein acknowledging his own imperfection. 15 He exhorteth them to be thus minded, 17 and to imitate him, 18 and to decline the ways of carnal Chriſtians.

FInally, my brethren, rejoyce in the Lord. To write the ſame things to you, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is ſafe.

2 Beware of dogs, beware of evil workers, beware of the conciſion.

3 For we are the circumciſion, which worſhip God in the ſpirit, and rejoyce in Chriſt Jeſus, and have no confidence in the fleſh:

4 Though I might alſo have confidence in the fleſh. If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he might truſt in the fleſh, I more:

5 Circumciſed the eighth day, of the ſtock of Iſrael, of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews; as touching the law, a Phariſee;

6 Concerning zeal, perſecuting the church; touching the righteouſneſs which is in the law, blameleſs.

7 But what things were gain to me, thoſe I counted loſs for Chriſt.

8 Yea doubtleſs, and I count all things but loſs, for the excellency of the knowledge of Chriſt Jeſus my Lord: for whom I have ſuffered the loſs of all things, and do count them but dung that I may win Chriſt,

9 And be found in him, not having mine own righteouſneſs, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Chriſt, the righteouſneſs which is of God by faith:

10 That I may know him, and the power of his reſurrection, and the fellowſhip of his ſufferings, being made conformable unto his death;

11 If by any means I might attain unto the reſurrection of the dead.

12 Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which alſo I am apprehended of Chriſt Jeſus.

13 Brethren, I count not my ſelf to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting thoſe things which are behind, and reaching forth to thoſe things which are before,

14 I preſs toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Chriſt Jeſus.

15 Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded: and if in any thing ye be otherwiſe minded, God ſhall reveal even this unto you.

16 Nevertheleſs, whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the ſame rule, let us mind the ſame thing.

17 Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk ſo, as ye have us for an enſample.

18 (For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the croſs of Chriſt:

19 Whoſe end is deſtruction, whoſe God is their belly, and whoſe glory is in their ſhame, who mind earthly things.)

20 For our converſation is in heaven, from whence alſo we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt:

21 Who ſhall change our vile body, that it may be faſhioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to ſubdue all things unto himſelf.

In this chapter we find

1. An exhortation to Divine Joy.
2. An excuſe for repeating the ſame exhortations, &c. ver. 1.
3. A caution againſt falſe teachers, deſcribed by their ill qualities, ver. 2. which deſcription is illuſtrated by its oppoſite, the temper of true Chriſtians, who ſhould caſt away all confidence in carnal things, ver. 3. Which particular he amplifies, by ſhewing, (1.) That he had more cauſe of confidence in ſuch things than any of them could pretend to, ver. 4. proved by an ennumeration of ſeveral particulars, ver. 5, 6. (2.) What his eſteem of them was, ver. 7. (3.) A repetition of his undervaluing of them, and renouncing confidence in them. (4.) His end herein, ſhewing the benefits he ſhall reap thereby, viz. a winning of Chriſt, ver. 8. a being found in him, ver. 9. an experimental knowledge of him; a communion with him, and conformity to him in his reſurrection and death, ver. 10. a partaking of a more perfect ſtate of holineſs, ver. 11. which nevertheleſs cannot be at preſent perfectly attained unto, though it muſt be endeavoured after, ver. 12—14.
4. An exhortation to follow his example in their endeavours after perfection, ver. 15.
5. An exhortation to regular walking and unity, notwithſtanding any difference in their judgments, ver. 16. and,
6. Concludes with an exhortation for them to follow his example, and of the other Apoſtles, ver. 17, &c.

Ver. 10. That I may know him and the power of his reſurrection.] To underſtand the Apoſtle's meaning in theſe words, it is neceſſary to conſider them with the context now, as you read above.

Paul, in this chapter, ſets himſelf to ſhew the excellency, and the great advantages of the knowledge of Jeſus Chriſt, and how inconſiderable, how unworthy to be named in compariſon therewith, all thoſe things were that the Jews, his countrymen, ſo much glorified in. His diſcourſe upon this occaſion is ſo very remarkable, that it will be worth our while to run over the particulars of it.

“ I alſo (ſaith he in the 4th verſe) might have confidence in the fleſh. If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he might truſt in the fleſh, I more. As if he had ſaid, Think not, O Philippians, that I therefore ſpeak lightly of thoſe privileges and advantage which the Jews among you ſo much boaſt of upon this account, becauſe I have none of them my ſelf: No, on the contrary, if I would value my ſelf upon ſuch outward carnal things, I have as much reaſon as any. Nay, there is not a Jew among you that perhaps can ſay ſo much on his own behalf in this reſpect as I can.

For, (as he goes on in the 5th and 6th verſes) “ I was circumciſed the eighth day, of the ſtock of Iſrael, of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews: As touching the law a Phariſee: Concerning zeal, perſecuting the Church: Touching the righteouſneſs which is by the law, blameleſs.

That is to ſay, I have not only the character of a ſon of Abraham upon me, being circumciſed; but I am alſo of the race of Iſrael, which all the circumciſed children of Abraham are not.

Nay further. I am an Iſraelite of the tribe of Benjamin; that Benjamin which our Father Iſrael ſo dearly loved, and that tribe which, together with Judah, kept firm to the houſe of David, and the true religion, when the other ten tribes revolted.

Nay more. I am an Hebrew of the Hebrews. Not ſprung from proſelytes, as many among you are, but all my anceſtors, both by father and mother, being natural born Jews.

And then, as to my profeſſion in religon, it was the ſtricteſt among the Jews, for I was a Phariſee. And you all know that ſect of all others to be the moſt eminent for the reputation of preciſeneſs and ſanctity.

Neither did I in my zeal for the law of Moſes come ſhort of the ſtricteſt Phariſee that is among you; for who was more buſy, more eager, more violent in perſecuting Chriſtianity than I was!

And laſtly, to ſum up all, as to the Righteouſneſs which is by the law I am blameleſs. So punctual have I always been in obſerving the precepts of Moſes's law, that none can reprove me in that point; but I may truly, in the Jewiſh notion of righteouſneſs, be accounted a righteous perſon.

But now am I much the better for all theſe things? Have I any great reaſon to glory upon the account of them? No, verily, (as he goes on in ver. 7.) but what things were gain to me, thoſe I counted loſs for Chriſt. All theſe outward advantages, my birth, my profeſſion, my ſect, my reputation, my ſtrict way of living, which might have proved very beneficial to me in all worldly reſpects; when I once came to the knowledge of the Chriſtian religion, I deſpiſed them all: For, in truth, I found they were ſo far from being real advantages to me, that they were rather hindrances in the way of virtue and piety.

Yea doubtleſs, (as he goes on in the eighth verſe) I account all things but loſs for the excellency of the knowledge of Chriſt Jeſus my Lord, for whom I have ſuffered the loſs of all things; and do count them but dung that I may win Chriſt. That is to ſay, not only the above-named privileges, but all other things whatſoever, wealth, greatneſs, fame, friends, and life itſelf I account them all very pitiful things if they be compared with the ineſtimable advantages of being a Chriſtian. As I have once, ſo I will again readily forſake all, part with all things that the world holds moſt dear and valuable, nay, I will trample them under my feet like dirt and dung; provided I may obtain the favour of Chriſt.

And (as he goes on in the ninth verſe) that I might be found in him, not having my own righteouſneſs, which is of the law, but that which is by the faith of Jeſus Chriſt, the righteouſneſs which is of God by faith. This paſſage hath been frequently miſunderſtood, and interpreted to a ſenſe that I believe Paul did not think of. Paul doth not here oppoſe an inherent righteouſneſs to an imputed one; but an outward natural legal righteouſneſs to that which is inward and ſpiritual: And wrought in a man by the ſpirit of God. The righteouſneſs which the Apoſtle here deſires to be found in, is not the righteouſneſs of Chriſt made his, or imputed to him; but a real righteouſneſs produced in his ſoul by the faith of Jeſus Chriſt.

The plain ſenſe of the verſe ſeems to be this. That which above all things I deſire is to be found in Chriſt, i. e. to be found a diſciple of his ingrafted into him by being a a member of his Church, Not having my own righteouſneſs which is of the law, i. e. not being content with thoſe outward privileges, and that outward obedience which by my own natural ſtrength, I am able to yield to the precepts of the law, which is that righteouſneſs in which the Jews place their confidence, and by which they expect to be juſtified before God: But that which is by the faith of Jeſus Chriſt, the righteouſneſs which is of God by faith, i. e. that righteouſneſs which I deſire, and in which only I ſhall have the confidence to appear before God, is an inward principle of holineſs? that ſpiritual renewed obedience to God's laws which he doth require as the condition of his favour and acceptance, and which I can never attain to but by the faith of Chriſt by becoming a Chriſtian. This is none of my own righteouſneſs, but God's, it being wrought in me by his ſpirit, accompanying the preaching of the Goſpel; and as it is his gift, ſo he will own it, and reward it at the laſt day.

This is the full importance of that verſe, and then it follows by way of explication of what he now ſaid, That I may know him and the power of his reſurrection, &c. This is the righteouſneſs that I aſpire after that I may know Chriſt, not only by a notional belief of his doctrines, or profeſſion of his religion, but by a ſpiritual experimental knowledge of him, ſuch a knowledge as transforms me into his ſpirit and temper: And that I may know the power of his reſurrection, i. e. that I may experience in my ſelt all the good effects, that his reſurrection has a power to work in me; that I may feel the virtue and efficacy of it in my daily dying to ſin, and riſing again to a new, holy, and heavenly life. This is that righteouſneſs

I long for, and in compariſon of which, I account all things in the world but as loſs and as dung. So that

We are not to look upon our Lord's reſurrection merely as a thing to be believed, or profeſſed, or commemorated; or as a matter of fact that only concerned himſelf: But there is a great deal in it which doth nearly concern us. The Apoſtle tells us, there is a great power in it; even a power of raiſing us from ſin to a holy and virtuous life. It is ſo ordered, as to be capable of being, and it ought to be, a principle of new life in us, as it was the beginning of a new life in our Saviour. Now this virtue, this power, this efficacy of it, as it is that, which with the Apoſtle, we ought all moſt earneſtly to endeavour the experiencing in our ſelves, and to apply our meditations to it. For,

I. Our Saviour's reſurrection hath an influence upon our practice, as it lays an obligation upon Chriſtians to lead holy and virtuous lives. As it is in itſelf an incitement to piety, and Heavenly-mindedneſs.

This is indeed the loweſt inſtance of its power; but yet we ought not to paſs it by, becauſe the writers of the New Teſtament do frequently inſiſt on it: For thus they argue. If Chriſt was crucified for our ſins, then ought we to crucify them in our members. And if Chriſt roſe again the third day; then are we engaged in conformity to him to riſe again to newneſs of life, to lead a ſpiritual, Divine, Heavenly Life, ſuch a life, as he now lives with God.

And this in ancient times was taught every Chriſtian in and by his baptiſm. Whenever a perſon was baptized, he was not only to profeſs his faith in Chriſt's death and reſurrection, but he was alſo to look upon himſelf as obliged in correſpondence therewith, to mortify his former carnal affections, and to enter upon a new ſtate of life. And the very form of baptiſm did lively repreſent this obligation to them: For what did their being plunged under water ſignify, but their undertaking in imitation of Chriſt's death and burial, to forſake all their former evil courſes. As their aſcending out of the water did their engagement to lead a holy, ſpiritual life. This our Apoſtle doth more than once declare to us.

Thus, Rom. vi. 4. We are buried (ſaith he) with Chriſt by baptiſm unto death, that like as Chriſt was raiſed up from the dead, by the glory of the Father, even ſo we alſo ſhould walk in newneſs of life. Thus again in the 10th and 11th verſes of that chapter, In that Chriſt died, he died unto ſin once, but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God: Likewiſe reckon ye your ſelves to be dead indeed unto ſin; but alive unto God through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord. That is to ſay, after the example of Chriſt's death and reſurrection, account ye your ſelves obliged to die to ſin, and to live to righteouſneſs.

Laſtly, To name no more texts, the ſame uſe doth the Apoſtle make of Chriſt's reſurrection in Coloſſ. iii. 1, 2. If ye then, (ſaith he) be riſen with Chriſt, ſeek thoſe things which are above, where Chriſt ſitteth at the right hand of God, i. e. You by entring into the Chriſtian Covenant are incorporated into Chriſt, he is your Head, you are his members; and therefore, ſince he no longer leads a life of this world, it will by no means become you to live like worldlings, or epicures, but being riſen with him (as the members ought to do with the head) to mind thoſe things that are above where he is, to ſet your affections (as he goes on) on the things above, and not on the things of the earth. For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Chriſt in God.

Theſe things plainly ſhew that the Apoſtles delivered the doctrines of Chriſt's reſurrection, as a practical doctrine; as a point, which, if Chriſtians believed as they ſhould do, it would engage them to mortify their luſts, to die to the world, to place their affections on ſpiritual things, to have their converſations in Heaven, where Chriſt our Head, our Life, now ſits at the right hand of God.

II. Great will the influence and power of Chriſt's reſurrection upon our lives appear to be, when we conſider that it is indeed the principal evidence that we have for the truth of our religion, the very deſign of which is to make us virtuous and holy.

If any thing in the world can make a man good, it muſt be a hearty belief of the Goſpel. And if any thing in the world can make a man heartily to believe the Goſpel, it muſt be the reſurrection of our Saviour from the dead. All that power therefore, that the Goſpel of Chriſt hath to make men good; all that force and efficacy that its arguments, its promiſes, its precept, its encouragement, its threatnings, have upon the underſtandings and wills of men in order to the bringing them to virtue and holineſs; I ſay, all this may in a great meaſure ultimately be reſolved into the article of Chriſt's reſurrection: For this reſurrection of his was the thing that did from the beginning, and doth now, and ever will aſcertain mankind of the truth of Chriſt's religion. This was, and will be for ever, the convincing evidence, that what Jeſus taught was true doctrine, that what he commanded was of perpetual obligation, that what he promiſed or threatned he was able to make good.

If Chriſt had not riſen from the dead, but had for ever been detained in the grave, notwithſtanding all that might be urged from the goodneſs of his doctrine, and the innocency of his life, and the multitude of his miracles, for the proof of the truth of Chriſtianity (though yet very ſtrong and concluding proofs theſe are) I doubt it would hardly have met with that ready entertainment in the world, that we find it did. But a great many, both then and now, would have made the ſame objection againſt Jeſus Chriſt and his Goſpel, that the Phariſees did of old; that is to ſay, That all his great works and miracles were done by ſorcery and magick. And that as for the innocency of his life, and the great virtue and ſtrictneſs that he expreſſed in his converſation; that was only uſed as a trick and an artifice the more eaſily to impoſe upon the world. But now when it appears that that Jeſus, who taught this Holy Religion, who did thoſe miracles, who lived that virtuous life; did, after he was put to a cruel death, riſe again to life, and converſed upon earth for forty days together, and after that, in the preſence of many ſpectators did aſcend into Heaven: I ſay, when this appears (as God be thanked it is evident beyond all contradiction) here is no room left for any ſuſpicion of this nature; but all pretences of impoſture do perfectly vaniſh. It is impoſſible for any conſidering man to believe Chriſt's reſurrection, and at the ſame time to doubt of the truth of his religion.

For thus let us reaſon. Chriſt over and over again told his Apoſtles that he ſhould be put to death, but after that, he would within three days riſe again, Matt. xvi. 21. xvii. 22. John xvi. 16.

Nay, he told this not only to the Apoſtles, but to all the people; nay, more than that, he gave this as a token, as an evidence to them whereby they ſhould know and be convinced that he was what he gave himſelf out to be, the Son of God and the Great Prophet and Saviour that was to come, John ii. 19.

Nay, in the laſt place, he not only refers the Jews to his reſurrection as an evidence of his being the Chriſt, but as the laſt and greateſt evidence that he had to give. And ſuch as if they were not convinced by, they muſt expect no other, Matt. xii. 39, 40.

Our Saviour now laying ſuch a mighty ſtreſs upon this point of his reſurrection, putting his whole cauſe, as I may ſpeak, upon this iſſue: I aſk, How is it poſſible to imagine, that God Almighty ſhould make theſe predictions of our Saviour, good; if he was not really what he pretended to be?

If Chriſt had been an impoſtor, it had been the eaſieſt matter in the world to have ſtifled all his pretences for ever. It had but been to have let him mouldered to duſt in his grave, as all other men do, and as he, without the help of omnipotency, would have done; and then all the world would have ſeen that he was a deceiver. But now, when inſtead of periſhing in the grave, he was after three days reſtored to life again, as he had foretold the people; nay, to a glorious immortal life; What are we to conclude from hence?

Did not God in this appear with a witneſs, as a voucher and approver of his cauſe? Was not this a demonſtration to all the world, that Chriſt Jeſus was no deceiver, but that he came from God; and that whatever he delivered was the truth of God, and to be received as the oracles of God? Certainly it was.

For that a man ſhould be raiſed from the dead by any other power, than the very power of God; all the world knows to be impoſſible. The devil, though he can do ſtrange feats in the natural world; yet I never heard or read that either he, or any of his agents or miniſters, ſo much as pretended to raiſe the dead to life again. And certainly, if he could have done it, he would have done it, often before this, (as in the caſe of Apollonius Tynaus, Mahomet, and others) if it had been for no other reaſon than to baffle thereby the evidence of our Saviour's reſurrection, and render it unconcluding.

It muſt therefore certainly be the power of God that raiſed up Jeſus from the dead. But then to ſuppoſe, that God ſhould employ this power for the giving teſtimony to a falſhood, that he ſhould ſet his own ſeal to atteſt an untruth, as he muſt be ſuppoſed to have done, if Jeſus was not his Son. What an unaccountable thing is this? No man that believes that God is faithful, and juſt, and true, and that he governs the world, can poſſibly imagine ſuch a thing: For this had been to have contradicted all his own attributes, and to have laid an invincible temptation and ſnare before all mankind to believe an impious lye. You ſee then what an unexceptionable proof, (nay, demonſtration I may call it) the reſurrection of Chriſt doth afford us of the truth of his religion; which is the ſecond inſtance of the power that is in it to bring men over to holineſs and virtue. But,

III. Thirdly, the power of Chriſt's reſurrection for the making us holy and virtuous will farther appear in this reſpect. Namely, as it is in particular, the great ſupport of our future hopes; the great pledge and aſſurance of our own reſurrection and immortality.

For if Chriſt be riſen, then may we alſo be certain that we ſhall at laſt be raiſed by him, becauſe Chriſt is not riſen for himſelf only, but as the firſt-fruits of them that ſlept, 1 Cor. xv. Good reaſon therefore, had Paul to argue as he doth in that place, If Chriſt be preached that he is riſen from the dead; how ſay ſome among you, that there is no reſurrection? On the contrary, as he urges, If we believe that Jeſus Chriſt died and aroſe again: Even ſo them alſo that ſleep in Jeſus will God bring with him, 1 Theſſ. iv. 14.

For how can we deſire to be better aſſured that our bodies ſhall not for ever ſleep in the grave, but ſhall at laſt be re-united to our ſouls, and both ſoul and body live eternally in unſpeakable bliſs and happineſs: I ſay, How can we have greater aſſurance of this, than by what was brought to paſs in our Saviour's reſurrection from the dead.

We have hereby a clear demonſtration that the reſurrection is poſſible; for Chriſt who was once dead is alive again, and lives in unexpreſſible glory, at the right hand of God. And at the ſame time that he roſe, he raiſed up other bodies alſo of holy men, to accompany him in his triumph over death.

But that is not all. He that raiſed up himſelf and them hath given us his ſolemn word and promiſe, in as expreſs terms as is poſſible, that he will by the ſame power raiſe us up alſo, and exalt us to the ſame glory that he is poſſeſſed of. He hath told us, that he is the Reſurrection and the life. And that whoſoever believeth in him, ſhall not periſh, but have everlaſting life; and he ſhall raiſe him up at the laſt day. There cannot be a ſtronger proof of any thing, than our Saviour's reſurrection is of the happineſs of good men in another ſtate.

Which being ſo, How powerful a means muſt we needs conclude it to be, for the reforming the manners of mankind, and making them truly holy and virtuous.

Since we have thereby ſuch a demonſtration given us of a glorious immortality to be expected by us; what is it that can be able to hinder or divert us from a ſerious purſuit of thoſe things that lead to it? What could God do more by way of motive and argument, towards the proſelyting the world to religion and righteouſneſs, than he hath done by thus aſcertaining our future happineſs by the reſurrection of his Son Jeſus.

To be certain, that if we ſeriouſly apply our ſelves to a life of piety here, we ſhall be crowned with everlaſting felicity hereafter! To be certain, that if we follow the ſteps of our bleſſed Saviour, we ſhall for ever ſhine in the ſame glory and luſtre that he now doth at the right hand of his Father! To be able poſitively to ſay, I know that my Redeemer liveth, and I know that if I live as he did, I ſhall for ever live with him; and though it doth not yet appear what I ſhall be, yet this I know, that when he ſhall appear I ſhall be like him! O what noble thoughts, what brave reſolutions is this able to inſpire us with! What difficulties ſhall we be afraid of? What labours ſhall we not willingly undertake? What temptations ſhall we not eaſily vanquiſh in the proſpect of ſuch an eternal crown of glory, as awaits us and is ſecured to us by our Lord Jeſus.

IV. Fourthly, There is ſtill a further bleſſing comes to us by our Saviour's reſurrection from the dead; and in which indeed is chiefly ſeen and expreſſed the great power of it for the making us holy and virtuous. That is to ſay, unto it we do principally owe all that ſupernatural grace and aſſiſtance by which we are enabled to vanquiſh our corruptions, and to live up to the precepts of our religion.

As Chriſt by his reſurrection did oblige us to lead new lives: As Chriſt by his reſurrection did demonſtrate the truth of the Chriſtian religion, which is wholly in order to our leading new lives: As by his reſurrection he cleared up to us the certainty of our future ſtate, and thereby gave us the greateſt motive and encouragement to lead new lives: So in the laſt place, by the ſame reſurrection he acquired a power of conferring grace and ſtrength and influence upon us, by the virtue of which we are in fact enabled to lead new lives.

Tho' Chriſt by his death reconciled us to God, and procured the pardon of ſin for us; yet the actual benefit of this reconciliation, the actual application of this pardon, did depend upon our performance of certain conditions. Which conditions were, that we ſhould mortify all our evil affections, and frame our lives ſuitably to the laws of the Goſpel. But now the grace and power by which we are enabled to do this, was not the effect of Chriſt's death, but of his reſurrection.

It was when he aſcended up on high, and led captivity captive, that is, when he had vanquiſhed death, which had vanquiſhed all the world before: It was then (as the Scripture aſſures us) and not till then that he was in a capacity of giving gifts unto men. It was not till he was glorified, as John obſerves, that the holy Spirit was given.

Hence it is, that we every where find the Apoſtle's attributing the buſineſs of man's juſtification and ſalvation, as much or more to Chriſt's reſurrection, than to his paſſion. If Chriſt be not riſen (ſaith Paul, 1 Cor. xv.) your faith is vain, ye are yet in your ſins. Indeed, if Chriſt had periſhed in the grave, we had ſtill had all the load of our ſins upon us; becauſe we had no aſſurance that God had accepted the atonement and propitiation which he had made for them. And much leſs could we have promiſed to ourſelves, that we ſhould have been aſſiſted by any Divine Power for the ſubduing of them.

Again, the ſame Paul tells us, Rom. iv. that Chriſt was delivered for our ſins, and raiſed again for our juſtification. Chriſt's death was the ſacrifice, the ſatisfaction for our ſins. But it was by the means of his reſurrection, that that ſacrifice and ſatisfaction is applied to us, and we for the merits of it become juſtified before God.

Laſtly, to name no more texts, "Who (ſaith the ſame Apoſtle, Rom. viii.) ſhall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that juſtifieth: Who is he that condemneth? It is Chriſt that died, yea, rather that is riſen again; who is even at the right hand of God, who alſo maketh interceſſion for us.

Here then is the great power of our Saviour's reſurrection to make us good. Chriſt being riſen from the dead, hath all power given him both in Heaven and in earth. God, as Paul expreſſeth it, hath put all things under his feet, and hath given him to be head over all things to the Church, Eph. i. 22. Now, in the fulneſs of that power that he is inveſted with; as he doth on one hand, with never-failing efficacy, make continual interceſſion for his Church, and every member of it! So he doth on the other hand, out of the fulneſs of that power, derive and communicate ſo much ſtrength and grace and aſſiſtance of the Divine Spirit to all Chriſtians; that, if they make a good uſe of it, they ſhall not fail to perform all thoſe conditions of faith and repentance and a holy life, that are required of them, in order to their being made actual partakers of all thoſe unſpeakable benefits, which he purchaſed for mankind by his death and ſufferings.

Chriſt, by his reſurrection, is become both our High-prieſt and our King; both our Advocate and our Lord.

By that power which he then obtained, as our Prieſt and Advocate, he doth with authority recommend us and all our concernments to his Father. As our King and Lord, he rules and governs us; he takes care of us; he provides for us; he repreſſes the inſults of his and our enemies, and defeats all their attempts againſt us; and laſtly, he ſupplies us from time to time with ſuch a meaſure of grace and ſtrength, and influence of his Divine Spirit, as he ſees is needful or proper for our condition.

CHAP. IV.

1 From particular admonitions, 4 he proceedeth to general exhortations, 10 ſheweth how he rejoyced at their liberality towards him lying in priſon, not ſo much for the ſupply of his own wants, as for the grace of God in them. 19 And ſo he concludeth with prayer and ſalutations.

THEREFORE, my brethren, dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, ſo ſtand faſt in the Lord, my dearly beloved.

2 I beſeech Euodias, and beſeech Syntyche, that they be of the ſame mind in the Lord.

3 And I intreat thee alſo, true yoke-fellow, help thoſe women which laboured with me in the goſpel, with Clement alſo, and with other my fellow-labourers, whoſe names are in the book of life.

4 Rejoyce in the Lord alway: and again I ſay, Rejoyce.

5 Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand.

6 Be careful for nothing: but in every thing by prayer and ſupplication with thankſgiving, let your requeſts be made known unto God.

7 And the peace of God which paſſeth all underſtanding, ſhall keep your hearts and minds through Chriſt Jeſus.

8 Finally, brethren, whatſoever things are true, whatſoever things are honeſt, whatſoever things are juſt, whatſoever things are pure, whatſoever things are lovely, whatſoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praiſe, think on theſe things.

9 Thoſe things which ye have both learned and received, and heard and ſeen in me, do: and the God of peace ſhall be with you.

10 But I rejoyced in the Lord greatly, that now at the laſt your care of me hath flouriſhed again, wherein ye were alſo careful, but ye lacked opportunity.

11 Not that I ſpeak in reſpect of want: for I have learned in whatſoever ſtate I am, therewith to be content.

12 I know both how to be abaſed, and I know how to abound: every where, and in all things I am inſtructed, both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to ſuffer need.

13 I can do all things through Chriſt which ſtrengthned me.

14 Notwithſtanding, ye have well done, that ye did communicate with my affliction.

15 Now ye Philippians know alſo, that in the beginning of the goſpel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me, as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only.

16 For even in Theſſalonica ye ſent once and again unto my neceſſity.

17 Not becauſe I deſire a gift: but I deſire fruit that may abound to your account.

18 But I have all, and abound: I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were ſent from you, and odour of a ſweet ſmell, a ſacrifice acceptable, well-pleaſing to God.

19 But my God ſhall ſupply all your need, according to his riches in glory, by Chriſt Jeſus.

20 Now unto God and our Father be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

21 Salute every ſaint in Chriſt Jeſus. The brethren which are with me greet you.

22 All the ſaints ſalute you, chiefly they that are of Ceſars houſhold.

23 The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you all. Amen.

¶ It was written to the Philippians from Rome, by Epaphroditus.

This chapter contains,

I. Exhortations to divers duties, as (1.) particularly, to ſtedfaſtneſs in the faith, ver. 1. To agreement between two good women, ver. 2. and to all the Philippians in general, to aſſiſt one another, ver. 3. (2.) in general, to ſpiritual joy, ver. 4. to moderation, ver. 5. to avoid too great anxiety after the things of this world, and to be thankful to God for all things by prayer, ver. 6. for that is the beſt way to obtain God's peace to ſecure them, ver. 7. to an imitation of their Heathen neighbours, in whatſoever was truly praiſe-worthy, ver. 8. and to follow his doctrine and example, with a motive, ver. 9.

II. A commendation of them for their kindneſs and bounty to him in his ſtraits. Wherein we find,

(1.) His rejoicing at their care of him, with an excuſe for their delay, ver. 10.

(2.) A removal of a falſe ground of his rejoicing, viz. not merely the ſupply of his wants; becauſe he is content in every ſtate, ver. 11, 12. being enabled thereto by Chriſt, ver. 13. Yet,

(3.) He ſhews the acceptableneſs of this ſupply to him, and commends them for it; with a deſcription of the nature of it, that it was a communicating with him in his afflictions, ver. 14.

(4) He acknowledges all their former kindneſſes, ver. 15, 16, 17. declares his full ſatisfaction with what they ſent, commending it in regard to its acceptableneſs with God, ver. 18 and encouraging them by a promiſe of recompence in this world, ver. 19.

III. The concluſion of the Epiſtle; wherein we find a doxology, ver. 20. ſalutations, ver. 21, 22. and his Apoſtolical benediction, ver. 23.

Ver. 5. Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand.] In this Scripture the Apoſtle exhorts to that truly Chriſtian temper, by which we may only be known to be the diſciples of Chriſt. Therefore, I ſhall be the more copious in its explanation. And,

Firſt, Let us enquire what this virtue of moderation is, ſo plainly recommended by the Apoſtle, and what are the principles of a man that poſſeſſes it.

The Greek word is ἐπιείκεια, or τὸ ἐπιεικὲς, and that if we look into the beſt Commentaries and Lexicons has different interpretations, but all centring in much the ſame temper. It is thought here in the text to ſignify a patient reſignation to the will of God under their ſufferings, without any anger or curſes on their perſecutors, leaving their recompence, and their own deliverance to the Lord, who was at hand in the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. It ſignifies a meekneſs and gentleneſs of diſpoſition, inclining us to bear with, and overlook and forgive, without any peeviſh frowardneſs or harſh reſentment. It ſignifies a love of, and a readineſs to do what is proper, and decent, and honourable. It imports juſtice and equity, and even an impartial frame of mind both as to things and perſons; valuing and ſetting a price and eſteem on every thing in proportion to its true value, worth and weight; and dealing with every man as we ourſelves would deſire to be dealt with, which is the ſureſt rule of equity. It is often taken for clemency and tender-heartedneſs, often for a keeping a medium, and not running into exceſſes either on one ſide or the other; but ofteneſt, and moſt properly, for an abatement of ſtrict rigour, for a coming down from what in ſeverity may be thought our due; for a yielding and conceding, for an equitable remittance and ſoftening of the extremities of the law. Therefore it is oppoſed to acting βιαίως, ſeverely and forcibly, and this is the definition that Ariſtotle gives of this virtue, and the ſenſe that Demoſthenes and others uſe in it; and I can think of no word in the Engliſh tongue that will ſo well anſwer theſe ſenſes as moderation; preſerving a medium, a modus and temper, as we call it, eſteeming and being zealous for things according to their true meaſure, not bearing upon the edges, but ſteering in the middle, governing our paſſions ſo as to be able to bear with and forgive, and condeſcend to our neighbours, and not to treat them with the rigorous ſeverities of a ſtretched and tortured juſtice.

So that moderation is not a ſlighting, and giving up, any thing that is truly juſt and valuable: It does not ſuppoſe, that we are to abate of a true and honeſt zeal and courage, that is to be employed in any thing that is in its own nature good and neceſſary: No, but it teaches us to diſtinguiſh theſe things from thoſe that are circumſtantially ſo, and to eſteem them ſo much more, and to maintain and embrace them ſo much more earneſtly as they are better. A man is not to be moderately honeſt, or moderately virtuous: Theſe are thin weak ſcandals. Virtue and honeſty are within the line that moderation walks in; nor is the queſtion about them. The queſtion is, Whether a man may not ſtoop from ſomewhat he may think his own right? Whether he may not be gentle and compaſſionate? Whether he may not in things that are not ſo good as peace, ſeek peace by giving them up? And the anſwer is, no, a man cannot give up juſtice and honeſty, whoever thought ſo? It is a willing miſtake.

Theſe virtues a man that truly values things muſt prize; but then moderation teaches him to be leſs ſolicitous in leſſer things, and to bend in matters that are not ſo eſſentially good. It is not a man's virtue and his reaſon that he is to keep a temper in and a hand over, but his paſſions: It is not his judgment and underſtanding that he would contradict, but his deſires. It is not in things that are truly good and valuable that he would make condeſcenſions; but in things that being indifferent in themſelves, may, according to their circumſtances be good or evil. But if we come to particulars we ſhall better ſee this.

A man then that truly has this virtue in his private converſation, is firſt, exactly juſt in giving to all their due; and then courteous and civil, and obliging. His carriage is peaceable and quiet to all with whom buſineſs or opportunity lead him to converſe: And he thinks nothing almoſt will anſwer his being uneaſy or vexatious to them; though his inclination may carry him to accompany with thoſe that are moſt agreeable to him in opinion: Yet his juſtice and charity are not confined, and neither the violence of party nor the reſentment of injury, can make him with-hold thoſe neceſſary duties.

In his opinions, he is not ſo conceitedly poſitive as to make them the ſtandard of his neighbours: Nor in his rights ſo nicely ſenſible as to make them their plague. He never maintains and vindicates the one to make men ſubmit, but when the importance requires it: He never proſecutes the other but when it is plain and notorious, and other means fail: In both, when the occaſions are but mean and trivial, he can ſilently let them drop: If otherwiſe, he can follow them with temper; as much as lies in him, if it be poſſible, he ſtudies to keep peace with all men.

As he muſt neceſſarily meet with many little diſturbances and vexations which the vanity and folly and wickedneſs of the world will caſt in his way; this temper gives him ſuch a command of himſelf as to yield ſomewhat to mens infirmities, and forgive their ill nature. And as he cannot promiſe himſelf to keep free from thoſe weakneſſes, whereby he may injure or offend others, he has not ſuch a ſenſe of honour as to double his folly and his injury by an obſtinate perſiſting; but is ready to acknowledge it, and beg pardon of the offended perſon. As men have all one Father, and one God hath made them, why ſhould they deal treacherouſly, injuriouſly, malicouſly, baſely, or rudely one with another?

Conſider him as a Chriſtian, a member of the Catholick Church; he thinks that that revelation is the compleateſt ſyſtem of the will of God: The laws ſo juſt, the encouragements ſo ſtrong, the aſſiſtances vouchſafed in it ſo great, that the bleſſing can never enough be prized by thoſe that enjoy it. Yet he knows not how to condemn all thoſe that having been neceſſarily ignorant of theſe truths have made an honeſt uſe of the light they had; and knows no harm in believing that the blood of that lamb that was ſlain from the foundation of the world reaches all in every nation under Heaven, that fear God and work righteouſneſs.

For Chriſtians themſelves, the Scripture is their rule, and their only rule of faith and life, ſuch an help and guide as to a man that reads it with an unprejudiced mind, with a ſincere love and deſire of finding out the truth, will direct and carry him forward in a ſure way to ſalvation; and he ſhall err in nothing neceſſary to that end. Otherwiſe it muſt be ſaid, that either God did not deſign to give us a clear revelation, or elſe that he could not ſo expreſs himſelf as to accompliſh what he deſigned.

Thoſe things which are not plain, are not neceſſary; thoſe things which we cannot comprehend, are no farther neceſſary than is revealed. And when men go about to explain and make them clear to the world, they go about a work they need not: But when they thruſt into the faith their vain philoſophy, and impoſe their ſcholaſtick niceties for neceſſary religion, they do more than they can juſtify. How far ſome councils have been guilty of this, carried more with a zealous hatred to a man or party than a love for neceſſary truth, let them, that think it concerns them, ſee.

The main end and deſign of Chriſtianity was certainly to reform the world, to make men better. The grace of God appeared to teach men, that denying ungodlineſs and wordly luſts, they ſhould walk ſoberly, righteouſly, and Godly in this preſent world: Jeſus Chriſt was ſent to bleſs us, by turning every one of us from our iniquities; and though ſome one form of government was inſtituted as proper to carry on this end; yet he that conſiders right, cannot believe the bleſſing and goodneſs of God ſo tied up to that, as to leave thoſe who want it under condemnation, though in their own, they attain the great end of Chriſtianity, and live the lives of Chriſtians. Such a man abhors the turning of a reaſonable rule of life, religion into mechaniſm and a charm; and making his own ſect, as a conjurer's circle the only place of ſafety from the Devil.

He cannot ſqueeze and ſtraiten the goodneſs of God where the revelation has not mark'd out a way for his judgment; and chain him down as the Heathens did their idols to his own houſe or city: And therefore doubts not wherever men's knowledge is ſincere, and their practice Chriſtian: The God of juſtice and mercy will acquit and receive them, in what Church or body of men whatſoever. Even in that Church which is the mother of corruptions, which has brought down Chriſtianity to ſomething worſe than good natural religion; wherever the belief of thoſe follies may be ſuppoſed to conſiſt with an honeſt mind and a good practice: Wherever the ignorance is invincible, and the life according to the beſt knowledge their ſtation will permit them to attain unto, there is a juſtification and excuſe. A man will be accepted according to that which he hath, and not according to that which he hath not, and cannot have.

In the other, the Reformed Churches which have nothing unſound either in doctrine or worſhip, there is nothing requiſite towards ſalvation but they are ſafe in, if there be nothing requiſite towards ſalvation but repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Theſe are the principles of a moderate man, as to theſe things, they may be called latitude, or any other word which men pleaſe; but it is ſetting the building to reſt upon its true foundation. All things in religion cannot be of the ſame worth. Practice is the end of all the reſt: Therefore unwilful errors in faith, much leſs miſtakes in any outward conſtitutions, he cannot ſet upon the ſame foot with ſins in practice. Wickedneſs he takes to be the greateſt hereſy, and a good life the trueſt orthodoxy.

If any of thoſe errors men may fall into are worth correcting (as many of them, are to ſettle them in the purity of faith,) that will be beſt done by cool reaſoning, by hard arguments, and ſoft words. Nothing elſe will juſtify clamour, and evil ſpeaking, and reviling the man we oppoſe; and it will never juſtify it ſelf, for it never does any good. In a word,

Moderation teaches a man to allow to all men their liberty of thinking, and to controul them no other way but by reaſon and argument, except in caſes of abſolute wickedneſs.

Nay farther, it teaches a man that ſomething may and ſhould be conceded to thoſe who diſſent, though unreaſonably, from us.

This is the moderation recommended by the Apoſtle, and the Church of England it ſelf allows, in the preface to her Liturgy; and this is the moderation which was uſed in its firſt eſtabliſhment. And

This is nothing more than what reaſon, and good ſenſe, and good nature recommend; to be zealous for things according to their worth and value: To keep between the extremities that dangerouſly encloſe virtue: To be gentle and eaſy to all: To be ready to give up what's leſs worthy for what is truly valuable, inanimate nature it ſelf, the whole creation gives teſtimony to it, where all things are preſerved in their being, and beauty, and perfection by that mean that is obſerved in them, and brought to corruption and ruin by violence and exceſs on either ſide.

'Tis what the Scripture moſt expreſly commands, and is a branch of that charity which ſuffereth long and is kind, which envieth not and is not eaſily provoked; which hopeth all things and endureth all things: Of that charity which teaches to bear with and forgive one another; to be gentle and eaſy to be intreated; to bear one another's burdens; to condeſcend to thoſe that are weak; to become all things to all men; not to pleaſe our ſelves, but every one of us to pleaſe his neighbour for his good to edification, to put away all bitterneſs and evil ſpeaking, and wrath and anger and clamour, to be patient towards all men, in meekneſs inſtructing thoſe who oppoſe themſelves. I might mention many more places throughout the New Teſtament.

The author of which, Chriſt Jeſus, was our great pattern in this virtue: God himſelf propoſes himſelf to our imitation under this character. Good God! If there could have been in him thoſe paſſions that men expreſs to one another; if he had been ſo extreme and rigorous on every default and ſin of ours; if he had not known how to forgive out of his infinite patience and long-ſuffering; if he could not have paſſed by and been ready to pardon and forget greater offences than we poor creatures, can commit againſt one another; if that ſentence which his juſtice could have executed; if Chriſt Jeſus, though greater than any are, could not have humbled himſelf lower than any man will, and have condeſcended from the throne of his glory, to have took on him ſinful fleſh, and to have died for us, even when we were enemies to him; where had we now been? 'Twas well we fell into the hands of God, and not into the hands of men.

Critical and Explanatory ANNOTATIONS,

ON THE

Epiſtle of PAUL the APOSTLE,

TO THE COLOSSIANS.

The INTRODUCTION.

Coloſſe was a Town in Phrygia the greater. Some believe that Paul had never been at this place, though it is certain he preached in Phrygia; but that theſe citizens were converted to the faith by Epaphras their Biſhop, whom Paul had ſent thither. See Hierom ad Philemon, ver. 22. Chryſoſtom, Theophylus, Athanaſius, in Synopſ. Eſtius, &c. Acts xviii. 23. and Col. i. 7.

Paul having been informed that there had been falſe apoſtles at Coloſſe, who had preached the neceſſity of circumciſion and other legal obſervances, and out of a miſtaken humility, had recommended the ſuperſtitious worſhip of Angels, telling the people there, that they were to addreſs not to God, the Father of Jeſus Chriſt, but to the Angels, who were mediators between God and man: The Apoſtle, I ſay, being informed of all this either by Epaphras, who was then a priſoner with him at Rome, or by a letter from the Laodiceans, wrote the Epiſtle to them, which we now have, wherein he inſiſts upon Jeſus Chriſt, being the only mediator of Chriſtians; the reconciler of mankind with God, and the head of the Church, from whom all his members receive action, ſenſe, life and ſpirit. He attacks the falſe apoſtles, and with great ſolidity confutes their doctrine, concerning the obligation of obſerving circumciſion and the legal ceremonies, and afterwards delivered leſſons to them of the moſt excellent and ſublime morality. For,

Having cautioned them to avoid all Jewiſh and Heathen ordinances to the end of the ſecond chapter, he afterwards ſtirs them up, as before he had done the Epheſians, to a true Chriſtian behaviour, by avoiding thoſe their old Heatheniſh ſins, which are contrary to a Chriſtian profeſſion, and labouring after ſuch holy diſpoſitions, as are agreeable to the Goſpel of Chriſt, and alſo by performing the duties of their ſeveral relations, as husbands and wives, parents and children, maſters and ſervants. And then concludes with an exhortation to earneſt and conſtant prayer, and with ſome particular ſalutations.

It is ſaid, that the Apoſtle was now a priſoner at Rome, and therefore it muſt have been in or about the year of Chriſt 62, at which time he had with him Epaphras, Timothy, Ariſtarchus, Marcus, Luke, Demas, and Jeſus or Joſhua, ſirnamed Juſtus.

The letter was carried to the Coloſſians by Tychicus, his faithful miniſter, and Oneſimus, whom Philemon had ſent to attend him in his confinement.

Several Greek copies, ſays the learned and judicious Calmet, read Colaſſæ, inſtead of Coloſſæ, and ſome criticks prefer the former to the latter. But the Latin copies in general, have it Coloſſæ.

There have been ſome Greek, as well as Latin authors, as Suidas, Zonoras, Glycus, Euſtat. Munſter and Calepin, who have been of opinion, that this Epiſtle was written to the faithful of Rhodes, a city famous for the Coloſſus of the ſun, which was a brazen ſtatue of ſuch a prodigious height, that ſhips under full ſail might paſs between its legs, being ſeventy cubits, or an hundred and five feet high, conſecrated to Apollo or the ſun, caſt by Chares, who was twelve years in making of it, at the charge of king Demetrius. It was begun in the year of the world 3700, and overthrown by an earthquake ſixty years after it had been erected. And it continued thus broken down till the year of Chriſt 672, when Moravius, ſixth Caliph of the Saracens, having taken Rhodes, ſold the braſs of this Coloſſus to a Jewiſh merchant, weighing about 720000 pounds weight.

I. It may be obſerved in this Epiſtle, the Apoſtle again very evidently explains himſelf concerning the caſe of obſerving days, and declares he means the Jewiſh ordinances of new moons, and ſabbath-days, &c. which were a ſhadow of things under the Goſpel, ch. ii. 16, 17. See my Diſſertations before on theſe ſubjects.

II. That the idolatry of worſhipping Angels under pretence of humility towards the Great God, was the doctrine of the worſt of hereticks, who did not hold the head; that is, were not true members of Chriſt's Body, the Church, ch. ii. 18, 19.

III. The fault, for which the Apoſtle checks ſome of the Coloſſians, in being ſubject to ordinances and commandments, and doctrines of men, and going back to the rudiments of the world, and the like, was their ſubjection to the Jewiſh ordinances ſo often mentioned before; and the doctrine and diſcipline of ſome Heathen philoſophers, and conceited hereticks, who pretended to a more perfect way, and ſtricter abſtinence than ordinary. This was not intended to diſparage government and ſubjection to the Chriſtian Church, or a compliance to what is decent, and for edification, ch. ii. 20, 21. Nor,

IV. Doth the Apoſtle condemn philoſophy, ver. 8. and human learning as conſidered in it ſelf; foraſmuch as it is the great improver of our reaſon, and that which teaches us the knowledge of God and of virtue, as far as that ariſes from the nature of things; inſomuch that ſound philoſophy was, in the primitive times often the foundation of Chriſtianity, as in Juſtin Martyr, and others, and was with great ſucceſs made uſe of by the ancients in defending the cauſe of Chriſt, and convincing its gain-ſayers. Beſides,

Whoever is acquainted with the Apoſtle's education and accompliſhments, cannot imagine he would ſpeak any thing to the diſparagement of true and ſound philoſophy, which is the guide of our faculties, the great improver of our reaſon, the main conduct of all rational and conſiderate minds, and that which teacheth us the knowledge of God as it ariſes from the nature of things in the world. To Moſes's honour it is recorded by Luke, and related by the holy martyr Stephen, (in which he was directed by the Holy Ghoſt) that he was learned in all the wiſdom of the Egyptians, Acts vii. 22. bred up in their myſtick hieroglyphicks, and acquainted with the natural magick of their wiſe men. And therefore, though it is one of the documents of a Jewiſh Rabbi to his diſciples, Suffer not your children to learn logick. See R. Judah Ben. Benera. And though ſome of the Chriſtian Fathers have ſpoken freely againſt logick and philoſophy, (and particularly Ambroſe on the 118th Pſalm is taken notice of for his nihil nobis cum Philoſophia) becauſe they, Tertullian, Auguſtin, Greg. Nyſſen. & Nazianzen, Baſil, obſerved, that a ſophiſtical way of reaſoning and logick was made uſe of by Hereticks, and becauſe the ſtudy of philoſophy had introduced innumerable contentions and quarrels, as alſo becauſe it ſometimes meddled with and encroached upon divinity, (for which cauſe a learned Father, Greg. Naz. Orat. de modo in diſput. gives no better name to philoſophy, than that of Egyptian plagues, and another, Auguſtin. de conv. decem Præcept. c. 2. calls them the Egyptian frogs that have crept into the Church;) though, I ſay, for theſe reaſons the Fathers ſometimes thus inveighed againſt logick and philoſophy; yet at other times they ſhew the uſefulneſs and neceſſity of both, and that the ſophiſtries of Hereticks cannot be confuted without them. Clemens of Alexandria, Strom. l. 1. proves that philoſophy and human arts are from God, and are uſeful in divinity. It is not abſurd, he ſaith, Strom. l. 6. to aſſert that philoſophy is the gift of Divine Providence, and was deſigned to prepare men for the perfect doctrine of the Goſpel. Accordingly he tells us that philoſophy was given to the Greeks to be the foundation of Chriſtianity. As the Law and the Prophets were to the Jews, ſo (ſaith he, Strom. l. 7.) was philoſophy to the Greeks, viz. to fit and diſpoſe them for the preaching of the Goſpel, to purge and prepare their ſouls for the reception of the Chriſtian Faith. A proof of this we have in that great and learned Platoniſt, Juſtin Martyr, who, in his Apology for the Chriſtians, acquaints us, that by reading a ſentence in Plato's works, he was excited to leave Paganiſm, and to embrace Chriſtianity. Theodoret, another Greek Father, in that known treatiſe of his wherein he addreſſes himſelf to the Grecians, makes it evident to them that the Evangelical Truth is conſonant to and may be confirmed by the Gentile philoſophy in ſome parts of it. Jerom, a Latin Father, although once in a dream he thought he was beaten for reading Tully, and ſuch like authors; yet in his epiſtle to Magnus, a Roman orator, after he had ſhewed what allowance human learning hath in Sacred Scripture, ſets down in order the Fathers who made uſe of the writings of the Gentiles in confuting their errors: And in his 84th epiſtle, he gives an account why he himſelf in his writings made uſe of ſecular learning. And as I related before, how Juſtin was guided to Chriſtianity by a ſentence in his Maſter Plato, ſo you may be certified from Auguſtin himſelf, in confeſſion. l. 8. c. 7. that he was very much helped forward toward embracing the Chriſtian Faith, by reading one of Tully's (that great and learned philoſopher's) dialogues, which is put out in Hortenſius's name.

Theſe things, thus alledged, repreſent to us the uſefulneſs and ſerviceableneſs of true and ſober philoſophy. This certainly, as I ſaid above, is a great help to religion, yea, a part of it. For, a philoſopher (as Tully, De Oratore 1. defines him, and not amiſs) is one that enquires into, and is acquainted with the nature and cauſes of all things relating to God and man, i. e. ſo far as natural reaſon will conduct him, and he is one that both knows and purſues all the ways of living well. Or take the deſcription of the rectified philoſophy in the words of Maximus Tyrius, It is, ſaith he, Diſſertat. 15. ſuch an accurate knowledge of Divine and human things as leads to virtue, and conduceth to excellent reaſonings, and cauſes a melody and apt proportion in a man's life, and teacheth us moderation and right conduct of our manners. Hierocles is ſhort, but very full.

Philoſophy is the purgation and perfection of man's life. This clears the mind of pollution, this enlightens and conſummates human nature: This I may call the Urim and Thummim of the Heathen moraliſts, the light and perfection which they attained to. Philo's definition of philoſophy agrees with this, but advanceth it yet higher, It is that, ſaith he, De Opif. Mundi, by which man, though he be mortal, attains to immortality. And that is a high flight of Cicero, who, as it were, ſpeaking to philoſophy, ſaith thus, One ſingle day, well ſpent in the obſervance of thy dictates and rules, is to be preferred before an eternity of living after the vicious way of the world, Tuſc. qu. 2. But if we ſhould ſpeak moderately, certainly what the Apoſtle ſaith of the law, is the leaſt that can be ſaid of true philoſophy, viz It is good if a man uſe it lawfully. It may be ſerviceable to excellent ends and purpoſes, if it be rightly made uſe of, and in a way ſubordinate to the revealed truth of Scripture.

We may be aſſured thereof, that Paul here condemns not philoſophy and human learning as they are conſidered in themſelves, but only with reſpect to the abuſe and corruption of them. Paul himſelf was bred up firſt at Tarſus, a noted ſchool of learning, and afterwards ſat at the feet of a famous doctor of the law, who was nephew of Hillel prince of the Sanhedrim, and was (if we may credit our learned antiquary) created by him a Jewiſh elder, and a member of that venerable council. He was the greateſt maſter of logick and reaſon of all the Apoſtles, a profound and accurate diſputant, and one no leſs ſeen in the Syriack, Greek, and Latin tongues, than in the Hebrew Traditions and Jewiſh Conſtitutions. His citing of the Greek Poets aſſures us of his skill in that ſort of learning. And who now will believe that he wholly neglected the Philoſophers? None ſurely who conſiders that he was ſignally called to be the Apoſtle of the Gentiles, and that he chiefly repaired to thoſe countries where there was the greateſt number of theſe, (as Peter moſt of all applied himſelf to the Jews) our Apoſtle being the fitteſt perſon to preach to them who were profeſſors of reaſon, and all lovers of arts and ingenuity: Among theſe he would by no means inveigh againſt Philoſophy as it was pure and innocent; but finding it to be miſerably corrupted and perverted, and to have eſpouſed many fond and abſurd principles, and to have abetted many undue practices, there was reaſon he ſhould declare againſt it. And indeed this corruption had been of a long date, inſomuch that in the days of the Aſmonæans it was decreed, ſee Grotius in locum. That that parent ſhould be pronounced accurſed, who taught his ſon the Philoſophy of the Greeks. Now if the Jews thought it would corrupt and debauch their children, it is no wonder that Paul ſaw it would be injurious to the Chriſtian Proſelytes, and undermine the principles of the Goſpel. Yea, it is very probable, that at this time when the Apoſtle writ to the Coloſſians, the Chriſtians began to mix their Chriſtian Divinity with the ſubtilties of Philoſopy, and ſo to corrupt the myſteries of Chriſtianity with thoſe ſophiſtries, and by that means to bring in hereſies. Thereupon the Apoſtle remonſtrates againſt this abuſe of Philoſophy, as a thing of very dangerous conſequence, ſuch as would pervert the minds of Chriſtians, and prove hazardous even to Chriſtianity itſelf. Wherefore he warns his Chriſtian converts of Coloſs againſt this corrupt way of Philoſophizing. Beware, ſaith he, leſt any man ſpoil you through Philoſophy and vain deceit.

Obſerve the Apoſtle's manner of expreſſing himſelf, "Leſt any man ſpoil you." The Greek word συλαγωγεῖν is a military term, and ſometimes is uſed in the imperial laws, particularly concerning repriſals. More generally it ſignifies prædam abigere, to carry off the prey or booty, either at land or ſea. The Apoſtle then doth very emphatically expreſs his meaning, when he ſaith, "Beware leſt any one ſpoil you," i. e. take from you by force, prey upon you, make a prize of you, rob you of your Chriſtianity through philoſophy and vain deceit, i. e. through the vain deceit of philoſophy, or the philoſophy which is both vain and deceitful. This is a common figure, not only uſed by our Apoſtle, but by other accurate writers. The Apoſtle here tells us the riſe of the Grecian philoſophy, which was ſo vain and deceitful. It is after the tradition of men, i. e. It is the reſult of human wit only, it is the mere inſtitution of man, and hath nothing Divine and heavenly, i. e. of ſupernatural revelation in it: And therefore this clauſe cannot be underſtood (as it is by moſt expoſitors) of the legal and Moſaical ceremonies, which we know were inſtituted by God himſelf. The Apoſtle adds, That it is after the rudiments of the world, i. e. It is a mere doting on the cuſtom and preſcription of the men of the world: It is an adhering to the opinions of the chief part of mankind, who are pleaſed with the philoſophy as well as the religion of their country. It is true, the rudiments of the world, in 2 Cor. ii. 20. and in Gal. iv. 3. are the ceremonial law, which was as the firſt rudiments or alphabet in which the world was inſtructed at firſt, and trained up, and taught a religion, which was to make way for a more perfect one. Or the Jewiſh rites and ceremonies are called the elements, or rudiments of the world, ſaith Grotius, in Gal. iv. 3. becauſe the chief of thoſe ceremonies, viz. Temples, altars, ſacrifices, firſt-fruits, &c. were common to all the world. But though the rudiments of the world are to be underſtood in thoſe forenamed places of the Jewiſh ceremonies, yet it doth not follow thence that thoſe expreſſions are to be underſtood ſo here; for the ſame words may be diverſly taken, according to the different matter they are applied to. It is probable that the rudiments of this world, mentioned in the 20th and 22d verſes of this chapter, are meant of the upſtart doctrines of ſome heretical Chriſtians. If ye be dead with Chriſt from the rudiments of the world, (i. e. if you have no regard to errors and falſe opinions which worldly men hold in oppoſition to Chriſt's doctrine) Why do ye dogmatize, ſo it is in the Greek, after the commandments and doctrines of men? The Moſaical ordinances ſeem not to be intended here, as our tranſlators import, for the things which the Apoſtle ſpeaks of are doctrines of men. This cannot be applied to the ordinances and rites appointed by God from Heaven, as the Judaical ceremonies were. Therefore the rudiments of the world here, are the inventions of worldy-minded hereticks, who were at that time crept into the Church; and the Apoſtle ſmartly demands of the Coloſſians, Why ſome among them did ſo ſtifly and dogmatically adhere to the opinions of thoſe ſeducers, who bid them touch not, taſte not, handle not? i. e. ſuperſtitiouſly forbad them to eat certain meats, and perſuaded them to abſtain from marriage as a thing unlawful.

And as heritical opinions are referred to in this place, ſo ſomething elſe may be meant by the rudiments of the world, they may refer to the philoſophy juſt before mentioned, the Apoſtle ſeeming to allude to the ϛοιχεῖα τȣ͂ κόσμȣ, the four elements of the world, thoſe ſimple bodies of which all mundane things conſiſt, and which are generally the ſubject of philoſophers. And thus the word ϛοιχεῖα is taken in Wiſd. vii. 17. where you read that Wiſdom teacheth men the knowledge of the σύϛασις κόσμȣ κ̀ ἐνέργεια Στοιχεῖων, the compoſition of the world, and the operation of the elements. It is likely then that the Apoſtle hath an eye here to the mundane philoſophy, or to the philoſophers who doted on the ſeveral elements, as Thales on water, another on fire, and the reſt on the other elements, as the firſt principles of all things.

Thus you ſee how reaſonable it is to apply the rudiments of the world to the Philoſophy here ſpoken of, and not to the Moſaical ceremonies, as expoſitors generally have done. So that ancient and learned Father Clemens Alexandrinus declares that Philoſophy, and the rudiments of the world, are in this place the ſame. But he gives this reaſon why the Apoſtle calls it the elements of the world, viz. becauſe it teacheth the firſt elements, and is but a preparatory diſcipline to truth. Theſe firſt rudiments and elements are weak and beggarly, as the Apoſtle ſaith of the Jewiſh inſtitutions; they are weak, becauſe they cannot throughly purge the ſoul of vice, and teach it to maſter its evil habits: They are poor and beggarly, becauſe they cannot enrich the ſoul with any of thoſe graces which are requiſite to eternal happineſs. In this reſpect they are not after Chriſt, as 'tis ſaid here, i. e. they are not like the excellent doctrine of Chriſt which was from Heaven, and is ever accompanied with extraordinary efficacy; ſee the notes on ch. ii. 8.

V. To this purpoſe, beſides the medley of Judaiſm and Paganiſm, which was one effect of the vain philoſophy of ſome hereticks of thoſe times, mentioned in the eleventh chapter, we may here reflect upon ſome other traditions of men, and rudiments of this world; which might occaſion Paul to caution the Chriſtians to beware of them. For we read in Acts xvii. 16. of two eminent ſects of philoſophers, as the Epicureans and Stoicks, who encountred Paul. Now the Epicureans taught that the world was made by chance, and a caſual concourſe of atoms, which are ſmall particles of matter; that there was no providence of God, who would not trouble himſelf with men and their affairs, that happineſs conſiſted in ſenſual pleaſures; that there was no future exiſtence of ſouls, nor any life after this. And the Stoicks pretended a fatal and irrevocable neceſſity of actions and things, and that good was not to be done for a reward. See my obſervations in the Introduction to the 1 Cor.

VI. We, as Chriſtians, are bound in duty to obſerve thoſe ſeveral relative duties mentioned in the third chapter, ver. 18, &c.

CHAP.

CHAP. I.

1 After ſalutation he thanketh God for their faith, 7 confirmeth the doctrine of Epaphras, 9 Prayeth further for their increaſe in grace, 14 deſcribeth the true Chriſt, 21 encourageth them to receive Jeſus Chriſt, and commendeth his own miniſtry.

PAUL an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, by the will of God, and Timotheus our brother,

2 To the ſaints and faithful brethren in Chriſt, which are at Coloſſe: Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

3 We give thanks to God, and the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, praying always for you:

4 Since we heard of your faith in Chriſt Jeſus, and of the love which ye have to all the ſaints;

5 For the hope which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the goſpel:

6 Which is come unto, as it is in all the world, and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth alſo in you, ſince the day ye heard of it, and knew the grace of God in truth.

7 As ye alſo learned of Epaphras our dear fellow-ſervant, who is for you a faithful miniſter of Chriſt;

8 Who alſo declared unto us your love in the Spirit.

9 For this cauſe we alſo, ſince the day we heard it, do not ceaſe to pray for you, and to deſire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will, in all wiſdom and ſpiritual underſtanding:

10 That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleaſing, being fruitful in every good work, and increaſing in the knowledge of God;

11 Strengthened with all might, according to his glorious power, unto all patience and long-ſuffering with joyfulneſs;

12 Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the ſaints in light:

13 Who hath delivered us from the power of darkneſs, and hath tranſlated us into the kingdom of his dear Son:

14 In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveneſs of ſins.

15 Who is the image of the inviſible God, the firſt-born of every creature:

16 For by him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, viſible and inviſible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him.

17 And he is before all things, and by him all things conſiſt.

18 And he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the firſt-born from the dead; that in all things he might have the preeminence.

19 For it pleaſed the Father, that in him ſhould all fulneſs dwell;

20 And (having made peace through the blood of his croſs) by him to reconcile all things unto himſelf, by him, I ſay, whethey they be things in earth, or things in heaven.

21 And you that were ſometime alienated, and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled,

22 In the body of his fleſh through death, to preſent you holy and unblameable, and unreproveable in his ſight:

23 If ye continue in the faith, grounded and ſettled, and be not moved away from the hope of the goſpel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a miniſter.

24 Who now rejoyce in my ſufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Chriſt in my fleſh, for his bodies ſake, which is the church:

25 Whereof I am made a miniſter according to the diſpenſation of God, which is given to me for you, to fulfil the word of God;

26 Even the myſtery which hath been hid from ages, and from generations, but now is made manifeſt to his ſaints:

27 To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this myſtery among the Gentiles; which is Chriſt in you, the hope of glory:

28 Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wiſdom; that we may preſent every man perfect in Chriſt Jeſus:

29 Whereunto I alſo labour, ſtriving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily.

This chapter contains,

I. A preface to the whole Epiſtle, ver. 1, 2. and after the Apoſtle has congratulated them, ver. 3. he ſhews them the ground of his rejoicing with them, even their faith and love, ver. 4. amplified by the moving cauſe, engaging them to the exerciſe of thoſe graces, viz. the hope for reward; amplified (1.) By the means whereby they came to the knowledge of this reward, viz. the Goſpel, ver. 5. which he commands or deſcribes; in that the Goſpel preached to them by Epaphras, was the ſame which was preached throughout the world by the Apoſtles, and it had been ſucceſsful among them to the bringing forth of good fruit, which fruit was conſtant, ver. 6. (2.) The means of conveying the Goſpel to them; Epaphras, whom he commends both from his relation to Paul; his office and faithfulneſs in it, and from his reſpect to them, evidenced by the good report he gave of them to Paul, ver. 8. And, (3.) By his prayer for them, ver. 9, 10, 11.

II. A ſhort ſum of Chriſtian doctrine, (by way of thankſgiving) wherein we read of the ſaving benefits beſtowed upon us by the Father, ver. 12, 13. and by the Son, ver. 14. whom he deſcribes by his internal relation to God, and his external relation to the whole world, as the firſtborn of all creatures, ver. 15. the creator of all things, the laſt end of all, and upholder of all, ver. 16, 17. And then by his myſtical relation to the whole Church in general, as her head; and the promoter of all her members both to a ſtate of grace and glory. Amplified by the conſequence thereof, his preheminence; ver, 18. and by the reaſon why theſe royal dignities and prerogatives were conferred on Chriſt, viz. the Father's good pleaſure; amplified by the object of his good pleaſure, Chriſt's fulneſs, ver. 19. and the work of reconciliation, ſhewing the means whereby it was effected, the blood of Chriſt, and the perſons reconciled, ver. 20. And finally by his relation to the Church of the Coloſſians in particular; ſhewing their miſery without Chriſt, from which they have been delivered by the death of Chriſt, ver. 21. and would ſave them, if they took care to perſevere in the faith, ver. 22.

III. An exhortation to this duty of perſeverance, wherein the duty enjoined is laid down. And

(1.) The manner which is firſt expreſſed affirmatively, grounded and ſettled, and then negatively, not moved.

(2.) The object, the hope of the Goſpel, deſcribed by their embracing it, and the univerſal publication thereof. Then,

The Apoſtle endeavours to inforce it with many arguments drawn from Paul's employment in it, ver. 23. from his ſufferings, ver. 24. his call to the miniſtry, and diſpenſation of the Goſpel, ver. 25. the excellency thereof, ver. 26. and of Chriſt, the ſubject of the Goſpel, ver. 27. the end of preaching the Goſpel, ver. 28. and from the great pains he took to bring about this end, ver. 29.

Ver. 2. — To the ſaints.] All thoſe, who perſevered in the faith of Chriſt; ſee the notes on ver. 12.

— At Coloſſe.] See the beginning of the introduction.

Ver. 12. Give thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the ſaints in light.] This text puts us upon the enquiry what kind of perſons they are, who are or ſhall be happy in the other world. And therefore,

Let it be obſerved, they who live happily in the other world, are in this text called Saints. Heaven is the inheritance of the ſaints, of all the ſaints, and of them only. It is proper and peculiar to them, ſo that none elſe have any right or title to it, nor can ever have any part or portion in it. And that there is ſuch a company and ſociety of men in the world, which are truly called ſaints, cannot be denied by any Chriſtian; it being one of the articles of our Creed, wherein we profeſs to believe, there is a communion of ſaints. And unleſs we be of that communion, we can never partake of the inheritance of the ſaints.

But the great queſtion is, what it is to be a ſaint? Or who may be truly or properly called ſaints, men of holineſs, or holy men, as the word ſignifies? But this we can never fully underſtand, unleſs we firſt ſtate the true notion of ſanctity or holineſs, from whence they are ſo called. Now holineſs or ſanctity in its higheſt perfection, is one of the perfections of God himſelf, who often calls himſelf the Holy One of Iſrael, Pſal. lxxxix. 35. And ſometimes abſolutely, the Holy One, Amos iv. 2. And as he ſometimes ſwears by himſelf, at other times he ſwears by his holineſs: Whereby he gives us to underſtand, that he himſelf is holineſs, or, which is all one, holineſs is himſelf his own Divine Nature or Eſſence. And that is the reaſon why they who partake of his holineſs, are ſaid to partake of his Divine Nature; Heb. xii. 10. 2 Pet. i. 4.

And hence it is, that when the holy Angels would celebrate the praiſes of the moſt High God in the higheſt manner they can, they cry, Holy, Holy, Holy, is the Lord of Hoſts, the whole earth is full of his glory, Iſa. vi. 3. Rev. iv. 8. And hence alſo it is, that when God deſigned to make man after his own image, as like him as a creature could be, he made him perfectly holy. And now that this image is defaced in us, if it be reſtored again to any man, ſo that he becomes a new man, he is ſaid to be created after God, that is, after the likeneſs of God, in righteouſneſs and true holineſs, Eph. iv. 24. So that this is the great perfection wherein we were at firſt made, and ought again to become like to God our Maker, who therefore commands us to be holy, as he is holy. As he who hath called you is holy, ſo be ye holy in all manner of converſation, 1 Pet. i. 15. From whence it appears, that though we cannot be holy in the ſame meaſure as God is, who is ſo without and beyond all meaſure; yet we ſhould be ſo after the ſame manner as he is, or rather our holineſs ſhould be of the ſame kind or nature with his, and as like it, as it is poſſible for it to be.

Hence therefore as holineſs, when attributed to God, denotes the purity and excellency of his Divine Nature, whereby he is exalted above all things elſe: So when attributed to men, it ſignifies the purity and excellency of their nature, whereby they are refined and raiſed above the reſt of mankind. This the Apoſtle teacheth us, where he oppoſeth holineſs to uncleanneſs, ſaying, God hath not called us unto uncleanneſs, but unto holineſs, 1 Theſſ. iv. 7. Pſal. xvi. 3. And David, where he calls the ſaints that are upon earth the excellent; implying that ſaints as ſuch, excel all other perſons, by reaſon of their holineſs, that is the higheſt excellency which their nature is capable of. Which therefore doth not conſiſt in any particular acts or habits either of the ſoul or body, or both together, but in the rectitude or due temperament of our nature in general. And indeed holineſs, properly ſo called, is nothing elſe, but that pure and excellent frame or diſpoſition of the whole man, whereby all the faculties of the ſoul and members of the body, are reduced to their primitive conſtitution, and become ſuch as God at firſt made, and would ſtill have them to be; exerting themſelves in their reſpective places and offices, according to thoſe rules which he hath ſet them ſo that to our perfecting holineſs, as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, in the fear of God, there is required a right and clear underſtanding, a ſound judgment, a pure heart, an obedient will, a good conſcience, and regular affections, placed every one upon its proper objects in a due manner. And whereſoever the ſoul, if I may ſo ſpeak, is thus all of a piece, all over ſuch as God would have it to be, and ſo agreeable to his Divine Will, there is true holineſs, and ſuch a one may be truly ſaid to be holy, yea, to be holy as God is holy, as being pure and excellent according to his finite capacity, as God himſelf is in his infinite perfections. Now,

The true notion of holineſs or ſanctity being thus briefly ſtated, we may eaſily underſtand what kind of perſons thoſe be, which are here called ſaints. For in order to a man's being a true ſaint, he muſt firſt have ſo much knowledge of God and Chriſt, as is neceſſary to the poſſeſſing of his mind with a due ſenſe of his Divine Majeſty, and with right apprehenſions of the great myſtery of our ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt. He muſt have a ſound judgment in all things, eſpecially in the fundamental articles of the Chriſtian Faith, and in all the neceſſary duties required in the Goſpel. He muſt have a pure and ſincere heart, in believing all thoſe articles as revealed, and in performing all ſuch duties as required by God. He muſt have a good conſcience, and a conſcience void of all offence both towards God and towards men. He muſt have a pliable and obedient will, ready upon all occaſions to chuſe whatſoever his underſtanding rightly inform'd, dictates to be good, and to refuſe whatſoever he apprehends to be evil. He muſt keep his affections all in their proper order, fixed conſtantly upon ſuch objects which they were at firſt fitted and deſigned for. He muſt hate, abhor, and ſhun all manner of ſin, upon that account only becauſe it is ſin, or the tranſgreſſion of God's Law, and be heartily troubled that he was ever guilty of it. He muſt love God with all his heart and ſoul, and ſo above all things in the world beſides. He muſt bear no grudge, hatred, malice, or ill-will againſt any perſon upon earth, but love his neighbour as himſelf. He muſt hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſs, and deſire nothing ſo much as to ſerve and pleaſe God, and ſo to have his love and favour, whatſoever it coſts him. He muſt not fear them which can kill the body, but him only who is able to deſtroy both ſoul and body in Hell. He muſt truſt in the Lord with all his heart, and ſupport himſelf under all the circumſtances and occurrences of this life, with an humble confidence of his goodneſs and mercy in Jeſus Chriſt. He muſt rejoyce in the Lord always, both when he hath, and when he hath not any thing elſe to rejoyce in. He muſt be ſober and temperate, meek and humble, gentle and peaceable, faithful to his word, true to his friend, loving to his enemy, charitable to the poor, kind and merciful, and juſt to all. In brief, he muſt be (1 Cor. xv. 58.) ſtedfaſt, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; as knowing that his labour is not in vain in the Lord.

And that he may be ſure of. For he who hath attained to ſuch an excellent temper as this is, is certainly a real and true ſaint, and therefore ſhall as certainly partake of that tranſcendent happineſs, which is here called, The inheritance of the ſaints in light. It is called an inheritance, or, as the word ſignifies alſo, a lot, in alluſion to that type of Heaven, the land of Canaan, which was divided among all the children of Iſrael by lot, and is all along in the Old Teſtament called their inheritance. And ſo certainly is Heaven in a proper and literal ſenſe, the inheritance of the ſaints. For they being all regenerate and born again of God, are properly his children; and as the Apoſtle rightly argues, Rom. viii. 17. If children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Chriſt. So that all the ſaints or ſons of God, in whatſoever age or place they were born again from the beginning to the end of the world, they are all co-heirs, and ſo have an equal right and title to this inheritance; not only to ſome part of it, but to the whole, and all and every one of them equally poſſeſs it all. It is not like an earthly inheritance, that is divided among the co-heirs, ſome taking one part of it, and ſome another: But every one that hath any ſhare in this heavenly inheritance, enjoy it all himſelf, as much as if he was the ſole heir, and there was none elſe to partake of it but himſelf.

Neither are the ſaints joint-heirs only with one another, but, as the Apoſtle there ſpeaks, with Chriſt himſelf alſo. And if ſo, their inheritance muſt needs be very large; for (Heb. i. 2.) Chriſt is appointed Heir of all things. And if they be joint-heirs with him, as be ſure they are, every one of them muſt inherit all things too as he doth. And ſo be ſure they do. For God himſelf aſſerts it, ſaying, He that overcometh, ſhall inherit all things: And I will be his God, and he ſhall be my ſon, Rev. xxi. 7. Where we may obſerve both the vaſt extent of this inheritance of the ſaints, and likewiſe the reaſon of it. As to its extent, it is not confined to a pariſh, or county, or kingdom upon earth, no, not the whole earth, nor to the moon nor ſun, nor to any ſtar, nor to all the ſtars of Heaven, nor to the whole Heavens where they are, nor yet to the greateſt part of the Creation, but extends it ſelf to the whole. For they inherit all things; all things that are good or amiable, all things that are pleaſing or delightſome, all things that are neceſſary or convenient for them. All things they can deſire or hope for, all things they can love or take comfort in, all things that can any way contribute to their happineſs: As all things in the whole world ſhall do one way or other.

For even while they are upon earth, all things work together for their good, how much more when they come to Heaven? Where they ſhall clearly ſee, how all things that ever happened to them through the whole courſe of their lives, concurred to bring them thither: And ſo will be matter of joy and comfort to them when they are there. By which means, they will then take pleaſure, not only in all the devotions, alms, and good works they ever performed, but likewiſe in all the loſſes, croſſes, and diſappointments, pains, ſickneſſes, and troubles of all ſorts that ever befel them. Yea, and in all things that God ever made, or did, or ſuffered to be done in the world. For all things are theirs, even while they are here below, as Paul aſſures the ſaints at Corinth, ſaying, 1 Cor. iii. 21, 22. All things are yours; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things preſent, or things to come, all are yours. All things are ſettled upon them at their new-birth, and when they come to full age, that is, as ſoon as they get to heaven, they will have the actual poſſeſſion of all things, and then muſt needs enjoy whatſoever any thing in the world can afford them. And what is there in the world, but what affords the ſaints in Heaven ſomething to delight and pleaſe them? The Heaven of heavens affords them moſt commodious and pleaſant manſions. All the Holy Angels there afford them their moſt agreeable company and converſation. All the devils and damned in hell afford them matter of praiſe and thankfulneſs to God, that they are not there. All the glorious lights in the firmament, afford them a moſt delicious proſpect. In ſhort, all the animals, and plants, and earths, and ſtones, and metals, and mineral, and whatſoever elſe God ever made, either in Heaven or earth, afford them a clear and perfect view of his Divine Perfections, which cannot but affect their hearts with the higheſt tranſports of joy and wonder.

Thus doth every ſaint in Heaven inherit all things. All things are his. And it is no marvel, for God himſelf is his; as it follows in the place before quoted, He ſhall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he ſhall be my Son. He ſhall be my Son, That's the reaſon he is an heir: I will be his God, that's the reaſon that he inherits all things. For he who hath him that hath all things, cannot but have all things in him. Yea, infinitely more than all things elſe; all things that God hath made being in a manner nothing in compariſon of him that made them. Who therefore to complete the happineſs of his ſaints, doth not only give them all he hath, but even himſelf too; ſaying, I will be their God, or rather, as the words ſignify, I will be God to them. By virtue of which promiſe they enjoy not only whatſoever God hath made or done, but likewiſe whatſoever he is, even all thoſe infinite, eternal, incomprehenſible perfections which are concentred in him.

But here I muſt confeſs my ſelf at a loſs, not knowing how to conceive, much leſs to expreſs either how the ſaints in Heaven enjoy God, or how great an happineſs that is to them? Only in general we know they ſee God face to face, as not only Paul, 1 Cor. xiii. 12. but likewiſe John acquaints us, ſaying, 1 John xxxii. Beloved, now we are the Sons of God: And it doth not yet appear what we ſhall be. But we know that when he ſhall appear, we ſhall be like him, for we ſhall ſee him as he is.

From whence it is evident, that they ſee God, not only as manifeſting himſelf in his creatures, but as he is in himſelf. Which bleſſed ſight muſt needs fill them with the higheſt joys their finite nature is able to bear. To ſee wiſdom, and power, and greatneſs, and goodneſs, and juſtice, and mercy, and immenſity, and eternity; to ſee the Lord of Hoſts, the chiefeſt, the only Good; to ſee God himſelf, unavailing himſelf, and ſhining forth in all his glory before them; yea, to ſee him ſmiling, as it were, upon them, rejoicing over them, meaning himſelf as well-pleaſed with them! Who is able to conceive how much their bleſſed ſouls are affected, delighted, tranſported with this bleſſed ſight? None certainly but only they that have it. They know, yea, they feel it to be the greateſt, the only perfect happineſs they can poſſibly enjoy. And that all things elſe could never ſatisfy their deſires and ſo make them happy, without this: Whereas this would do it without all things elſe. It being impoſſible for them to deſire any thing, but what they have in God, infinite goodneſs itſelf. In whom, by conſequence, all their inclinations meet as in their proper centre; and ſo their minds are always at reſt and quiet, and their ſouls full as they can hold of ſolid and ſubſtantial joy, which makes them break forth continually into praiſes and hallelujahs to Almighty God, and to the Lamb that ſitteth upon the throne, who purchaſed ſuch a glorious inheritance as this is for them, and ſettled upon them for evermore.

But how can theſe things be? How is it poſſible for the ſaints in Heaven to ſee God? To that the Apoſtle anſwers in the words before me, by calling it the inheritance of the ſaints in light. It is true, all men are born at firſt ſpiritually blind, and ſo generally live in the dark, ſeeing no more of God or any ſpiritual object, than as if there was no ſuch thing in being. But when a man is born again, his eyes are opened, and he is turned from darkneſs to light, Acts xxvi. 18. as well as from the power of Satan unto God. And therefore all ſuch are called the children of light, 1 Theſſ. v. 5. and the children of the day; becauſe they have a marvelous light, (as Peter calls it) 1 Pet. ii. 9. conſtantly ſhining in them, whereby they diſcover many glorious things which lie perfectly hid to all other mortals. By this Eliſha's ſervant, when his eyes were opened, ſaw the mountains full of horſes and chariots of fire, 2 Kings vi. 17. even a whole legion of the heavenly hoſt, round about his maſter. By this St. Stephen ſaw the heavens opened, and Chriſt ſtanding at the right hand of God, Acts vii. 55, 56. yea, by this Moſes ſaw him that is inviſible, Heb. xi. 27. God himſelf. And thus

All that are real ſaints, being the children of light, ſee more or leſs of God; at leaſt ſo much as to make them love, and deſire, and fear, and truſt on him above all things in the world. Indeed they cannot ſee his face and live, as he himſelf told Moſes: But they ſee him as Moſes did, Exod. xxxiii. 20. in his back-parts, in his works, the effects and products of his Divine Perfections. And the reaſon why they cannot ſee his face and live in this world, is becauſe they are ſtill in their imperfect ſtate, and therefore cannot poſſibly have a perfect ſight of ſo glorious a Being; or if they had, it would ſtrike them dead, for they could not poſſibly bear it; or as Job expreſſeth it, Job xxxi. 23. by reaſon of his highneſs they could not endure, ſo as to live under it. But of ſeeing God, himſelf ſaith, that no man ſhall ſee his face, and live; he thereby gives us to underſtand, that ſome ſhall ſee his face when they are dead, and departed out of this life.

And ſo queſtionleſs do all the ſaints that are in Heaven. For they live in a city, Rev. xxi. 23. which hath no need of the ſun, nor of the moon to ſhine in it: For the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof. Or as the Prophet Iſaiah words it, Iſa. lx. 19. The Lord is to them an everlaſting light. So that as the ſun is to us upon earth the fountain of all that light whereby we ſee any object here below; ſo to the ſaints that are above in Heaven, God himſelf is pleaſed to iſſue forth light immediately from himſelf, which exceeds the light of the ſun, infinitely more than that exceeds the glimmering of a gloworm. Neither doth it only ſhine, as the ſun doth, upon them, but into them, and ſo enlightens themſelves too, as well as all things that are about them. And

What is there in the world which they cannot ſee by ſuch a glorious, ſuch an infinite light as this is? By this light they ſee not only the ſuperficies, but the very ſubſtance and contexture of every creature they have a mind to look upon, as exactly as if it was perfectly anatomized and laid open before them. By this they ſee the ſeveral virtues, qualities, and operations of things here below, and the great ends and purpoſes for which they are deſigned. By this, they ſee the cauſes of the ebbing and flowing of the ſea, and other great phœnomena of nature, which ſo much puzzle philoſophy, and make it but a mere conjecture. By this, they ſee the ſecret and wonderful powers that God hath put into all animals and vegetables, of propagating their reſpective ſpecies, ſo that none of them ever did, or can ever fail to be in the world. By this, they ſee both the compoſition and the ſeveral motions of the ſun and all the other planets, as well as fixed ſtars, and what influences they have upon terreſtrial bodies. By this, they ſee the wiſe eſtabliſhment of ſecond cauſes, how they depend upon one another, and all upon the firſt. The ſight of which, and ſuch like things, muſt needs be an extraordinary pleaſure to them; by reaſon of the moſt admirable art and contrivance they obſerve in them; and alſo becauſe their faculties are by this means employed to the proper uſes, for which they were made, and to which they therefore tend. For as God made all things for the manifeſtation of his own glory, he endued men with reaſon on purpoſe, that they might behold and admire the glory of thoſe perfections, which he manifeſted in them. And

Hence it is, that (all things naturally tending to their end) all men naturally deſire to know, and many apply their minds wholly to find out ſuch things as thoſe are. And if they can but gueſs at any of them with the leaſt ſhew of reaſon, or ſo much as probability, they are mightily pleaſed with it. But what a pleaſure then muſt it be, to have a full view and proſpect of them, and of that infinite wiſdom, power, and goodneſs which appeareth in them, as the ſaints in Heaven have, by that light which ſhines upon their inheritance?

Moreover, by this light they look back upon their former lives, and ſee the ſteady hand of providence ordering and over-ruling, not only the greater occurrences, but even the leaſt circumſtances in them; and the Holy Spirit of God making ſome uſe or other of every one of them, to work them over to himſelf. By this, they ſee God's infinite love and goodneſs to his Church Militant here on earth, in all the ſtraits and difficulties he brings it into, and how good and neceſſary it is for it, that every thing ſhould be juſt as it is.

By this, they ſee the holy angels and all their fellow-citizens in the new Hieruſalem, and converſe familiarly with them, as we do with one another. By this, they ſee their ever Bleſſed Saviour, the Eternal Son of God in their nature exalted at the right hand of the Father, far above all principality and power, and might and dominion, and every name that is named in Heaven or earth. By this, they ſee all the glory which the Father hath given him, as he himſelf once prayed they might, John xvii. 4. Yea, by this, they ſee the moſt High God face to face, even as we ſee the ſun by his own light: And that too, as clearly, as fully, as perfectly as it is poſſible for creatures to do it. Which ſo refreſhes, enlivens, elevates and cheers their ſpirits, that they are always rejoicing and ſinging, and praiſing God; admiring, adoring, magnifying and giving thanks to his Almighty; all-glorious, and all-gracious Majeſty, Father Son and Holy Ghoſt, for his creating, redeeming, and ſanctifying them ſo as to bring them through the various changes and chances of this mortal life, to ſuch an inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, eternal in the Heavens, in glory, in bliſs, in light it ſelf. But,

We cannot attain to this bleſſed ſtate, till we are made meet to be partakers thereof. Therefore,

The Apoſtle here ſuppoſeth, or rather takes it for granted, that all men are not meet for it. Than which nothing can be more certain. None being meet to partake of the inheritance of the ſaints, but only they who are ſaints themſelves. God himſelf hath excluded all others from it, by his eternal and irrevocable decree, Heb. xii. 14. that without holineſs no man ſhall ſee the Lord. And indeed, none but ſaints are ſubjects capable of it. For all others being ſtill in their natural and ſinful eſtate, their minds are ſo ſtuffed with vicious and groſs humours that they cannot ſee the light; and ſo wholly inclined and bent upon ſenſual objects, that they can take no pleaſure in the joys of Heaven. But rather being altogether unclean and carnal, they have an utter averſion, if not an antipathy, againſt ſuch pure and ſpiritual delights, as being directly contrary to their corrupt nature. Inſomuch that Heaven it ſelf would ſeem more like hell than Heaven to them. The place would ſeem melancholy, the company irkſome, the work tedious, the light troubleſome, every thing uneaſy and diſagreeable; becauſe they want that principle of true grace and holineſs, which would make them ſaints, and ſo capacitate them for the enjoyment of thoſe holy pleaſures, without which a blind man may as well delight in pictures, the deaf in muſick, yea, a brute beaſt in metaphyſicks, as they in Heaven or in God himſelf.

By this therefore, we may ſee how neceſſary it is to be holy before we can be happy; pure in heart, before we can ſee God, real and true ſaints, before we can partake of their inheritance in light. And by conſequence, as ever we deſire to go to Heaven when we die, we muſt take care while we live, to get our hearts purged from all corrupt affections, our minds enlightned and our ſouls ſanctified throughout, and inclined wholly unto God, ſo as to prefer him at leaſt in ſome degree before all things elſe; that ſo we may go out of this world, rightly diſpoſed and fitted to behold the light of his countenance, and to ſolace ourſelves in it, as the higheſt object of our ſouls deſires. And then we may be ſure that our deſires ſhall be fully ſatisfied: For our ſouls will be no ſooner looſned from our bodies, but they will be immediately carried up to Heaven, and there partake of the inheritance of the ſaints in light. And at the laſt day, our bodies ſhall be united to our ſouls again, and then both in ſoul and body, we ſhall enjoy all we can deſire for evermore.

But who is ſufficient for theſe things? How can we who were born, and have lived ſo long in ſin, ever be made ſo pure and holy, as to be meet to live with ſaints and angels, with Chriſt and God himſelf in the world to come? It is, I confeſs, no eaſy matter: But howſoever it is poſſible for every one to be ſo. Nay more than that, none can fail of it, unleſs we be failing to ourſelves in our endeavours after it. As we may eaſily perceive, if we do but conſider how others have been; and ſo how we ourſelves may be ſanctified or made ſaints, if we do but ſet ourſelves in good earneſt about it.

For which end we may obſerve, that this being too great a work for us to do by our own ſtrength, the eternal Son of God himſelf was pleaſed to undertake it for us. And for that purpoſe, having taken our nature upon him, he gave himſelf for us, as to redeem us from all iniquity, ſo, Tit. ii. 14. to purify to himſelf a peculiar people, zealous of good works. And ſo he is made unto us, wiſdom as well as righteouſneſs; ſanctification as well as redemption, 1 Cor. i. 30. that as we are juſtified and redeemed from our ſins, ſo we may be made wiſe and holy through him; who is the fountain as of all the good things we do or can enjoy, ſo likewiſe of all the goodneſs and virtue we are or can be endued with. It all flows from him; who therefore tells us, John xv. 5. that without him we can do nothing. But by him, there is nothing but we can do, as Paul found by experience, ſaying, Phil. iv. 13. I can do all things through Chriſt which ſtrengthneth me.

Hence therefore, if we deſire to be made holy, we muſt apply ourſelves to Chriſt, who although he be now in heaven as to his human nature, yet he is always preſent with us here below, both in his Divine Perſon, and alſo by his Holy Spirit, and ſo is ready upon all occaſions to aſſiſt us in our endeavours after piety, and to crown them with that ſucceſs, as to make us ſincerely pious. For which purpoſe, as he ſanctified our human nature in general, by aſſuming it into his Divine Perſon; ſo he ſanctifieth our human perſons in particular, by making us partakers of his Divine Nature: Which he doth, by ſending his holy Spirit, of the ſame Divine Nature with himſelf into our hearts, which by degrees makes us alſo holy and ſpiritual, and ſo in our capacities, like unto himſelf, and partakers of his own nature.

Now the great thing which he requires of us, in order to his doing this great work for us, is, that we believe in him. For he himſelf ſaith, Acts xxvi. 18. that we are ſanctified by faith that is in him. Not by believing only his Goſpel in general to be true, but by believing particularly in himſelf, ſo as to have a ſure truſt and confidence on him, to give us ſuch illuminations and aſſiſtances of his holy Spirit, whereby we may be turned from darkneſs to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, and ſo be made ſincerely, as he is infinitely pure and holy. And indeed, this is the firſt and great thing that we ought to believe and truſt in our Saviour for; and that which is the foundation of all our other expectations from him. For we have no ground to expect either pardon, or any other bleſſing at his hands, until we repent and be converted. But if we firmly believe and depend upon him in the firſt place for grace to repent and turn to God, and ſo to become holy and new creatures, according to the promiſes that he hath made us to that purpoſe; as he will then moſt certainly perform ſuch promiſes to us, ſo all the other bleſſings that he hath purchaſed for us, will then follow in courſe. For if we be truly ſanctified and made holy, then our ſins will be all pardoned, our perſons juſtified, our duties accepted, God reconciled to us, and at length our ſouls eternally ſaved. But all theſe things depend upon our being firſt ſanctified by him, as that doth upon our believing in him. But Faith, as the Apoſtle ſaith, Epheſ. ii. 8. is the gift of God; and therefore if we deſire to believe ſo as to be ſanctified, we muſt aſk and expect it from him, in the uſe of thoſe means which he hath appointed both for the begetting and encreaſing of it. We muſt read, and hear, and meditate upon his holy word. We muſt faſt and pray, and receive the Sacrament of our Lord's Supper. For theſe are the ordinary means which God hath eſtabliſhed in his Church, whereby to make known himſelf unto us, to convince us of the truth and certainty of his promiſes, and ſo work and confirm in us a true belief of them, by the power of the Holy Ghoſt, which for that purpoſe doth continually aſſiſt and influence the adminiſtration and performance of ſuch duties; which therefore are not only holy duties in themſelves, but the means too whereby we may become holy.

But for that purpoſe, we muſt perform, not only one or more, but all of them, ſo as to go through the whole courſe that God hath preſcribed for the healing of our ſpiritual diſtempers, and for the reſtoring us to a ſound frame and conſtitution of mind, wherein, as I have ſhewn, the nature of true holineſs properly conſiſts.

And that we muſt do too, not only now and then, but through the whole courſe of our lives, ſo as to be conſtantly, as much as poſſibly we can, employed in ſome or other of theſe holy exerciſes; not in a careleſs and ſuperficial manner, but heartily, ſincerely, earneſtly, as for our lives; for our lives, our eternal lives in a great meaſure depend upon it. For it is by our continual exerciſe of thoſe holy duties and the grace of God always accompanying of them, that our hearts are inſenſibly taken off from ſin and the world, and raiſed up higher and higher towards God and Heaven, till at length our whole ſouls being ſanctified by a quick and lively faith in Chriſt, we are made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the ſaints in light.

And what cauſe have they who are ſo, to give thanks as Paul here doth, to God the Father for it? For the whole of our ſalvation from firſt to laſt, muſt be aſcribed unto him. It is begun, continued, and ended all in him. For it was he, John iii 16. Who ſo loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whoſoever believeth in him, ſhall not periſh, but have everlaſting life; Rom. viii. 32. It was he, who ſpared not this his Son, but delivered him up to be tempted, to be ſcourged, to be ſpit upon, to be arraigned, condemned, crucified, and all for us and our ſalvation; Acts iii. 26. It was he, who having raiſed up this his Son, Jeſus, ſent him to bleſs us, by turning every one of us from his iniquities, and made him who know no ſin, to be ſin for us, 2 Cor. v. 21. that we might be made the righteouſneſs of God in him, Acts v. 31. It was he who hath exalted him with his own right hand, to be both a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance and remiſſion of ſins. It is he, who hath paſſed by the greateſt part of mankind, and hath revealed himſelf and his Son to us, the unworthieſt of all his creatures. It was he, who cauſed us to be born and bred within the pale of his holy Catholick Church, and in one of the ſoundeſt and pureſt parts of it upon the face of the whole earth. It is he, who ſtill continues the means of grace to us, and us to them, and his bleſſing both to them and us. It is he, who gives us his Holy Spirit, to mortify the deed of the fleſh, and to quicken us with newneſs of life; to raiſe up our minds from the world, and fix them upon himſelf; to keep us from evil, and to enable us to do, or ſuffer any thing we can for his ſake. It is he, who calls upon us continually by the miniſtry of his word, to repent and believe the Goſpel, and to give us grace to do it. In a word, it is he who ſent Paul to acquaint the Coloſſians in his name, how they might be meet partakers of the inheritance of the ſaints in light; and it is he alone can make us ſo.

And therefore all who are ſo made, may well join with the choir of Heaven, in thoſe ſeraphick anthems we find them ſinging in Rev. vii. 10.—12. Salvation to our God which ſitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, Amen. Bleſſing, and glory, and wiſdom, and thankſgiving, and honour, and power, and might be unto our God for ever and ever.

Ver. 26.—The myſtery.] Of the incarnation and paſſion of the Son of God; ſee the next verſe.

CHAP. II.

1 He ſtill exhorteth them to be conſtant in Chriſt. 8 To beware of philoſophy, and vain traditions, 18 worſhipping of angels, 20 and legal ceremonies, which are ended in Chriſt.

FOR I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not ſeen my face in the fleſh :

2 That their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full aſſurance of underſtanding, to the acknowledgment of the myſtery of God, and of the Father, and of Chriſt ;

3 In whom are hid all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge.

4 And this I ſay, leſt any man ſhould beguile you with enticing words.

5 For though I be abſent in the fleſh, yet am I with you in the ſpirit, joying and beholding your order, and the ſtedfaſtneſs of your faith in Chriſt.

6 As ye have therefore received Chriſt Jeſus the Lord, ſo walk ye in him :

7 Rooted and built up in him, and ſtabliſhed in the faith, as ye have been taught, abounding therein with thankſgiving.

8 Beware leſt any man ſpoil you through philoſophy, and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Chriſt :

9 For in him dwelleth all the fulneſs of the Godhead bodily.

10 And ye are complete in him, which is the head of all principality and power.

11 In whom alſo ye are circumciſed with the circumciſion made without hands, in putting off the body of the ſins of the fleſh, by the circumciſion of Chriſt :

12 Buried with him in baptiſm, wherein alſo you are riſen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raiſed him from the dead.

13 And you being dead in your ſins, and the uncircumciſion of your fleſh, hath he quickned together with him, having forgiven you all treſpaſſes,

14 Blotting out the hand-writing of ordinances, that was againſt us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his croſs :

15 And having ſpoiled principalities and powers, he made a ſhew of them openly, triumphing over them in it.

16 Let no man therefore judge you in meat or in drink, or in reſpect of an holyday, or of the new-moon, or of the ſabbath-days :

17 Which are a ſhadow of things to come ; but the body is of Chriſt.

18 Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility, and worſhipping of angels, intruding into thoſe things which he hath not ſeen, vainly puft up by his fleſhly mind ;

19 And not holding the head, from which all the body by joints and bands having nouriſhment miniſtred, and knit together, increaſeth with the increaſe of God.

20 Wherefore if ye be dead with Chriſt from the rudiments of the world ; why, as though living in the world, are ye ſubject to ordinances,

21 (Touch not, taſte not, handle not :

22 Which all are to periſh with the uſing) after the commandments and doctrines of men ?

23 Which things have indeed a ſhew of wiſdom in will-worſhip and humility, and neglecting of the body, not in any honour to the ſatisfying of the fleſh.

The Apoſtle in this chapter being about to refute ſome errors which prevailed among the Coloſſians makes his advances thereto by way of an inſinuating Preface. So that he begins,

I. With a Preface to his confutation of their errors. Wherein he acquaints them (as a proof of his labour ; ſee ch. i. 29.) with his great ſolicitude for their welfare and confirmation in the truth, ver. 1, 2, 3. Then he gives the reaſons of this his great care, that he might ſecure them from ſeducers, ver. 4. and the more earneſtly convince them of his inward affection for them, ver. 5. And ſo concludes his Preface with an exhortation to continue in the truth received, and to make progreſs therein, ver. 6, 7. Then

II. The confutation follows, and alſo a dehortation from ſome errors contrary to the truth received by them. Firſt, Laying down the errors themſelves, and then producing reaſons againſt them in general, at ver. 8, 9, 10. and afterwards againſt each in particular, as againſt Moſaical ceremonies, ver. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17. and againſt vain philoſophy, ver. 18, 19. And laſtly, Againſt tradition, ver. 20, 21, 22, 23.

Ver. 1.——Conflict.] Or, great care, or fear for your eternal welfare, leaſt any one ſhould by ſubtilty draw you from your faith in Chriſt ; ſee ver. 4.

Ver. 2.——The myſtery of God.] See chap. i. 26, 27.

Ver. 6. As ye have therefore received Chriſt Jeſus the Lord, ſo walk ye in him.] Paul, as a learned Divine ſuppoſeth, having been told by Epaphras, the Biſhop of Coloſſe, that his flock were like a garriſon cloſely beſieged on all ſides ; and although hitherto they had held out with great courage, yet he did not know what earneſt ſolicitations, and fair promiſes, and tempting motives might do with them, in his abſence therefore the Apoſtle writes this Epiſtle to encourage them in their ſtedfaſtneſs, and to warn them againſt temptations. Which he doth in ſuch a manner, as ſhews, That he had a more than ordinary apprehenſion of the danger they were in. And this I ſay, ſaith he, leſt any man ſhould beguile you with enticing words, ver. 4. and beware leſt any man ſpoil you with philoſophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Chriſt, ver. 8. Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worſhipping of Angels, &c. ver. 18. All which expreſſions do imply, that he had juſt reaſon to fear and to give them caution in time, that while they did yet think they ſtood, they ſhould take heed leſt they fall.

And this is that which the Apoſtle aims at in the words of the text; As ye have therefore received Chriſt Jeſus the Lord, ſo walk ye in him.

Receiving Chriſt Jeſus the Lord, doth not here relate to his perſon, but to his authority, and to his doctrine; ſo the Apoſtle himſelf explains it in the next verſe, rooted and built up in him, and eſtabliſhed in the faith, as ye have been taught.

Walking in him is an eaſtern way of ſpeaking, and ſuppoſes both an adhering to that faith they had then received, and living according to it, looking on Chriſt and his doctrine, as their only way to Heaven.

And as ye had received him, ſo walk ye in him, implies that the manner of their receiving Chriſt and his doctrine at firſt was different from that which the falſe apoſtles endeavoured to bring in among them, and that they were bound to keep cloſe to that pure and primitive doctrine which they at firſt received.

From hence we may conſider a double obligation lying upon them.

To keep ſtedfaſt to that faith which they firſt received, without being ſeduced from it by the arts of deceivers, who were then buſy among them.

To live according to it; by making that faith the principle of a Chriſtian Life; and ſo walking in him, as they have received him.

1. As to the former, the reaſonableneſs of it cannot but appear from the ſuppoſition here made, viz. that they had received Chriſt Jeſus the Lord.

For, thereby they declared, that they received him as the Chriſt, i. e. as him who was anointed of the Father to teach and inſtruct his Church; and therefore they were bound to adhere to his doctrine, there being no other, whom the Father hath ſealed and appointed to declare his will; and in him were hid all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge, Col. ii. 3.

They received him as Chriſt Jeſus, that is, they hoped for redemption through his blood, even the forgiveneſs of ſins, Col. i. 14. And if their hopes of Heaven depended upon his mediation, they had the greateſt reaſon to adhere only to him.

They received him as Chriſt Jeſus the Lord, and therefore they ought to ſubmit to his authority, to obey his commands, and to obſerve his inſtitutions, and in all circumſtances of life to keep ſtedfaſt to the doctrine which he delivered.

But here ariſes the great difficulty, how they ſhould know by any certain rule, what was the true and genuine doctrine of Chriſt, which himſelf delivered? For,

1. The falſe teachers among them pretended to deliver the true doctrine of Chriſt as well as the Apoſtles.

2. That which they at firſt received was no certain rule. For the falſe teachers might have been before them. And firſt poſſeſſion gives no title in religion.

3. The Apoſtle doth not put the whole trial merely upon their judgments or memories, or capacities, viz. What they thought, or remembred was at firſt taught them for the doctrine of Chriſt.

For, it was very poſſible for them to have miſtaken, or to have miſ-remembred, what was at firſt delivered.

Nothing can be more weak than to imagine that the judgments of people in matters of faith, muſt be formed according to the skill and excellency of their teachers. For the hearers of Chriſt himſelf; although he ſpake as never man ſpake, yet did very often miſtake his meaning. And at one time ſo remarkably, that although he took care to rectify their miſapprehenſion, yet it is ſaid, From that time many of his diſciples went back and walked no more with him, John vi. 66. So that the higheſt infallibility in the teachers, doth not prevent the poſſibility, or the danger of miſtaking in the hearers. And whatſoever any vainly pretend, nothing can do it, but transfuſing the ſpirit of infallibility into all.

If we look over the Apoſtolical Churches while they were under the care and conduct of an infallible ſpirit; yet this did not prevent their running into great errors and miſtakes, as appears by the account we have of them, given by that ſpirit which cannot deceive in the Apoſtolical Writings.

In the Church of Rome it ſelf, even at that time, when its faith was ſpoken of throughout the world, Rom. i. 8. yet there were diſſenſions and differences there, and ſuch as were contrary to the doctrine which was delivered. And Paul bids them to mark ſuch which cauſed them, xvi. 17. he doth not ſay, it was impoſſible for them to introduce any thing contrary to the doctrine which they had learned by tradition from the Apoſtles; but he not only ſuppoſes it very poſſible, but he bids them have a particular eye to them, leſt they ſhould be deceived by them.

The Church of Corinth was planted by Paul, and watered by Apollos; and there were diſciples of Cephas and of Chriſt himſelf. And yet in the midſt of ſo many infallible teachers, they had like to have loſt all their faith; as one of them tells them. How ſay ſome among you there is no reſurrection of the dead? And if Chriſt be not riſen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is alſo vain, 1 Cor. xv. 12—14. Could not they remember to day what was taught them yeſterday, and ſo what the Apoſtles at firſt preached to them?

The Churches of Galatia had ſuch an opinion of Paul, upon his firſt preaching the Goſpel among them, that they received him as an Angel of God, even as Chriſt Jeſus; yet preſently after he ſaith, am I therefore become your enemy becauſe I tell you the truth? What! Of an Angel of God, or of one received as Chriſt Jeſus, to become their enemy, and that upon the moſt unjuſtifiable account, becauſe he told them the truth! But, where truth can make enemies, errors may eaſily gain friends. And ſo we find it was in the Apoſtolical Churches, even under the conduct and teaching of the Apoſtles.

The Coloſſians were not yet ſo far gone; but they were in ſuch danger, that the Apoſtle writes this Epiſtle with great concernment for them. He tells them, ver. 1. he had a ſharp conflict in his own mind about them. They had not yet ſeen his face in the fleſh, ch. i. 7. iv. 12. being converted by ſome ſent by him, of whom Epaphras is moſt taken notice of, but he was preſent with them in ſpirit, ver. 5. i. e. He was deeply affected with their condition; for he underſtood the deſigns and artifices of the ſeducers among them. He knew what fair and plauſible pretences they had; viz. that they went about not to undermine Chriſtianity, but to advance it, by taking in ſome Jewiſh cuſtoms, and ſome Gentile obſervances, and modes of worſhip which might eaſily be accommodated to the Chriſtian Doctrine; and ſo a great deal of the animoſities both of the Jews and Heathens would be removed; and Chriſtianity would thereby gain more friends, and meet with fewer enemies.

The Apoſtle finding how neceſſary it was at this time, if poſſible, to keep them ſtedfaſt in the faith,

1. He aſſures them, that the Chriſtian Doctrine was of it ſelf ſo ſufficient for the good of mankind, that it needed no additions, either from the law of Moſes, or the philoſophy of the Gentiles, which might introduce ſeveral things, with a ſpecious appearance of wiſdom, humility and mortification; but they ought to be aſſured, that from Chriſt they had all that was neceſſary or uſeful for ſalvation; for in him are hid all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge.

2. That this doctrine was at firſt truly delivered to them, and they ought to be ſtedfaſt in it; which is the deſign of the text.

But they might object that Epaphras was no Apoſtle of Chriſt himſelf; and if he were, yet there were many Apoſtles, and the falſe apoſtles pretended to be true ones; and although Paul interpoſed his authority; yet he was but one, and the Judaizers would not yield to it, but were ready to ſuggeſt, that the other Apoſtles were more favourable to the Jewiſh cuſtoms than he; and therefore it was neceſſary ſome more general and common rule be found out, whereby to diſtinguiſh the original and genuine doctrine of Chriſt from that of pretenders and ſeducers.

The clearing of this is in itſelf a matter of great conſequence; and not only was to thoſe of that age, but is ſo in every age of the Chriſtian Church, where the ſame queſtion may be put: What was the true primitive doctrine of Chriſt; and by what means may we come to it? which concerns us at this day as well as them.

And the anſwer lay in two particulars, which I ſhall endeavour to clear.

1. That which the Apoſtles did in common deliver to the Churches planted by them, was the genuine doctrine of Chriſt.

2. That which they have left in their writings, after it came to be conteſted which was the true doctrine of Chriſt

1. That which the Apoſtles did in common deliver to the Churches planted by them. For we have all the reaſon in the world to believe, that the Apoſtles delivered one and the ſame faith to all the Churches; having the ſame Infallible Spirit to direct them. There was no need for them to meet together before their diſperſion, and to agree upon ſome common articles of faith, as Ruffinus, in Symbol. imagines, leſt they ſhould differ from each other; for how could they differ, who had the ſame ſpirit of truth to lead them into all truth? John xvi. 13. And we find nothing like a combination among the Apoſtles, as to matters of doctrine: And if there had been, it would have rendred the faith they delivered more ſuſpicious, in that they durſt not truſt particular perſons with delivery of it, without an antecedent confederacy among themſelves, which would have looked like a miſtruſt of that promiſe of the ſpirits being fulfilled, upon all of them. And we find, when the Goſpels were to be written, there was no ſuch meeting together, to ſettle the ſeveral parts of it; and yet this was of as much conſequence to the Church of God; but Matthew writes his Goſpel in Judea, at the time, ſaith Irenæus, l. iii. c. 1. that Peter and Paul preached and founded a Church in Rome, Mark either at Rome or in Egypt, not till after their deceaſe, ſaith the ſame very ancient father. Luke in Greece, after Paul planted Churches in Rome, and John in Aſia, after all the reſt; ſee Euſeb. l. v. c. 18. But there was the ſame Divine Spirit, which aſſiſted them all, and therefore there was ſuch a concurrence as ſhewed their veracity, but ſuch a variety as ſhewed there was no combination.

But it is obſervable, that none of the Goſpels were written till the doctrine of Chriſt had been preached by the Apoſtles in many places, and many Churches were formed and eſtabliſhed by them. And there were two great advantages thereby.

1. The unity of the faith delivered by the Apoſtles was the more ſeen, becauſe then without the help of a written rule, they ſo unanimouſly agreed in the doctrines they delivered. Not as though it were leſs poſſible to miſtake without it; but on the contrary, there being a much greater liableneſs to miſtake, ſo univerſal a conſent, was the ſtronger argument of a Divine Aſſiſtance. If there had been any difference in the doctrines preached by the Apoſtles, there were ſo many enemies both of Jews and Infidels, and falſe Apoſtles, who would preſently have reproached the Chriſtian Churches with it. But no diſagreement is ever ſo much as mentioned, as to what the Apoſtles themſelves taught; They had one Body, one Spirit, one Lord, one Faith, one Baptiſm, one God and Father of all; Eph. iv. 5, 6. Where-ever the Apoſtles went, whether into Scythia, Parthia, Meſopotamia, or any Provinces of the Roman Empire, all who were converted by them were baptized into the ſame faith, which Jude calls the faith once delivered to the ſaints; Jude i. 3. But once delivered though by many perſons, and by very diſtant places; and ſo once delivered, as the ſame faith once delivered is to continue to the world's end. For nothing can be made the faith of Chriſt, which was not always ſo; for that were to lay a new foundation, and to make another covenant than what Chriſt hath ſealed with his blood. But he is the ſame yeſterday, to day, and for ever; Heb. xiii. 8. The terms of ſalvation can never be altered, unleſs there be a new ſaviour, and new apoſtles, and new teachers. But if we go to Heaven by Chriſt, we muſt go that way that himſelf hath directed. For men and angels joining their powers together cannot ſave one ſoul; Chriſt alone being the way, the truth and the life; and none can come to the Father but by him; John xiv. 6. This the Apoſtles very well knew, and were therefore careful to deliver nothing to the Church but what they received from Chriſt, as Paul ſaith of himſelf, For I have received of the Lord that which I delivered unto you; 1 Cor. xi. Not by way of tradition from men, but by immediate Divine Revelation; for as he ſaith, he was not an Apoſtle of men, or by men, but by Jeſus Chriſt, and God the Father; Gal. i. 1. and not long after he ſaith, he neither received the Goſpel of man, neither was I taught it but by revelation of Jeſus Chriſt; 12.

There was none of all the firſt preachers of the Goſpel ſo liable to the ſuſpicion of ſetting up for himſelf, and varying from the reſt as Paul was. For he was none of the original number of Apoſtles, and he was a known perſecutor of the diſciples of Chriſt, and ſudden converts are always ſuſpected; and Ananias had a viſion to ſatisfy him, and yet he could not tell what to think at firſt concerning him; and the diſciples when they firſt heard him were amazed; Acts ix. 13.—21. after this, he took a courſe by himſelf, and did not go up to Jeruſalem to the college of Apoſtles there reſident, but went into Arabia; Gal. i. 17. ſo that if any one might be thought to ſet up another doctrine, it was he; but he was ſo far from it, that he eſtabliſhed and confirmed the truth of what they delivered, and was very ſucceſsful in his Apoſtleſhip in all places. And when there had been ſome whiſpers concerning him, as though he proceeded not in the ſame way with the reſt, he went up to Jeruſalem, and there upon full examination, James and Cephas, and John, who were the leading Apoſtles, gave him the right hand of fellowſhip; ii. 9. in token of their full conſent in the ſame faith.

2. The truth of the Goſpel was the more plainly diſcovered.

All this while the Apoſtles only preached and delivered their doctrine to the ſeveral Churches by verbal inſtructions; but after theſe had been received in the hearts of ſuch multitudes, that there could be no ſuſpicion that a falſe repreſentation of Chriſt's doctrine or actions could be received by thoſe Churches, then the wiſe providence of God took care for poſterity, and employed ſeveral perſons in diſtant places and times to write the hiſtory of our Saviour. And there was this advantage to the Church, that the Goſpels were written no ſooner: For, all the Churches planted by the Apoſtles, were then made judges whether the Goſpels written were agreeable to the doctrine which the Apoſtles had taught; and if not, there would have been juſt reaſon to have queſtioned either the truth of what had been taught them, or what was delivered in the Goſpels.

But when they found the main to be fully conſonant to what they had been taught, the teſtimony of every one of theſe Churches did ſhew the concurrence of all the Apoſtles, as to the doctrine contained in the ſeveral Goſpels. And,

That which adds to the ſtrength of this proof is, that when the true Goſpels were written, there were ſeveral falſe and counterfeit Goſpels diſperſed abroad, under the names of the Apoſtles themſelves; as of Peter, Thomas, Matthias, and others; and as we have the genuine acts of the Apoſtles, ſo there were the pretended acts of Paul, of Andrew and John, and the other Apoſtles, Euſeb. Hiſt. l. 3. c. 25. How came theſe to be rejected, and the other to be carefully received . Here lies the true advantage of original tradition before the written Goſpels, that by it the ſeveral Churches were enabled to paſs a true judgment concerning them when they came to be diſperſed among them. For they could preſently tell whether what they read were agreeable to what they had heard and received from the Apoſtles. As ſuppoſe the Goſpel of Matthew, being publiſhed in Judea, were carried into Meſopotamia or Perſia, where many Chriſtian Churches were very early planted; theſe being throughly inſtructed by the Apoſtles in all things relating to the life, death, reſurrection and doctrine of Chriſt, could preſently judge whether Matthew's Goſpel agreed with what they had heard or not, and the like holds as to all the Churches in the Roman Empire. So that the conſent of the Churches ſo ſoon, while the memory of the Apoſtle's doctrine was ſo freſh in their minds, is in effect the conſent of all the Apoſtles who taught them.

And this is very different from the caſe of particular perſons in ſome Churches, who might miſtake or forget what was taught; for this is a concurrent teſtimony of all the Apoſtolical Churches, who could not agree to approve an error in the Goſpels contrary to the faith delivered to them, and that while ſome of the Apoſtles were ſtill living; for the other Goſpels were received and approved before John wrote his.

The caſe had been far otherwiſe, if no Goſpels had been written in that age; for then it might have been ſuſpected, that either the impreſſions of the firſt teachers were worn out, or they had been by degrees altered from their firſt apprehenſions by the cunning craftineſs of thoſe who lay in wait to deceive them.

After the deceaſe of the Apoſtles, the common tradition of the Apoſtolical Churches was uſeful in theſe caſes:

1. To convey down the authentick writings of the Apoſtles or Evangeliſts, which were delivered to any of them.

2. To bear teſtimony againſt any pretended writings which were not firſt received by the Apoſtolical Churches to which they were ſaid to be written. For there can be no negative teſtimony of more force than that, it being improbable to the utmoſt degree that ſuch a Church ſhould not know, or not make known any true Apoſtolical writings.

3. To overthrow any pretence to a ſecret tradition from the Apoſtles different from what was ſeen in the Apoſtolical writings. And to this purpoſe Irenæus and Tertullian make very good uſe of the tradition of the Apoſtolical Churches againſt the pretenders to ſuch a tradition, which thoſe Churches were not acquainted with. See Iren. l. 3. c. 3, 4. Tertul. de Præſcript. Hær.

But they agree that the Apoſtles committed the ſame doctrine to writing which they preached, and that it might be a foundation and pillar of faith; that this doctrine was contained in the four Goſpels; and that the Apoſtolical Churches did receive them from thoſe who firſt wrote them, and that within the compaſs of the Apoſtolical age.

It was therefore moſt agreeable to the infinite Wiſdom of God in providing for a conſtant eſtabliſhment of the faith of his Church in all ages, neither to permit the Goſpels to be written till the Churches were planted, nor to be put off to another generation. For, then it would have been plauſibly objected; "if theſe things are true, why were they not recorded, when there were perſons living who were beſt able to have either proved, or confuted them? Then we might have been ſatisfied one way or other; but now the Jews are dead, and the Apoſtles are dead; and although there are many left who believe their doctrine, yet this can never reach to the teſtimony of thoſe who ſaw and heard the things themſelves, or whoſe doctrine was atteſted by thoſe who did ſo." And this is now the mighty advantage of the Church ever ſince that the things concerning Chriſt were written by ſuch perſons. With what another kind of authority do thoſe words command our aſſent, That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have ſeen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the word of life; for the life was manifeſted, and we have ſeen it, and bear witneſs, and ſhew unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifeſt unto us, that which we have ſeen and heard declare we unto you, 1 John i. 2, 3. then if all the teſtimony concerning Chriſt were to be reſolved into thoſe who heard ſome ſay, that others told them, they had it from ſuch, who ſaw thoſe who converſed with them who ſaw Chriſt in the fleſh? At ſuch a diſtance the authority of a teſtimony is extremely leſſened, which is not like a river which grows greater by running, but like a mineral water which loſes it ſtrength by being carried too far. We find in the time of Papias, who lived but in the ſecond century, the authority of bare tradition was mightily ſunk; for, Euſebius, Hiſt. l. 3. c. 39. ſaith, he converſed with the Diſciples of our Lord and his Apoſtles, he ſaith of himſelf, that he went up and down to them to get what he could from them, having a greater eſteem of what he could learn from them than of what was written. And what advantage did this bring to the Church? It brought ſome idle opinions into reputation, ſaith Euſebius; for, afterwards they thought it enough to fix them upon Papias. But, how was it poſſible for him to miſtake? Euſebius ſaith, that being a man of mean capacity, he might eaſily miſunderſtand the meaning of what was ſpoken. But if tradition might fail after ſuch a manner ſo near the Apoſtles times, then we muſt be aſſured of the capacity as well as integrity of thoſe of every age through whom a tradition paſſed, or elſe they might deceive, or be deceived about it.

But God was pleaſed to provide better for the ſecurity of our faith, by cauſing the Goſpels to be written either by the Apoſtles themſelves, as Matthew and John, or by the diſciples of the chief Apoſtles, while the others were ſurviving, as Mark and Luke; and the latter gives this account of his undertaking to write it, viz. That thou mighteſt know the certainty of thoſe things wherein thou haſt been inſtructed, Luke i. 4. His inſtruction was by an oral tradition, but that it ſeems wanted ſomething to ſtrengthen and confirm it, and that was by Luke's writing his Goſpel. How could they add any aſſurance to him, if all the ground of his certainty were to be taken from tradition? Luke thought it neceſſary then, that thoſe things which concerned the life and doctrine of Chriſt ſhould be put into writing, that they might be more cercertainly conveyed; and that while they had the teſtimony of thoſe, who were eye-witneſſes and miniſters of the word.

2. And ſo I come to the ſecond rule of diſcerning the primitive doctrine of Chriſt, viz. the writings of the Apoſtles, when matters of doctrine came to be conteſted, were the infallible rule, whereby they were to judge, which was the true and genuine doctrine of Chriſt. And,

I ſhall now prove that the writings of the Apoſtles were intended by the Holy Ghoſt to be a ſtanding rule, whereby the Church was to judge which was the true and genuine doctrine of Chriſt.

1. From the reaſons and occaſions of writing the books of the New Teſtament.

As to the Goſpels, we muſt diſtinguiſh the general reaſon of writing them, from the particular occaſions as to the ſeveral Goſpels. The general reaſon is to be drawn from the Divine Wiſdom which inſpired and guided them; the particular occaſions relate to the circumſtances of writing them.

The general reaſon is that which Irenæus, l. 3. c. 1. gives, viz. That the Goſpel which they had firſt preached, was by the Will of God put into writing, that it might be a foundation and pillar of our faith. Not merely to keep up the remembrance of it, which Fevardentius yields, and thereby overthrows the infallibility of oral tradition; but that ſo it may be a certain rule of faith to all ages. The Evangeliſts, ſaith Auguſtin, de Concenſ. Evang. l. 1. c. 54. were but Chriſt's hands, which himſelf as the head, directed in writing the Goſpels, and therefore we are to look on the Goſpels as his own hand-writing. The Holy Ghoſt, ſaith he, again, in lib. ii. c. 53. directed the minds of the Evangeliſts, as to the order and manner of their writing. Which varied according to the particular occaſions, but yet were all ſubſervient to the general reaſon.

Matthew wrote the firſt Goſpel, ſaith Euſebius, hiſt. l. 3. c. 24. to the Jews to whom he had preached, becauſe going into other parts he would ſupply the want of his preſence among them by his writing. What need this, if tradition were a certain and infallible way of conveying the doctrine of Chriſt? Chryſoſtom, hom. 1. in Matth. ſaith, the Jewiſh Chriſtians deſired him to put into writing what they had heard him preach. Did not they underſtand the force of tradition better? Or why ſhould Matthew put them out of an infallible way? The authority of the imperfect work on Matthew ſaith, in Prologo. they deſired him to write his Goſpel, that wherever they went they might carry an account of their faith with them. Clemens Alexandrinus, ſaith, the occaſion of writing Mark's Goſpel was, that the people were not ſatisfied with an unwritten delivery of the Holy Doctrine, and therefore importuned Mark, who was the diſciple of Peter, that he would leave a monument of his doctrine in writing; which Peter underſtanding by revelation, approved and confirmed his Goſpel for the uſe of the Churches; ſee Euſeb. l. 2. c. 15. Origen ſaith, he wrote it according to Peter's directions. Epiphanius ſaith, by his authority; Athanaſius ſaith, it was dictated by him at Rome; ſee Euſeb. l. 6. c. 25. Epiphan. hær. 51. Athanaſ. in Synopſi. p. 155.

It ſeems that Peter himſelf did not think fit to leave the doctrine of Chriſt to an oral tradition, even at Rome, but Irenæus thinks it was written after Peter's deceaſe, who therein differs from the reſt, and ſhews how uncertain mere tradition is. Tertullian ſaith, Mark's Goſpel was attributed to Peter, and Luke's to Paul. Jerom mentions the opinion of ſome, that when Paul ſaith, according to my Goſpel, he means that of Luke; ſee Tertul. c. Marc. l. 4. c. 5. Hieron de Script. Eccleſ.

But Luke himſelf plainly gives an account of the occaſion of his writing. Ambroſe thinks by thoſe who had taken in hand to write of theſe things which were firmly believed among us, he means the authors of the counterfeit Goſpels, as that of the twelve Apoſtles and Matthias. But we have no evidence that theſe were older than Luke; his meaning is, that in thoſe parts where he was, there were ſome who did undertake to give an account of the life and actions of Chriſt, who wanted the advantages which he had; having had great opportunities of knowing circumſtances from the eye-witneſſes; and therefore he ſet himſelf to give an exact relation of them, that not only Theophilus, but every one that anſwers his name might know the certainty of thoſe things wherein they had been inſtructed, Epiph. hær. 51. But, did not they know the certainty of theſe things by the Apoſtles preaching? Yes, but the things they heard might ſlip out of their memories; and to prevent this, ſaith Theophylact, Luke wrote his Goſpel, that they might retain theſe things with greater certainty, Theophyl. in Luc. And words that are only ſpoken are more eaſily miſunderſtood; which Maldonat aſſigns, as one great reaſon of the Evangeliſts writing their ſeveral Goſpels; ſee Maldonat. Com. in Evang. prol.

John likewiſe gives an account himſelf of the reaſon of his writing; and that the greateſt imaginable. But theſe are written that ye might believe that Jeſus is the Chriſt, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his Name, John xx. 31. Why written that ye might believe? Did the Apoſtle in his old age miſtruſt the underſtandings or the memories of Chriſtians? Was not the Apoſtles teaching ſufficient to keep up the principles of the Chriſtian Faith in the hearts of the people; no, not while John himſelf was yet living? He had certainly a very mean opinion of tradition, that thought it neceſſary for him to write that they might believe that Jeſus is the Son of God. For there was no point of faith more neceſſary than this, which was required of all perſons to be owned before baptiſm.

Yet for all this, and whatever elſe can be ſaid, John thought it neceſſary that theſe things be written that they might believe.

He lived the longeſt of any of the Apoſtles, and therefore ſaw how little tradition was to be truſted; for it was already corrupted in ſo weighty a point as the Divinity of Chriſt.

Cerinthus and his followers allowed the general tradition of the Church, that Jeſus was the Son of God; but then they gave their own ſenſe of it, by extraordinary favour and adoption. And from hence the fathers agree, that John took occaſion to write his Divine Goſpel, to clear this fundamental point of the Chriſtian Faith; ſee Hierom. Prœm. in Matth. de Script. Eccleſ.

And withal obſerving, that the other Evangeliſts inſiſted chiefly on the actions of Chriſt for one year, viz. after John's impriſonment, he reſumes the whole matter, and adds thoſe things which were omitted by the reſt; that ſo the Church might be furniſhed with a full relation of all that was neceſſary to compleat and eſtabliſh the faith of Chriſtians; ſee Epiph. hær. 51. Chryſ. hom. 1. in Matth. Euſeb. l. 3. c. 24.

2. As to the Epiſtles.

The firſt Epiſtle we read of in the Chriſtian Church, (and in probability the firſt writing in the New Teſtament) was the decretal Epiſtle of the Council of Jeruſalem, Acts xv. 23.

What ſhould make the Apoſtles put theſe decrees into writing? They were very ſhort, and concerned the practices of men, and withal were ſent by Barnabas and Paul, and Judas, and Silas. Were not theſe ſufficient to deliver the Apoſtles ſenſe to the Churches, without letters from them? What a pitiful thing did they take oral tradition to be, if they thought ſuch men could not by it give full ſatisfaction to the Churches of Syria and Cilicia, unleſs they ſent it under their hands?

The Epiſtle to the Romans was written by Paul on purpoſe to clear ſome main points of the Chriſtian Doctrine, which were then warmly diſputed between the Jews and the Chriſtians, and between the Judaizing Chriſtians and others, as about juſtification, rejection of the Jews, the difference of meats, &c. And Paul took very needleſs pains in writing that excellent Epiſtle, if he knew of Chriſt's appointing a judge of controverſies there; or if he thought writing were not a certain way to make a rule of faith, whereby they were to judge in thoſe matters.

The firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians was written not merely to reprove their factions and diſorders; but to direct them, and to eſtabliſh and prove the faith of the reſurrection, which was then conteſted among them. The Epiſtle was ſent by Stephanus and Fortunatus; ſee 1 Cor. xv. 12. who could have carried the Apoſtle's ſenſe without his writing; but there are many weighty things, beſides the particular occaſions which are of laſting concernment to the Church in all ages; as there are likewiſe in his ſecond Epiſtle to them.

The Epiſtle to the Galatians was written on occaſion of one of the greateſt points of controverſy at that time, viz. the uſe and obligation of the law of Moſes. And Paul found by ſad experience among them, that it was very poſſible for thoſe who had the beſt inſtructions, either to forgot them, or to grow out of love with them, and to be fond of a change; elſe he would never have ſaid, O fooliſh Galatians, who hath bewitched you that ye ſhould not obey the truth? Gal. iii. 1. And I marvel that ye are ſo ſoon removed from him that called you into the grace of Chriſt into another Goſpel, i. 6. How! Was it indeed poſſible for them to be removed, and to be ſo ſoon removed, who had received the faith by the delivery of Paul himſelf? Then, for all that I can ſee, human nature taken with all its advantages and motives, and evidences, is a very fallible thing; and if then it might be deceived, and that ſo eaſily and groſly; then much more in any following age of the Church; unleſs human nature be mightily changed for the better, ſince the Apoſtles times; or any teachers ſince be more effectual, than the Apoſtles, and eſpecially than Paul, who laboured more abundantly than they all, 1 Cor. xv. 10.

The Epiſtle to the Epheſians, though written upon a general argument, yet doth ſuppoſe that they were in continual danger of being deceived; and toſſed up and down, and carried about with every wind of doctrine by the ſleight of men, and cunning craftineſs whereby they lye in wait to deceive, Eph. iv. 14.

And therefore he adviſes them to be upon their guard, and to have their armour about them, and one choice part of it, is the ſword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, vi. 17.

The Philippians were aſſaulted by a rude, violent, head-ſtrong faction of Judaizers; which the Apoſtle bids them to beware of; and writes his Epiſtle to them for that purpoſe, and he exhorts them to ſtand faſt in one Spirit, with one mind ſtriving together for the faith of the Goſpel.

In the ſecond Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians, and in both Epiſtles to Timothy, he gives notice of a great defection from the Chriſtian Faith; he deſcribes the manner of it, that it ſhall be with ſigns and lying words, and with all deceiveableneſs of unrighteouſneſs in them that periſh, becauſe they received not the love of the truth; that they ſhall ſpeak lies in hypocriſy, and forbid to marry, and command to abſtain from meats, being evil men, having a form of godlineſs, and denying the power of it. From hence, it is evident that Paul ſuppoſed, that thoſe who at firſt received the Chriſtian Faith by tradition from the Apoſtles themſelves, might notwithſtanding through their own weakneſs and folly, and the artifices of deceivers be drawn from it; and that to prevent ſuch miſchievous conſequences, he knew no better means than a written rule, which he tells Timothy was able to make him wiſe to ſalvation; and to make the man of God perfect, throughly furniſhed to every good work; ſee 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17.

And to name no more, the Coloſſians were ſet upon by ſome who thought to refine Chriſtianity; or at leaſt to make it more paſſable in the world, and therefore would have introduced into it ſome rites of the Jews, ſome auſterities of the Gentiles, ſome ways of worſhip which would recommend them to their adverſaries; and upon this occaſion he writes this Epiſtle to them to convince them that Chriſtianity alone was far beyond any mixtures of the fancies or traditions of men, and therefore he could give them no better advice, than as they had firſt received the doctrine of Chriſt to continue in it, or in the words before me, As they had received Chriſt Jeſus the Lord, ſo to walk in him. Now,

The deſign of what I have written is, that although the Goſpels and Epiſtles were written upon particular occaſions; yet thoſe occaſions were ſo great and conſiderable, and the aſſiſtance of the Holy Ghoſt did ſo direct the hands and pens of the Evangeliſts and Apoſtles in writing them, that what they have therein delivered contains a complete rule of the true and genuine faith, as it was at firſt delivered to the Church.

Ver. 8, &c. Beware leſt any man ſpoil you through philoſophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Chriſt, ver. 9. For, &c.] I have already ſhewn in the Introduction to this Epiſtle, that it is not the Apoſtle's deſign here to adviſe Chriſtians to deſpiſe or neglect human learning and philoſophy, and then I referred you to this note for a further proof of that aſſertion. Therefore,

Let us firſt look into the reaſon which the Apoſtle himſelf gives for his caution againſt philoſophy, in the following verſes. For in him (i. e. Chriſt) dwelleth all the fulneſs of the Godhead bodily, ver. 9.

As if he had ſaid, Let no man impoſe upon you by a lame and imperfect philoſophy, for now there is introduced an abſolute and complete doctrine, namely, that of our Lord Jeſus, who hath the fulneſs of all wiſdom incorporated into him. Or, the dwelling of the fulneſs of the Godhead bodily in him, may ſignify the perfect glory and majeſty of the Divine Nature diſplayed in the fleſh, when the word became incarnate, when God was made man. Bodily denotes the hypoſtatical union, whereby the Divine Nature is united to the humane, and both concur to make up one perſon. The Godhead dwells in Chriſt, not only ſpiritually, (as in all ſaints and believers) but ſo that the Divine and humane nature are joined by a perſonal union. Or, you may conſider that of our learned Annotator, Dr. Hammond, who tells us, that the word gnetzem, which is the Hebrew word for body, ſignifies oftentimes no more than being or eſſence, and imports the exiſtence and reality of the thing ſpoken of. And accordingly he ſaith, that the body of ſin, and the body of death, mentioned in the New Teſtament, are no more than ſin and death; the real Being of them is denoted, and nothing elſe. Thus here alſo the Greek word σῶμα anſwers to the Hebrew one, and is a kind of expletive; for, nothing but the real Being of the thing, here ſpoken of, is to be underſtood by it. But I conceive there is ſomething more than this meant by the word bodily, for it ſignifies not only the real, but ſubſtantial and ſolid fulneſs of Chriſt. The greateſt maſters of human wiſdom attained to the ſhadow only, but he is the body, the ſubſtance.

And ſo it follows, Ye are compleat in him, ſaith the Apoſtle, at ver. 10. you have all things by Chriſt; there is nothing wanting and defective in the Chriſtian Doctrine, it is an exact model of moral and Divine Wiſdom. But the philoſophy which is now in vogue in the world, is another kind of thing; it is weak and imperfect, ſhort and deficient; and as it is at this time abuſed and corrupted, hath nothing of ſolidity and ſubſtance in it. Paul had often cautioned againſt the legal and Jewiſh Inſtitution, and bid the Chriſtians beware that none ſpoil them by that.

Now he comes to direct his caveat againſt the impoſtors of philoſophy. He had without doubt repeated and inculcated that of our Saviour, Except your righteouſneſs exceed the righteouſneſs of the Scribes and Phariſes, (the moſt exact obſervers of the Moſaick Law) ye can in no wiſe enter into the kingdom of Heaven. Now he thinks fit to urge this upon them alſo, That unleſs they go beyond the bounds of the moſt improved wiſdom among the Gentiles, they are never like to arrive at that place of happineſs. Neither the ceremonious precepts of the Jews, nor the dogma's of philoſophers, were able to conduct them thither. All the men of tradition could not effect it, the numerous Rabbies, and the families of Hillel and Shammeai were defectivo, notwithſtanding all their peculiar dictates and will-worſhips. And here and elſewhere, the ſons of reaſon, the great ſearchers into the law of nature, are charged by the Apoſtle with the ſame deficiency. Their philoſophy, which they brag ſo much of, and value themſelves ſo much upon, if it be righrly ſcanned, is but Κενὴ ἀπάτη; philoſophy and vain deceit, are but terms convertible. As Chriſtianity out-doth the law of Moſes, ſo it out-ſtrips that of nature and morality, eſpecially as it is depraved and corrupted by the Grecian philoſophers and others, as it is made up of fallacies and ſeeming ſhews of arguing, but really void of ſolid reaſon.

Againſt theſe the Chriſtians of Epheſus were warned, Let no man deceive you (ſaith the Apoſtle) with vain words, ch. v. 6. Theſe κενοὶ λόγοι, exactly anſwer to the κενὴ ἀϖάτη, and they both ſtrike at the fallacious and deceitful mode of philoſophizing in Paul's days, who was the firſt that planted the Goſpel at Epheſus, (the metropolis of all Aſia) but it ſeems, in his abſence from that place, ſome attempted to pervert his converts, by preſſing upon them the Jewiſh rites; and others endeavoured to debauch them by philoſophy, either that of Heraclitus, who was an Epheſian, or of Pythagoras, who had many followers there. This coming to Paul's ear, who was then in bonds at Rome, he preſently diſpatched away his Epiſtle to the Epheſians, wherein he undertaketh to ſhew them, that the Goſpel far exceeds both Judaiſm and philoſophy, and that Chriſt's doctrine is more ſublime and heavenly, more powerful and efficacious than either of them. In moſt divine and exalted language he extols the Evangelical Doctrine, and convinces them, that all learning and wiſdom are mean and vile in compariſon of it. And this Epiſtle to the Coloſſians was written, it is likely, at the ſame time with that to the Epheſians, even whilſt the things he wrote to them were freſh in his memory: For you will find that it is of the ſame ſtrain and tenor with that, and the very phraſe and expreſſion are the ſame, as I might ſhew you in ſeveral particulars beſides that in theſe words. The argument and deſign is the ſame in both, viz. to oppoſe the Goſpel-wiſdom not only to the Jewiſh diſpenſation, but to the accompliſhments of the Gentile knowledge ſo celebrated at that time in Greece and Aſia. Of this latter it is that Paul ſpeaks in the text, and in that parallel place to the Corinthians, 1 Epiſt. 3. ch. 18. v. (and it is well known that Corinth was famous for philoſophy, and Periander, one of the ſeven wiſe men fell to their ſhare, and Diogenes lived and converſed there. Let us hear then what the Apoſtle ſaith to theſe men of Corinth); Let no man deceive himſelf, (where the deceitfulneſs of human philoſophy is no leſs aſſerted than in the text) upon which Grotius, in loc. makes this gloſs, All human philoſophy which is repugnant to the doctrine of Chriſt in the Goſpel, is a mere cheat and deluſion. Let therefore no man deceive and gull himſelf with it. But (as it followeth) if any man ſeem to be wiſe in this world, (ἐν αἰῶνι τȣ́τῳ, i. e. according to the wiſdom of this world; if he thinks himſelf to be a great philoſopher) let him become a fool (renounce thoſe deceitful principles, and embrace the Goſpel, which is accounted folly) that he may be wiſe, (really ſo, i. e. wiſe to ſalvation;) for the wiſdom of this world (i. e. human reaſon and philoſophy abſtracted from revelation) is fooliſhneſs with God, i. e. it is reckoned by God, what it is really in itſelf, a weak and ſhallow thing, blind and imperfect, and unable to conduct a man to bliſs and happineſs. Mark here how the pretenders to wiſdom are ſhamefully baffled, and their perverſe judgment is here juſtly retaliated. As the Goſpel is no other than fooliſhneſs in the accounts of the men of the world, ſo their wiſdom is eſteemed no better than folly by God. And this it muſt needs be likewiſe in the eſteem of all truly wiſe men, who, with Paul, making a right judgment of things, diſcern that vanity and deceit are entailed upon it. For,

1. The common philoſophy of the Greeks and others then in requeſt in the Apoſtles days, was vain and empty.

2. It was fallacious and deceitful. It was vain, becauſe it profited nothing to piety, and making them better. It was deceitful, becauſe it hazarded their ſouls, and robbed them of happineſs. The philoſophy at that time in force had theſe bad qualities. It was in all things ſhort and imperfect; in many, erroneous and vicious. It was not only defective, but corrupted; whereas the Sacred and Inſpired Doctrine of the Apoſtles was compleat and ſound, fraught with infallible truth, and the exacteſt rules of living well. Therefore,

To ſhew you that the philoſophy of which Paul here ſpeaks, was vain and empty: That it was, 1. Uncertain. 2. (which was the effect of the former) Quarrelſome. And, 3. (which made it yet vainer) it was Trifling.

1. The Pagan philoſophy was dark and uncertain. The title which Ariſtophanes gives his comedy, wherein he laſhes the philoſophers, may agree to the philoſophy it ſelf. Νεφέλαι, clouds might be prefixed to it, it was mere clouds and obſcurity. The philoſophers ſpoke as doubtfully and ambiguouſly as their Delphick oracles. The Epheſian philoſoper was called Σκοτεινὸς, dark, and it might as well be fixed on ſome others of the philoſophick tribe, for they are wonderfully dark and dubious. It is confeſſed, they light upon many things true and excellent, but they only gueſſed at them; and their concluſions of them were fickle and unſteady. A ſhort peruſal of Stobæus, and of Plutarch's treatiſe of the Placits of Philoſophy, or Diogenes Laertius of their lives, are ſufficient, I think, to ſatisfy any man of the uncertainty both of their phyſicks and ethicks. It fares with philoſophers, as it did with thoſe mutineers at Epheſus, ſome crying one thing and ſome another. Varro reckons 188 opinions of the Summum Bonum. or the chief good of man; and their opinions of other things laboured under vaſt uncertainties. The world ſurely had very miſtaken and diſordered conceptions of things, when every thing was a god with them, when (as the Apoſtle obſerves of that ſtrange way of metamorphoſis which their idolatrous fancy led them to) They changed the glory of the Incorruptible God, into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beaſts, and creeping things; Rom. i. 22, 23. and any thing elſe which their wild imagination ſuggeſted. The learned may ſatisfy themſelves how uncertain notions they had of their gods, from the divers accounts which Plutarch (who was one of the moſt intelligent perſons among them) gives of the Egyptian deities Iſis and Oſiris. And if they were in the dark about their gods, it is no wonder they had ſo little light in other things. This made Hermias, the old Chriſtian philoſopher (in his piece which he intituled, The Irriſion of the Gentile Philoſophers) cry out at laſt, "Truth hath left the world, and the ſo much celebrated philoſophy hunts rather after ſhadows, than lays hold on any true knowledge of things." Again thus, (in very fine words) "All this that the philoſophers talk of, is but the darkneſs of ignorance, and black fraud, and endleſs error, and imperfect imagination, and incomprehenſible ignorance." Indeed the firſt and beſt enquirers into the knowledge of things were ſenſible of this; particularly Pythagorus, notwithſtanding the ſeven celebrated men of Greece went under the name of wiſe men, aſſumed to himſelf only the name of a lover of wiſdom. To him the philoſophers owe that modeſt name, whereby they tell the world that they are only well-willers to wiſdom, not perfect maſters of it. And Socrates (who was voted by the oracle the wiſeſt man of his age) was yet more ſelf-denying, when he ſincerely profeſſed (for why ſhould we take it as a complement?) that all that he knew was this, that he knew nothing.

The reaſons of this ignorance and darkneſs in philoſophy, I take to be theſe two eſpecially: 1. Becauſe human reaſon was corrupted and vitiated, loaded with prejudices and prepoſſeſſions, darkned with ſenſuality, and perverted in many by a conſtant courſe of ſinning. Hence it was diſabled from framing right apprehenſions of things, and from directing men into a certain knowledge of God, and of themſelves, and of their duty. 2. Becauſe they wanted ſupernatural revelation, which is abſolutely neceſſary to give men a clear diſcovery of the nature of God, and a full repreſentation of all the offices of religion. This was another reaſon of philoſophick darkneſs and uncertainty. And on the contrary, that which renders the Chriſtian laws ſo certain and indubitable is this, that they are derived from the immediate inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt; this is the foundation of that inſtitution which we are honoured with. This makes our religion unqueſtionable and infallible, and ſuch as we can confidently rely upon. For Divine teſtimony commandeth aſſent, and forceth an acknowledgment, and will not ſuffer our minds to hang in uncertain doubtings and heſitations: This is the excellency of Chriſtianity. Whereas the corrupted philoſophy of the Gentiles diſcovered its vanity in its great obſcurity and uncertainty.

2. Another inſtance of the emptineſs and unſatisfactorineſs of the Gentile wiſdom is, that it was intolerably quarrelſome and vexatious. And this is the reſult of the former; for it was uncertainty among the philoſophers which made ſo many ſects among them. The two capital ones were the Italick and Ionick; ſee Diog. Laert. in Proœmio. Of the former Pythagoras (who after his travels philoſophized in Italy) is reckoned the chief, and next to him Democritus and Epicurus. Of the latter Thales was the firſt author and inſtitutor; and this was divided into ſeveral ſects, as, 1. The Socratick, of which Socrates was the head. 2. The Platonick, which took its riſe as well as name from Plato; though the retainers to it were alſo called Academicks. 3. The Peripatetick, of which Ariſtotle was the founder. 4. That of the Cynicks, of whom Antiſthenes was the father. 5. That of the Stoicks, which was ſet up by Zeno and Chryſippus. To theſe we may add the Scepticks (if they may be thought to deſerve the name of philoſophers, who queſtioned, and in a manner denied all philoſophy) who were all called Aporeticks, i. e. Doubters, and Zeteticks, or Seekers, of whom Pyrrho was the head; and the Epicureans (named ſo from their maſter Epicurus) though their philoſophy moſt properly belongs to the Italick: But even this may be called part of the Greek philoſophy, becauſe the founders of it were Grecians.

There was a perpetual ſquabbling among theſe philoſophers about their divers placits and opinions; they grew angry and waſpiſh, they made it their buſineſs to brawl, wrangle, to cavil and ſcuffle, to ſtart objections, and to make everlaſting repartees. Socrates, who was one of the beſt of them, was called ὁ εἴρων, one that acted a part, that diſſembled and prevaricated: He affected all his life ironical diſſimulation. This was his way of rhetorick, and his philoſophy was tainted with it; for, you may obſerve that his diſputing was in the way of dialogue, or interrogations, which ſavoured of a mind diſpoſed to bickering and contending. The old Academicks, who imitated Plato and Socrates, their firſt founders, uſed a problematick way of philoſophizing, and made a trade of diſputing pro and con, and were unſufferably litigious: So that Socrates's philoſophy ſeemed to bear Xantippe, i. e. to be clamorous and brawling. The Stoicks and Cynicks (who were the ſtiffeſt and moſt peremptory ſort of men, yet) were given to ſnarling and contradicting. It was obſerved of the Stoicks by a grave man, Plutarch. adv. Stoicos, that they exerciſed it on themſelves, they oftentimes ran from their own notions. But,

The Ariſtotelians (of which tribe there was plenty in Greece) were the moſt diſputing people of all, they were never at a non-plus, but had always ſomething to ſay. The great ſtagirite, who was the founder of them, ſet up in the world by refuting the doctrine of all that went before him: Like one of the race of the Ottomans, he thought he could not reign ſafely except in the firſt place he ſlew all his brethren philoſophers. And he could not but look for the ſame fate himſelf, and ſo it happened, for he was dealt with after the ſame rate that he treated his predeceſſors and competitors. And as for

The New Academicks, they diſputed of courſe, and were for and againſt all things; nay, they held an univerſal incomprehenſion; or, as ſome of them ſtiled it, an utter ſuſpenſion, which is as much as to ſay, they held nothing. So that it ſeems dubitation was the firſt principle of their philoſophy, as it was of Des Cartes's. This was called by others ἰσοσθένεια, which according to Sextus Empiricus is an equilibrium between believing and diſſenting. Falſhood and truth were equally probable; for which Lucian deſervedly derides the philoſophers in his ballance, where he brings them in weighing truth and falſhood, and making them of equal poize. At laſt out of the different diſputes and contentions of philoſophers ſprung up.

The Scepticks, thoſe ſchiſmaticks in philoſophy, who held no communion at all with the aſſemblies of philoſophers, but doubted of, or denied whatever they ſaid. Indeed theſe Scepticks, were but a bolder ſort of Academicks, or we may ſay, theſe ſet up firſt the doctrine of Indifferency and Acatalepſy, and the others improved it. Their aſſertion was that nothing can be defined and determined concerning any object, that to incline to one part or other, or to affirm or deny any thing, is unphiloſophical, and that all is mere appearance only. Pyrrhoniſm was a calumny to the whole profeſſion of philoſophers, a baffling of all ſcience and argument. They profeſſed a liberty of enquiry, and, as they thought fit, rejected the arguments of all men by virtue of that liberty. Some of theſe pretenders to philoſophick modeſty and ſelf-denial reaſoned themſelves out of their ſenſes. Some philoſophers denied motion whilſt their tongues wagged. Nay, there was an odd fellow (Anaxagorus they called him) who profeſſedly gave the lye to any one who ſaid ſnow was white, for he was pleaſed to maintain that it was as black as ſoot. Now certainly Tully's words prove true, that there is nothing ſo abſurd but one philoſopher or other aſſerted it, De Nat. Deor. l. 3. And that brief character which Tertullian gave of the philoſophers is verified, that they had a gift of ſetting up or pulling down what they pleaſed, De Anim. c. 3. This was the beſt of it, ſeeing nothing was aſſerted by any of them but ſome one would ſtand and oppoſe it, by this means falſhood was oppoſed as well as truth. But this was not to be attributed to any good deſign in them, but it proceeded wholly from their love of diſpute and quarrelling. But,

Chriſtianity runs counter to all this. It openly declares againſt diſputes and wranglings, and enjoineth us to ſpeak all the ſame things (i. e. to agree in all matters of faith) and that there be no ſchiſms and diviſions in the Church, but that all be perfectly joined together in the ſame mind and in the ſame judgment, i. e. that we believe, approve of, and profeſs the ſame neceſſary truths. The ſame Apoſtle bids us avoid fooliſh and unlearned queſtions, knowing that they gender ſtrife; and the ſervant of the Lord muſt not ſtrive. Some have obſerved, that when the Phariſees ſought out our Saviour to wrangle and contend with him about what he had done, he ſlipped aſide in the throng, and purpoſely evaded them. The deſign of the Goſpel is to put a period to conteſts and debates, which it happily effecteth by taking away the occaſion of all uncertainty. The Apoſtle aſſigns this to be the end of Chriſt's aſcending to Heaven and giving gifts to men, and conſtituting paſtors and teachers in the Church, Epheſ. iv. that we henceforth be no more children toſſed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the ſlight of men and cunning craftineſs, whereby they lye in wait to deceive (to which belongs the vain deceit in the text) but ſpeaking the truth in love (i. e. agreeing together unanimouſly to profeſs and maintain the ſame things) we may grow up unto him in all things, which is the head, even Chriſt, This is the noble deſign of the Evangelical Diſpenſation, it aims at agreement and concord, it baniſheth fruitleſs diſputes and controverſies, it is void of Sophiſtical wrangling and cavilling. This is the true and natural, the real and proper effect of Chriſtianity conſidered in it ſelf, and in its excellent principles: But if we ſee ſomething elſe in Chriſtendom (as with great regret we may) it is not to be attributed to the nature and genius of the Goſpel, or of thoſe that are the true and genuine profeſſors of it. Whereas

The philoſophers were naturally contentious and brawling; they delighted to amuſe and puzzle the world, they dealt in ſophiſtry and fallacies, and were converſant in ſhiftings and windings, like thoſe ſort of combatants in the Roman Spectacles, whoſe aim was to catch their adverſaries in a net. Theſe men too ſtudied to intangle; which was no ſmall argument of the vanity and emptineſs of their philoſophy.

3. Their philoſophy was idle and trifling. Had their controverſies been about great and weighty matters, they might have met with ſome excuſe; but that which ſtigmatizeth them for fooliſh and vain perſons was this, that they jangled about mean and worthleſs propoſitions, they were at daggers-drawing about idle and uſeleſs things, and ſuch as were not for the real profit of the world, conducing nothing to the bettering their minds or manners, to the advancing any ſolid truth, or the reforming of mens lives. The Apoſtle obſerves of them that they became vain in their imaginations, Rom. i. 21. or, in their reaſons and arguings (ſo it may be rendred). Theſe were of no uſe, their diſcourſes were childiſh and fooliſh, they were conceited and capricious, they affected curioſities and niceties, they purſued ſhadows, and neglected ſubſtantial and uſeful inquiſitions. This humour of the Gnoſticks, who were conſiderable retainers to philoſophy, was charged upon them by Paul in his firſt Epiſtle to Timothy, ch. vi. 4. where he deciphers them to be proud, knowing nothing (though they ſo much affected to be eſteemed knowing men, and accordingly had their name from their monopolizing of knowledge and wiſdom to themſelves) doting about queſtions and ſtrifes of words (νοσȣ͂ντες, they were ſick about queſtions, as the Greek word imports, they were not well till they were diſputing) whereof cometh envy, ſtrife, railings, perverſe diſputings, παραδιατριβαὶ. Διατριβαὶ was the word to expreſs their philoſophical exercitations; ſee Diog. Laert. in Ariſtippo. And the perverſe and ſiniſter uſe of thoſe diſputes and exerciſes is ſignified by the prepoſition παρὰ. They had unworthy conflicts and ſcuffles among their Diſſertations: Therefore the Apoſtle gives them their own word with a little altering, to denote the perverſe fondneſs of their diſputes, which in the ſame chapter he ſtiles Κενοφωνίας vain babblings, which is part of the vain deceit in the text, the vain and trifling way wherein they purſued their deluſions.

In purſuance of this Hierocles writ a book of philoſophical jeſts, where he gives a catalogue of philoſophical bulls, or abſurdities, and laſhes them for it. They were contemptible and ridiculous for this at laſt; and a philoſopher (as Epictetus ſaith) was a creature that all men laughed at, Arrian. Diſſert. Of theſe was true what my Lord Bacon ſaith of the ſchoolmen, that by their petty and childiſh queſtions, they marred the ſolidity of all ſciences. Their philoſophy was made up of idle and uſeleſs diſquiſitions, of verbal conteſts, of unedifying diſputes. They puzzled their auditors, and perplexed themſelves with unneceſſary ſubtilties and vain curioſities: They contented themſelves with dry and ſapleſs notions, with jejune and frigid ſpeculations.

But theſe are unworthy of a Chriſtian, whoſe religion forbids all fooliſh bickerings and degladiations about mean and inconſiderable matters. This laborious idleneſs, this ſolemn trifling becomes him not. We are bleſſed under the Chriſtian Diſpenſation with ſolid and ſubſtantial truths, we are entertained with things that are material and weighty, and which are worthy of a rational enquiry. All the Evangelical diſcoveries are uſeful and profitable, of vaſt concern and neceſſity. We are not put off with trifles, but are invited to ſtudy and converſe with ſerious and manly doctrines, ſuch as are fraught with great ſenſe, with high matter, with diſcoveries of vaſt moment and importance; which cannot be ſaid of the philoſophy which the Apoſtle ſpeaks of, which I have proved to be light and vain, as well as uncertain and quarrelſome. And now,

I will make it appear, that the Pagan philoſophers deceived and deluded men, by inſtilling into their minds erroneous principles, and by promoting vicious practices in their lives. Error and vice, unſound maxims and evil manners, falſity and immorality were the iſſue of that philoſophy which our Apoſtle here cautions the Coloſſians againſt. And, that I may touch at the particular ſects which he here intends, I ſhall ranſack the principles, 1. Of the Pythagoreans and Platoniſts, whom the Gnoſticks affected. 2. Of the Epicureans. 3. Of the Stoicks. 4. Of theſe and other philoſophers together:

Firſt, I begin with the philoſophy of the Pythagoreans and Platoniſts, which was at that time taken up by the Gnoſticks, who by the confeſſion of all were philoſophically diſpoſed, and gave no ſmall trouble on that account to our Apoſtle and others to convince and refute them. And indeed the learned Hammond underſtands the text wholly of the corrupt doctrine of Simon Magus, the Simonians and Gnoſticks, who borrowed their wild notions from the Pythagorean philoſophy, and withal judaized in impoſing the obſervation of the Moſaick law, which that learned perſon thinks is meant by the rudiments of the world. They made a medley of philoſophy and Divinity, a ſtrange rhapſody of the Jewiſh cabala, and the Platonical and Pythagorean conceits. They affected to introduce the theology of Orpheus and Heſiod into Chriſtianity. But a particular inſtance of the deceit of their philoſophy is mentioned in the 18th verſe of this chapter. Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility, (or, more exactly according to the Greek, pleaſing himſelf in humility) and worſhipping of Angels. For it ſeems theſe Gnoſticks were diſpoſed to worſhip Angels, and thought it no little ſpecimen of their humility and modeſty to do ſo. They would not be ſo bold as to offer prayers to God immediately, but they begged of the Angels to preſent them to him. It is certain that Celſus, and other Pagan philoſophers uſed to defend their Polytheiſm this way. And it is plain, that it was a ſpice of Gentiliſm, becauſe the Heathens had their Dii Medioxumi, ſpirits that were mediators between the Supream Deity and men, whoſe office was to offer the prayers and oblations of mortals to the gods. To this queſtionleſs the Apoſtle refers in his worſhipping of Angels.

This part of the Gentiles theology concerning demons or inferior deities, whoſe office was to mediate between the ſovereign gods and mortal men, is that philoſophy which the Apoſtle admoniſheth the Coloſſians to take heed of. To this purpoſe, Mr. Mede interprets that Prophecy in 1 Tim. iv. 1. The Spirit ſpeaketh expreſly, that in the latter days ſome ſhall depart from the faith, giving heed to ſeducing ſpirits, and doctrines of devils. Whereby theſe doctrines of devils are not meant, ſaith he, in his apoſtacy of the latter times, ſuch doctrines as ſprung from the Devil, or from deviliſh teachers and impoſtors, but the doctrines about demons or deceaſed ſpirits. And he explains this by a like ſpeech, in Acts xiii. 12. the doctrine of the Lord, i. e. the doctrine about the Lord. So that, according to this learned man, here is meant that Paganiſh and idolatrous doctrine of worſhipping demons or departed heroes. And this part of the Gentile theology the Apoſtle foretels ſhall creep into the Church, and be received among Chriſtians, i. e. worſhipping and invocating of ſaints, who anſwer to the Pagan heroes, ſhall be practiſed among ſome of them, as it was by the Gnoſticks: And that it is in uſe among the Papiſts is evident to all the world, and there are few of that Church that are very ſollicitous to deny it.

This worſhipping of Saints and Angels, though it was reckoned a piece of modeſty, was, as the Apoſtle tells us in the next words, a ſingular inſtance of boldneſs and impudence; for the man who worſhippeth them intrudes into thoſe things which he hath not ſeen, vainly puffed up by his fleſhly mind. He ſaucily preſumes to determine of matters not known; he peremptorily aſſerts what he pleaſeth of the orders and ranks of Angels, whoſe œconomy is not diſcovered to us below. His humility therefore which he talks of is but a pretence; as meager and lank as he ſeems to be, he is really ſwell'd and puft up: Whiles he pretends humility, he hath nothing of it; or if he hath any ſuch thing, he is proud even of that.

The Gnoſtick philoſophy then is deſervedly ſtiled knowledge falſely ſo called, it makes a ſhew of being humble, and at the ſame time dictates the higheſt arrogance. Their diſputes therefore are called prophane janglings, becauſe they ſavour only of their own inſolent humour, and proceed without any ground of revelation. For this is it we are to rely upon in this matter, namely, that there is but one mediator between God and man, even the man Chriſt Jeſus. Invocation and worſhip are proper to God only, and Chriſt is the only interceſſor to the Father, and therefore to apply our addreſſes to ſaints or angels, is an abſolute diſhonour to the merits and interceſſion of our Saviour. From whence you may take notice how abominable the doctrine and practice of the Papiſts are. They blaſpheme whilſt they pretend to worſhip, they are groſly idolatrous in attributing that to the creature, which is due only to the Creator.

And thus you ſee how the Gnoſticks, (from whom the Church of Rome borrowed her doctrine as to this particular; (ſee the heretical tree of Popery, where you have the roots of all their doctrines;) by pretences to a higher and ſublimer knowledge than others had attained to, corrupted and ſpoiled mens minds, and by their bold and daring notions adulterated the ſimplicity of the Goſpel. Of which the Apoſtle was juſtly jealous, when he ſaid, I fear leſt by any means, as the ſerpent beguiled Eve through his ſubtilty, ſo their minds ſhould be corrupted from the ſimplicity that is in Chriſt, 2 Cor. xi. 3. And this is that which, it is likely, the Apoſtle ſpeaks of in his Epiſtles to Timothy and Titus, where, by fables and endleſs genealogies, he means the idle and fabulous pedigrees of Angels, which under the name of Æones the Gnoſticks talked ſo much of, which they partly borrowed from the Platoniſts and Pythagoreans, of which you may read a particular account in Irenæus, Tertullian and Epiphanius. They will ſatisfy you, that the Gnoſtick hereticks received theſe things from thoſe philoſophers who were adorers of demons and Angels, and made them mediators between God and man. I will quote only one paſſage out of Plato for the ſatisfaction of the learned, God (ſaith he, in Sympoſ.) is not mingled with man, i. e. hath no converſe and intercourſe with him; therefore by theſe is held all that communication and intercourſe which is between God and men, theſe carry mens prayers to God, and God's commands to men. Therefore, Plutarch (de Oſir. & Iſid.) repreſenting this philoſopher's opinions, tells us, that he held it to be the office of demons, i. e. Angels to convey mens petitions to Heaven.

And here by the by it might be obſerved, that many old hereſies roſe from philoſophy, eſpecially from the Platonick philoſophy in the three firſt centuries, as the hereſies of Simon Magus, and of the Valentinians, and of the Marcionites, and of the Manichees, as the fathers who confute theſe hereticks let us ſee, and complain of it often.

Tertullian (de Præſcript. Hæretic.) particularly ſheweth, that many hereſies in Chriſtianity came from philoſophy, particularly the doctrine of the Æones and Forms came from Valentinus who was a Platoniſt, and ſo other errors from Marcion who was a Stoick, and others from the Epicureans, &c. All theſe, ſaith he, are made up of the fables and fancies of philoſophers. Athens and Jeruſalem were blended, the academy and the Church were unhappily mixed; there was a Stoical and Platonical Chriſtianity. Hence he ſaith, (in Apol. c. 47.) that hereticks are begot of the ſeed of philoſophers, and that philoſophers are the patriarchs of hereticks, Adv. Hermogen, c. 8. Nay,

I might farther remark, that not only the theology of ſome of the hereticks, but likewiſe of ſome of the learnedeſt fathers was almoſt ſpoiled by philoſophy, and particularly by that of the Platoniſts. I might inſtance in Origen, Juſtin Martyr, and Clemens Alexandrinus, about the doctrine of the eternal Λόγος; they ſpoke as Heraclitus, Plato and Socrates did, and thereby gave ſcope for the Arian hereſy. More eſpecially it may be obſerved, that Origen borrowed his Divinity from Plato, and that corrupted him, as Gaudentius proves in ſeveral particulars. It was from his following of Plato, that he propagated the opinion of the ceaſing of hell torments. So likewiſe, he borrowed the pre-exiſtence of ſouls from Plato's ſchool, and therefore one (Harmenopul. de ſect. 9.) ſaid rightly, he taught according to the Greeks (meaning the Platoniſts) that ſouls did exiſt before their bodies. The reaſon of this is well known, Origen, Juſtin, Clemens, and other fathers, were Platonick philoſophers before they were converted to Chriſtianity, and therefore, it is no wonder that they brought ſome of their Philoſophical errors into Chriſtianity. I need not tell you, that the Church in its firſt times explained and defended its principles of religion by the way of Plato's philoſophy; beſides that, I might ſuggeſt this, (which is a great truth) that Platoniſm of all the ſects of philoſophy, came neareſt to Chriſtianity. Hence the Platoniſt who read the firſt verſes of the firſt chapter of John's Goſpel ſaid that Barbarian had ſtolen from his maſter. Yea, I could add what Clemens of Alexandria in his ſtromata tells us, that they made the Chriſtian Divinity as like Gentile Philoſophy as they well could, and they cauſed the Holy Doctrine of Chriſt to approach to the received notions of philoſophers; and made the Holy Scriptures ſpeak Platoniſm, that they might by that means gain proſelytes to the Chriſtian Religion. I appeal to you now upon theſe things, whether theſe good men were not in danger of being ſpoiled through philoſophy.

Secondly, Leaving the Platoniſts, I come to examine the falſe and pernicious principles of the Epicureans, with whom we are informed, by Acts xvii. 18. our Apoſtle encountred. Their philoſophical deceits were ſuch as theſe.

So they held that chance and fortune were the riſe of this world, and of all things in it: That the world was not made or created by an Underſtanding Being, but commenced by a ſtrong juncto of atoms, which clubbed together (though without counſel and intelligence) to erect this great and ſtately fabrick. Theſe men had no notion at all of a creation, for their old ſaw was, nothing is made of nothing; ſee Laert. in Epicuro. And therefore, according to their maſters, Democritus and Epicurus, they agreed to give the world its date from thoſe capering atoms, as if that would ſolve the buſineſs, Laert. in Democrito. But indeed according to their hypotheſis it had no date at all, for all this atomick buſtle was from eternity.

As the Platoniſts held the world was eternal by neceſſity, ſo the Epicureans aſſerted its eternity, but ſaid it was by chance. The world, according to them, was a ſtrange by-blow of nature, begot by mere fortune. Theſe were the wild conceits they took up, rather than they would be beholden to God for the production of the world; that is, rather than they would acknowledge a Wiſe Omnipotent Being that was the author of it, rather than they would own the principle of the world's beginning, and that by a Power Divine. As for their notion, it is ſo poor and precarious, that no man of any conſiſtency of thoughts can give credit to it.

Nay, not to ſpeak of the utter impoſſibility of the thing it ſelf; for what is made cannot be from eternity, i. e. cannot be without a beginning, for its being made, neceſſarily ſuppoſes one that made it to have been before it; and if he was before it, then it was not from eternity, for there is nothing hath the priority of eternity. But it is enough that this Epicurean doctrine is confronted by the Chriſtian Philoſophy. Through faith we underſtand that the worlds were framed by the Word of God, ſo that things which are ſeen were not made of things which do appear, Heb. xi. 3. And as the ſame inſpired author argues in another place, Every houſe is built by ſome man, but he that built all things is God, Heb. iii. 4. As much as to ſay, there is a great reaſon, nay greater, to be perſuaded that this vaſt ſtructure of the univerſe was built and erected by a Divine Hand, than that we ſhould believe that the ſtately habitations and palaces which we ſee, were made by ſome artiſts. The world is the fabrick of Divinity, the temple of God,

—Mundi magnum & verſatile templum.

So far Lucretius went, but we may go farther. It is a wonderful ſyſtem contrived by an All-wiſe and Omnipotent Being. It is a temple made by God, and dedicated to him. As the world had a beginning, ſo it had its beginning of exiſting from God. In the beginning God created the Heaven and the earth: In the beginning; therefore the world was not from eternity; God created, therefore it was not by chance.

2. As the Epicureans affirmed the world was by chance, ſo (conſiſtently enough with that principle) they held it was left to ſhift for itſelf. And truly this was no abſurd conſequence from the former aſſertion; for if the world made itſelf, it might as well be thought to look after itſelf. Theſe men, in their moſt ſober determinations, would not ſuffer God to intermeddle with the government of the world; they complemented the Godhead out of its juriſdiction over mankind and things here below, by ſaying he ſhould not give himſelf the trouble of having any reſentments of things on earth, and taking care of human affairs. Not unlike to theſe were thoſe abſurd Atheiſtical people in Zech. i. 12. who ſaid, The Lord will not do good, neither will he do evil.

The reaſon of this was that ἀταραξία, which the Epicureans ſay is in God; he is at quiet in himſelf, and it would diſturb him to provide for the world, Cic. de nat. deor. l. 1.) The Being which is happy (ſay they, Laert. in Epicuro.) hath no employ of its own, and it creates no buſineſs to others; for buſineſs and care would diſtract, and render unhappy. They yet more blaſphemouſly add, that ſuch a buſy God would cauſe perpetual dread in the minds of men, and they muſt always ſtand in awe of him, if he conſtantly took notice of them and their actions Cic. de nat. deor. l. 1.

Theſe were the vile blaſphemies of the Epicurean philoſophy. But,

Chriſtianity hath rendered it clear and undeniable, that God hath an inſpection into all human actions, and diſpoſes and directs all occurrences to his own glory. At his beck and command are all men and devils, glorified angels and departed ſouls: nothing comes to paſs in Heaven, or earth, or hell itſelf, without his cognizance and controul. Like a prudent maſter of a family he ſuffers nothing to be done by any member of it without his licenſe or permiſſion. Providence is ſpread as wide as the univerſe; nor is there any thing, be it never ſo little and mean, exempted from its tuition, no, not the fall of a ſparrow, nor of a hair of the head, as our great and infallible inſtructor hath aſcertained us. Well, therefore, doth Octavius (who repreſents the Chriſtian in Minutius Felix) in anſwer to Cæcilius's objection againſt Providence, viz. that God is in Heaven, and cannot ſee all things below; well doth he aſſert, "That all things are full of God; that he is not only moſt near to us, but infuſed into us; we not only act under him, but live with him; we are not only in his eye, but in his boſom.

This was the rate of the old Chriſtianity, as it was derived from the Prophets and holy men, and particularly from our Apoſtle, who excellently aſſerts the providence of God, ſaying, He is not far from every one of us; for in him we live, and move, and have our being, as he tells the Athenian philoſophers, Acts xvii. 27. intending thereby directly to confront the doctrine of the Epicureans, with whom he encountered at that time. All that I will add under this head is this, that the Epicureans exempting God from all employment and adminiſtration of things, was ſuitable enough to their known hypotheſis of an idle, lazy and pleaſurable life: They thought it a happy thing to be free from cares and buſineſs, and to indulge themſelves in all pleaſure; and accordingly they attributed the ſame happineſs to God which they deſired and liked themſelves. And this reminds me of the Third deceitful opinion of the Epicureans, which was this, that happineſs conſiſted in pleaſure. Clemens Alexandrinus, ſpeaking of theſe words, Beware leſt any man ſpoil you through philoſophy, ſaith, the Apoſtle meant them of the Epicurean philoſophy, and eſpecially that part of it which denies providence, and deifies pleaſure. Theſe mens avowed principle was, that ſenſual delight is the ſource of all good, and the ſoveraign bleſſedneſs of mankind, Athenæ. Deipnoſoph. 1. Yet Epicurus is repreſented to be a very abſtinent and mortified man, Diog. Laert. in Epicuro; and others ſay he was a great glutton and drunkard. But from what he farther adds (when he diſtinctly ſets down his principles and perſwaſions) it is evident that this philoſopher placed not happineſs in bodily pleaſure, i. e. not in that only; for his avowed opinion was, that happineſs conſiſted both in mind and body, in the peace and tranquillity of the former, and in the eaſe and health of the latter, ibid. He held, that the pleaſure which ariſes from both theſe, is the beginning and end of a happy life. But that he might not be miſconſtrued, he adds farther, "When we ſay, ſaith he, that pleaſure is the end and happineſs of a man, we do not mean the pleaſures of the luxurious, and ſuch as are placed in the fruition of worldly delights, (as ſome ignorantly or maliciouſly interpret our words) but we ſay this pleaſure conſiſts in an abſence of bodily pain and perturbation of mind." Nay, he goes on further, and declares, that virtue alone, abſtracted from bodily pleaſure, is never ſeparated from pleaſure. And many other excellent notions he hath, which diſcover him to have been a good man, conſidering he was but a Heathen. Which may induce us to think, that ſome of thoſe other things, which he is reported to have held, are not a juſt repreſentation of his own opinions, but rather of what ſome of his deluded followers took up. But,

If I may gueſs at the reaſon of his being thus miſrepreſented, I conceive it was this, becauſe he was ſingular and different from the reſt of the philoſophers, as to his ſchool or place of philoſophizing, which was a pleaſant garden. Some might think that this had ſome influence on his ſtudies and opinions, and that he was a light airy man, addicted to bodily pleaſure, and that he placed man's happineſs in it, eſpecially when it was his real opinion and profeſſion, that happineſs conſiſted in pleaſure. This philoſopher's pher's caſe, methinks, was like that of Nicolas the Deacon, who, though he was himſelf of a pure and blameleſs life, yet from him the filthy and diſſolute Nicolaitans took their name. So though Epicurus himſelf might be a man of abſtinence and ſobriety, yet it is certain that his followers, i. e. thoſe who called themſelves after his name, did roundly maintain, that ſenſual and bodily pleaſure was the only good to be ſought after, and paſſionately proſecuted by all men. By brutes they ſhould have ſaid, for corporeal pleaſure is all the happineſs that thoſe creatures are capable of, or concern themſelves for. But man's chief part is his ſoul, which was made and deſigned for nobler pleaſures, and cannot find any ſolid ſatiſfaction but in them, and therefore God hath provided him ſuch to be his chief entertainment.

The Apoſtle takes notice of that Epicurean ſtrain, [Let us eat and drink, for to morrow we die, 1 Cor. xv. 32.] and replies to it, 1. With an intimation of the vain deceit of theſe ſwiniſh philoſophers, Be not deceived. 2. With a ſober check borrowed from one of their poets, Evil communications corrupt good manners. And 3dly, He anſwers yet more Apoſtolically in the words following, Awake to righteouſneſs and ſin not, for ſome have not the knowledge of God. Theſe, ſaith he, are downright Atheiſts, void of the true knowledge and ſenſe of a Deity, and of another life. Which brings me to the Fourth pernicious opinion of the Epicureans, viz. That there is no life after this, that there is no future exiſtence or ſtate of ſouls to be expected. And herein again theſe men are conſiſtent with themſelves; this is a natural conſequence of their former aſſertion. If ſenſual and bodily pleaſure be all the happineſs which is the portion of mankind, then there can be little or no entertainment for the ſoul if it ſhould be ſeparated from the body, and therefore it is fit to believe that the ſoul periſheth with the body, and there is no future ſtate after this; ſee Plutarch de Placit. Philoſ. l. iv. And Laertius in Epicuro aſſures us, that it was his opinion, that men vainly trouble themſelves with the fear of ſome terrible thing in another and everlaſting ſtate, as if there were any thing after death. Therefore, When the reſurrection was preached to the Epicureans by Paul, which implies a future life, they were ſtartled at it, and looked upon it as a new and ſtrange doctrine; Acts xvii. 19. All is concluded, ſaid they, in this world, and therefore they made much of themſelves whilſt they were here, and lived as they liſted, not looking at all for any puniſhments or rewards hereafter. But this is ſo diametrically oppoſite to the natural notions and dictates of rectified minds, which are not debauched with prejudice and ſenſuality, and ſo fully baffled by the principles of the Chriſtian religion, that it will be but loſt labour to offer at the confutation of it. I ſhall only deſire you to reflect upon this and the other dangerous ſentiments of the Epicurean philoſophy, and to conſider how reaſonable and neceſſary it was that the Apoſtle ſhould caution his followers againſt it, and intimate to them that this was a philoſophy by which they would certainly be ſpoiled and ruined if they adhered to it.

Thirdly; I will preſent to your view the deceitful ethicks of the Stoicks, who were another ſort of antagoniſts our Apoſtle grappled with; Acts xvii. 18. From what topicks he diſputed with them may be gathered from the knowledge of theſe things, which that ſect was moſt conſiderable for. And we read they were noted for the notion of fatal neceſſity, for their proud and conceited humour, and for their doctrine of apathy.

Their firſt beloved notion was that of fatality; they held that God and all things are tied up by fate, that the ſame irrevocable neceſſity hampers all beings Divine and human, and that particularly men are ſo reſtrained by the deſtinies, that they cannot act freely, but all their actions, whether internal or external, are forced; ſee Plut. de contradict. Stoic. and Seneca de Provident. cap. 5. This was the opinion of the ſevereſt ſort of Stoicks, which cramps all religion, and enervates all the attempts and enterprizes of virtue, and robs man of his rational nature, and indeed makes him a ſtock rather than a man, and therefore is a doctrine unworthy of mankind, and conſequently of the Chriſtian inſtitution, which is no ways repugnant to the reaſonable nature of man. Why therefore may not this be thought to be part of this deceitful philoſophy which the Apoſtle ſpeaks againſt? But to do the Stoicks right, this was the ſentiment but of ſome of them, and as for the more intelligent and ſober ſort of them, they were of another perſuaſion; or rather, to ſpeak more impartially, they ran counter to their own perſuaſions. Seneca, Antoninus, Epictetus, who every where inculcate faith, yet defend the liberty of the will. And Lipſius (who was well acquainted with thoſe mens writings and notions) declares, that the Stoicks fate is no more than the immutability of the Divine Decrees, which takes not away the freedom of man's will, or the contingency of events as to us; Phyſ. Stoic. l. i. Diſſertat. 12. Thus fate and freedom were reconciled, and there was no hurt done to Chriſtianity. And by the by, this doctrine of the Stoicks fatal neceſſity and free will being conſiſtent, may teach us to moderate our diſputes, and to reconcile the Divine Decree with the freedom of man. It was no abſurd doctrine among them, and I do not ſee why it ſhould be among us at this day. But I cannot ſo eaſily acquit the Stoicks of the

Second thing they were noted for, was their pride and arrogance, their inſufferable inſolence and oſtentation. Three inſtances; among others, I will give of their proud and haughty ſpirit.

1. They held that their wiſe man was not indebted to God for any virtue or worthy accompliſhment which he was maſter of, but that he was furniſhed out of his own ſtock. He was beholden to himſelf only that he was good and virtuous. The Stoicks wiſe man was upright and juſt of himſelf, and ſtood not in need of others helps: his happineſs was all from what he had by his own power and will; ſee Seneca Ep. 49, 59, and 31, 58, and 73.

And other Stoicks indulged this way of talking, this vain Rhodomontade. It is quoted by Stobeus; Eclog. Phyſic. and Plutarch, De commun. Notionib. as a ſaying of Chryſippus, (a man that was in high eſteem among that ſect of philoſophers; as being one of their founders) Jupiter did not exceed Dion in virtue, (which is yet better and more ſmartly expreſſed with an equivoke in the Greek) yea, Jupiter and he were equally helpful to one another. And that of Epictetus is ſomething like it; If thou art a wiſe man, thou art not inferior to the gods in point of underſtanding and reaſon; What think you now of theſe Stoicks? Can there be more manifeſt proof of their unmeaſurable arrogance and elation of mind? Are they not as well as the Epicureans horribly prophane and blaſphemous, though in a different way. The one denies a God and Providence, the other makes his God to come ſhort of his wiſe man; or, which is the ſame, he makes his wiſe man much better than his God.

You ſee therefore how reaſonable it was that our Apoſtle ſhould caution againſt this ſect of philoſophy, leſt the minds of men ſhould be perverted by it. This is the philoſophy that will ſpoil a man, or elſe there is none in the world that will do it. The Chriſtian religion therefore is in direct oppoſition to it. Thoſe arrogant and blaſphemous boaſtings are repugnant to the Chriſtian ſimplicity and the tenour of the Goſpel, which every where beateth down all high and lofty thoughts, and bids us pray and intreat, and humbly ſue for the Divine Aſſiſtance, and be throughly ſenſible of our own weakneſs and diſability. This acquaints us that every good and perfect gift is from above, and that there is nothing which we have that was not received thence, that we cannot think, nor ſpeak, much leſs act any thing that is good without the aſſiſtance of the Divine Power; that we are conſtantly beholden to God; that we depend upon him for all things, eſpecially as to grace and goodneſs. Theſe are wholly derived from him, and we are ever to acknowledge that he is the Author and Finiſher of them in us.

2. They held that it was below a man to do any good act, with any reſpect to a reward to be received for the doing of it. Theſe ſoaring ſouls would needs maintain that virtue is to be loved, and good to be done merely for its own ſake; they declared that the foreſight of a recompence did not influence upon them at all in what they did or ſuffered; and that no good man ought to make any thing a motive to virtue and goodneſs, but theſe themſelves. Seneca, Epictetus, Arianus, Antoninus and other Stoicks will furniſh you with paſſages to this purpoſe. But Chriſtianity (which is the ſublimeſt doctrine in the world) is not of this ſtrain, if we may credit one of the greateſt profeſſors of it, who freely declares, that if in this life only we have hope, we are of all men moſt miſerable; 1 Cor. xv. 19. From whence it appears that there muſt be an expectation of another life, there muſt be the aſſurance of a future recompence joined with the pleaſure and intrinſic goodneſs of a holy life. It is true, it is ſervile to fix the eye altogether on the wages; but it is diſingenuous and ungrateful not to take notice of the reward which God hath purpoſely ſet before us. Therefore when theſe men; ſee Sen. Epiſt. 81. tell us that no reward is to be looked after, when like the love-phariſees (called ſo in the Talmud; Sota. c. 1.) they pretend to obey the law merely and only out of love of virtue, without the leaſt reſpect to a future ſtate, we may reaſonably conclude that in this, as in other things, they affect chimæra's and fictions, and are ready on all occaſions to give proof of their ſelf-conceit and haughty imaginations.

3. To give another inſtance of theſe mens unſufferable pride, they grew up to ſuch a pitch of it, that they were inclined to throw off magiſtracy and government, and to withdraw themſelves and others from the juriſdiction of the powers they lived under. Their wiſe man was a king, nay king of kings (as you heard before), and thence they would infer that he was above all allegiance and ſubjection to authority. This notion made them ſo domineering and imperious, that they broke out into tumults and ſeditions, as Tacitus obſerves of them in his Annals. It went againſt the philoſophick grain to be ſubjects and ſervants. But this is contrary to Paul's politicks, Let every ſoul be ſubject to the higher powers; and to his œconomicks, Art thou called a ſervant? mind it not, i. e. do not think that that condition renders thee the worſe in the ſight of God: Serve God and thy maſter at once, and therein thou wilt ſhew thy ſelf a good Chriſtian. So much of the Stoicks pride.

The third thing they were taken notice of for, and which was a piece of ſingularity in theſe philoſophers, was their apathy, as Laertius, in Zenone, acquaints us. And we are told by another, Plin. lib. vii. c. 19. that Diogenes the Cynick (for you muſt know the Cynicks were but overgrown Stoicks) was a great maintainer of it. This put an unneceſſary reſtraint and violence upon the natural affections of mankind, and would not allow human nature either to laugh or weep. Their wiſe man that they made was but a ſtatue, (and ſo indeed he was as good as ſome of their gods): He was ſtupid and ſenſeleſs upon occaſion: He was not permitted to reſent the occurrences of the world, were they never ſo ſurpriſing and admirable. He was to be ſilent upon the rack; and when the ſtone or gout tortured him, he was to force a ſmile: And it was a mortal ſin (for you muſt remember all ſins were alike with theſe gentlemen) to wax pale at the ſight or feeling of the inciſion-knife. He was to play with torments, and to ſport with pain and miſery. Thus they believed the ſenſe of morality was to devour all ſenſe of humanity. But this was the doctrine of ſome only of that rigid ſect. The ſobereſt of them did neither ſpeak nor think thus: The apathy or indolency which they maintained was a very laudable and innocent thing. Let Seneca ſpeak for them, I do not (ſaith he, in Epiſt. 71.) draw out a man from amongſt mankind, and place him out of the number of men; for he that is ſenſeleſs is no man. And this philoſopher's practice was ſuitable to this principle, for we find him in his writings often reſenting the evils which befel the world, himſelf, or his relations. So Antoninus ſirnamed the Philoſopher, ſhed tears upon occaſion of a friend's death; and his father Antoninus Pius (for he was his ſon by adoption) excuſed him, ſaying, Permit him to be a man. Arianus, l. 3. c. 2. profeſſedly declares againſt that apathy which takes away that natural affection. It becomes a man (ſaith he) not to be ſenſeleſs and immoveable, but to keep and preſerve his natural and acquired affections and relations, as a father, a ſon, a brother, a citizen. The affections are not to be eradicated and expelled, but the beſt way is to change them and turn about, and fit them for our purpoſe, and ſo make them eaſy and advantagious to us, Plut. de Curioſ. Reaſon, and nature, and Chriſtianity approve of the emotions of our affections ſo far as they are inſtrumental to virtue, and are reſtrained within their due limits. The paſſions are not wholly to be rooted up, but to be diverted; they are not to be baniſhed, but to be curbed and kept under. Theſe Gibeonites are not to be killed, but to be made ſerviceable, and kept in obedience. Jeſus wept over the grave of his friend, and thereby for ever hallowed all tears, and conſecrated all natural and human affections. It is certain that the paſſions are of great uſe in religion, and may be ſubſervient to the nobleſt ends and purpoſes of it. Therefore our Apoſtle might juſtly enter his caveat here againſt thoſe hard and flinty philoſophers, who talked of an utter diſpaſſion, and would make men to be iron and ſtones.

Thus I have acquainted you what were the opinions and practices of the Epicurean and Stoick philoſophers with whom Paul grappled. Thence you may gueſs what the Apoſtle and they diſputed about, and thence you may gather likewiſe what the Apoſtle means when he warns the Chriſtian Coloſſians that they be not ſpoiled through philoſophy and vain deceit. I will only make this remark or reflection in the cloſe, that theſe Epicureans and Stoicks among the Pagans anſwer to the Sadducees and Phariſees among the Jews. There is a great affinity between thoſe two ſorts of antagoniſts. The Epicureans, like the Sadducees, placed all their hopes in this life, and therefore would be very merry and frolick: The Stoicks, like the Phariſees, were demure, and great pretenders to auſterity and ſublime virtues, though they came but little ſhort of the others in point of true morality.

I have hitherto ſhewed the deceitful opinions which were peculiar and proper to thoſe particular ſects of philoſophers I have named. Now in the next place, I will ſet before you thoſe groſs and miſtaken notions, which for the moſt part were common to them all. I will diſcover the deceitfulneſs of the Pagan Philoſophy, by inſtancing in ſome principles and practices which were not only maintained by the particular ſects above named, but alſo by all the reſt of the philoſophers. I will reduce them to theſe two heads, 1. Their deceitful opinions and practices relating to ſome particular vices and virtues. 2. Their falſe ſentiments concerning happineſs.

In purſuance of the firſt, I ſhall preſent you with their pride, their revenge, their ſelf-murder, their lewdneſs, and other miſtakes in their morals.

1. Pride was the Catholick blemiſh, the general ſtain of all the philoſophers: Yea, it ſeemed even to be congenial to them to be immoderately proud of their attainments. There could not be a more viſible diſcovery of this than their deſire of applauſe and acclamations. By their ſubtilty and ſophiſtry they thought to conciliate a great fame and honour, than which nothing was dearer to them, even when they ſeemed to ſhun them. Excellently to this purpoſe Plutarch obſerves that the author of that ſaying, Λάθε βιώσας, live retiredly and unknown, would not lie hid himſelf: He would be known by that motto; whilſt he affected an obſcurity, he reached at fame. Thoſe that give ſuch precepts, (ſaith he, de occulte videndo.) follow after glory, and yet at the ſame time ſeem to turn away from it: Whilſt they look full at it, they pretend to look another way. Some of them, even whilſt they writ againſt glory, ambitioned it. Our own philoſophers, (ſaith Tully, in Tuſc. quæſt.) ſet their names to thoſe books which treat of deſpiſing of glory. And the ſame obſervation you meet with in Valerius Maximus, Glory is not deſpiſed, no not of thoſe who endeavour to introduce the contempt of it; for we ſee they are very careful to affix their names to their very books that they put forth, lib. 8. c. 14. A philoſopher, ſaith Tertullian, de Anima. cap. 1. is a vain-glorious animal; and Jerom, (in Epiſt. ad Pammach. & ad Julian.) ſaith the very ſame of him, and addeth, that he is a mercenary ſlave of applauſe. Tertullian, ſpeaking of the philoſophers in another place, ſaith they were traders for fame, Apolog. cap. 46. and this was the commodity they were moſt eager to purchaſe. Another time he ſaith they were men that luſted after glory, and made fame their miſtreſs. This was the noted badge of the beſt of them, to hunt after glory with too great an impatience; and they would do any baſe and ſervile thing to get a name.

We may truly ſay of them that they lived upon applauſe; and if fame did not trumpet them, they could not breathe. But to inſtance in the arrogant humour of thoſe who were thought the modeſteſt and moſt ſelf-denying philoſophers, viz. the Cynicks, their daily buſineſs was to decry the pride of others. But whilſt they did ſo, and profeſſed to be maſters of the greateſt humility, they pher's caſe, methinks, was like that of Nicolas the Deacon, who, though he was himſelf of a pure and blameleſs life, yet from him the filthy and diſſolute Nicolaitans took their name. So though Epicurus himſelf might be a man of abſtinence and ſobriety, yet it is certain that his followers, i. e. thoſe who called themſelves after his name, did roundly maintain, that ſenſual and bodily pleaſure was the only good to be ſought after, and paſſionately proſecuted by all men. By brutes they ſhould have ſaid, for corporeal pleaſure is all the happineſs that thoſe creatures are capable of, or concern themſelves for. But man's chief part is his ſoul, which was made and deſigned for nobler pleaſures, and cannot find any ſolid ſatisfaction but in them, and therefore God hath provided him ſuch to be his chief entertainment.

The Apoſtle takes notice of that Epicurean ſtrain, [Let us eat and drink, for to morrow we die, 1 Cor. xv. 32.] and replies to it, 1. With an intimation of the vain deceit of theſe ſwiniſh philoſophers, Be not deceived. 2. With a ſober check borrowed from one of their poets, Evil communications corrupt good manners. And 3dly, He anſwers yet more Apoſtolically in the words following, Awake to righteouſneſs and ſin not, for ſome have not the knowledge of God. Theſe, ſaith he, are downright Atheiſts, void of the true knowledge and ſenſe of a Deity, and of another life. Which brings me to the Fourth pernicious opinion of the Epicureans, viz. That there is no life after this, that there is no future exiſtence or ſtate of ſouls to be expected. And herein again theſe men are conſiſtent with themſelves; this is a natural conſequence of their former aſſertion. If ſenſual and bodily pleaſure be all the happineſs which is the portion of mankind, then there can be little or no entertainment for the ſoul if it ſhould be ſeparated from the body, and therefore it is fit to believe that the ſoul periſheth with the body, and there is no future ſtate after this; ſee Plutarch de Placit. Philoſ. l. iv. And Laertius in Epicuro aſſures us, that it was his opinion, that men vainly trouble themſelves with the fear of ſome terrible thing in another and everlaſting ſtate, as if there were any thing after death. Therefore,

When the reſurrection was preached to the Epicureans by Paul, which implies a future life, they were ſtartled at it, and looked upon it as a new and ſtrange doctrine; Acts xvii. 19. All is concluded, ſaid they, in this world, and therefore they made much of themſelves whilſt they were here, and lived as they liſted, not looking at all for any puniſhments or rewards hereafter. But this is ſo diametrically oppoſite to the natural notions and dictates of rectified minds, which are not debauched with prejudice and ſenſuality, and ſo fully baffled by the principles of the Chriſtian religion, that it will be but loſt labour to offer at the confutation of it. I ſhall only deſire you to reflect upon this and the other dangerous ſentiments of the Epicurean philoſophy, and to conſider how reaſonable and neceſſary it was that the Apoſtle ſhould caution his followers againſt it, and intimate to them that this was a philoſophy by which they would certainly be ſpoiled and ruined if they adhered to it.

Thirdly; I will preſent to your view the deceitful ethicks of the Stoicks, who were another ſort of antagoniſts our Apoſtle grappled with; Acts xvii. 18. From what topicks he diſputed with them may be gathered from the knowledge of thoſe things, which that ſect was moſt conſiderable for. And we read they were noted for the notion of fatal neceſſity, for their proud and conceited humour, and for their doctrine of apathy.

Their firſt beloved notion was that of fatality; they held that God and all things are tied up by fate, that the ſame irrevocable neceſſity hampers all beings Divine and human, and that particularly men are ſo reſtrained by the deſtinies, that they cannot act freely, but all their actions, whether internal or external, are forced; ſee Plut. de contradict. Stoic. and Seneca de Provident. cap. 5. This was the opinion of the ſevereſt ſort of Stoicks, which cramps all religion, and enervates all the attempts and enterprizes of virtue, and robs man of his rational nature, and indeed makes him a ſtock rather than a man, and therefore is a doctrine unworthy of mankind, and conſequently of the Chriſtian inſtitution, which is no ways repugnant to the reaſonable nature of man. Why therefore may not this be thought to be part of this deceitful philoſophy which the Apoſtle ſpeaks againſt? But to do the Stoicks right, this was the ſentiment but of ſome of them, and as for the more intelligent and ſober ſort of them, they were of another perſuaſion; or rather, to ſpeak more impartially, they ran counter to their own perſuaſions. Seneca, Antoninus, Epictetus, who every where inculcate faith, yet defend the liberty of the will. And Lipſius (who was well acquainted with thoſe mens writings and notions) declares, that the Stoicks fate is no more than the immutability of the Divine Decrees, which takes not away the freedom of man's will, or the contingency of events as to us; Phyſ. Stoic. l. i. Diſſertat. 12. Thus fate and freedom were reconciled, and there was no hurt done to Chriſtianity. And by the by, this doctrine of the Stoicks fatal neceſſity and free will being conſiſtent, may teach us to moderate our diſputes, and to reconcile the Divine Decree with the freedom of man. It was no abſurd doctrine among them, and I do not ſee why it ſhould be among us at this day. But I cannot ſo eaſily acquit the Stoicks of the Second thing they were noted for, was their pride and arrogance, their inſufferable inſolence and oſtentation. Three inſtances; among others, I will give of their proud and haughty ſpirit.

1. They held that their wiſe man was not indebted to God for any virtue or worthy accompliſhment which he was maſter of, but that he was furniſhed out of his own ſtock. He was beholden to himſelf only that he was good and virtuous. The Stoicks wiſe man was upright and juſt of himſelf, and ſtood not in need of others helps: his happineſs was all from what he had by his own power and will; ſee Seneca Ep. 49, 59, and 31, 58, and 73.

And other Stoicks indulged this way of talking, this vain Rhodomontade. It is quoted by Stobeus; Eclog. Phyſic. and Plutarch, De commun. Notionib. as a ſaying of Chryſippus, (a man that was in high eſteem among that ſect of philoſophers; as being one of their founders) Jupiter did not exceed Dion in virtue, (which is yet better and more ſmartly expreſſed with an equivoke in the Greek) yea, Jupiter and he were equally helpful to one another. And that of Epictetus is ſomething like it; If thou art a wiſe man, thou art not inferior to the gods in point of underſtanding and reaſon; What think you now of theſe Stoicks? Can there be more manifeſt proof of their unmeaſurable arrogance and elation of mind? Are they not as well as the Epicureans horribly prophane and blaſphemous, though in a different way. The one denies a God and Providence, the other makes his God to come ſhort of his wiſe man; or, which is the ſame, he makes his wiſe man much better than his God.

You ſee therefore how reaſonable it was that our Apoſtle ſhould caution againſt this ſect of philoſophy, leſt the minds of men ſhould be perverted by it. This is the philoſophy that will ſpoil a man, or elſe there is none in the world that will do it. The Chriſtian religion therefore is in direct oppoſition to it. Thoſe arrogant and blaſphemous boaſtings are repugnant to the Chriſtian ſimplicity and the tenour of the Goſpel, which every where beateth down all high and lofty thoughts, and bids us pray and intreat, and humbly ſue for the Divine Aſſiſtance, and be throughly ſenſible of our own weakneſs and diſability. This acquaints us that every good and perfect gift is from above, and that there is nothing which we have that was not received thence, that we cannot think, nor ſpeak, much leſs act any thing that is good without the aſſiſtance of the Divine Power; that we are conſtantly beholden to God; that we depend upon him for all things, eſpecially as to grace and goodneſs. Theſe are wholly derived from him, and we are ever to acknowledge that he is the Author and Finiſher of them in us.

2. They held that it was below a man to do any good act, with any reſpect to a reward to be received for the doing of it. Theſe ſoaring ſouls would needs maintain that virtue is to be loved, and good to be done merely for its own ſake; they declared that the foreſight of a recompence did not influence upon them at all in what they did or ſuffered; and that no good man ought to make any thing a motive to virtue and goodneſs, but theſe themſelves. Seneca, Epictetus, Arianus, Antoninus and other Stoicks will furniſh you with paſſages to this purpoſe. But Chriſtianity (which is the ſublimeſt doctrine in the world) is not of this ſtrain, if we may credit one of the greateſt profeſſors of it, who freely declares, that if in this life only we have hope, we are of all men moſt miſerable; 1 Cor. xv. 19. From whence it appears that there muſt be an expectation of another life, there muſt be the aſſurance of a future recompence joined with the pleaſure and intrinſic goodneſs of a holy life. It is true, it is ſervile to fix the eye altogether on the wages; but it is diſingenuous and ungrateful not to take notice of the reward which God hath purpoſely ſet before us. Therefore when theſe men; ſee Sen. Epiſt. 81. tell us that no reward is to be looked after, when like the love-phariſees (called ſo in the Talmud; Sota. c. 1.) they pretend to obey the law merely and only out of love of virtue, without the leaſt reſpect to a future ſtate, we may reaſonably conclude that in this, as in other things, they affect chimæra's and fictions, and are ready on all occaſions to give proof of their ſelf-conceit and haughty imaginations.

3. To give another inſtance of theſe mens unſufferable pride, they grew up to ſuch a pitch of it, that they were inclined to throw off magiſtracy and government, and to withdraw themſelves and others from the juriſdiction of the powers they lived under. Their wiſe man was a king, nay king of kings (as you heard before), and thence they would infer that he was above all allegiance and ſubjection to authority. This notion made them ſo domineering and imperious, that they broke out into tumults and ſeditions, as Tacitus obſerves of them in his Annals. It went againſt the philoſophick grain to be ſubjects and ſervants. But this is contrary to Paul's politicks, Let every ſoul be ſubject to the higher powers; and to his œconomicks, Art thou called a ſervant? mind it not, i. e. do not think that that condition renders thee the worſe in the ſight of God: Serve God and thy maſter at once, and therein thou wilt ſhew thy ſelf a good Chriſtian. So much of the Stoicks pride.

The third thing they were taken notice of for, and which was a piece of ſingularity in theſe philoſophers, was their apathy, as Laertius, in Zenone, acquaints us. And we are told by another, Plin. lib. vii. c. 19. that Diogenes the Cynick (for you muſt know the Cynicks were but overgrown Stoicks) was a great maintainer of it. This put an unneceſſary reſtraint and violence upon the natural affections of mankind, and would not allow human nature either to laugh or weep. Their wiſe man that they made was but a ſtatue, (and ſo indeed he was as good as ſome of their gods): He was ſtupid and ſenſeleſs upon occaſion: He was not permitted to reſent the occurrences of the world, were they never ſo ſurpriſing and admirable. He was to be ſilent upon the rack; and when the ſtone or gout tortured him, he was to force a ſmile: And it was a mortal ſin (for you muſt remember all ſins were alike with theſe gentlemen) to wax pale at the ſight or feeling of the inciſion-knife. He was to play with torments, and to ſport with pain and miſery. Thus they believed the ſenſe of morality was to devour all ſenſe of humanity. But this was the doctrine of ſome only of that rigid ſect. The ſobereſt of them did neither ſpeak nor think thus: The apathy or indolency which they maintained was a very laudable and innocent thing. Let Seneca ſpeak for them, I do not (ſaith he, in Epiſt. 71.) draw out a man from amongſt mankind, and place him out of the number of men; for he that is ſenſeleſs is no man. And this philoſopher's practice was ſuitable to this principle, for we find him in his writings often reſenting the evils which befel the world, himſelf, or his relations. So Antoninus ſirnamed the Philoſopher, ſhed tears upon occaſion of a friend's death; and his father Antoninus Pius (for he was his ſon by adoption) excuſed him, ſaying, Permit him to be a man. Arianus, l. 3. c. 2. profeſſedly declares againſt that apathy which takes away that natural affection. It becomes a man (ſaith he) not to be ſenſeleſs and immoveable, but to keep and preſerve his natural and acquired affections and relations, as a father, a ſon, a brother, a citizen. The affections are not to be eradicated and expelled, but the beſt way is to change them and turn about, and fit them for our purpoſe, and ſo make them eaſy and advantagious to us, Plut. de Curioſ. Reaſon, and nature, and Chriſtianity approve of the emotions of our affections ſo far as they are inſtrumental to virtue, and are reſtrained within their due limits. The paſſions are not wholly to be rooted up, but to be diverted; they are not to be baniſhed, but to be curbed and kept under. Theſe Gibeonites are not to be killed, but to be made ſerviceable, and kept in obedience. Jeſus wept over the grave of his friend, and thereby for ever hallowed all tears, and conſecrated all natural and human affections. It is certain that the paſſions are of great uſe in religion, and may be ſubſervient to the nobleſt ends and purpoſes of it. Therefore our Apoſtle might juſtly enter his caveat here againſt thoſe hard and flinty philoſophers, who talked of an utter diſpaſſion, and would make men to be iron and ſtones.

Thus I have acquainted you what were the opinions and practices of the Epicurean and Stoick philoſophers with whom Paul grappled. Thence you may gueſs what the Apoſtle and they diſputed about, and thence you may gather likewiſe what the Apoſtle means when he warns the Chriſtian Coloſſians that they be not ſpoiled through philoſophy and vain deceit. I will only make this remark or reflection in the cloſe, that theſe Epicureans and Stoicks among the Pagans anſwer to the Sadducees and Phariſees among the Jews. There is a great affinity between thoſe two ſorts of antagoniſts. The Epicureans, like the Sadducees, placed all their hopes in this life, and therefore would be very merry and frolick: The Stoicks, like the Phariſees, were demure, and great pretenders to auſterity and ſublime virtues, though they came but little ſhort of the others in point of true morality.

I have hitherto ſhewed the deceitful opinions which were peculiar and proper to thoſe particular ſects of philoſophers I have named. Now in the next place, I will ſet before you thoſe groſs and miſtaken notions, which for the moſt part were common to them all. I will diſcover the deceitfulneſs of the Pagan Philoſophy, by inſtancing in ſome principles and practices which were not only maintained by the particular ſects above named, but alſo by all the reſt of the philoſophers. I will reduce them to theſe two heads, 1. Their deceitful opinions and practices relating to ſome particular vices and virtues. 2. Their falſe ſentiments concerning happineſs.

In purſuance of the firſt, I ſhall preſent you with their pride, their revenge, their ſelf-murder, their lewdneſs, and other miſtakes in their morals.

1. Pride was the Catholick blemiſh, the general ſtain of all the philoſophers: Yea, it ſeemed even to be congenial to them to be immoderately proud of their attainments. There could not be a more viſible diſcovery of this than their deſire of applauſe and acclamations. By their ſubtilty and ſophiſtry they thought to conciliate a great fame and honour, than which nothing was dearer to them, even when they ſeemed to ſhun them. Excellently to this purpoſe Plutarch obſerves that the author of that ſaying, Λάθε βιώσας, live retiredly and unknown, would not lie hid himſelf: He would be known by that motto; whilſt he affected an obſcurity, he reached at fame. Thoſe that give ſuch precepts, (ſaith he, de occulte videndo.) follow after glory, and yet at the ſame time ſeem to turn away from it: Whilſt they look full at it, they pretend to look another way. Some of them, even whilſt they writ againſt glory, ambitioned it. Our own philoſophers, (ſaith Tully, in Tuſc. quæſt.) ſet their names to thoſe books which treat of deſpiſing of glory. And the ſame obſervation you meet with in Valerius Maximus, Glory is not deſpiſed, no not of thoſe who endeavour to introduce the contempt of it; for we ſee they are very careful to affix their names to their very books that they put forth, lib. 8. c. 14. A philoſopher, ſaith Tertullian, de Anima. cap. 1. is a vain-glorious animal; and Jerom, (in Epiſt. ad Pammach. & ad Julian.) ſaith the very ſame of him, and addeth, that he is a mercenary ſlave of applauſe. Tertullian, ſpeaking of the philoſophers in another place, ſaith they were traders for fame, Apolog. cap. 46. and this was the commodity they were moſt eager to purchaſe. Another time he ſaith they were men that luſted after glory, and made fame their miſtreſs. This was the noted badge of the beſt of them, to hunt after glory with too great an impatience; and they would do any baſe and ſervile thing to get a name.

We may truly ſay of them that they lived upon applauſe; and if fame did not trumpet them, they could not breathe. But to inſtance in the arrogant humour of thoſe who were thought the modeſteſt and moſt ſelf-denying philoſophers, viz. the Cynicks, their daily buſineſs was to decry the pride of others. But whilſt they did ſo, and profeſſed to be maſters of the greateſt humility, they were the boldeſt and proudeſt fellows imaginable: Tho' they were the greateſt cenſors of pride, yet they were certainly moſt haughty, and under the very garb of humility there lurked an intolerable arrogance. They were rudely clothed, to witneſs outwardly a contempt of the world; but yet if a man looked narrowly into them, he might obſerve they were very proud of what they wore, though it was never ſo coarſe. Their beards and their ſullen looks, their affected geſtures and grimaces were enſigns not of their gravity, but ſingularity —— This made them harden their bodies againſt all injuries of weather, this made ſome of them beg of ſtatues, and provoke common women to rail with them, which were inſtances of affectation, not humility.

Diogenes in a froſty morning ſtood naked in the market-place, to ſhew (as he pretended) his patience; it happened that Plato paſſed by at that time, and knowing his vain-glorious humour, ſpoke to the people that came about him to leave him alone, and then my Cynick would ſoon retire, for he was buoyed up only by the peoples applauſe.

Diogenes another time thought to be even with Plato for this, (for you muſt know they underſtood one another well enough, though they deceived the people) and trampled upon a neat couch, or ſome ſuch trim furniture which Plato had in his houſe, and cried out, I trample on Plato's pride; to which Plato adjoined, but with greater pride. Thus they were conſcious to themſelves of the diſtemper which they ſo much laboured under. As for the academicks, who openly profeſſed they knew nothing; it is too evident from their carriage and wild contraſts that they were conceited they had an inſight into all things; for thoſe that undertake to diſpute againſt every one, do thereby proclaim their univerſal knowledge. The ſupercilious temper of the Stoicks I have partly given you an account of before, and I might here further do it by ſhewing you how they, above all ſects, delighted in high ſtrains and paradoxes, which is an argument that their philoſophy was ſtarched and formal, that it was more for ſhew and oſtentation, than to cheriſh in mens minds ſound and profitable truths.

The arrogant and vain-glorious ſpirit of the reſt of the philoſophers, and of all the men of parts and worth among the Gentiles, is ſufficiently obvious from many examples that could be produced, were they neceſſary. All which ſhew that they were tickled with applauſe, and impatiently thirſted after fame and repute. But,

Chriſtianity allows not of this, it permits us not to gaſp inſatiably after the acclamations of men. I do not ſay it is ſimply unlawful and againſt the rules of Chriſtianity to deſire or accept of honour and praiſe; for it is certain that he who doth virtuouſly, cannot hate the reward of doing ſo. But to look after theſe chiefly, and in the firſt place, and to make them the great end of our actions, is altogether blameable and vicious. To love the praiſe of men more than the praiſe of God; to do good acts not for the acts ſake, but only for the applauſe that follows them, is immoral as well as unchriſtian. Our chief end muſt be to contribute towards the honour and glory of God in the world, to be beneficial to mankind, and to promote the deſign of our maſter upon earth. If whilſt we are doing this, repute and a good name accrue to us, it becomes us not to be averſe to them, but to receive them as the due attendant of virtue; yea, as that reward of it which God himſelf hath pleaſed to annex to it. Moreover, Chriſtianity acquaints us, that it is a ſign of a mean and vulgar ſpirit to act only out of a deſire to be commended, and that it is truly noble and generous to deſpiſe the world, and to glory in the croſs, and to look for the Euge's of Angels, and the applauſe of Heaven: This is a worthy ambition. The advice of our Apoſtle is, Let nothing be done through vain-glory; and again, Be not deſirous of vain-glory.

Chriſtianity leads men to a true knowledge of themſelves, and that is the only ſpring of humility, and of ſober and becoming thoughts. Whereas, it is the nature of all other knowledge, as the Apoſtle obſerves, to puff up them that are poſſeſſors of it, to ſwell them into high conceits of themſelves. And this was the very caſe of the philoſophizing Gentiles, they grew big, and were ready to burſt with this tumour, or rather this poiſon. Their carriage was obſerved to be moſt abſurdly proud and lofty: Fame and vain-glory principled all of them, and the aggrandizing their names was the main thing they looked after.

2. Their inſatiable deſire of revenge, and their averſeneſs to forgive injuries, was another deceitful and unſound principle that they had imbibed. Their very philoſophers too often ſpoke the language of the poet, ——— Nos hæc patiemur inulti ?

Muſt we ſuffer ſuch affronts, muſt we undergo ſuch wrongs, and yet not revenge ourſelves ? Vim vi repellere, was accounted good morality: But it was held the mark of a low ſpirit to paſs by injuries and wrongs. It is a ſervile and ſlaviſh thing, when we are uſed contumeliouſly, to ſuffer it without making returns. This was the ſenſe of Ariſtotle, ad Nicomach. l. 4. c. 2. And that Tully, the great maſter of moral offices, placeth not forgiveneſs amongſt them, and that he reckons it not among natural dictates, Grotius, de Verit. Chriſt. Relig. will inform you in three or four quotations out of that philoſopher, tho' certainly it is a dictate of right and unbiaſſed reaſon. Nay, you will find that this famous moraliſt reckons revenge in the number of thoſe things which belong to the law of nature, de invent. 2. He doth but invite perſons to the commiſſion of a new offence, who paſſeth by an old one, was a Pagan maxim. It was thought the beſt way to defend themſelves againſt injuries for the future, to take revenge on thoſe that were paſt. And here what a great moraliſt, Iſocrates, ſaith, Think it as baſe a thing to be out-done by thy enemies in ill turns, as by thy friends in good ones. I know this is not the conſtant language of the Pagan philoſophers; they have better apprehenſions of this thing at other times, and ſpeak very laudably. But you ſee how eaſily their ſentiments are altered and perverted, and to what corrupt maxims their unſtable philoſophy betrayed them. But,

Chriſtianity on the contrary inculcates nothing more than patience and ſelf-denial, and a free forgiving of injuries. We are bid by Chriſt to forgive not ſeven times, but ſeventy times ſeven, Luke xvii. 4. i. e. to make it our conſtant and uſual practice to forgive offences. We are enjoined by the Chriſtian morals to overcome our enemies with patience, or (which is more heroical) by obligations and courteſies. When they hunger, we are bid to feed them, and when they thirſt, to give them drink, Rom. xii. 20. that by ſo doing we may heap coals of fire on their heads; that we may, if it be poſſible, ſoften and melt them, tame and charm them by our tenderneſs and benevolence; that we may by the flames of charity in our own breaſts, kindle a reſembling one in theirs. Our maſter hath commanded us to forgive, that we may be forgiven, Luke vi. 37. to pardon others, as we hope to find pardon and mercy at the hands of our offended God. It is truly Chriſtian to imitate him, who makes his ſun to ſhine on the evil and on the good, and ſendeth rain on the juſt and on the unjuſt; who lets the greateſt delinquents ſhare in his favour, and communicates his mercies and bleſſings to the vileſt ſinners. In ſhort, it is the excellent and generous nature of Chriſtianity, to forgive offences when the criminal acknowledges them; it is yet a greater degree and height of it to take no notice of them, where the community is not concerned, but to paſs them by as not worth our obſerving; but the greateſt and higheſt glory of it, is to love our enemies, to pray for them that perſecute us, to return good for their evil, and to be kind and obliging even to the worſt of men.

3. Self-murder, which is a notorious affront and injury to human nature, was defended by the chiefeſt philoſophers of them all. They held that a man need not aſk leave before he went out of the world, that when they ſaw themſelves in danger, they might be as cruel to themſelves as the gods were, yea, that it was religious to diſpatch that life which the gods were reſolved to deſtroy. It was determined by the Stoicks, that a man might kill himſelf rather than endure ſervitude, reproach, or long and grievous diſeaſes: And this Cato defends, if Tully doth not belie him, as we have no reaſon to think he doth. That Stoick it ſeems was a ſevere commonwealth's-man, and could not fit himſelf to the turn of the times. The gods muſt give him a reaſon why Cæſar vanquiſhed Pompey; and becauſe they would not, he fell upon his own ſword, and diſpatched himſelf. This the great Roman philoſopher approves of, Tuſc. quæſt. and thinks it was not without God's leave that he departed hence. He expreſly ſaith, God gave him a juſt occaſion of dying, as he did Socrates; and he reckons him among thoſe who are diſcharged and diſmiſſed by God. Some others of the moſt philoſophical men, either directly ſlew themſelves, or were wilfully acceſſary to their own deaths.

Thus Lycurgus, the great and renowned law-giver of Sparta, pined himſelf to death; which fact Plutarch, in vita Lycurg. approves and applauds with a jeſt, viz. that he made an end of himſelf by a total abſtinence from meat, to teach his countrymen temperance, Cic. Tuſc. Queſt. l. 1. Cleombrotus a Platoniſt, having read Plato's Phædo, where Socrates being about to die, diſcourſes of the immortality of the ſoul, went and threw himſelf down headlong into the ſea. And other great men of morals, as Empedocles, Demoſthenes, Anaxagoras, Chryſippus, yea and Zeno the Stoiciſm, were felons of themſelves. Thoſe who pretended to be great deſpiſers of pains and ſufferings, ran away from them as ſoon as they felt the anguiſh of them. Obſerve it, the very Stoicks, who were ſuch unpaſſionate and immoveable moraliſts, were for leaving the world before their time. This they called, Withdrawing themſelves, and a fair retiring out of the world.

And the famous Seneca, Epiſt. 70. in no fewer than four Epiſtles, maintains this practice. In one of which he plainly tells us, (whatever he had ſaid at other times concerning the great extremities which might put a man upon killing himſelf) that his wiſe man need not ſtay till extreme neceſſity urgeth him to ſuch a violent action, but as ſoon as his fortune begins to be ſuſpected, as ſoon as he perceives there is ſome likelihood of his being brought into ill circumſtances, he may prevent them all by going aſide. He hath this leave given him by the Stoicks, as well as by the Platoniſts and other philoſophers. But Reaſon and Chriſtianity (and ſome of the philoſophers too in a better mood, oppoſe it as a raſh and fooliſh attempt, nay, as a vile and wicked enterprize. It is an uſurping on God's proper right and authority, who only hath power to diſpoſe of man's life. When God calls for our lives, then we are to part with them ſubmiſſively and willingly, and not before. In the mean time, we muſt entertain poverty, ſickneſs, diſgrace, or whatever croſſes befal us, with invincible patience and reſolution. We muſt not ſhamefully relinquiſh ſtations, and, like imprudent pilots, quit the guidance of the veſſel in the midſt of a ſtorm. We muſt bear up undauntedly againſt the briskeſt aſſaults, and reſolve to grapple with all ſorts of hazards and extremities. We muſt prepare ourſelves to look new dangers in the face, and, by the Divine Aſſiſtance, make way through the thickeſt troops of oppoſition. When we are aſſaulted with ſufferings, we muſt not crouch and ſneak, and fly like cowards, but we muſt reſolve to maintain our poſt, and weather out our miſeries with a courage becoming Chriſtianity. Be the way we paſs through rough or ſmooth, difficult or eaſy, it is the Divine Appointment, and God hath not made any calamity inſupportable; it may ſoon wear off of itſelf, however time will take it away. But we muſt be careful that we do not by any means put an end to it, by doing ſo to our lives. This is a high offence againſt God, againſt the community (of which we are a part,) and againſt ourſelves, and human nature itſelf. This is a manifeſt token of baſe fear and cowardice, and abjection of mind; it argues unmanly precipitancy and unadviſedneſs, a diſtruſt of Providence, a defect of faith, and hope, and Chriſtian courage, and even black deſpair itſelf. But how brave and noble is it, after all our hard ſervice, to go off honourably, with the comfort of having fought a good fight, and finiſhed our courſe, and kept the faith, and of having perſevered in our duty to the end, maugre all diſcouragements and hardſhips? This is true Chriſtian philoſophy.

4 Lewdneſs, i. e. immodeſt and obſcene ſpeeches, ribaldry and looſe talk, with laſcivious geſture and behaviour, with lewd and filthy practice, were countenanced by the greateſt pretenders to deep notions and morality; yea, and were not thought contrary to the principles of philoſophy. As for the Stoicks, they profeſſedly held that there is no obſcenity in words. And Chryſippus more particularly is named by Sextus Empiricus as the chief aſſertor of this: Chryſippus, who was the very prop and buttreſs of the Stoicks porch (as Tully tells us) was a great defender of this opinion, and propagated it among his diſciples. They were wont (as the ſame author ſaith) to call every thing by its name, Cic. Epiſt. l. 9. Ep. 22. ibid. hereby excuſing and palliating their obſcenity; and he ſeems to take their part, calling this lewdneſs of ſpeech libertatem loquendi, a liberty of ſpeaking. From tolerating of obſcene words, they proceeded to licenſe the lewdeſt actions, and therein were juſtified by the concurrent practice of other philoſophers. He that rifles Plato's politicks, ſhall find that plurality of wives, and even a community of women are allowed by him. The wiſeſt philoſopher ſhews himſelf here moſt abſurd, for thus he argueth: Becauſe all things in a commonwealth are to relate to the common good and publick advantage, therefore to have all things in common doth ſo, yea, to have the promiſcuous uſe of women. We are told by Laert in Zenone, that Diogenes, Zeno and Chryſippus (topping men among their parties) were of the ſame mind. Adultery was allowed the Lacedemonians by the ſober Lycurgus. See Plutarch in vit. Lycurgi. Common whores were permitted to the Athenians by the wiſe Solon, idem in vit. Solon. We are told that the Cynicks bluſhed not to act openly the moſt uncomely and lewd things.

Yea, Sodomy was approved of and practiſed by the greateſt pretenders to wiſdom among the Pagans. See Ovid. Metam. l. 10. Plutarch, Diodorus Siculus, Minutius Felix, Tertullian's Apolog. c. 46. Athenæus's, Deipnoſoph. l. 13. I know ſome are inclined to think that this charge againſt Socrates is a ſlander, and that he was clear and innocent as to this matter, and that theſe authors were too raſh in borrowing ſuch a report from ſome poets and light heads. And truly I am not averſe to think ſo too, ſince I have made ſome enquiry into the buſineſs. I conceive this may be given as the faireſt and trueſt account of this brave man, that he was taken with the ſociety of ingenious and ſweet-natured young men. Their intellectual beauty was that which was courted and loved by him; and this is that manly beauty which ſome of his dialogues (as Philæbus and Phædo) commend. He having made choice of the ſprightlieſt youths he could meet with, took great pains with them to ripen and improve thoſe ſeeds of virtue which he ſaw in them, and to fit them for the ſervice of their country. Among others, an example of this was Alcibiades, a young nobleman of Athens, who was ſhaped and formed in his manners by this philoſopher, and owed the excellent conduct of his whole life to the early inſtructions of ſo wiſe a maſter. Hence ſome took occaſion to tax him as guilty of unnatural luſt toward this and other young men, and of corrupting (in the worſt ſenſe that can be thought) the youth of Athens. Some were conſcious to themſelves of their own guilt, and knew that παιδεραστία was the vice of the country; and therefore concluded Socrates to be like themſelves, and that he made no other uſe of young mens company than they did. Ariſtophanes was the chief man that ſet this on foot, who wrote his comedy called the Clouds, only to abuſe Socrates: You muſt know then (as the true ground of this) that Socrates inveighed againſt the ſophiſts and mock-philoſophers of that age, men who had nothing in them of true and ſober philoſophy, but were a diſgrace and reproach to it. Hereupon theſe men got him jeered by Ariſtophanes, in that play of his beforenamed. Beſides, Socrates had diſobliged all the poetick tribe by that part of the model of his commonwealth, wherein he would have all poets baniſhed: Whence it is no wonder that the poets were ſet againſt him. Indeed, they were theſe who had the greateſt hand in the impeachment of Socrates, eſpecially the comedians, becauſe Socrates had a more particular diſlike of the comick poetry: For he being grave and compoſed, diſreliſhed that light humour of the ſtage, which was vain and drolling, but at that time moſt taking. Yea, Socrates was ſometimes preſent at, and applauded the tragedies of Euripides, but would not honour with his preſence Ariſtophanes's comedies. Whereupon this poet-laureat of that age conceived a diſpleaſure againſt the philoſopher, and ſeeing he would not approve of the comick way, he muſt fall under his laſh, to make the people ſport. Now, Socrates is every where laughed at; now virulent tongues ſay any thing of him; now they report he uſed the company of young men to vicious and lewd purpoſes. But that would not ſuffice; a formal indictment was drawn up againſt him. The poets take to them Melitus and Anytus, and other conſpirators, who, becauſe out of extreme hatred to the philoſopher, they ſought his death; inſiſted not much on the former accuſation, as not criminal enough, but accuſed him for perverting the laws, by introducing new gods and a new religion. If you look into the ſtory, you will find that Socrates had the honour to be impeached upon the ſame Athenian law that Paul was when he was convented before the Areopagites, viz. that the ancient gods were to be worſhipped, and no new ones to be introduced contrary to the cuſtom of the country, Acts xvii. 18. It was the breaking of this law which procured his death; he had diſcovered the unreaſonableneſs of the Pagan idolatry, and the ſhameful deities which were ſet up among the Athenians. This proved fatal to him, though, to make him doubly guilty, they inſerted the accuſation before-mentioned, by Laert. in Socr. which no man believed, who knew either Socrates, or his enemies malice. It was this which at laſt bereaved him of his life, after they had robbed him of his good name, by fixing the crime of unnatural luſt upon him.

But though Socrates, for the reaſons above alledged, may be thought not to be guilty of that foul vice; yet ſome other philoſophers of great name cannot be ſo cleared. I am loth to think that Plato was one of that number, but Diogenes Laertius ſaith he was, and that he diſguiſed this vice, calling παιδεραϛίαν μετὰ φιλοσοφίας. Ariſtotle, the prince of the Peripateticks, was guilty, ſaith Athenæus, ſo was Zeno, the father of the Stoicks, who, as both Athenæus and Diogenes Laertius teſtify, had a male ſweet-heart whoſe name was Cremonides: And this was ſo frequent among the philoſophers, that Lucian would have this love of boys left wholly to that ſort of men, Dialog. Amor. And other credible authors vouch this for a known truth, that the laws of moſt cities in Greece did not ſuppreſs that libidinous uſage, Xen. de Repub. Lacedæm. And Paul's teſtimony may be added to all theſe, in Rom. i. 27. The men, leaving the natural uſe of the woman, burned in their luſt one toward another, men with men, working that which is unſeemly. Which words are meant of that filthy and prepoſterous luſt, and are ſpoken of the wiſe men and philoſophers among the Pagans: Which is a farther proof and confirmation of this head of my diſcourſe, that the Gentile philoſophy patronized obſcenity and lewdneſs, and even unnatural acts of luſts. Thus

I am glad I have rid my hands of this ill ſubject, which yet it was requiſite to ſtay a while upon in purſuance of my underſtanding on theſe words, which was to ſhew the corruption of the Pagan philoſophy, together with that of philoſophical men. And you ſee the Apoſtle himſelf thought fit to make particular mention of this flagitious uſage among them, and at the ſame time to reprove and condemn it, as he doth likewiſe in 1 Cor. vi. 9. For,

Our moſt Holy religion forbids even the leaſt tendencies to lewdneſs, and the leaſt indications of it; inordinate affection, evil concupiſcence, laſcivious thoughts and deſires are criminal by the Evangelical laws.

We are aſcertained by our Saviour himſelf, that an unchaſte eye, a luſtful look is adultery; Matth. v. 28. All words and ſpeeches that ſavour of luſt, all corrupt communications and diſcourſe are condemned by the Apoſtle; Epheſ. iv. 29. And the ſame inſpired writer, who knew very well what was vice, and what was virtue, and who fully underſtood the nature of the Chriſtian religion, and what it allows, and what it forbids, ſtrictly commands us that we abſtain from fleſhly luſts; 1 Pet. ii. 11. that we make not proviſion for the fleſh, to fulfil the luſts thereof; Rom. xiii. 14. that we flee fornication; 1 Cor. vi. 18. aſſuring us of the everlaſting penalty which is awarded againſt thoſe that act contrary to theſe prohibitions; Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge; Heb. xiii. 4. Thoſe wanton and laſcivious flames ſhall certainly end in thoſe that are eternal.

I might proceed, and inſtance in other allowances incorporated into the body of thoſe morals which are left us by philoſophers, as the deſtroying of the child in the mother's womb, (if it be ſafe and poſſible for her) when ſhe thinks ſhe hath had a full and ſufficient number of children; this you will find ſuggeſted by Ariſtotle, in Polit. l. vii. c. 16. And the expoſing of children is another allowance. Plato would have this done whenever parents have exceeded the bounds of getting chidren, and when they grow too numerous. Ariſtotle is of opinion, that a child which is lame or blind, or any ways deformed, may be caſt out, and without pity or care expoſed to the wide world: And he ſaith it would be well if there were a law to forbid the bringing up of children that are any way maimed and imperfect. Thus two of the greateſt philoſophers that ever were, taught people to be cruel to the fruit of their own loins, to be brutiſh and unnatural to their own fleſh (nay, the worſt of brutes are ſeldom found to do ſo).

I could obſerve to you alſo, that theft was approved of by that wiſe lawgiver Lycurgus, who allowed to the Spartans on condition they could keep it cloſe. It was tolerated, (ſaith Plutarch in Vita Lycurgi) yea, enjoined by the law to ſteal, but it was looked on as a baſe and diſhoneſt thing to be found guilty of it: The being taken was criminal, the not ſtealing cunningly was the thing that was faulty. Laſtly, Lying had the approbation of the chief philoſopher among the Pagans. It is lawful to lye for the good of the commonweath, ſaith Socrates, as he is quoted by his ſcholar Plato, De Repub. l. ii. Thus you ſee what were the corrupt Ethicks of the Heathen world; for though many of theſe things which I have mentioned are repugnant to true philoſophy, yet being maintained, and ſometime practiſed by the maſters of philoſophy, they are juſtly reckoned among the deceits of philoſophy. However, if theſe latter inſtances be not ſo home to the purpoſe, it is certain that no man can pronounce ſo concerning the others before-mentioned, which were ſome of the chief ingredients and principles of the Gentile Philoſophy.

But though I have given you this large account of their miſtakes in morality, yet I will purſue this matter a little farther, and ſhew you in the next place, that the philoſophy the Apoſtle ſpeaks of was deceitful, in that it was groſly miſtaken about the happineſs of man. It was miſtaken, and conſequently deceived men as to this grand point. 1. By not aſſuring them of a future life. 2. By giving no notice of the eternal duration of it. 3. By not determining wherein true happineſs conſiſts. 4. By not directing them the right way to it.

It deceived them by not aſſuring them of a future life. The future exiſtence of the ſoul (though it was a notion dictated by the light of nature and reaſon, and ſometimes poſitively and plainly aſſerted by ſome of the philoſophers, yet it) was diſputed and doubted of among them at other times, by reaſon of falſe principles which they had wilfully taken up, and thereby clouded their reaſons and the natural dictates of their minds, as alſo becauſe of intereſt and ſenſual pleaſure which ſtifled the rational actings of their ſouls. Upon theſe accounts a future ſtate was hardly believed by ſome of the philoſophers, and wholly oppoſed by others. The Epicureans (as you have heard) flatly denied it: And it is no wonder, ſeeing their language was after this rate, We can have no notion of an incorporeal thing, unleſs it be a Vacuum: They therefore that ſay the ſoul is incorporeal, talk vainly and idly; ſee Laert. in Epicuro. Plutarch, De Placit. Philoſoph. l. iv. atteſts that Democritus held the ſoul to be corruptible, and that it periſhed together with the body. It is true, the Pythagoreans and Platoniſts aſſerted that the ſoul went on pilgrimage, and flitted from one man to another: Yea, they held, that mens ſouls paſſed into brutes as well as into other men; and he that was a man a while ago, is now an aſs, a wolf, a dog, or ſome other animal: But this is vain philoſophy indeed, and all that we can build upon it (if it were true) is this, that the ſame man is often begot, and as often born, and dieth: Indeed Plato, in Phædone, ſeu de Animo. brings in Socrates before his death, treating of the Immortality of the Soul; he makes him ſpeak ſome things that are admirable, excellent, and Divine, but other things are poor, mean, and frigid; he preſents him as dubious and uncertain, wavering and inconſiſtent with himſelf.

That Socrates doubted of a future ſtate and the ſoul's immortality, may be gathered from that paſſage of his, which Plato inſerts, If theſe things we ſpeak of be true. Again, Socrates ſaith, One of theſe two is abſolutely neceſſary, either death utterly deprives us of all ſenſe, or we paſs from hence to another place, Apologia Socratis. It ſeems he looked upon death as a ſound ſleep, or a long journey, but he could not certainly tell which. Plutarch, De Conſolatione ad Apollon. had this very notion of it, and on that account concludes that death is not evil. After this wavering manner ſpeaks the great Roman Philoſopher, Cic. Tuſc. qu. l. 1. If the day of death be accompanied with the change of place only, and not an utter extinction, What can be more deſirable than death? Or, if it makes an end of us, and quite annihilates us, What is better than when we are wearied with the labours of this life, to fall aſleep, and never to wake again? In like manner Seneca, Epiſt. 24. Death doth either conſume, or ſends us out of this world into another: If the latter be true, there are better things remain for us when we are ſent out hence, and have laid aſide our terreſtrial clog and burden; but if the former be true, then there is nothing remaining for us, being utterly conſumed, and conſequently no hurt can befal us; that is our comfort. Again, he thus faintly and ambiguouſly talks, in Epiſt. 63. Perhaps if the report of wiſe men be true, and if there be any ſuch thing as a place hereafter to receive us, &c. Thus Antonine (the Royal Philoſopher) cannot tell whether death be σβέσις or μετάστασις, an extinction, or a tranſlation; whether it be an annihilation, or a change of our condition. And many others have thus expreſſed their doubtfulneſs about another life; ſee Val. Max. l. 4. c. 6. But moſt remarkable is that paſſage of Xenophon in the life of Cyrus, lib. 8. whom that wiſe hiſtorian repreſents as a great heroe, and ſingular pattern of virtue. We muſt expect therefore that he will make him ſpeak like a brave prince, furniſhed with true and ſound notion of things. He tells us that this great man lying on his death-bed, and having certain preſages of his approaching departure out of the world, commanded his courtiers to come to him, and called his ſons and friends together, and ſpoke to them to this purpoſe, "You ought not to think you know certainly that I ſhall be nothing when I ceaſe to live here. For let me tell you, the ſoul whilſt it is in this mortal body, doth not live, though it gives life to the body, but when it leaves the body, then it properly lives, then it acts, and is truly knowing and wiſe. The tortures and puniſhments inflicted on murderers by ſouls thruſt out of their bodies, and the honour and rewards of good and innocent minds, proves that ſouls ſtill ſubſiſt. When man is diſſolved, it is not probable, that all things belonging to him to go their particular kind except the ſoul only. You may obſerve, that nothing is more like death than ſleep; but even in ſleep the ſoul diſcovers its Divinity, and never more than then, for it hath a proſpect of things to come, the ſoul being at that time more free than ever. If theſe things be ſo, reverence my ſoul when I am dead, and do according to my commands. But if theſe things be not ſo, but the ſoul periſheth with the body, yet reverence the gods who are immortal. And a little after, he ſaith, Call all the Perſians and my fellow-ſoldiers to my funerals, that they may congratulate with me that I am got to a ſafe place and ſtate, wherein no evil can befal me, whether it ſhall be my lot to be with God, or whether to be reduced to nothing." A fair ſpeech indeed! This was the faint reſult of all the knowledge which his wiſe tutor could let him have of another ſtate. He had not determined whether after death he ſhould be taken to the gods, or be annihilated. Thus philoſophy, as it was corrupted and depraved, was unſteady and doubtful about a future life and happineſs. Much leſs,

2. Had they any notice of the eternal duration of them. Thoſe of them who held that the ſoul was long-lived, had no firm apprehenſion of its being immortal. But eſpecially the Stoicks failed here; Zeno, the maſter of that ſect, expreſly aſſerted that the ſoul remains after death, but at length is corrupted; ſee Diog. Laert. in Zenone. The generality of this ſect went ſo far as to ſay, the ſoul ſurvives the body a good while. But if you aſk, How long? They tell you it is only till the conflagration of the world. Yet here they were divided, for there were ſome among them who held, that the weaker ſort of ſouls, viz. of the unlearned, periſh with the body; but the ſtronger ones, viz. of wiſe men, hold out till the conflagration. And with this agrees that account which Cicero, in Tuſc. qu. l. 1. gives of them; and Seneca relates the very ſame of this ſect of philoſophers. But the certain knowledge and aſſurance of the endleſs duration of ſouls, and the eternal reward of virtue, is the purchaſe only of Chriſt's appearing, who hath brought life and immortality, i. e. immortal life, to light by the goſpel. There was but a faint ſhadow of it before; the diſcoveries were dark and obſcure, but by the ariſing of the ſun of righteouſneſs, this darkneſs is diſpelled, and we have gained a clear manifeſtation of the everlaſting ſubſiſtence of our ſpirits in another world. For Chriſt Jeſus, whoſe ſoul was of the ſame nature with ours, commended his into God's hands, and ſo did the holy martyr Stephen in imitation of him; which aſſures us, that the ſouls of the righteous are taken into God's cuſtody at their departure out of the body. This, together with the reſurrection of our Saviour and his aſcending into Heaven, gives us an abſolute aſſurance and demonſtration of our riſing again, and living immortally in another world.

3. Their philoſophy proved deceitful in not determining wherein the true happineſs of man conſiſteth. The different notions of the divers ſchools of philoſophy about the chief good, proclaim aloud that they only gueſſed at it, and were not able to tell wherein it was placed. Their miſtakes were never ſo numerous and, which is worſe, ſo dangerous as here. It is of infinite conſequence to underſtand what is the chief felicity of man, what is the perfect ſtate of bliſs, what is the principal and laſt end of man, wherein there remains nothing further to be deſired. Now, he only can acquaint us with our true happineſs who is the author of it, the Lord of bliſs and glory, who purchaſed immortal life for us, and is himſelf the true, ſovereign, chief god, the ultimate object of our wiſhes and deſires, ſtudies and endeavours, the only reſt and center of our minds. This is life eternal to know, and in knowing to enjoy the only true God, and Jeſus Chriſt whom he hath ſent. It is the utmoſt happineſs of a man to have, in the diſcharge of his proper duty, the favour of God, to know and love him, and to be loved of him. This is the higheſt felicity our nature is capable of, and it is no where fully diſcovered but in the Holy Scriptures.

4. Philoſophy was miſtaken, and thereby proved deceitful in not diſcovering the true certain way to this happineſs. And indeed how could it? It was impoſſible for the philoſophers to know how to regain the favour of Heaven whilſt they underſtood not how they loſt it. They could not come to the full underſtanding of the true cauſe of the degenerate condition of mankind. Whence ſhould they know that man was at firſt created pure and holy, ſpotleſs and innocent, able to ſerve God with an unwearied obedience, and that he voluntarily abuſed his power and freedom, and diſobeyed the command of his Maker, and ſo by an act of his own will apoſtatized from God, and plunged himſelf into unſpeakable miſery? They could not reach this by their natural light and moral reaſon. The moſt philoſophical and inquiſitive brains, though they have made ſome gueſſes about the corruption of mankind, were not able to arrive to a clear account of this matter. They were apprehenſive that nature was vitiated; they perceived a ſtrange diſorder, a horrible ſhatter, but they were ignorant of the original ſpring and ſource of it. And thus not knowing the cauſe of human corruption and depravation, it is no wonder that they light not on the right remedy of them. In the Goſpel alone is ſet forth the way for the recovery of lapſed and degenerate ſouls; here is diſcovered the certain method of obtaining the pardon of our ſins, and the aſſurance of God's favour, and our everlaſting welfare. The contrivance of man's redemption by the blood of Jeſus was too high a flight for the moſt improved reaſon, and light of nature. And when it was revealed to ſome of the moſt knowing Pagans, they were loth to truckle to ſo low and mean a diſpenſation as the Goſpel, which teacheth us to truſt and rely upon another's merits. They all agreed in this, that there is this one good thing which is the cauſe and foundation of happineſs, viz. a man's truſting to himſelf, and reſting upon what he can do by his own power; ſee Sen. Epiſt. 31. Theſe lofty ſons of reaſon counted it abſurd to be beholden to another's undertakings for their felicity; eſpecially it ſounded as the moſt ridiculous thing ever heard of, to hope for life and happineſs by the death of another. Auguſtin's complaint of Tully's works may be the juſt impeachment of all the voluminous diſcourſes of philoſophers, that the name of Chriſt is not to be found there. There is nothing in them of the exalted morals of our great and perfect lawgiver, of the great myſtery of Godlineſs manifeſted by a Redeemer, and of the knowledge of Jeſus Chriſt, and him crucified. Yea, in the account which the philoſophers gave of the ordinary moral virtues and vices, they are very wavering and uncertain. He that is acquainted with the writings of the chief moraliſts among them, knows that they frequently confute themſelves; their way is to ſet up their wiſe men, and then ſoon after to pull him down; which made an underſtanding perſon declare that the Stoicks wiſe man, is no where to be found upon earth; yea, and that he never was in being; ſee Plutarch. de contradict. Stoicorum. He is a chimera, a fiction, made up wholly of paradoxes, riddles and impoſſibilities; ſo that there is nothing real in their deſcription of him but their pride and conceit. The falſe and erroneous conceptions which theſe and other moraliſts had concerning virtue and vice, we have in ſeveral particulars laid open in the preceding part of this diſcourſe; and it is that which Lactantius, de vero cultu, cap. 17. long ago hath very largely proved, viz. that the philoſophers miſtook virtue for vice, and vice for virtue. I remember the excellent Des Cartes, in Præfat. ad Ethic. compares the moral writings of the Heathens to ſplendid and magnificent palaces built upon mud and ſand. They extol, ſaith he, virtue to the skies, and prefer it before all other things, but do not ſufficiently explain to us the true nature of it, or lay the ground of it right: Nay, oftentimes that which is called virtue by them, ought rather to be ſtiled vice. Now, theſe ill foundations cannot but be followed with as bad ſuperſtructures; and both of them will promote vicious practices in mens lives. So that upon this account we might conclude the Pagan philoſophers were very defective in ſhewing the way to happineſs; for how could they do this, ſo long as they were not able to build men up in true Godlineſs, and to make them really better?

But their greateſt blemiſh was that which I have already mentioned, viz. their ignorance of the way of life and ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt. They knew not that there is no other name under Heaven given among men whereby they muſt be ſaved. They underſtood not that in the great and univerſal deluge of mankind, this is the only ark we can be ſafe in. They were unacquainted with the myſtery of faith and juſtification, and the abſolute neceſſity of the aſſiſtance of the Holy Spirit, and other ſuch Divine and ſaving truths, the diſcovery of which is peculiar to the Chriſtian Religion, which is the only true philoſophy. For this name you may obſerve it bears in the writings of the ancient fathers: Thus Juſtin Martyr, in his Dialog. cu. Tryph. ſpeaking of the Chriſtian inſtitution, hath theſe words concerning it, Philoſophy truly is the greateſt good and moſt acceptable to God, it being that alone which leads us and commends us to him; and they are really holy, who apply their minds to this philoſophy. And he tells us, that he found this to be the only certain and uſeful philoſophy. So the barbarous philoſophy with Clemens Alexandrinus, is the Chriſtian Religion, or the New Teſtament compoſed by thoſe whom the Greeks ſtiled Barbarians. This according to Iſidore is the new and Evangelical philoſophy, Epiſt. l. 4. and ſometimes it is called by him the Heavenly philoſophy, Epiſt. l. 5. by Sozomen. Eccl. hiſt. l. 5. c. 12. And in ſeveral other fathers this is the word for Chriſtianity; and the doctors and eminent profeſſors of the Chriſtian Church are ſtiled philoſophers, in oppoſition without doubt to thoſe among the Pagans who boaſted of this title.

Thus I have attempted to ſhew how the Apoſtle's words are to be underſtood; I have let you ſee what thoſe things are which were blameable in the Greek philoſophy, and why the Apoſtle cautions againſt it. I have particularly diſcovered how this philoſophy was abuſed of old, and thereby became moſt prejudicial to Chriſtianity, and how the profeſſors of it did συλαγωγεῖν (which is the word here uſed) forcibly carry away, and make a prey and booty of too great a part of the world by it. Whence it is, that the Apoſtle here couples philoſophy and vain deceit together.

Ver. 12. Buried with him in baptiſm.] As to ſin and Satan; ſee Rom. vi. 4. and below at ver. 13, and 20th.

Ver. 16. Let no man therefore judge you in meat or in drink, or in reſpect of an holyday, or of the new moon, or of the ſabbath-days; ſee Romans xiv. 3, 10, 13. Gal. iv. 10. and our Diſſertation on the ſabbath-day.

Ver. 18. Let no man beguile you, &c.] See the notes above on ver. 6, 8.

Ver. 19. — The head.] Chriſt, the head of the Church; ſee Epheſians iv. 15, 16.

Ver. 22. — After the commandments and doctrines of men.] See the notes above on ver. 6. and Matt. xv. 9.

CHAP. III.

1 He ſheweth where we ſhould ſeek Chriſt. 5 He exhorteth to mortification, 10 to put off the old man, and to put on Chriſt, 12 exhorting to charity, humility, and other ſeveral duties.

IF ye then be riſen with Chriſt, ſeek thoſe things which are above, where Chriſt ſitteth on the right hand of God.

2 Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth.

3 For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Chriſt in God.

4 When Chriſt who is our life ſhall appear, then ſhall ye alſo appear with him in glory.

5 Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth; fornication, uncleanneſs, inordinate affection, evil concupiſcence, and covetouſneſs, which is idolatry:

6 For which things ſake the wrath of God cometh on the children of diſobedience.

7 In the which ye alſo walked ſometime when ye lived in them.

8 But now you alſo put off all theſe; anger, wrath, malice, blaſphemy, filthy communication out of your mouth.

9 Lye not one to another, ſeeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds.

10 And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge, after the image of him that created him.

11 Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumciſion nor uncircumciſion, barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Chriſt is all, and in all

12 Put on therefore (as the elect of God, holy and beloved) bowels of mercies, kindneſs, humbleneſs of mind, meekneſs, long-ſuffering:

13 Forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel againſt any: even as Chriſt forgave you, ſo alſo do ye.

14 And above all theſe things, put on Charity, which is the bond of perfectneſs.

15 And let the peace of God rule in your hearts, to the which alſo ye are called in one body; and be ye thankful.

16 Let the word of Chriſt dwell in you richly in all wiſdom; teaching and admo-niſhing one another in pſalms, and hymns, and ſpiritual ſongs, ſinging with grace in your hearts to the Lord.

17 And whatſoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jeſus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him.

18 Wives, ſubmit your ſelves unto your own husbands, as it is fit in the Lord.

19 Husbands, love your wives, and be not bitter againſt them.

20 Children, obey your parents in all things: for this is well-pleaſing unto the Lord.

21 Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, leſt they be diſcouraged.

22 Servants, obey in all things your maſters according to the fleſh; not with eye-ſervice, as men-pleaſers, but in ſingleneſs of heart, fearing God:

23 And whatſoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men:

24 Knowing that of the Lord ye ſhall receive the reward of the inheritance; for ye ſerve the Lord Chriſt.

25 But he that doeth wrong, ſhall receive for the wrong which he hath done; and there is no reſpect of perſons.

The Apoſtle having aſſerted the truth of the Goſpel, and confuted ſome contrary errors in the two former chapters, begins in this chapter with,

An Exhortation to general Duties, ſuch as heavenly-mindedneſs; becauſe they were riſen with Chriſt, who is now in heaven, ver. 1. beſides this ſhews, ſays he, that you are ſpiritually dead to earthly things, ver. ii. 3. and that God doth preſerve your life for you, ver 3. which is the glorious eſtate we ſhall enjoy at Chriſt's ſecond coming, ver. 4. and therefore we ought to flee from all things that ſhall any ways oppoſe, let, or hinder our attainment of that happy ſtate. Then the Apoſtle gives a catalogue of thoſe luſts and corruptions from ver. 5 to ver. 9. and and ſubjoins his reaſons againſt them from ver. 9, to ver. 12. and then he encourages us to reſiſt them by the exerciſe of certain graces, mentioned in ver. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17. in hopes of attaining eternal glory. Then

He exhorteth them to ſome ſpecial Duties belonging to Chriſtians, as they are members of families, ſuch as the duties of wives, in ver. 18. of husbands, ver. 19. of children, ver. 20. of parents, ver. 21. and of ſervants, ver. 22, 23, 24, 25.

Ver. 1. If ye then be riſen with Chriſt] See ch ii. ver 12.

Ver. 7. In the which] Fornication, &c. ſee ver. 5.

Ver. 12, Put on therefore (as the elect of God, holy and beloved) bowels of mercies, &c. Let us ſee what theſe excellent words contain for our inſtruction, and for the better apprehending thereof, let us view the context. Now

In the 8th Verſe, the Apoſtle ſpeaking of putting off anger, wrath and malice, &c. as part of the old man, which a new convert is to lay aſide; he after gives us to underſtand, there is ſomething to be put on by ſuch in the room thereof, ver. 10. inſomuch that let men be Jews or Greeks, ver. 11. Heathens or Chriſtians, there muſt not be any wrathful reſentments, any haughty and unmerciful inſolence ſhow'd towards them; ſince none, let them diſtinguiſh themſelves how they will, are of themſelves accepted before God for any merit of their own, but only in and thro' Chriſt, who is all and in all: And therefore inſtead of anger, and wrath, and malice, there muſt be bowels of mercies, that is, the contrary thereunto; a tender pity and compaſſion, and ſympathizing love, as the words import, which cannot be conſiſtent with bearing malice and ill-will: and ſuch is accompanied with kindneſs, as it follows, without which there cannot be ſuch compaſſion; and an humbleneſs of mind, meekneſs, which diſpoſes men to overlook thoſe faults, that may cauſe any miſunderſtanding and diſreſpect, and to ſee more of their own infirmities, for the preventing their taking offence at others reflections; and to be ſure there will be long-ſuffering, a forbearing and forgiving, as is further added; and a putting on of Charity, and a labouring for peaceableneſs, as is ſuggeſted in ver. 14 and 15, which a chriſtian that hath put on bowels of mercies cannot but be led unto.

So that what is implied in the exhortation, is a compaſſionate, friendly, and humble deportment, a wiſhing and doing all the good we can; and as the conſequence hereof, and avoidance of a quarrelſome, malicious, revengeful, or arrogant carriage, that deſtroys all love, compaſſion and peace, And

We ſhall find how much it is the great duty of our chriſtianity to comply with the Apoſtles Words, in putting on bowels of mercies, as to the ſeveral things imply'd, by conſidering the divine commands and declarations of God's will given us in his word; which being ſo very numerous, I ſhall do but little more than barely name: And yet I think it may not be amiſs to run over moſt of them, that we may ſee what a ſhameful thing it is to overlook a duty, which is ſo extreamly preſt upon us.

How many times, and in what moving ſtrains, are we called to that ſweet and kind temper, which is ſhown in love and charity? Above all things put on charity, ver. 14. after the text. And follow after charity, 1 Cor. iv. 1. and let all things be done with charity, 1 Cor. xvi. 14.—Howſoever, this in the law of Moſes was forgot, Lev. xix. 18. Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thy ſelf; or, whatſoever allowances ſome of old had to abridge, and confine their kindneſs to a party, ſo as to love none but thoſe of their own nation; yet it is now enforced anew, and is to be extended under the Goſpel. A new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another, ſays our Saviour, John xiii. 34. and by this ſhall all men know that ye are my diſciples, if ye have love one to another. And the like is enjoined by his Apoſtles, to make thoſe that are too regardleſs hereof more mindful; though it might be otherwiſe ſaid unto them, as the Theſſalonians were told, 1 Theſ. iv. 9. as touching brotherly love, ye need not that I write unto you, for ye your ſelves are taught of God to love one another: They therefore tell us, though a man ſhould ſay I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar, 1 John iv. 20. And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God, love his brother alſo, ver. 21. that we conſider one another, to provoke unto love, Heb. x. 24. that we love the brotherhood, 1 Pet. ii. 17. that we owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another, hath fulfilled the law, Rom. xiii. 8. and that we be kindly affectioned one towards another, with brotherly love, Rom. xii. 10. and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, 1 John iv. 16. every one that loveth, is born of God, and knoweth God, ver. 7. But on the contrary, he is not of God, who loveth not his brother, 1 John iii. 10. And though it hath been ſaid, as our Saviour tells us, "Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy: Yet the charge is now, love even your enemies, Matt. v. 43. ſo far as to be ready to do them any acts of kindneſs, when they are not like to be empowered thereby to become farther hurtful; and to deſire ſuch a change here, as may make for their eternal welfare; and not to curſe them with wiſhes of hell and damnation, and much leſs ſuch as are friends and neighbours.—And is it not a faint and complimental reſpect that is to be ſhewn towards each other; but that is the fulfilling the royal law, relating to our duty towards man, Thou ſhalt love thy neighbour as thy ſelf; though not with the ſame height of love, yet with ſuch a real reſpect as inclines us to perform any kind offices, if we have opportunity, as we would for our ſelves. The ſame is repeated, Gal. v. 14. and ver. 13. it is expreſly commanded, that by love we ſhould ſerve one another. And we are "not to love in word, and in tongue, but in deed and in truth," 1 John iii. 18. and therefore, "whoſo hath this worlds goods, and ſeeth his brother have need, and ſhutteth up his bowels of compaſſion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" ver. 17. and much more contrary to the Divine Will do they act, who, under a fair cover of a pretended reſpect, do hide all their deceitful and malicious deſigns againſt any. The end of the commandment, is charity out of a pure heart, 1 Tim. i. 5. Charity which ſeeketh not her own, 1 Cor. xiii. 5. with an excluſion of all concern for the promoting another's wealth, 1 Cor. x. 24. And therefore, when we have purified our hearts, in obeying the truth, there will be an unfeigned love of the brethren, and we muſt ſee that we love one another with a pure heart fervently, 1 Pet. i. 21. and our love muſt be without diſſimulation, Rom. xii. 9. and above all things we muſt have fervent charity amongſt ourſelves, 1 Pet. iv. 8. and we are entreated to encreaſe more and more, 1 Theſſ. iv. 10. and it is made a part of the Apoſtle's prayer, that Chriſtians ſhould abound in love one to another, and towards all men, 1 Theſſ. iii. 12. and of his thankſgiving, where their charity towards each other aboundeth, 2 Theſſ. i. 3. and ſo much is he ſet upon it, that for fear men ſhould fall therefrom, he tells us, Heb. xiii. 11. Let brotherly love continue.

So alſo, as for that peaceable amity and concord, which a compaſſionate reſpect for one another will lead unto, how frequently urged, and that with a very pathetick vehemency, and in all the moſt entreating terms, in order to win upon us. I beſeech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jeſus, that ye all ſpeak the ſame things, that there be no diviſions amongſt you: But that ye be perfectly joined together, in the ſame mind, and in the ſame judgment, 1 Cor. i. 10. and Phil. ii. 1, 2. If there be any conſolation in Chriſt, if any comfort of love, if any fellowſhip of the Spirit, if any bowels of mercies, fulfil ye my joy, that ye be like-minded, having the ſame love, being of one accord, and of one mind. And 2 Cor. xiii. 11. Brethren, be of one mind. And if it be poſſible, as much as in you lieth live peaceably with all men, Rom. xii. 18. and ſeek peace and purſue it, 1 Pet. iii. 11. and follow peace with all men, Heb. xii. 14. and follow righteouſneſs, charity, peace, 2 Tim. ii. 22. and follow after thoſe things which may make for peace, Rom. xiv. 19. endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit, in the bond of peace, Eph. iv. 3. and ſtudy to be quiet, 1 Theſſ. iv. 11. and have peace one with another, Mark ix. 1. and be at peace amongſt your ſelves, 1 Theſſ. v. 3. The kingdom of God is righteouſneſs and peace, Rom. xiv. 17. be of the ſame mind one towards another, Rom. xii. 16. and the God of patience grant you to be like-minded one towards another, Rom. xv. 5. And it is exhorted that prayers and ſupplications be made for all men, and for kings, &c. that we may lead quiet and peaceable lives, &c. 1 Tim. ii. 1.

And as to that tenderneſs of ſpirit in a patient bearing with, and forgiving one another, amidſt any infirmities or offences, how much is it enforced upon us? "See that ye walk worthy of your vocation, &c. with meekneſs, longſuffering, and forbearing one another in love, Eph. iv. 1, 2. A ſervant of the Lord muſt be gentle towards all men, patient, 2 Tim. ii. 24. and we ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to pleaſe ourſelves, Rom. xv. 1. and if any be overtaken with a fault, reſtore ſuch a one in the ſpirit of meekneſs: And bare one another's burthens, Gal. vi. 1, 2. and let your moderation be known to all men, Phil. iv. 5. Be patient towards all men, 1 Theſſ. v. 14. and ſee that none render evil for evil, ver. 15. And be all of one mind, having compaſſion one of another, Love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous; not rendring evil for evil, or railing for railing, but contrarywiſe bleſſing, 1 Pet. iii. 8, 9. and bleſs them that curſe you, do good to them which hate you, and pray for them which deſpitefully uſe you, and perſecute you, Matt. v. 44. Bleſs them which perſecute you; bleſs, and curſe not, Rom. xii. 14. recompence to no man evil for evil, ver. 17. revenge not your ſelves, but rather give place unto wrath, ver. 19. be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good, ver. 21. and reſiſt not evil. But whoſoever ſmite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other alſo," Matt. v. 39. Yield unto the ſuffering of, or parting with ſome little things for peace ſake, and a greater good that may enſue thereby; or whenſoever we vindicate ourſelves in the puniſhment of another, let it not be with ſpight, and a rejoicing at his ſufferings for revenge ſake. But we muſt be kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, Eph. iv. 32. and how often ſoever our brother treſpaſſes againſt us, we muſt forgive him; not in few inſtances only, as until ſeven times; but, if need be, until ſeventy time ſeven, as our Saviour tells, Mat. xviii. 22. this is the Charity of the Goſpel that ſuffereth thus long and is kind, 1 Cor. xiii. 4. that is not eaſily provoked, ver. 5. that beareth all things, endureth all things, ver. 7. This the meek and quiet ſpirit, that is in the ſight of God of great price, 1 Pet. iii. 4. theſe the fruits of God's ſpirit upon men, love, peace, long-ſuffering, gentleneſs, meekneſs, Gal. v. 22.

And how much is there ſaid to diſſwade from theſe cenſorious thoughts and upbraidings which are diſpleaſing unto a kind and forbearing temper? ſpeak not evil of one another, Jam. iv. 11. ſpeak evil of no man, be no brawlers, but gentle, ſhewing all meekneſs unto all men, Tit. iii. 2. comfort the feeble minded, 1 Theſ. v. 14. judge not, that ye be not judged, Mat. vii. 8. judge nothing before the time, 1 Cor. iv. 5. him that is weak in the faith, receive, but not to doubtful diſputations, Rom. xiv. 1. let not him that eateth, deſpiſe him that eateth not, ver. 13. and becauſe there may be difference in our ſentiments or actions, let us not therefore judge and condemn one another, ver. 13. charity thinketh no evil, 2. Cor. xiii. 5. will not give way to any hard ſuſpicions of what there is not ſome evidence of, but believeth all things, hopeth all things, ver. 7. it will make the beſt of things, and not aggravate; much leſs will it ſeek to find or make faults, where are none, and raiſe any falſe reports or promote the ſpreading of them, where it knows they are ſo; that rejoicing not in iniquity, but rejoicing in the truth, 1 Cor. xiii. 6.

And how plain are the expreſſions of the divine will againſt an haughty ſpirit and carriage, by which cometh contention, which prompts men highly to reſent any ſlight againſt themſelves, to carp at and play upon others, and ſtiffly to refuſe any the leaſt conceſſion; and ſo ſhuts out that ſweet and kind temper which is commanded. God reſiſteth the proud, but giveth grace to the lowly, James iv. 6. 'tis lowlineſs of mind, that we are exhorted unto, Eph. iv. 2. at the ſame time we are preſt to meekneſs, long-ſuffering. And after the command, Rom. xii. 6. be of the ſame mind, 'tis added, mind not high things, but condeſcend to men of low eſtate. And when we are called to be kindly affection'd one towards another, Rom xii. 10. the next thing that follows is, that in honour we ſhould prefer one another. The like whereunto we have, Phil. ii, 3. Let nothing be done thro' ſtrife or vain glory, but in lowlineſs of mind, let each eſteem other better than themſelves. And Gal. v. 26, be not deſirous of vain-glory, provoking one another, envying one another. And ſuch therefore is the property of charity, that it vaunteth not it ſelf, does not behave it ſelf unſeemly, 1. Cor. xiii 4.

And further, what is more condemn'd, than the ill nature that does diſcover it ſelf in inordinate anger, ſtrife, malice, envy, hatred, and the like; which is fully oppoſite to the kind diſpoſition and courteous carriage of a chriſtian. The proud man is complain'd of, 1 Tim. iv. 4. who doubts about queſtions and ſtrifes of words, whereof cometh envy, ſtrife, and railing. And he loveth tranſgreſſion, that loveth ſtrife, Prov. xvii. 9. but we are to walk honeſtly as in the day, &c. not in ſtrife and envying, Rom. xiii. 13. we muſt not bare ſuch a grudging ill-will towards any, as to rejoice at their falls from their proſperity; or to be grieved at the continuance and encreaſe of it; when the ſame hath not been, nor is like to be prejudicial: but rather rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep. Rom. x. 15. And ſo ſtrict is the charge againſt hating ones Brother, that he that does ſo, is pronounc'd in God's ſight, a Murderer, 1 Joh. iii. 15. and every man is commanded to be ſlow to wrath, Jam. i. 19. which tho' there may be ſome lawful occaſion for ſome little diſcovery of; yet we muſt not let it run too high, or hold too long, for fear of its degenerating into hatred, or what is worſe: The advice is therefore, let not the ſun go down upon your wrath. —— And we have ſeveral liſts of theſe things, which are very contrary to the Chriſtians bowels of compaſſion, put together and condemn'd. The Apoſtle tells us, he fears leaſt he ſhould find men ſuch as he would not; leaſt there be debates, envyings, wraths, ſtrifes, backbitings, ſwellings, tumults, 2 Cor. xii. 20. and he makes it the character of the unregenerate, that they live in malice, envy, hateful, and hating one another, Tit. iii. 3. and the remnants of the old man which muſt be put off, anger, wrath, malice, &c. by thoſe who would be the elect, holy and beloved of God, who are to have bowels of mercies And whereas there are among you envyings, ſtrifes and diviſions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men, 1 Cor. iii. 3. ſuch are reckon'd amongſt the works of the fleſh, as hatred, variance, emulations, wraths, ſtrifes, ſeditions, envyings, murders, Gal. v. 5, 20. and wars and fightings come from mens luſt, Jam. iv. 1. Wherefore lay aſide all malice, and evil-ſpeaking, 1 Pet. ii. 1. and let all bitterneſs, envyings, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil-ſpeaking be put away from you with all malice, Eph. iv. 31.

Thus you ſee by ſuch multiplied commands and declarations in God's word, how much a kind, and peaceable, and compaſſionate temper is inſiſted on: Which that we may ſtill find more of our duty in, let us conſider,

The examples we have, in the ſame Sacred Writings, recommended to our imitation: And in ſhort, theſe are no leſs than thoſe of God himſelf, our Bleſſed Saviour, and his greateſt followers and miniſters.

This does enhance our duty of loving our enemies, Matt. v. 45. that we may be the children of our father, who makes his ſun to riſe on the evil and on the good: Whom ought we to affect to be like more than our heavenly father? now to ſhew any reſpect to thoſe, who do oblige us by their power and kindneſs thereto, we diſcover nothing of a Chriſtian virtue; doing no more than what the nature and intereſt of a Publican and Heathen will lead him unto. But herein lies our duty, whereby we copy after our father's example, when we ſhew mercy and kindneſs, even among the failings and affronts of the helpleſs and worthleſs. For who ſo ready to forgive and plenteous in mercy; he that is here ſo gracious to foes as well as friends; he that condeſcends to dwell with the humble and contrite, tho' he be infinitely exalted above all; he that is unwilling to caſt off ſuch as will return; he that is deſirous to be reconciled, nay, firſt entreats by his Embaſſadors, Men's reconciliation to him; and all this when there is nothing to draw or drive him to the leaſt pity from any hope of benefiting by us, or fear of ſuffering from us; he that offers the remiſſion of our innumerable debts, which there cannot be the thouſandth part of contracted between one man and another: And is not the demand then fair and equal, that is made in the parable, Matt. xviii. 33. I forgave thee all thy debt, as great as it was, ſhouldſt not thou have compaſſion on thy fellow-creature, even as I had pity on thee? And how particularly amazing is the love of God unto us in his ſon? from which the Apoſtle infers our duty, 1 John iv. 11. if God ſo loved the world, we ought alſo to love one another: and verſe 8. he that therefore loveth not God, knoweth not God, for God is love; when this, that is ſo ſhining an attribute of his Nature, is made his very name; as again, ver. 16. God is love.

And how does our Saviour propoſe his love and meekneſs, which was unconceiveably endearing and obliging, and makes the foundation of his command, John xiii. 34. love one another, as I have loved you; as likewiſe does his Apoſtle, walk in love, as Chriſt alſo hath loved us, Eph. v. 2. and as even Chriſt forgave you, ſo alſo do ye, Col. iii. 13. learn of me, ſays our Saviour, for I am meek and lowly in heart, Matt. xi. 29. learn of him, who, tho' he did no ſin, neither was guile found in his mouth, yet when he was reviled, he reviled not again, when he ſuffered, he threatned not, 1 Pet. ii. 22. learn, of him who could pray for his moſt abuſive enemies, at a juncture of their greateſt cruelty, father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. And how did his miniſters and diſciples think it their duty to follow their meek and merciful maſter? His ſervant Stephen could beg of God in the behalf of his murtherers, that he would not lay their ſin to their charge, Act vii. 60. And what patience and pity did others diſcover, as we find in many places? Paul does confeſs in their name, 1 Cor. iv. 12. being reviled, we bleſs; being defam'd, we entreat.

And now, what do the furious, and unmerciful, and contentious think of all this? what do thoſe think, who wet their tongues like a ſword, and bend their bows, to ſhoot out their arrows, even bitter words? Can they ſay, that the declarations of God's will are ſo dark or few, or the examples ſo mean, that they cannot find a plain and neceſſary duty in what I have been ſhewing? No wonder would it be to ſee Pagans, who are unacquainted with theſe things, entertaining the moſt ill-natured thoughts, and pouring out the hotteſt and hardeſt words againſt one another. But to behold the height and ſpight, the curſes and quarrels of Chriſtians, who know and believe the Scriptures, good God! what matter of admiration! and much more ſtrange ſtill, to hear of the heart-burnings and unfriendly feuds of thoſe who do profeſs more than a common veneration for the Scripture-doctrine. Whereas Chriſtianity, if obſerved according to the tenour of the duty mention'd, would tend to cool mens paſſions, to file off the roughneſs of their temper, and to produce a kind converſation in the world: But that we may be more engaged hereunto, let us

See what reaſon there is for it, from that relation there is between men, as to their nature, profeſſion, &c.

Now, tho' the lines of our relation may be remote, as to our deſcent from the ſame head, and there may be elder and younger branches, ſo as that we cannot call one another brethren, according to the common uſe of the name; yet in a larger ſenſe thereof, as we come from one common father the firſt parent of mankind, we are ſo; and ſhould there be then an unbrotherly enmity and variance amongſt us? or ſhould we diſreliſh Abraham's advice to his nephew Lot? Gen. xiii. 18. let there be no ſtrife between me and thee, for we are brethren. And when we all partake of the ſame kind of being, having all in ſome meaſure thoſe powers and faculties that are the reſemblances of the Divine Image, and the diſtinguiſhing ornaments of our nature; how unreaſonable is it for any to ſhew ſuch diſdain and ill-will as many times they do; as if they themſelves were of a more exalted kind than their neighbours, no leſs than gods or angels; or others, whom they treat with ſuch inhumanity and unkindneſs, were brutes or devils.

But, if ſince we are all related together as men, we ought to carry it with better temper; ſurely, as Chriſtians, we have much more reaſon to do ſo; here being another bond of brotherhood, 1 Pet. ii. 17. to unite us together in love. This is the motive which is made uſe of for the ſame, Eph. iv. 4. becauſe as Chriſtians we all own, there is one body, and one ſpirit, even as ye are call'd in one hope of your calling, one faith, one baptiſm, one God and father of us all, who is above all. —— When herein we have all one calling, (how different ſoever our ſecular vocations be) why ſhould we not endeavour to unite under it? And tho' we can't agree in every particular of it, why ſhould we be ſo much divided, as if we did agree in nothing? Others can be friends, when combin'd in a bad cauſe? Herod and Pilate could agree, when crucifying our Saviour; a legion of devils could agree to be together, whilſt they are tormenting one man, and ſhall not we agree when we are ſerving one God? — And when we believe we are all ſervants to one, who is above us all; why ſhould we take upon us, imperiouſly and unmercifully to rail at, and lord it over others, as if we our ſelves where ſome abſolute governours? ——— And when we believe we are all one body, the members of one head, Chriſt Jeſus; how can we find in our hearts to foment and keep up any brawls againſt each other? This is the argument the Apoſtle uſes, Rom. xii. 4, 5. in his exhorting us, not to think more highly of our ſelves than we ought to think; and to be kindly affection'd towards one another; for as we are many members in one body, and all members have not the ſame office; ſo we being many are one body in Chriſt, and every one members one of another: Now whatſoever difference there may be in the members, as to their uſe and excellency, yet ſtill ſince they are ſo nearly related, as to belong to one body; how unnatural would it be to quarrel and wiſh ill one to another? for the eyes to envy the hands, or the hands to abuſe the feet, for one to ſay to the other, I have no need of thee, 1. Cor. xii. — And when we profeſs there is one ſpirit, that is the ſole cauſe of the uſefulneſs and ſucceſsfulneſs of any ones powers or labours; why ſhould we make ſuch vaſt and wicked diſtinctions in our eſteem and carriage towards men, as almoſt to idolize one, and ſacrifice another; to bawl and brangle with ſuch odious cries, I am for Paul, and hate Apollos: When, let men be what they will, let their charity be more or leſs; let them preach or pray, long or ſhort, within book or without; plant or water; 'tis God alone that giveth the encreaſe, 1 Cor. iii. — And ſince we have all one hope, expecting to live together for ever; why ſhould we be ſo much at odds here; and the ſalvation offer'd is not a ſingle Prize, ſo as that, tho' a great many ſhould run, one ſhould only obtain; that there need to be any ſcuffling and contending for fear of anothers carrying all away; but that they may run, not as uncertainly, the offer being made to all to accept of happineſs, and Heaven being large enough for all, if they will prepare for it: Or, ſhould I endeavour to ſtop or trip up my fellow-traveller, if he does not run juſt in my track, or go my pace towards it, or thereupon wiſh he may never come thither? May we not very juſtly apply the counſel Joſeph gave his brethren upon their returning to their father? that as we are journeying to one home, to our father's houſe, we ſhould ſee that we fall not out by the way.

And is it not reaſonable we ſhould conſider one another in love, when we are near of kin, not only in our great aim and profeſſion, as Chriſtians; but in our tranſgreſſing againſt the ſame, as ſinners. Be not many maſters, ſays James, for in many things we offend all: Be not ſo high, and harſh, and furious againſt another, as if he had all the faults, and you were exempt from all; ſince there are none but have ſome, though all may not have the ſame: He may be guilty of the greateſt in one kind, and you in another; he may be free from infirmities in ſome reſpects, and you in others. But alas! Men do commonly gaze, as through a magnifying glaſs, on others vices, and their own virtues; and ſo do not ſee how much they are alike to incline them to a more favourable carriage. Or, let men be never ſo exact and upright in their walking, they cannot, in this imperfect ſtate, with their greateſt confidence, be out of all danger of being miſlead; and therefore, ought in prudence to labour for mildneſs and moderation towards others, not knowing how ſoon they may have occaſion to deſire the like of them; according to the Apoſtle, Gal. vi. 1. If a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are ſpiritual, reſtore ſuch a one in the ſpirit of meekneſs; conſidering thy ſelf, leſt thou alſo be tempted.

And let us, to prevent a quarrelſome and diſdainful ſpirit, behold, how that we are all ourſelves equally worthleſs before our God; one of his beſt ſervants confeſſing, that his goodneſs extended not to him, Pſal. xvi. 2. and our Saviour telling us, that when we have done all we are commanded, we muſt ſay that we are unprofitable ſervants, Luke xvii. 10. And the Apoſtle before in this context, ſays, that neither Greeks nor Jews, &c. are any other before God; for that Chriſt is all and in all; that good reaſon there is for putting on bowels of mercies.

Or take a view of one another's preſent wants, or thoſe which probably may be; and you will find you are not ſo very unlike, or can be ſure long to continue ſo; but that you may ſtand in need of each others favours. If providence cauſes ſome good fortune to attend on you now, you know not how ſoon it may be ordered to ſhift about.

May we not thus ſee, how great a diſſuaſive the relation and likeneſs, that is between us, is againſt an unkind deportment? Or if this be inſufficient to work upon us, let us

Conſider, how much we have need to forbear the ſame, in order to promote any perſonal eſteem, eaſe and intereſt, and the general comfort and welfare of mankind in this world.

And one may be ſenſible, how great an attractive of reſpect is a mild and courteous temper. Where there is envy and fury, and the like, how does it naturally tend to wean mens affections from the perſons in whom they are found: And though it is our duty, as we ſee, to maintain a good will to all, ſo as to be ready to befriend them when convenient occaſion calls for it; yet it cannot be thought, that any are bound to reſpect them for their infirmities, as theſe at beſt are; but for any other good that appears in them; and for that relation they bare to us; and out of regard to the command of God, and thoſe advantages that may enſue thereby: Theſe moſt certainly are ſuch blemiſhes, as render them many times an eye-ſore to the world, and ſo far leſſens their character in the account of Scripture-doctrine. For though the hot and bluſtering man may be ſometimes cried up by an unthinking multitude, as one of a great mind, and a large ſoul; in that he can ſo highly reſent, and ſo loudly exclaim againſt any offence; yet can ſuch be ever thought, by thoſe who guide their opinions by the judgment of God, to have any other than a mean and narrow ſpirit, void of all that noble generoſity, that ſhould incline to put up quarrels, or to uſe more candour and mercy; and that he hath got at beſt but a falſe honour raiſed upon a bad foundation? As we may find teſtified by the authority of the Inſpired Writers; who may be allowed, it is to be hoped, to have the trueſt notion of what is excellent and honourable, Jam. iii. 13. "Who is a wiſe man, let him ſhew out of a good converſation his works with meekneſs of wiſdom; but if ye have bitter envying and ſtrife in your hearts, Glory not; this wiſdom deſcendeth not from above, but is earthly, ſenſual, and deviliſh." And Prov. xix. 11. "the diſcretion of a man deferreth his anger, and it is his glory to paſs over a tranſgreſſion." And xvi. 32. "He that is ſlow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his ſpirit, than he that taketh a city;" he gains ſuch a conqueſt as is more to be prized and praiſed: Or,

Whatſoever eſteem he may miſs of in the world, he is more at eaſe in himſelf, than others under their furious heats amidſt their greateſt glory. Where mens paſſions run high, how do theſe fret and gnaw the ſpirits; and raiſe ſuch a tempeſtuous hurricane within, as overturns all the order and compoſure of a man's mind.

And how much is a man's intereſt many times impaired by his ill temper and unkind carriage? How many good friends loſt; how many uſeful counſels thrown away, and how many that would be equally as uſeful kept from him, which there is no encouragement to aſſiſt him with? ——— It is not indeed a ſoft and eaſy temper which makes men trampled on, and betrays them to many inconveniencies, which is ſo beneficial; unleſs there be boldneſs and courage joined therewith; and ſuch there may be, conſiſtent with a mild nature, as contrary to the furious and malicious: This hath the meek man, who hath the general promiſe given of inheriting the earth, Matt. v. 5. He that will therefore love life, and ſee good days, let him according to Peter, 1 Ep. iii. 10. refrain his tongue from evil, &c. let him ſeek peace, and enſue it.

And it is peaceableneſs and concord makes for the benefit and comfort of a place where it comes. This is the way for the hearts of people to be comforted, by being knit together in love, Col. ii. 2. This they cannot but find true, Pſal. cxxxiii. 1. "How good and pleaſant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity. But where envying and ſtrife is, there is confuſion and every evil work, Jam. iii. 16. By long forbearing, is a prince perſwaded, but a ſoft tongue breaketh the bone, Prov. xxv. 15. A ſoft anſwer turns away wrath, but grievous words ſtir up ſtrife, Prov. li. 1. But where there is heat, and no yieldings, no reconciling tempers; what convulſions and frettings ariſe, that put families, neighbourhoods, and kingdoms into the greateſt uneaſineſs? Where there are churliſh Nabals, that there is no ſpeaking unto; where there are flaming fire-brands, that there is no coming near without heat; what little enjoyment can there be? — And when men are at variance with one another, how many deſigns are put by, for giving thoſe publick and private helps as might be of uſe againſt the approaches of any worldly evils, and the inſinuations and encroachments of vice? That our Saviour's words are too often verified, Luke xi. 17. A kingdom divided againſt it ſelf, is brought to deſolation; and the Apoſtle ſpeaks with no little reaſon, Gal. v. 15 If ye bite and devour one another, take heed ye be not devoured one of another. What more common, than to make miſchief one for another, where there is want of unity and friendſhip; or to ſuffer a black ſtorm to gather and fall, that at firſt appeared no bigger than a man's hand, which, if they had been ſo kind, they might have eaſily prevented from each other? What frequent advantages are gained by enemies, through the ſeparation of the hearts and ſtrength of a people, which when united, would, with the Divine Bleſſing, have been able to have debarred them from the ſame? And what a common inroad is made for Atheiſm and Irreligion, by thoſe gaps that are owing to our heats and diviſions, which ſlacken mens endeavours after a reformation? — But when we are ſpeaking of a mild and peaceable temper, it is not to encourage a ſlothful connivance in magiſtrates or miniſters, or any that have a charge over others: As that they lay aſide reproof and puniſhment, which are of the higheſt uſe. They may have compaſſion and meekneſs at the ſame time; they muſt be zealouſly affected in a good matter. A miniſter is to rebuke ſharply, Tit. i. 13. but yet with all long-ſuffering, 2 Tim. iv. 2. In meekneſs inſtructing, 2 Tim. ii. 25. without any wrathful and malicious words and wiſhes. Others are to correct, but it muſt be in love, and with an hearty deſire of promoting ſome good thereby. When kindneſs goes along with diſcipline, then it is moſt likely to take effect. And it is therefore neceſſary, that mens zeal in ſetting forward the ſame be proportioned to the nature of offences; that it may be ſeen it is not made up of ſpite and revenge: For nothing does blaſt the operation more, than a diſcovery of ſuch ill nature.

But if men will not be perſwaded to a better temper for the ſake of any thing in this world, yet the neceſſity thereof for a future happineſs, one ſhould think might incline them;

For, if we act in defiance againſt the Divine Will, there can be, without repentance, no hopes of mercy. But the promiſes and threatnings relating hereunto, make all ſtill more plain. " We are to have compaſſion one of another, &c. knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye may inherit a bleſſing, 1 Pet. iii. 9. The merciful are thoſe that ſhall obtain mercy, Matt. v. 7. and the peace-makers, that ſhall be called the children of God, ver. 9. But he ſhall have judgment without mercy, who ſhewed no mercy, Jam. ii. 13. and we are to follow peace and holineſs, without which no man ſhall ſee the Lord, Heb. xii. 14. and whoſoever is angry with his brother without a cauſe, ſhall be in danger of the judgment; and whoſoever ſhall ſay to his brother, Raca, ſhall be in danger of the council; and whoſoever ſhall ſay, thou fool, ſhall be in danger of hell-fire, Matt. v. 22. And if ye forgive not men their treſpaſſes, neither will your Father forgive you, Matt. vi. 14. and he is to be delivered to the tormentor, who will not have compaſſion on his fellow-ſervant, even as the Lord hath pity on him, ch. xviii. 34. And all his prayers for pardon and mercy will not be accepted, unleſs there be lifting holy hands without wrath. For, firſt be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift, ch v. 24. and any pompous work of religion, if without charity, it profiteth nothing, 1 Cor. xiii. If men continue guilty of the works of the fleſh, hatred, variance, &c. they ſhall not inherit the kingdom of God, Gal. v. 51. That is not a place for ſuch to come near to make diſturbance in; there being none but thoſe to be there, that will dwell togther in love; that will have all ſweetneſs in their carriage and tenderneſs in their affections, and mutual rejoicings at each others happineſs; joying and uniting together in ſinging the everlaſting praiſes of their God: And this is the Apoſtle's exhortation in this chapter to the Coloſſians.

Ver. 15.—— In one Body.] Viz. the Church, which is the body of Chriſt, its head.

Ver. 23.—— As to the Lord.] Or, as commanded ſo to do by the word of the Lord. See Eph. vi. 6, 7, 8, 9.

CHAP. IV.

1 He exhorteth them to be fervent in prayer, 5 to walk wiſely toward them that are not yet come to the true knowledge of Chriſt. 10 He ſaluteth them, and wiſheth them all proſperity.

MAſters, give unto your ſervants that which is juſt and equal, knowing that ye alſo have a Maſter in heaven.

2 Continue in prayer, and watch in the ſame with thankſgiving;

3 Withal, praying alſo for us, that God would open unto us a door of utterance, to ſpeak the myſtery of Chriſt, for which I am alſo in bonds:

4 That I may make it manifeſt, as I ought to ſpeak.

5 Walk in wiſdom toward them that are without, redeeming the time.

6 Let your ſpeech be alway with grace, ſeaſoned with ſalt, that ye may know how ye ought to anſwer every man.

7 All my ſtate ſhall Tychicus declare unto you, who is a beloved brother, and a faithful miniſter, and fellow-ſervant in the Lord:

8 Whom I have ſent unto you for the ſame purpoſe, that he might know your eſtate, and comfort your hearts:

9 With Oneſimus a faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you. They ſhall make known unto you all things which are done here.

10 Ariſtarchus my fellow-priſoner ſaluteth you, and Marcus ſiſter ſon to Barnabas (touching whom ye received commandments; if he come unto you, receive him)

11 And Jeſus, which is called Juſtus, who are of the circumciſion. Theſe only are my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, which have been a comfort unto me.

12 Epaphras, who is one of you, a ſervant of Chriſt, ſaluteth you, always labouring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may ſtand perfect and complete in all the will of God.

13 For I bear him record, that he hath a great zeal for you, and them that are in Laodicea, and them in Hierapolis.

14 Luke the beloved phyſician, and Demas greet you.

15 Salute the brethren which are in Laodicea, and Nymphas, and the Church which is in his houſe.

16 And when this epiſtle is read amongſt you, cauſe that it be read alſo in the church of the Laodiceans; and that ye likewiſe read the epiſtle from Laodicea.

17 And ſay to Archippus, Take heed to the miniſtry which thou haſt received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it.

18 The ſalutation by the hand of me Paul. Remember my bonds. Grace be with you. Amen.

¶ Written from Rome to the Coloſſians, by Tychicus and Oneſimus.

This chapter contains,

I. The duty of maſters, with a motive to inforce it; ver. 1.

II. Exhortations to ſeveral duties, as (1.) to prayer; concerning which he ſhews the manner, that it ſhould be offered with perſeverance, watchfulneſs and thankfulneſs, ver. 2. Then he ſhews the matter of a good and effectual prayer, as the perſons for whom, and the things for which prayer may and ought to be made, ver. 3, 4. (2.) He exhorts a diſcreet carriage towards Heathens; amplified by one particular branch, redeeming the time, ver. 5. (3.) He exhorts to an holy communication, ſo as to fit and enable us to give particular anſwers on all occaſions, ver. 6.

III. The concluſion of the Epiſtle; which contains an account of his ſending Tychicus and Oneſimus to them; on which occaſion he praiſes Tychicus, ver. 7, 8. and Oneſimus, ver. 9. He ſends the ſalutations of many perſons by name, ver. 10—15. gives direction concerning the reading of this Epiſtle, ver. 16. and admoniſheth Archippus their miniſter to be diligent and faithful in his miniſtry, ver. 17. and ſo concludes with his ſalutations of them, requeſt to them, and prayer for them, ver. 18.

Ver. 3. — In bonds.] At Rome; ſee the Introduction.

Ver. 5. — Towards them that are without.] The pail of the Church of Chriſt, i. e. the Heathens.

Ver. 11. — Which have been a comfort unto me.] In my bonds at Rome; ſee the Introduction.

Ver. 14. Luke, the beloved phyſician.] The ſame that wrote the Goſpel, which bares his name; ſee the Introduction to that Goſpel.

Ver. 18. Remember my bonds.] In your prayers, that God would deliver me out of them.

And now having finiſhed this Epiſtle which was levelled by the Apoſtle againſt thoſe, who would have ſeduced the Coloſſians from the faith in Chriſt, by inticing words, and having ſhewn in the notes, the reaſon of the Apoſtle's declaiming againſt the philoſophy of the Heathens, I ſhall conclude with ſome account of their knowledge of God in

A Diſſertation on natural Theology or Divinity, and human learning, abſtract from Revelation.

It has already been ſeveral times noted, that there is ſuch a thing as natural theology; that is, a knowledge of God, and Divine Affairs, attainable, in ſome degree, by the light of nature only.

If it were not ſo, it would be very difficult, perhaps impoſſible, to ſay how the generality of Heathens, who had no other light to walk by, ſhould come by the little knowledge they had of Divine Affairs; who by the ſtrength of unaſſiſted reaſon only, which is that I call the light of nature, were convinced of the being of a God, and Providence; of their duty to worſhip, and pay Religious Reverence to the Deity; and of their obligation to mutual offices of love, and kindneſs, and beneficence, to all acts of juſtice and mercy to one another: All which, I have obſerved, on other occaſions, is very plain from their own authors of all ſorts, Hiſtorians, Poets, and Philoſophers. And if the knowledge of theſe things were not attainable, in ſome degree, by the light of nature only; how can we think they ſhould come by it, when, it is plain, they had no other light to guide them to it, no revelation, as the Jews had, and we Chriſtians have, whereby they might acquire it?

'Tis true, they had tutors and inſtructors of their own, ſuch as they were; I mean, their prieſts and magi, their ſoothſayers and philoſophers, who from what diſcoveries they were capable of making by nature's light, that is, by collection and inference from ſenſible objects, did teach the common people what they knew of Sacred Things: But, as all the knowledge theſe men had muſt come from nature's light alone, by ſuch collection and inference; ſo others that were taught by them, owed all their knowledge of Divine Affairs to the ſelf-ſame original; and if they had not had thoſe teachers to inſtruct them, as they muſt have been at ſome more pains, ſo they might, and we may very well ſuppoſe they would have found out many of the things they taught them, by the ſame means as they had done. For as all men are by nature endued with reaſon, that is, a faculty of apprehending, comparing and judging, of collecting, inferring, and drawing conſequences and concluſions from what they ſee and find in the greater and the leſſer world, in the Heavens and the earth, and in themſelves; though all men have not reaſon in the ſame degree, and therefore all men are not capable of, and conſequently, would not make the ſame diſcoveries, how intent ſoever they might be, and whatever pains they might be at; yet, I make no ſcruple to affirm, the leaſt ſagacious of mankind may by the light of nature only diſcover, apprehend and know ſome things, according to his meaſure, that are needful to be known and done by all men, in order to their happineſs. But this will be more properly inſiſted on, and particularly illuſtrated, under another head.

At preſent, I have only one thing more to ſay to this affair, and that is this: That though men might attain to a knowledge of God, and ſome other Sacred Matters, by the light of nature only; yet, for want of Revelation to aſſiſt them in their ſearch, their knowledge of theſe things muſt needs be very ſhort of perfect, very defective in ſeveral reſpects, of a very low degree, and only in proportion to the light they have.

Indeed, the Apoſtle, ſpeaking in and of the earlieſt times of the Goſpel-Revelation, tells us, Now we ſee thro' a glaſs darkly, but then face to face: Now I know in part, but then I ſhall know even as alſo I am known, 1 Cor. xviii. 12. From whence we may infer, That if the light and knowledge of Sacred Matters, which we have by the Goſpel-Revelation, the brighteſt and moſt glorious that ever was, or ever will be vouchſafed to men in this world, be ſo dark and imperfect, as that the Apoſtle ſhould compare it to looking and ſeeing as only through a glaſs, and that too when the Church had ſuch an intimate converſe and correſpondence with Heaven, and was immediately and extraordinarily aſſiſted and enlightned from above; then the light into, and knowledge of Divine Affairs, which the moſt ſagacious and aſpiring ſages and philoſophers among the Heathens could poſſibly attain unto by nature, or unaſſiſted reaſon only, muſt needs be much more dark, and much leſs perfect: And conſequently, all they could pretend to, was only ſome faint glimmerings of light, a very dusky and imperfect knowledge, in compariſon of that which is now attainable by us, and which the Jews might formerly attain unto, by the light of Revelation, ſuperadded to the light of nature. And now,

As to the extent of natural theology, with reſpect to the moſt material things it teaches, as neceſſary to be known and done by men, in order to their happineſs; the Apoſtle plainly intimates, in Rom. xi. 14. That the Gentiles, who had not the law, did by nature the things contained in the law. Where, by the things contained in the law, are meant, the principal duties preſcribed by the law, and to be performed by men, in order to their happineſs, both at preſent, and hereafter. And if the Gentiles did by nature do thoſe things, if they did perform thoſe duties, though they had not the written law; it is not againſt reaſon, nor contrary to truth, but agreeable to both, that the Heathens might, and did attain to ſome good degree of knowledge both of God, and of their duty to him, and to one another, by the light of nature only, without the help of Revelation; and that the knowledge of theſe things, attainable by nature's light, was of no ſmall extent, though it did not reach ſo far as that we have by Revelation, but went a great way, as the caſe then ſtood, towards making men both good and happy. For the Apoſtle tells us, that the Gentiles did by nature the things contained in, or preſcribed by the law: He ſpeaks indefinitely, without ſaying either what, or how many things they did; and therefore, we may fairly underſtand him, as intending all thoſe duties of the moral law, which are diſcoverable by nature's light, if there had never been any external Revelation of them.

Now, the Gentiles having by the light of nature found a God; it was eaſy for them to diſcover, by the ſelf-ſame light that this God muſt be honour'd with ſome kind of worſhip, ſuitable to the notions and conceptions they had of him; that all things belonging to the Deity are ſacred, and not to be prophan'd; that ſome part of our time is due to him, from whom we have our being and our life; that ſome proportion of our ſubſtance is his due, from whom we have receiv'd our all; and that, conſidering the mutual dependance of men on one another, for the advantage of ſocieties in general, and the benefit and welfare of every member in particular, there are duties neceſſary to be perform'd by inferiors to ſuperiors, and by ſuperiors to inferiors, and by all men to their equals; in ſhort, that all men ought to deal with others, all circumſtances duly weigh'd, as they would have others deal with them. Theſe things the Gentiles did by nature: That is, the thinking ſort diſcover'd, the wiſe among them taught, and the good and virtuous, who were therefore truly wiſe, did practiſe all theſe things by the light of nature only. And ſo the Gentiles, having not the law, were a law unto themſelves: That is, they did to themſelves, by nature's light, ſupply the place of the law of Moſes.

And ſurely, if the light of nature did in them ſupply the place of the written law; then, though this knowledge of Divine Affairs, which the Heathens had by nature, was very ſhort of perfect, yet is was ſuch, as, if well improv'd, and regularly follow'd, would ſet them fair for happineſs, tho' it could give them no aſſurance of it.

To make good this, we need only look to Rom. xi. 12. and then to ver. 16. comparing one with t'other; and we ſhall ſee, in both, this matter ſtated and reſolv'd to ſatisfaction. As many as have ſinned without law, ſhall alſo periſh without law: And as many as have ſinned in the law, ſhall be judged by the law. ——— In the day when God ſhall judge the ſecrets of men by Jeſus Chriſt, according to my Goſpel. As if he had ſaid thus; "All thoſe of the Gentile world, who having not receiv'd the Moſaical law, have ſinned againſt that knowledge of God which has otherwiſe been afforded them, ſhall be adjudged to perdition: That is, they ſhall partake of that final doom which ſhall involve all, both Jews and Gentiles, at that great day, when Chriſt Jeſus, being by his father ſeated in his regal power, ſhall at the end of all come forth again to judge the world, not according to outward privileges or performances, but inward qualifications and demeanours, being as he is, a ſearcher of hearts: For then ſhall the Jews be dealt with, either in judgment or mercy, as they have liv'd or not liv'd according to the rules of the Moſaical Law; and ſo the gentiles alſo, according as they have obey'd or not obey'd the law of nature." I think there is no need of adding any thing to this, for a farther proof and illuſtration of this matter; eſpecially ſince the whole paſſage makes it evident. I ſhall therefore

Proceed to enquire, whether this natural theology may be ſaid to be, in any meaſure or degree, innate in men? and conſider, how this innate knowledge of Divine Affairs differs from that which is acquir'd either by experience, or revelation; and ſhew, how far the light of nature is concern'd in each.

As to the enquiry, whether the knowledge of Divine Affairs be in any degree innate in men? If we allow, as all men do, that men may have a knowledge of theſe things, in any meaſure, by the light of nature, that is by the dictates of unaſſiſted reaſon only, then this muſt neceſſarily follow; or elſe we muſt deny man to be endu'd with the faculty of reaſon from his birth, or firſt appearance in the world, and how he ſhould come by it afterwards, is hard to tell.

I do not ſay, that every man, as ſoon as he is born, hath ſuch a knowledge of Divine Affairs immediately; but that he is born with ſuch a faculty, by which, ſo ſoon as he comes to be able to exert it, he may, without any other help, arrive to ſome degree of knowledge of theſe matters. For it is one thing to have this faculty, and another to be able to exert it. And this I take to be the ground of thoſe mens error, who have diſputed with ſo much vehemence againſt innate ideas; that they do not diſtinguiſh, as they ought, between a perſon's having ſuch a faculty as reaſon, and his being capable of uſing or exerting it. For every man is born a man, in all reſpects a man, tho' he be but a child in underſtanding, as well as ſtature; that is, he has, from his beginning to exiſt in this world, the faculties of human nature, though he be not able to exert them. And to ſay, an infant has not reaſon, becauſe he is not capable of uſing it; is as abſurd, as to ſay, he is not man, only becauſe he is not ſo big as one at thirty.

So that, we muſt not argue from the capacity of man in infancy or childhood; but from the capacity of human nature: And the queſtion is not, Whether man by nature, in his infant ſtate, can have any ſenſe or knowledge of Divine Affairs? but, Whether man, as man, that is, as he is endued with reaſon, can by the uſe of that, without any other help, arrive to any meaſure or degree of apprehenſion of theſe things? If he can, and I think it is no more than all men grant; then this knowledge, or, which is much the ſame, the faculty by which he does acquire it, is innate in man. An infant certainly has reaſon, though he cannot reaſon; that is, he has the faculty, though he is not capable of uſing it: Or elſe he is not man, but a monſter as prodigious as any; a brute in human ſhape.

No, if man has that faculty by nature, from his very birth or firſt appearance in the world, by which, ſuppoſing him capable of uſing it, he may diſcover and come to the knowledge of ſome Sacred Matters; then this knowledge may be ſaid to be innate in man, becauſe that faculty is ſo And for any man to ſay, that all the knowledge man can have by nature, comes by conſideration and reflection, or by collection and inference from ſenſible objects, is nothing to his purpoſe, or rather very much to mine; for theſe being only ſo many ways whereby the faculty of reaſon is exerted, do plainly ſhew, that reaſon is innate in man, becauſe, without this faculty, the thing could neither conſider nor reflect, neither collect nor infer; but muſt be ſuppoſed, like other brute animals, to have ſight without knowledge, and hearing and all other ſenſes without underſtanding.

But, to put this matter out of doubt, let us ſuppoſe ſome perſon, ſome individual of human race, appearing in the world in full proportion of body and of mind, that is, with all his parts and faculties compleat, as much accompliſhed as we can ſuppoſe a man to be at his full growth, and not improved by converſation and experience, having no one to inſtruct him, nor any other light whereby to diſcover any thing, but his own unaſſiſted reaſon: The queſtion is, if we may make a queſtion of it, Whether this perſon of himſelf, by the ſole ſtrength and evidence of reaſon, by contemplating himſelf, and all things elſe he ſees about him, could arrive to any apprehenſion of a firſt cauſe of all theſe things? Whether he could, in any meaſure or degree, by conſideration of, and reflection on himſelf, or by collection and inference from ſenſible objects, find out that Being, who was the Author of all others? If he could not, then it would follow, that the exiſtence of a God could never be diſcovered by the light of nature only; which yet has always been made uſe of as an argument to prove his Being, againſt thoſe that have denied or doubted of it. But if he could diſcover this in any meaſure under theſe dark circumſtances, as undoubtedly he might, or elſe he either has not reaſon, or has it to no purpoſe; then it is plain, that the ſenſe and apprehenſion of a Deity, that is, of ſome Supreme Almighty Being, who was the cauſe and author of all other beings, is innate in man; that is, a man, as man, may by the light of nature only, arrive to ſome degree of knowledge of a God, though he cannot, as no man can, have juſt and adequate conceptions of him.

In ſhort, and to conclude this point, all that I mean, and all that any man can mean, by an innate knowledge of Divine Affairs, is only ſuch a meaſure or degree of knowledge of theſe things as man is capable of attaining to by the light of nature only, without the help of revelation, or any other monitor beſides his own naked unaſſiſted reaſon. And I think, upon the whole, I have juſt cauſe to fear at leaſt, that ſome learned men have gone too far in their diſputes againſt innate ideas, by which nothing can be meant, but ſuch a ſenſe and knowledge as men may have of Sacred Matters by nature's light alone; and have, either purpoſely or unawares, betrayed the cauſe they would at other times ſeem to defend, by being ſo far advocates for Atheiſm and Irreligion, as to leave the greateſt part of mankind, who have not the light of revelation to direct them, utterly deſtitute of any light at all whereby to find out God, or to diſcover any kind of worſhip to be due unto him: Becauſe, according to their reaſoning, mens reaſon can be of no advantage to them to this purpoſe, and nature's light alone can make no ſuch diſcoveries in any meaſure or degree.

And now, to ſhew how this innate knowledge of Divine Affairs differs from that which is acquired either by experience or revelation; as alſo, how far the light of nature is concerned in each: I ſhall only briefly hint theſe following things.

Firſt, That the mind of man is capable of improvement as well as his body; and conſequently he may grow and increaſe in knowledge as well as in ſtature, till he comes to the perfection of manhood in bulk and underſtanding. So we are told That Jeſus increaſed in wiſdom and ſtature, Luke ii. 52. That is, in reſpect of his human nature, conſiſting of ſoul and body, he did grow or improve; his ſoul improved in wiſdom, and his body in ſtature, as others of his age are wont to do.

Secondly, This improvement of the mind in knowledge, as the growth of the body in ſtature, comes on by degrees, and is increaſed by inſtruction and experience. No man is perfectly wiſe and knowing at once; but he increaſes knowledge, as he increaſes ſtrength, by little and little: And according to the aſſiſtances he has, either from experience or revelation, and the uſe he makes of thoſe aſſiſtances, his knowledge of Divine Affairs, as well as his inſight into natural things, is daily more and more refined and perfect, and the man grows ſtill more wiſe and knowing the longer he lives, though he cannot in this life bring knowledge to perfection.

Thirdly, The light of nature, by which I mean that faculty of reaſon which is in every man by nature, is concerned, as in enabling him to make his firſt diſcoveries, ſo to improve his knowledge of the things he has diſcovered. For, as it is by means of reaſon that he becomes more knowing, or is confirmed in the notions he already has of things, by obſervation, which is what I call experience; ſo it is upon the evidence of reaſon, that he receives and makes uſe of that other help to knowledge, revelation. For, by this he judges of the things revealed unto him, whether they be plain and obvious to his underſtanding, and conſequently, ſuch as cannot be denied or doubted of; or whether the authority by which they are revealed is ſuch as may and muſt be credited, and by conſequence the things themſelves are true, and ought to be believed, though he cannot comprehend the nature or the manner of them. And now I come,

To enquire briefly, what is meant by reaſoning? or, what it is to reaſon? And this enquiry will lead me to conſider the nature and extent of human reaſon. And then

I ſhall enquire alſo, What is meant by reaſoning out of the Scriptures? Which is the very thing that the Apoſtle Paul is noted for. And this enquiry again will lead me to conſider, of what uſe human reaſon is in Sacred Matters; that is, what part it has to act, and how it does exert itſelf, in diſcuſſing points or matters that are purely theological. Now, Reaſon is that faculty in man, whereby he is diſtinguiſhed from all other ſublunary beings, and ſhews the excellency of human nature above that of all brute animals. To know preciſely what it is, and give a perfect definition of it, is not within our power; but is a ſecret hidden with that firſt and author of all beings, who endowed our nature with it. That mankind is endued with reaſon, is very plain from its effects; but what this faculty in mankind is, is not ſo plain: Nor can we have an adequate and clear conception of it in this ſtate, but muſt expect the perfect knowledge of it in another ſtate to come.

It is the diſtinguiſhing mark or character of man, and ſhews him to partake of the image of his Maker; and renders him capable of much higer aims, an unſpeakably nobler end, and an infinitely greater happineſs than any of the inferior creatures can have, or poſſibly attain unto. It is that ſtamp or ſignature upon the ſoul of man, which ſhews its original to be Divine, and ſpeaks its extraction much more noble, and makes it ſhine with greater luſtre, and appear more eminently the workmanſhip of God, if I may ſo expreſs it, than that of other animals.

But the nature of this faculty will beſt appear, by conſidering, which I ſhall do very briefly, its effects and operations.

Now reaſon, as a learned prelate of our Church has very well defined it, "is that faculty in man, whereby he apprehends, compares, and judges of moral things; that is, ſuch things as do not come within the ken of any of the ſenſes, but are the objects of the underſtanding only."

Firſt, then, by reaſon's apprehending any thing, I do not mean its having an adequate and perfect notion and conception of the thing it is ſaid to apprehend; but its having ſuch a notion and conception of it, as is commenſurate to its preſent circumſtances and capacities. I mean, it does not ſignify an exact and perfect knowledge of the thing propoſed, as to its nature, and the manner of its exiſtence and operations; but only a capacity of underſtanding any propoſition, and the terms of which it is compoſed, in ſuch meaſure or degree, by which reaſon is enabled to give a judgment of the thing propoſed, whether it be true or falſe, good or evil; or the like.

For it is one thing for a man to apprehend, that is, to underſtand a propoſition, and the terms of which it does conſiſt, and by comparing circumſtances, to paſs his judgment on the things propoſed, as to the truth or falſhood, the good or evil of them; and another thing to know exactly the nature of thoſe things, and the manner of their exiſtence and operations: The former human reaſon may; but the latter, in many inſtances, it cannot do.

Hence reaſon may be ſaid to apprehend, though it cannot comprehend the thing propoſed; by the firſt of which is meant, its underſtanding ſo much of the thing as is needful to be underſtood, and it is capable of underſtanding; and by the latter, ſuch a full and perfect knowledge of the thing, its nature, manner of exiſtence, qualities and operations, as any being, however qualified, can have, or poſſible attain unto.

And hence a difference is eaſily perceivable betwixt Divine and human reaſon; the firſt of which extends it ſelf at once to all things in the world, and all particulars relating to them, and knows and comprehends them all moſt perfectly; whereas the latter reaches but a very little way, can only apprehend and know things ſuperficially, not as to what and how they are in every reſpect, but only prima facie, as they do or may appear in a manner ſuitable to its capacity.

Therefore, for any man to think his reaſon capable of comprehending what it can only apprehend in ſome very low degree, is to think himſelf not man, but God; to magnify himſelf beyond his ſize; to exalt himſelf, in his vain imagination, far above what he can attain unto; and to graſp at things that are many, even infinite degrees out of his reach. Even in natural things, I mean objects of ſenſe, and thoſe among them that we have the cleareſt and moſt perfect knowledge of, there are abundance of particulars, whoſe nature, manner of exiſtence, qualities and operations the moſt exalted human reaſon cannot know; at leaſt, it cannot make a full diſcovery of them in this ſtate. And then, how vain a thing is man, when he fancies his ſhort-ſighted reaſon capable of comprehending not only all created, but even uncreated nature, the incomprehenſible Divinity itſelf? To dream of bringing the Divine Perfections, and confining them within the narrow limits of human underſtanding, and ſo to ſtate the bounds of infinity itſelf, as to make our ſcanty reaſon capable of ſurrounding it, would ſhew the ſame degree of folly, as if we ſhould compare Eternity with time, Omnipotence with impotence, Omniſcience with the moſt imperfect knowledge, or, to ſay all in a word, God with man; and make the latter equal with, if not ſuperior to the former. That queſtion, therefore, which Zophar put to Holy Job, is not impertinent to this purpoſe; Canſt thou by ſearching find out God? Canſt thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is as high as Heaven, What canſt thou do? deeper than Hell, What canſt thou know? The meaſure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the ſea, Job xi. 7, 8, 9. For, though all this is ſpoken only of one Attribute of God, to wit, his wiſdom; yet, ſince whatever may be ſaid of the Divine Perfections ſingly and apart, may as truly be ſaid of the Divinity itſelf, in which they are; by conſequence, if human reaſon cannot fathom the Divine Wiſdom in particular, neither can it comprehend the nature of God in general, in whom that Wiſdom is: But if this be unſearchable by man, the other muſt needs be ſo.

However, human reaſon may be very well allowed to apprehend the thing propoſed, whether natural or Divine, though it cannot comprehend it. That is, a man may, by reaſon's light, attain to the meaning of the terms of any propoſition, though he cannot by that light diſcover or diſcern the manner of exiſtence, the qualities and operations of the things propoſed. For inſtance; let the propoſition be, that man conſiſts of ſoul and body: Though we cannot ſee the ſubſtance of the ſoul, nor penetrate the manner of its exiſtence, nor know preciſely how it moves and actuates the body; yet we may apprehend the meaning of the terms, that ſoul and body are the two conſtituent parts of man; that the body, being ſenſeleſs matter, cannot live alone, nor move it ſelf, but receives its life and motion from the ſoul: We are by reaſon and experience aſſured that theſe things are and muſt be ſo.

Again, let it be propoſed, concerning any thing or being, that it is both one, and three; that though it be but one, yet it is three, and though it be three, yet it is but one, in different reſpects: We may clearly underſtand the meaning of the terms, one and three, and perceive the difference of one from the other; and we ſee it may be ſo, and know it to be ſo in ſome things obvious to ſenſe, as in a triangle which conſiſts of three equal ſides, and yet is but one triangle: But when this is ſaid of God, that he is one and three; that there are three perſons in the Godhead, of the ſame ſubſtance, power and eternity, and yet but one God; though our reaſon cannot comprehend the manner of exiſtence of three equal perſons in one eſſence, yet, ſince reaſon will inform us that this may be, and experience does aſſure us that ſomewhat like it is in nature, and Revelation does affirm a Trinity in Unity, with reſpect to God; we may conclude it ſuch a truth, as is worthy of, and juſtly requires our belief, though there be ſome things relating to it, which ſurmount our underſtandings, and ſome difficulties in it, which human reaſon cannot ſolve. But,

Secondly, Another act or property of human reaſon is, that of comparing things propoſed with one another, in order to its paſſing judgment on them.

Thus when two different things or perſons are made the terms of any propoſition, the work of reaſon is, to ſet one againſt the other, and by viewing each on every ſide, and conſidering impartially the circumſtances with which either is attended, ſo to compare them with their different reſpects to truth and falſhood, good and evil, as to be able to make choice of which ſoever of the two appears to be the trueſt or the beſt. For inſtance, if it be affirmed, that virtue is good, and vice is evil; we know what good and evil is, that is, we apprehend the meaning of thoſe terms, upon the firſt propoſal of them; that good is ſomething beneficial, and evil ſomething hurtful: But now, the work of reaſon is, to diſcover how, and in what reſpects, virtue is good, and vice evil. And this it muſt endeavour, by a nice compariſon of one with the other, weighing exactly and impartially every circumſtance, together with the tendency of each; ſtripping both naked of all things that may either render the former more deformed, or the latter more amiable than indeed it is; and ſo expoſing both in their ſeveral native ſhapes to the underſtanding for its judgment, and to the will for choice: And thus it will be eaſy to perceive, that virtue is more charming, and vice much more deformed, when both appear unto us naked, than when dreſſed up in ſuch circumſtances as do many times attend them. Let it be ſaid again, that God is the beſt of friends, and the Devil the worſt of enemies unto us: Here we clearly underſtand God and the Devil to be as contrary to each other, as a friend and enemy can be; but how they are ſo, as to us, we cannot know, but by conſidering each apart, with their ſeveral deſigns and aims towards us, and the ways and methods taken by each party to do us good or hurt. And if upon a ſtrict enquiry we find, that all God's dealings with us are only for our good, both here and hereafter, and that he affords us all the means that are neceſſary and conducive to that end; and that the ſole aim of the Devil is, to work our ruin and deſtruction, at preſent and for ever, and that all his ſuggeſtions and practices towards us have a natural tendency thereto: We may from hence conclude, and we ſhall have the evidence of reaſon for it, that the former is our great and only friend, and the latter our great and only enemy. And then it is eaſy to determine, on whom the choice muſt fall.

And this leads me to conſider the third and laſt work reaſon has to do; to wit, after apprehending and comparing things propoſed, to paſs its judgment on thoſe things, as to the truth or falſhood, the good or evil of them, to the underſtanding, that the will may make its choice accordingly of one or the other.

Now, though it be true, that as human reaſon is imperfect, and cannot comprehend thoſe things, which yet it may be ſaid in ſome degree to apprehend, ſo its judgment on thoſe things is not infallible at all times; yet, when it is unbiaſſed, and unprejudiced, and exerts its utmoſt ſkill and power for the finding out of truth, though it may ſometimes fail us, ſo that we may judge amiſs, yet, ſince the error is not wilful, but reſulting only from the frailty and ſhort-ſightedneſs of human underſtanding, after our beſt endeavours to inform ourſelves aright, we have ſome reaſon to infer, at leaſt to hope, that ſuch a failure in our judgment will not be imputed to us for a fault, as being only our infirmity, which ſince the fall we cannot help; though it may influence us ſomething, as the effect of that primitive tranſgreſſion by which we fell. But this I ſpeak of human reaſon, as to its capacities by nature, without the aſſiſtance of Revelation; that if in ſuch dark circumſtances we are ſincere in our endeavours, and do our beſt to find out truth, and when it is found, do chuſe impartially what ſhall appear to us to be the beſt, upon the niceſt ſearch that we can make; then our conſciences will bear witneſs for us, that we have done what in us lies towards our happineſs: And we know, that if we do our beſt, we have a merciful and gracious God to deal with, who will not be ſevere with any man for what he cannot help. And now,

Having thus ſhewn what is meant by reaſoning, and in that, the nature and extent of human reaſon, chiefly as unaſſiſted by Revelation: I proceed, to conſider alſo, what is meant by reaſoning out of the Scriptures, and likewiſe of what uſe human reaſon is in Sacred Matters; that is, what part it has to act, and how it does exert itſelf, in diſcuſſing points or matters that are purely theological.

It is ſaid of the Apoſtle Paul, in Acts xvii. 2. That he reaſoned with the Jews out of the Scriptures. That is, he endeavoured to convince them, by arguments drawn from the writings of the Old Teſtament, which they held to be Sacred and Canonical, That Jeſus Chriſt was the true Meſſias, who was to come into the world. This was the great deſign and buſineſs of the Apoſtles in all their dealings with the Jews, to perſwade them, that Jeſus was the Chriſt, the very Meſſias foretold from time to time, and ſo often promiſed to them by Moſes and the Prophets, and in the Pſalms: Which three parts, according to our Saviour's diſtribution, do on one account or other take in all the Jewiſh canon of the Scripture, Luke xxiv. 44.

Now, to reaſon out of the Scriptures, is to argue from the words and ſenſe of Scripture, for or againſt any matter in diſpute. The matter in diſpute between the Apoſtles and the Jews was this; Whether that perſon, that very Jeſus, whom the Apoſtles preached, was the Chriſt, the Meſſias promiſed to the Jews, or not? The Jews contended that he was not the perſon, and thought, no doubt, they had the Scriptures on their ſide. The Apoſtles, on the other hand, affirmed, he was the very perſon promiſed, and proved he was ſo, from thoſe very Scriptures, which they muſt needs be judged by, becauſe they owned them for Canonical, and that they were the Word of God. And in order to their doing this effectually, that they might ſo reaſon out of, or from the Scriptures, as to convince the unbelieving Jews that this muſt needs be ſo, two things were requiſite.

1. A competent ſkill in the language and phraſeology of Scripture. And,

2. An ability, by other uſual helps, to reach the genuine ſenſe and meaning of the Sacred Writings.

1. I ſay, that they might reaſon out of Scripture to the purpoſe, it was requiſite the Apoſtles ſhould be competently ſkilled in the language and phraſeology of Scripture.

For unleſs they underſtood the words and phraſes, they could never be certain of the ſenſe of Scripture. Which I the rather mention, not only with reference to the Jews themſelves, the generality of whom did not at that time underſtand the original language in which the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament were written; and therefore had a tranſlation of them into their vulgar tongue for common uſe: But alſo with reſpect to after-ages; to ſhew the advantage and neceſſity of human learning to this purpoſe. For ſince tranſlations are ſo faulty, as generally they are in ſome reſpects or other, they cannot be ſuppoſed ſo ſafe and ſure a guide to truth, as the original for certain is. And therefore, if we would be certain of the ſenſe, we muſt be firſt endued with ſuch a ſtock of human learning, whereby to underſtand the language of the Scriptures.

In the Apoſtles times, indeed, the place of human learning was generally ſupplied by inſpiration; though ſometimes, as in Paul particularly, both theſe met together in one perſon. But, ſince inſpiration ceaſed, as it has long ſince done, whatever ſome pretenders to it have affirmed; the only means now left, beſides the bleſſing of God upon our juſt endeavours, for which we always ought to pray, whereby to underſtand the language of the Scriptures, is our being, by the help of human learning, competently skilled therein: By which I mean, our being ſo far maſters of thoſe languages, wherein the Scriptures were originally written, as to be able rightly to interpret the words and phraſes, either literally as they nakedly occur, or alluſively, according to the uſages and cuſtoms, and whatever other circumſtances, to which they may, or do moſt probably refer. But,

2. There are other helps, beſides this of human literature, whereby reaſon is aſſiſted to find the genuine and proper ſenſe and meaning of the Sacred Writings, and without which we cannot find it, and conſequently cannot reaſon rightly out of Scripture. And they are ſuch as theſe.

Firſt, The perſpicuity of any place of Scripture, in and of itſelf; when it is ſo plain and obvious to our underſtanding, that we need look no farther than the text itſelf, to find the ſenſe and meaning of it.

Secondly, Obſerving the coherence and connexion of one ſentence with, and its dependance on another. By which I mean, reading the text together with the context: By which means the ſenſe of any part, that elſe would ſeem obſcure and unintelligible, will be cleared up, and made more plain and eaſy to be underſtood.

Thirdly, Bringing in other paſſages, as third parties, to reconcile ſuch texts as ſeem to contradict, or claſh with one another. As when it is ſaid in one place, No man hath ſeen God, that is the Father, at any time, John i. 18. and in another place, He that hath ſeen the Son, that is, Chriſt, hath ſeen the Father alſo, chap. xiv. 9. There muſt be other paſſages conſulted, to reconcile theſe two, and find the meaning of them. And to this purpoſe, Believe me, ſays our Saviour in one place, I am in the Father, and the Father in me, ib. ver. 11. and in another place, I and my Father are one, chap. x. 30. So that, tho' no man had ever ſeen the Father without the Son; yet as many as had ſeen the Son, had ſeen the Father alſo in the Son.

Fourthly, Laying ſeveral paſſages together, which are differently expreſſed in words, and yet agree in ſenſe. As when our Saviour ſays in one place, Bleſſed are the poor in ſpirit, Matt. v. 3. which would be very plain, but that in another place, or according to another Evangeliſt, he ſays only, Bleſſed be ye poor, Luke vi. 20. as if he had ſpoken this to his diſciples only, and only with reference to their external poverty, which makes the ſenſe appear quite otherwiſe than it did before: But when both paſſages are laid together, and looked upon at once, the ſeeming difference will quickly vaniſh, and the meaning muſt be this; That not only his diſciples, but all other members of his Church, who were then, or ever after ſhould be poor in ſpirit, ſhould be bleſſed.

Fifthly, Collating ſentences that are more difficult, with others of the like importance that are more plain, and eaſy to be underſtood. For, as an ancient father very well obſerves, there is no paſſage in the Scriptures ſo difficult, but it is ſomewhere elſe explained in the Scriptures. And we muſt either ſearch the meaning out; or, we muſt only blame ourſelves, our own negligence and careleſſneſs, if we do not underſtand it.

Sixthly, Being careful to diſtinguiſh rightly betwixt figurative expreſſions, and ſuch as are to be literally underſtood. Of each of which we have an inſtance, in what our Saviour ſaid; ſee Matt. xxvi. 26, &c. Mark xiv. 22, &c. Luke xxii. 19, 20. when he diſtributed the bread and wine, at the inſtitution of his Holy Supper, this is my body, which is given for you. —— This is my blood, which is ſhed for you, 1 Cor. xi. 23, &c. Where the bread is called his body, and the wine his blood, only in a figurative ſenſe, as the breaking of the former, and the pouring out of the latter, ſignified and repreſented typically the breaking of his body, and the ſhedding of his blood for us: But his body is ſaid to be given, and his blood to be ſhed for us, in a literal ſenſe; becauſe they were really ſo diſpoſed of for our ſakes.

Seventhly, Weighing duly and impartially the conſequences of doctrines ſeemingly repugnant to each other; and taking ſuch as are leſs plain, and ſeem to claſh with the Divine Perfections in ſuch a qualified ſenſe, as that they may not overthrow others that are more expreſly taught, and do more exactly ſquare with thoſe perfections which we know to be in God, and do more directly aim at the promotion of holineſs and virtue.

Laſtly, Bringing the types and antitype, the Prophecies and perſon propheſied of, together, and comparing one with the other, to ſee how they agree. This courſe, no doubt, the Apoſtles always took, when they ſet themſelves to reaſon with the Jews, and prove that Jeſus was the Chriſt out of the Scriptures; ſhewing them how exactly he anſwered and agreed with all the types of him who was to come into the world, to redeem and ſave mankind, and how fully all the ancient Prophecies concerning the Meſſias were accompliſhed in his perſon.

Theſe are the helps that reaſon has, and muſt make uſe of, for interpreting the Sacred Writings. To which I ſhall only add this general rule to be obſerved; that when we meet with any matter there affirmed and taught, the manner or the reaſon of which we cannot comprehend, our reaſon in ſuch caſes ſhould be ſubjected to our faith; and we ſhould aſſent, without more ado, to whatever we are ſatisfied God has revealed, becauſe he has revealed it, though we cannot comprehend the thing that is ſo revealed, as to the reaſon or the manner of it: That is, though reaſon be not able to determine how, or why it ſhould be ſo, as we are aſſured it is by revelation. Therefore,

When the Apoſtle at any time bids us beware of philoſophy, or human learning, we are only to underſtand him, that it is not the uſe, but the abuſe thereof, which he forbids. And,

Now the uſe to be made of this Diſſertation, and of the Apoſtle's exhortation; not to be ſo proud upon this faculty of reaſon in us, which appears to be ſo imperfect and ſhort-ſighted, as to eſteem and ſet it up for the meaſure and ſtandard of all moral truth; nor to pronounce concerning things revealed by God, only becauſe we cannot comprehend the manner or the reaſon of them, that therefore it is impoſſible they ſhould be true: For, this would be to make man equal with, if not ſuperior to God himſelf. But to be humbly content that human reaſon and underſtanding ſhould ſubmit and vail to the Divine; and thankful for the helps we have to find out truth by revelation. In ſhort, that we be humble and ſincere in all our ſearches and enquiries after truth, and make the word of God, who cannot lie, nor will deceive, the ſtandard and the meaſure of it; aſſenting readily to what we find he has revealed in thoſe unerring writings, though human reaſon cannot find the meaning of it to perfection: Wiſely conſidering, that it is no derogation from the wiſdom and goodneſs of God, who is in his nature incomprehenſible, if he does reveal ſome truths concerning himſelf, which, though we muſt believe, yet we cannot comprehend.

In a word, and to conclude; Let us have faith, though in this imperfect ſtate we have not, neither can have viſion. And let us make that wiſe uſe of our reaſon to aſſent to, and believe, whatever truths we know God has revealed in Sacred Writ, becauſe he has revealed them, though we cannot yet diſcover the meaning or the reaſon of them: Concluding, that whatever he, who is the God of truth, reveals, muſt needs be true, and ought to be believed on his bare word, though we cannot comprehend it.

Critical and Explanatory ANNOTATIONS,

ON THE

Firſt Epiſtle of PAUL the APOSTLE,

TO THE THESSALONIANS.

The INTRODUCTION.

This Epiſtle was wrote to the Church at Theſſalonica, the chief city of Macedonia in Greece, which had been planted by Paul, and conſiſted of ſome converted Jews and a great number of Gentiles, ſome of which were called devout Greeks, being probably proſelytes of the Gate; ſee Acts xvii. 1---5. And that a great part were Gentiles, appears from the Apoſtle's ſaying, They turned to God from idols, ch. i. 9. Now,

The Apoſtle, I ſay, underſtanding by Timothy their ſtedfaſtneſs, wrote this Epiſtle to confirm them in the Chriſtian Faith, which they had received from him, and in a perſeverance therein, notwithſtanding any tribulation or perſecution, ch. i. 2, 3 Where obſerve, that the Apoſtle might mean that perſecution in particular, to which the unbelieving Jews, according to their uſual manner, excited the Gentiles, mentioned in Acts xvii. 5. To which purpoſe he, in the following chapters, inſtructs them in a godly courſe of life, and comforts them with the glorious hopes of the Reſurrection, and of being for ever with the Lord Jeſus, which ſhould ſatisfy them in the midſt of their concern for their deceaſed friends, eſpecially if any were perſecuted to death for the cauſe of religion.

He further ſhews, in ch. v. that the day of the Lord, or the time of Chriſt's coming to judgment at the general reſurrection (of which he was treating juſt before in the latter part of the foregoing chapter) was uncertain, and that it would ſurprize the ungodly world; but for thoſe that are Chriſtians, they need not be afraid, provided that they lived as ſuch, in that holy converſation which he inſtructs them in to the end of the Epiſtle.

CHAP. I.

1 The Theſſalonians are given to underſtand both how mindful of them St. Paul was at all times in Thanſgiving and Prayer: 5 and alſo how well he was perſuaded of the truth, and ſincerity of their faith, and converſion to God.

PAUL, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, unto the church of the Theſſalonians, which is in God the Father, and in the Lord Jeſus Chriſt: Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

2 We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers,

3 Remembring without ceaſing your work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, in the ſight of God, and our Father:

4 Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God.

5 For our Goſpel came not unto you in word only, but alſo in power, and in the Holy Ghoſt, and in much aſſurance; as ye know what manner of men we were among for your ſake.

6 And ye became followers of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghoſt:

7 So that ye were enſamples to all that believed in Macedonia and Achaia.

8 For from you ſounded out the word of the Lord, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but alſo in every place your faith to God-ward is ſpread abroad, ſo that we need not to ſpeak any thing.

9 For they themſelves ſhew of us, what manner of entring in we had unto you, and how ye turned to God from idols, to ſerve the living and true God,

10 And to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raiſed from the dead, even Jeſus which delivered us from the wrath to come.

The Apoſtle in this chapter ſtirs up the Theſſalonians to perſeverance, by a conſideration,

I. Of the rich grace of God beſtowed upon them by his miniſtry, ver. 2—7. And,

II. Of the great and general fame thereof in the Churches of God, ver. 8—10. and therefore they ſhould take care to maintain their ſtation, ſince the caſe of revolters is much more deſperate than of refuſers.

Ver. 9. How ye turned to God from idols.] i. e. How ye have embraced the faith, and Revelation of the Will of God through Jeſus Chriſt, having forſaken the Heatheniſh ſuperſtition, and worſhip of idols; ſee the Introduction.

Ver. 10. —His Son from Heaven.] At the day of judgment.

CHAP. II.

1 In what manner the Goſpel was brought and preached to the Theſſalonians; and in what ſort alſo they received it. 18 A reaſon is rendred both why Saint Paul was ſo long abſent from them, and alſo why he was ſo deſirous to ſee them.

FOR your ſelves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not in vain.

2 But even after that we had ſuffered before, and were ſhamefully entreated, as ye know, at Philippi, we were bold in our God to ſpeak unto you the goſpel of God with much contention.

3 For our exhortation was not of deceit, nor of uncleanneſs, nor in guile:

4 But as we were allowed of God to be put in truſt with the goſpel, even ſo we ſpeak, not as pleaſing men, but God, which trieth our hearts.

5 For neither at any time uſed we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloke of covetouſneſs; God is witneſs.

6 Nor of men ſought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, when we might have been burdenſom, as the apoſtles of Chriſt.

7 But we were gentle among you, even as a nurſe cheriſheth her children:

8 So being affectionately deſirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the goſpel of God only, but alſo our own ſouls, becauſe ye were dear unto us.

9 For ye remember, brethren, our labour and travel: for labouring night and day, becauſe we would not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the goſpel of God.

10 Ye are witneſſes, and God alſo, how holily, and juſtly, and unblameably we behaved our ſelves among you that believe:

11 As you know, how we exhorted and comforted, and charged every one of you (as a father doth his children)

12 That ye would walk worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory.

13 For this cauſe alſo thank we God without ceaſing, becauſe when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but (as it is in truth) the word of God, which effectually worketh alſo in you that believe.

14 For ye, brethren, became followers of the churches of God, which in Judea are in Chriſt Jeſus: for ye alſo have ſuffered like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews:

15 Who both killed the Lord Jeſus, and their own prophets, and have perſecuted us; and they pleaſe not God, and are contrary to all men:

16 Forbidding us to ſpeak to the Gentiles, that they might be ſaved, to fill up their ſins alway: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermoſt.

17 But we, brethren, being taken from you for a ſhort time, in preſence, not in heart, endeavoured the more abundantly to ſee your face with great deſire.

18 Wherefore we would have come unto you (even I Paul) once and again; but Satan hindred us.

19 For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoycing? are not even ye in the preſence of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt at his coming?

20 For ye are our glory and joy.

In this chapter the Apoſtle continues to exhort the Theſſalonians to perſeverance, and progreſs in the faith, received by,

I. A relation of his miniſterial carriage among them, ver. 1—12.

II. By their own experience of the efficacy and ſucceſs of his miniſtry among them. And,

III. From his ſingular care and tenderneſs over them.

Ver. 2. — At Philippi.] See Acts xvi. 22.

Ver. 3. — Not of deceit.] See our notes on Coloſſians ii. 8. and on the next verſe.

Ver. 4. — Not as pleaſing men, but God which trieth our hearts.] Paul doth here ſpeak of pleaſing men, and of pleaſing God, as things not only different in ſpeculation, but inconſiſtent in fact. When he profeſſeth of himſelf, that in the diſcharge of his miniſtry, he did not aim at pleaſing men, but God, which trieth our hearts; he ſeems to imply, that theſe are two oppoſite ends, and that thoſe who purſue the one, do thereby plainly ſhew that they have no regard at all to the other. But in other parts of his Epiſtles, he ſpeaks as if he was of a quite contrary opinion: He adviſes the Corinthians againſt doing any thing that might diſpleaſe any ſort of men: And that we may not think he exhorted them to what he did not practiſe himſelf, he recommends this advice to them, by the authority of his own example, 1 Cor. x. 32, 33. Give none offence, ſaith he, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the Church of God, even as I pleaſe all men in all things. What therefore he in this place declares, muſt receive ſome limitations; and it may be of uſe to us, not ſo much to juſtify Paul's conduct in this matter, as to regulate our own, to know what thoſe limits are; to enquire into the meaſures we ought to preſcribe to ourſelves, in our ſtudy to pleaſe men; to examine, when, and in what caſes an endeavour to pleaſe men is innocent, when unlawful, when the duty of a good and ſincere Chriſtian. I ſay, an endeavour to pleaſe; for the actual pleaſing of men is not within our power, nor doth it depend upon our choice; ſo that it cannot properly be the ſubject of any command or prohibition. When Paul therefore ſaith, that he did not pleaſe men, but God; this cannot be underſtood of his actual pleaſing men, but of his aim and endeavour to pleaſe them. Men may be pleaſed with thoſe actions that are performed, without any deſign to pleaſe them; but this pleaſure cannot be aſcribed as a virtue, or imputed as a fault, to thoſe who intended it not: When therefore we are either commanded or forbidden to pleaſe men, this precept is of the ſame nature, and muſt admit of the ſame interpretation, as that of Paul to Timothy, Let no man deſpiſe thee. It was not wholly in Timothy's power, whether he ſhould be deſpiſed or not; nor is it in ours, whether we ſhall pleaſe men, or not: But as by that command Timothy was enjoined to do ſuch things as might procure reverence, and to forbear ſuch as might cauſe contempt; ſo, when we are either commanded or forbidden to pleaſe men, we are enjoined or prohibited to do thoſe things which are moſt likely to pleaſe, or to intend the pleaſing of men by our actions: So that in this caſe, we are to meaſure the goodneſs or evil of our actions, not by their actual pleaſing, but by our deſign and endeavour to pleaſe; and are to ſhew when, and how far, this endeavour is innocent, when it is a ſin, and when it is a duty. Therefore,

Let it be obſerved, that God hath implanted in our ſouls a natural deſire of pleaſure; which conſequently in ſome caſes we may give way to; becauſe otherwiſe this deſire would be implanted in vain: To be pleaſed therefore, is not always a ſin, but is good or evil, according to its different cauſes, occaſions, and circumſtances. What things God hath not forbid us to be pleaſed with, in thoſe we may innocently take pleaſure; and as we may, without guilt, be pleaſed ourſelves, ſo may we, with innocence, contribute to the warrantable pleaſures of each other; For what another can innocently be pleaſed with, that I may do without ſin; ſince if I could not do it without ſin, neither could he without guilt be pleaſed in my doing of it, becauſe no one ought to be pleaſed with any action which is in the leaſt ſinful; and if an action be in itſelf lawful, it cannot become otherwiſe by its pleaſing others, unleſs there were ſome law of God againſt doing any thing which might pleaſe our brother. But that a thing pleaſes, is ſo far from making what is in it ſelf innocent to become ſinful, that rather of indifferent, it makes it a duty; for ſince we are bound to contribute to the happineſs of our brethren, and ſo far as we do pleaſe them without expoſing them to any miſchief, we do make them happy; to pleaſe others, where it can be done without ſin, ſeems to be an act of brotherly charity. God hath been ſo indulgent to us, that he hath debarred us from no pleaſures, but ſuch as will at laſt end in grief and pain; and we are ſo far from being forbidden to promote the pleaſure of others, that we are never reſtrained from pleaſing them, but where the pleaſure which we afford them, will at laſt tend to their hurt.

This rule will juſtify us in the uſe of all innocent methods of pleaſing each other. We may comply with the warrantable cuſtoms of the age and manners of thoſe we live with: We may make our perſons acceptable to thoſe with whom we converſe, by civil and obliging converſation: We may divert their imagination with the pleaſantry of wit, and innocent mirth; and much more feed their underſtandings with delightful truths: In ſhort, we may miniſter to any unforbidden pleaſure of each other, without being guilty of ſo pleaſing men, as to diſpleaſe God, who trieth our hearts. Yet,

The pleaſures of men are to be bounded within certain limits, beyond which if they paſs, they became unwarrantable. The will of man, by the law of our creation, ought to be ſubordinate to the will of God: Whilſt it conforms it ſelf to that rule, it is juſt: When it any way tranſgreſſes that, it becomes unjuſt. When man therefore is pleaſed with that which diſpleaſes God, this pleaſure is ſinful, becauſe nothing, which is contrary to the Will of God, ought to be the object of our pleaſure. And as men ought not to be pleaſed with any thing which is ſinful, ſo ought they not to do any thing which is ſinful, to pleaſe each other: For, what is in itſelf unlawful, cannot become lawful by its pleaſing; ſince the pleaſing or diſpleaſing men is wholly extrinſical to the morality of our actions, any otherwiſe than as God commands or forbids us to pleaſe them: To ſome men indeed our actions will be pleaſing or diſpleaſing, as they are good or bad; but they are good or bad, only as they are pleaſing or diſpleaſing to God.

This rule will condemn all endeavour to pleaſe men, by doing any thing which is evil; evil to them or to us; deſtructive to their ſalvation, or to our own.

And firſt, We muſt not to pleaſe men, do any thing which is prejudicial to their ſalvation. It is the height of folly, to be pleaſed with what tends to our ruin, and of cruelty to pleaſe others, at the expence of their eternal happineſs. He would do a very inhuman office to his friend, who ſhould adminiſter him a deadly draught, tho' it pleaſed his palate, and were ſweeter than honey in his mouth. By this vicious complaiſance, the ſerpent firſt beguiled Eve; and ſhe, being deceived, brought Adam into the tranſgreſſion: When ſhe had taſted the forbidden fruit, and eaten thereof, ſhe was willing, in great courteſy, to oblige her Lord, by communicating to him, in the ſame morſel, pleaſure and death. Of the ſame fatal treachery are all thoſe inſtruments of Satan guilty, who inſtruct raw and unpractiſed ſinners in the ways of vice; bring them firſt acquainted with ſin, and take upon them, with the Devil on the mount, to ſhew them the world, and the pleaſures of it. Theſe make it their buſineſs to call aſide paſſengers, who are going on right in the ways of virtue, and to lead them officiouſly into the more pleaſant paths of vice, Prov. ix. 16, 17. Whoſo is ſimple, they bid him turn aſide thither; and as for him that wanteth underſtanding, they ſay unto him, ſtolen waters are ſweet, and bread eaten in ſecret, is pleaſant. Thus, Prov. vii. 21, &c. With much fair ſpeech they cauſe him to yield; with the flattering of their lips they enſnare him. He goeth after pleaſure ſtrait way, as an ox goeth to the ſlaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the ſtocks: As a bird, he haſteth to the ſnare, and knoweth not that it is for his life; 'till at laſt he finds, by ſad experience, that this pleaſant way leads to hell, and goes down to the chambers of death.

Next to this firſt rank of ſinners, who pleaſe men by being their tutors and directors in vice, are thoſe complaiſant perſons, who though they do not plainly and expreſly invite men to be wicked, yet countenance them in their vice, and encourage them to continue in it, by flattery or connivance. They know how unable vice is to ſuſtain itſelf under diſgrace; and how glad a vicious man is, when his ſins, of which he himſelf is naturally aſhamed, are kept in countenance by thoſe with whom he converſes. Theſe courteous men therefore, are careful ſtrictly to watch all their words, leſt any ſhould eſcape them, which might betray the leaſt diſlike of what thoſe perſons do, whoſe ruin they had rather ſee, than feel their diſpleaſure. If by oppoſing themſelves to the licentious practices of a daring ſinner, they ſhould chance to offend him, ſome ſmall temporal intereſt of their own might be in danger; which, becauſe it is their own, they do not think worth hazarding, to purchaſe the eternal ſalvation of another. If their deluded friend ſhould be ſo hardy, as to walk upon a precipice, they are more complaiſant than to ſpoil a frolick, though the next ſtep may be into the depths of hell. Over men of ſuch ſordid ſpirits, ſinners have as great a power, as they have over their own conſciences: When ungodly men have once prevail'd with their conſciences not to accuſe them, theſe flatterers ſoon take the hint, and preſently ſtop their mouths; and both together ſuffer the habitual ſinner to go on quietly to perdition: For ſuch men think it ſufficient, that their charity to the ſoul of their brother, ſhould keep pace with his love to himſelf: And if it is his pleaſure to ſacrifice his ſoul to his luſts, he diſpoſeth of what is his own; and they will not be ſo impertinently rude, as to intermeddle in the concerns of another.

They find it is his humour to live without controul, and they know how to make their court better than to attempt to ſave a man againſt his will. This ſordid compliance with the wicked, for fear of diſpleaſing them, as it is a ſign of a baſe and ſervile ſpirit, wherever it is met; ſo is it attended with greater degrees of guilt and ſcandal in thoſe, whoſe peculiar office it is boldly to rebuke ſin, and to ſhew the people their tranſgreſſions. God hath denounced very ſevere woes againſt thoſe Seers, who ſhut their eyes, and will not ſee; who ſpeak ſmooth things, and prophecy deceit; who ſow pillows under the arms of ſinners, that they may ſleep on ſecurely, and take their eaſe. Should the miniſters of the Goſpel ſuit their doctrines not to the edification, but to the palates of their hearers; ſhould they, who are allowed of God to be put in truſt with the Goſpel, even ſo ſpeak, not as pleaſing God, which trieth our hearts, but as pleaſing men; ſhould they handle the word of God deceitfully, not by manifeſtation of the truth, commending themſelves to every man's conſcience, but diſſimulation of the truth, commending themſelves to ſome mens favour; ſhould they, in order to compliment ſinners of diſtinction and rank, repreſent the way which leadeth unto life, as much broader, and the gate which entreth into Heaven, as a great deal wider, than Chriſt in the Goſpel hath taught us they are; ſhould they take more care to advance pleaſing errors, than to preach uſeful truths; ſhould they alter, ſhould they diſguiſe, ſhould they ſtifle any fundamental points, either of the Chriſtian Faith, or of the Chriſtian Practice, which they had formerly inculcated with zeal and earneſtneſs, not becauſe they judged ſuch points to be leſs true, leſs neceſſary, or leſs ſeaſonable, but merely becauſe they found them to be leſs taking, leſs popular, and leſs faſhionable, than they had been; ſhould, I ſay, the ſtewards of the myſteries of God be at any time thus unfaithful, they would probably incur the diſpleaſure even of thoſe very men, whom by ſo ſcandalous a conduct they ſought to pleaſe; they would certainly expoſe themſelves to the juſt cenſures of all wiſe and good men, and to the utmoſt indignation of an offended God. Should we thus depart out of the Way, ſhould we cauſe many to ſtumble at thy law, ſhould we corrupt the Covenant of God, it would be juſt in God to make us contemptible and baſe before all the people, according as we have not kept his Ways, but have been partial in his law. But were we ſure to pleaſe men by ſuch baſe compliances, yet ſhould we deſerve ill of thoſe, whom by thus pleaſing we expoſed to ruin. Better are the keeneſt reproofs of an open enemy, than the fatal endearments of thoſe falſe friends, who, whilſt they flatter men into damnation, and betray thoſe to whom they make their court, have no other title than Judas had, to be numbered amongſt the faithful ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt. But, 2dly, As we may not pleaſe men, by doing any thing which is deſtructive to their ſalvation; ſo neither may we pleaſe them, by doing any thing which may endanger our own. Charity to my brother, obliges me rather to incur his diſpleaſure than to contribute to his ruin; and charity to my own ſoul, will make me rather venture to diſpleaſe man than God. It is not lawful for any man to make his pleaſure the rule of his own actions; much leſs ought another to make his will the meaſure of mine: He, who expects that I ſhould comply with him, is himſelf bound up by the ſame laws as I am: We are both limited by the laws of God, and it can be no excuſe to either of us, that we ſeek to gratify our fellow-ſervant, by tranſgreſſing the commands of our common Lord and Maſter.

When at any time we conſult the pleaſure, and comply with the deſires of each other, it is not ſo properly men whom we deſire to pleaſe, as God, who hath commanded us in ſome things to pleaſe men: And to ſhew that it is not the pleaſure of man which governs us any otherwiſe than in ſubordination to God's, when the will of our fellow-creatures runs counter to the commandments of God our Creator, we ought no longer to ſhew our ſelves obſequious and complaiſant. Whatever motives can be urged for our compliance in any thing which is ſinful, will betray the cauſe which they are brought for, and plead much ſtronger for a peremptory refuſal. If to work upon our gratitude paſt favours are pretended, why we ſhould not ſtand out, the mercies we have received from God are infinitely greater, the obligations to him earlier, and the ties by which we are bound to him much ſtronger.

If thoſe who would have us do their pleaſure, addreſs themſelves to our hopes, by ſhewing that it is our intereſt to humour them, or would prevail upon our fears, by repreſenting to us the ill conſequences of diſobliging them, yet Heaven hath greater rewards in ſtore than they can promiſe, much more than they can make good; and hell hath greater plagues in reſerve than they can threaten, much more than they can inflict. If we chuſe to offend them, rather than diſobey God, we have juſt reaſon to hope, that his providence will ſhelter us from any ill effects of their diſpleaſure: But if to pleaſe them, we offend God, their power is unable to ſecure us from, or to ſupport us under his diſpleaſure.

His anger is unavoidable, ſo that there is no flying from it: His vengeance is inſupportable, ſo that there is no abiding under it. We may ſometimes incur the diſpleaſure pleaſure of men, for not conforming our practice to theirs, but we can never deſerve it; and this teſtimony of our own conſcience, that we ſuffer unjuſtly, will bear us up againſt their frowns: But we can never diſpleaſe God, but we muſt at the ſame time wound our own conſcience, which will then be ſo far from ſupporting us under the weight of God's diſpleaſure, that it will it ſelf prove a burden too great for man to bear. From men's diſpleaſure, be the effects of it at preſent never ſo ſevere, there will in a ſhort time be a final releaſe; but the Divine Vengeance will purſue us out of this world into the next; in the grave we ſhall not find any ſanctuary againſt that puniſhment, which will laſt as long as the guilt which deſerves it, the ſoul which ſuffers it, and God, who inflicts it.

Theſe thoughts ought always to be preſent to our minds, to deter us from ſeeking to pleaſe men by any ſinful practices; for no temptation which Satan uſeth, turns better to his account, or betrays more ſouls into the ſnares of death, than his fear of diſpleaſing men: It is not the perſecution of tyrants only, that makes men fall from their duty, but every private man hath that awe over his neighbour, as to fright him into ſin: It is not only out of the fear of death, or baniſhment, or poverty, or any evils of the firſt magnitude, that we tranſgreſs the laws of God; but the fear of an angry word, an unkind look, a cool indifference towards us, ſhall make us comply with what we know to be ſinful and damnable.

